Beneath an awful gloom, a night of shade,
By silent darkness more majestic made,
I place thy volume, YOUNG, with reverence place;
Thy volume, worthy of a saint's embrace!
What gospel-truths thy heavenly lines convey,
And steal us from mortality away!
Full on the soul thy tides of rapture flow,
Kindling we hear, and, while we read, we glow!
Exalted by thy theme, we mount on high,
We spurn at earth, we claim our native sky.
Now let the unletter'd, or the letter'd man,
Deny the soul immortal, if he can:
A soul immortal in thy works we see;
Can dust and ashes think and write like thee?

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR

Let us in sweet gloom, a world of hours,
By silent darkness more and more retire;
To place the volume Young, with reverence placed;
The volume, worthy of a saint's embrace;
What sacred truths thy heavenly lines convey,
And lead us from mortality away!
Laid on the soul thy rills of rapture flow,
Kindling we hear, and while we read, we glow!
Inspired by thy theme, we mount on high,
We spurn at earth, we chain our native fly.
Now let the vulgar herd, or the polluted man,
Dread the foul immortal, if he can:
A soul immortal in thy works we see;
In dust and ashes thick and wide like thee?

THE LIFE OF YOUNG.

FOR the life of YOUNG, the world is obliged to Mr. Herbert Croft, the English lexicographer, formerly a barrister of Lincoln's-Inn, now a clergyman, who was the friend of his son, and wished to vindicate him from some very mistaken remarks to his prejudice. Mr. Croft's narrative, which exhibits a successful imitation of Dr. Johnson's style, was subjected to the revision of our great poetical biographer, who adopted it as an introduction to his critical examination of the genius and writings of Young.

The facts stated in the present account are chiefly taken from Mr. Croft's narrative, with the addition of such particulars as subsequent researches, or casual information, have supplied.

Edward Young was born at Upham, near Winchester, in June 1681. He was the son of Dr. Edward Young, at that time Fellow of Winchester College, and Rector of Upham. In 1682, he was collated to the prebend of Gillingham-Minor, in the church of Salisbury, by Bishop Ward. He was afterwards, in consequence of his merit and reputation, or of the interest of Lord Bradford, to whom, in 1702, he dedicated two volumes of sermons, appointed Chaplain to King William and Queen Mary, and preferred to the deanery of Salisbury. Jacob, who wrote in 1720, says, "he was Chaplain and Clerk of the Closet to the late Queen, who honoured him, by standing godmother to the poet." He died at Salisbury, in 1705. Burnet preached his funeral sermon, and bestowed upon him a handsome eulogium.

He was placed on the foundation at Winchester College, where he remained till the election after his eighteenth birth-day, the period at which those upon the foundation are superannuated; when, not being chosen to New College, Oxford, he, on the 13th of October 1703, was entered an independent member of that society, that he might live at little expence at the lodgings of the Warden, who was a particular friend of his father. In a few months, the Warden of New College died. He then removed to Corpus College. The president of this society, from a regard also to his father, invited him thither, in order to lessen his academical expences. In 1708, he was nominated to a law-fellowship at All Souls, by Archbishop Tenison; into whose hands it came by devolution. Such repeated patronages, while it justifies Burnet's praise of the father, reflects credit on the conduct of the son. The manner in which it was exerted, seems to prove, that the father did not leave behind him much wealth.

It is reported, that when he first found himself independent, and his own master, at All Souls, he was not the ornament to religion and morality which he afterwards became.

Pope is said, by Ruffhead, to have told Warburton, that "Young had passed a foolish youth, the sport of peers; but his having a very good heart, enabled him to support the clerical character, when he assumed it, with decency, and afterwards with honour."

The authority of his father, indeed, had ceased some time before by his death; and he was certainly not ashamed to be patronized by the Duke of Wharton, "the scorn and wonder of his days."

His father had been well acquainted with Mrs. Anne Wharton, the first wife of Thomas Wharton, Esq. afterwards Marquis of Wharton, a lady celebrated for her poetical talents, by Burnet and by Waller. The father of the Duke of Wharton, had been the friend of his father; and, after he became ennobled, did not drop the son of his old friend: In him, during the short time he lived, Young found a patron, and in his eccentric and dissolute descendent, a friend and a companion. But the duke, it is to be supposed, did not at once sink into the depths of profligacy. That he had great and shining abilities, was acknowledged by his contemporaries, who entertained the greatest hopes of his becoming an honour to his country. It is not unreasonable to imagine, that the bare acquaintance with such a man as Wharton proved to be, might give rise to the report of his having relaxed, in early youth, from the strict and rigid rules of virtue; of the truth of which, there is not sufficient evidence.

The testimony of Tindal, who spent much of his time at All Souls, is an unquestionable authority in favour of Young's warmth and ability in the cause of religion, in the early part of his life.

"The other boys," said he, "I can always answer, because I always know whence they have their arguments, which I have read a hundred times; but that fellow Young, is continually pestering me with something of his own."

In 1712, when Queen Anne called up to the House of Lords the sons of the Earls of Northampton and Aylesbury, and added, in one day, ten others to the number of peers, he published An Epistle to the Right Honourable George Lord Lansdown; in order to reconcile the people to one, at least, of the new lords. It seems intended also to reconcile the public to the late peace.

The affectionate mention of the death of his friend Harrison, of New College, at the close of the poem, is an instance of his art, which displayed itself so wonderfully afterwards in the Night Thoughts, of making the public a party in his private sorrow.

Of this poem, there is no appearance in his own edition of his works, in 4 vols; 8vo; and prefixed to an edition by Curll and Tonson, in 1741, is a letter from Young to Curll, in which he advises its omission. "I think," says he, in the preface to the Works of the Author of the Night Thoughts, "the following pieces, in four volumes, to be the most excusable of all that I have written; and I wish less apology was needful for these. As there is no recalling what is got abroad, the pieces here republished I have revised and corrected, and rendered them as pardonable as it was in my power to do." It is but justice to distinguish what the author of the Night Thoughts deliberately rejected.

When Addison published "Cato," in 1713, Young prefixed to it a recommendatory copy of verses. This is one of the pieces which he did not republish.

The Last Day was published the same year. The Vice-Chancellor's Imprimatur: for it was first printed at Oxford, is dated May 19. 1713. From the exordium, he appears to have spent some time in the composition of it. While other bards with Britain's hero set their souls on fire, he draws, he says, a deeper scene. This serious poem was finished by him as early as 1710; for part of it is printed in the "Tatler." The "Englishman" of October 29. 1713, which was probably written by Addison, speaks handsomely of it. It was inscribed to the queen in a dedication; which, for some reason, he did not admit into his works. It tells her, that the only title to the great honour he now does himself, is the obligation which he formerly received from her royal indulgence.

Of this obligation nothing is now known, unless he alluded to her being his godmother. He is said, indeed, to have been engaged at a settled stipend, as a writer for the court. In Swift's "Rhapsody on Poetry," are these lines, speaking of the court:

Whence Gay was banish'd in disgrace,
Where Pope will never show his face,
Where Y—— must torture his invention,
To flatter knaves, or lose his pension.

That Y—— means Young, seems clear from four other lines in the same poem:

Attend, ye Popes, and Youngs, and Gays,
And tune your harps, and strew your bays;
Your panegyrics here provide;
You cannot err on flattery's side.

Of the dedication, the complexion is clearly political. It speaks in the highest terms of the peace of Utrecht. Mr. Croft doubts whether he had a right to withdraw the praise he had once given, and asks, "Was he conscious of the exaggeration of party? Then he should not have written it. If it contained only the praise of truth, he should not have omitted it in his works." Surely this is denying a man the privilege of becoming wiser by his own experience! Young, in the warmth of party zeal, might very honestly and sincerely write a panegyric, which time, and a clearer knowledge of characters, might convince him was undeserved; all he could then do, was silently to suppress, as far as he was able, those errors into which an upright heart had betrayed his judgment.

The poem itself, is not without a glance towards politics, notwithstanding the subject. The cry, that the church was in danger, had not yet subsided. The Last Day, written by a layman, was much approved by the Tory ministry, and their friends.

The Force of Religion, or Vanquished Love, was published before the queen's death. This poem is founded on the execution of Lady Jane Gray, and her husband, Lord Guildford Dudley, 1554; a story chosen for the subject of an epistle by Cawthra Smith, and wrought into tragedy by Rowe. The flattering dedication of it to the Countess of Salisbury, does not appear in his own edition.

On the 23d of April 1714, he took his degree of Bachelor of Civil Law; and, the same year, he published a poem on the Queen's death, and his Majesty's accession to the throne. It is inscribed to Addison, then Secretary to the Lords Justices. This poem he did not admit into his works.

In 1716, when the foundation of the Codrington Library was laid, he was appointed to speak the Latin Oration. In his letter to Curll, he says, "If you will take my advice, I would have you omit the Oration on Codrington. I think the collection will sell better without it." This oration he did not admit into his works.

In 1717, when Wharton, after his return from his travels, went to Ireland, it is not unlikely that Young accompanied his avowed friend and patron. From a passage relating to Swift, in his letter to Richardson, on original composition, it is clear he was, at some period of his life, in that country.

In 1719, he was received into the Earl of Exeter's family, as tutor to Lord Burleigh; which he soon quitted, upon the pressing solicitations of Wharton, and his promises of serving and advancing him in the world.

The same year, his Busiris, King of Egypt, was acted at the theatre in Drury-Lane, and met with success. The plot is of his own contrivance. The haughty message sent by Busiris to the Persian Ambassador, is copied from that returned by the Ethiopian Prince to Cambyfes, in the third book of Herodotus. The dialogue contains many striking beauties of sentiment and description, but it is written in a glaring ambitious style; the pride of Busiris is such as no other man can have; and the whole is too remote from human life, to raise either grief, horror, or indignation. It was inscribed to the Duke of Newcastle, "because the late instances he had received of his Grace's undeserved and uncommon favour, in an affair of some consequence, foreign to the theatre, had taken from him the privilege of choosing a patron." The dedication he afterwards suppressed.

He took the degree of Doctor of Laws on the 10th of June 1719. The same year, he lamented the death of Addison, in a letter addressed to their common friend, Tickell. According to Spence's MSS, they used to "communicate to each other whatever verses they wrote, even to the least things."

The same year appeared A Paraphrase on part of the Book of Job, which he dedicated, in no common strain of flattery, to Lord Chancellor Parker. Of this work, his opinion may be known from his letter to Curll:—"You seem, in the collection you propose, to have omitted what I think may claim the first place in it; I mean, "A Translation from part of Job, printed by Mr. Tonson." The dedication was only suffered to appear in Tonson's edition.

In 1721, The Revenge, a tragedy, was acted at the theatre in Drury-Lane, and met with very great success. This is his best dramatic performance. It approaches much nearer to human practices and manners than Busiris, and therefore keeps possession of the stage. The first design seems suggested by "Othello" and "Abdelazar;" but he has, in some respects, greatly improved on both. The reflections, the incidents, and the diction, are original. The moral observations are so introduced and so expressed, as to have all the novelty that can be required.

He dedicated this famous tragedy to Wharton. "Your Grace," says the dedication, "has been pleased to make yourself accessory to the following scenes, not only by suggesting the most beautiful incident in them, but by making all possible provision for the success of the whole." That Wharton should have suggested the incident to which he alludes, is not unlikely, as his last mental exertion, in his quarters at Lerida in Spain, was some scenes of a tragedy, on the story of "Mary Queen of Scots;" to which Lady Mary Wortley Montague wrote an epilogue, which is preserved in Dodsley's "Collection."

He concludes his address to Wharton, whom he acknowledges not only as the defender of his poetry, but as the promoter of his fortune, thus: "My present fortune is his bounty, and my future his care; which, I will venture to say, will be always remembered to his honour; since he, I know, intended his generosity as an encouragement to merit; though, through his very pardonable partiality to one who bears him so sincere a duty and respect, I happen to receive the benefit of it." He excluded this dedication from his own edition of his works.

To the patronage of this unhappy character, he was certainly, however, indebted for something material. Wharton's regard for Young, added to his "lust of praise," procured to All Souls College a donation, which was not forgotten when he dedicated The Revenge.

Two annuities were also granted by the Duke to Young; one of which was dated March 24. 1719, and accounted for his Grace's bounty in a style princely and commendable, if not legal:—"Considering that the public good is advanced by the encouragement of learning, and the polite arts, and being pleased therein with the attempts of Dr. Young; in consideration thereof, and of the love I bear him, &c." The other was dated July 10. 1722.

When Lord Chancellor Hardwicke was to determine, March 14. 1740, whether these annuities were for legal considerations, Young, on his examination, swore, that he quitted the Exeter family, and refused an annuity of 100 l., which had been offered him for life, if he would continue tutor to Lord Burleigh, upon the solicitations of the Duke of Wharton, and his Grace's assurances of providing for him in a much more ample manner.

It also appeared, that the Duke had given him a bond for 600 l., dated March 15. 1721, in consideration of his taking several journeys, and being at great expences, in order to be chosen Member of Parliament, at the Duke's desire; and in consideration of his not taking two livings of 200 l. and 400 l., in the gift of All Souls College, on his Grace's promises of serving and advancing him in the world. The attempt to get into Parliament was at Cirencester, where Young stood a contested election, about 1721, in which he was unsuccessful.

His Satires were originally published separately, under the title of The Love of Fame, or The Universal Passion. The first appeared in 1725. The fifth was not published till 1727, and the sixth not till 1728; when he gathered them into one publication, "corrected and enlarged," and prefixed a preface, decisive in favour of laughing at the world; which he preserved, without any palliation, in the collection of his works. They were inscribed to the Duke of Dorset, Mr. Dodington, afterwards Lord Melcombe, Mr. Spencer Compton, afterwards Lord Wilmington, Lady Elizabeth Germain, Sir Robert Walpole, &c.

By the Universal Passion, according to Mr. Croft, he acquired more than three thousand pounds. His son informed Dr. Johnson and Mr. Boswell, in 1781, "that his father had received several thousand pounds of subscription-money for his Universal Passion, but had lost it in the South Sea. Dr. Johnson thought this must be a mistake; for he had never seen a subscription-book."

It is related by Spence, in his MSS., on the authority of Mr. Rawlinson, that Young, upon the publication of his Universal Passion, received from the Duke of Grafton two thousand pounds; and that, when one of his friends exclaimed "two thousand pounds for a poem," he said it was the best bargain he ever made in his life; for the poem was worth four thousand. This story may be true; but it seems to have been raised from the two answers of Sidney and Lord Burleigh, respecting the "Faery Queene."

In 1726, he addressed a poem, called The Installment, to Sir Robert Walpole, of which the title sufficiently explains the intention. It is among the pieces he did not admit into the number of his pardonable writings.

At the accession of George II., he published Ocean, An Ode, concluding with a Wish. The hint of it was taken from the Royal Speech; which recommended the increase and the encouragement of the seamen; that they might be invited, rather than compelled by force and violence, to enter into the service of their country; a plan which humanity must lament that policy has not even yet been able or willing to carry into execution. Prefixed to the original publication, were An Ode to the King, Pater Patriæ, and an Essay on Lyric Poetry. He preserved neither of them in his own edition. The Ode itself, which in the first edition, and in the last, consists of seventy-three stanzas, in his own edition is reduced to fifty-nine. Among the omitted passages, is the Wish. The Essay on Lyric Poetry is so just and impartial, as to condemn himself.

Soon after the appearance of Ocean, when he was almost fifty, he entered into orders; and, in April 1728, not long after he put on the gown, he was appointed Chaplain to the King.

The tragedy of The Brothers, which was already in rehearsal, he immediately withdrew from the stage, as unbecoming his new profession.

It is related by Ruffhead, that, when he determined on the church, he addressed himself to Pope, for instructions in theology; who, in a frolic, advised the diligent perusal of Thomas Aquinas. With this treasure, he retired from interruption, to an obscure place in the suburbs. Pope hearing nothing of him during half a year, and apprehending he might have carried the jest too far, sought after him, and found him just in time to prevent what Ruffhead calls "an irretrievable derangement."

Not long after he took orders, he published, in prose, A True Estimate of Human Life, 1728, dedicated to the Queen; and a Sermon, preached before the House of Commons, January 30. 1729, intitled, An Apology for Princes, or the Reverence due to Government. The True Estimate of Human Life, exhibits only the dark side. Being asked, why he did not give, as he promised, the bright representation; he is said to have replied, that he could not. By others it has been said, that this was finished; but that, before there existed any copy, it was torn in pieces by a lady's monkey.

In 1730, he relapsed to poetry, and published Imperium Pelagi, a Naval Lyric; written in imitation of Pindar's Spirit, occasioned by his Majesty's return from Hanover, September 1729, and the succeeding Peace. It is inscribed to the Duke of Chandos. In the preface he observes, that the ode is the most spirited kind of poetry, and that the Pindaric is the most spirited kind of ode. "This I speak," he adds, with sufficient candour, "at my own very great peril. But truth has an eternal title to our confession, though we are sure to suffer by it." It was one of the pieces which he deliberately refused to own. It was ridiculed in Fielding's "Tom Thumb."

Not long after this Pindaric attempt, he published Two Epistles to Mr. Pope, concerning the Authors of the Age, 1730. In July the same year, he was presented, by his college, to the rectory of Welwyn, in Hertfordshire, worth above 500*l.* a-year.

In May 1731, he married Lady Elizabeth Lee, daughter of the Earl of Litchfield, and widow of Colonel Lee, who left a son and two daughters. His connection with this lady, arose from his father's acquaintance with Mrs. Anne Wharton, who was the daughter and co-heiress of Sir Henry Lee of Ditchley, in Oxfordshire, and sister of the Countess of Abingdon, celebrated by Dryden in a funeral panegyric, intitled, "Eleanora."

His next publication was The Sea-Piece, in two odes, with a poetical dedication to Voltaire, whom he had seen when he was in England, at Eastbury, the seat of Mr. Dodington, in Dorsetshire, which Thomson, in his "Autumn," calls the "Seat of the Muses,"

Where in the secret bower, and winding walk,
For virtuous Young and thee they twine the bay.

He enjoys the credit of an extempore Epigram on the French poet, who ridiculed, in the company of the jealous English poet, Milton's "Allegory of Sin and Death."

You are so witty, profligate, and thin,
At once we think thee Milton, Death, and Sin.

From the following passage in the poetical dedication of The Sea-Piece, it seems that this extemporaneous reproof was something more gentle than the distich now quoted.

No stranger, Sir, though born in foreign climes;
In Dorset downs, when Milton's page
With Sin and Death provok'd thy rage,
Thy rage provok'd, who sooth'd with gentle rhymes.

In 1734, he published The Foreign Address, or the best Argument for Peace, occasioned by the British Fleet, and the Posture of Affairs, written in the character of a sailor. It is not to be found in his own edition of his works.

In 1741, he was deprived of his wife. She brought him one child, Frederick, now living, to whom the Prince of Wales was godfather. The Night Thoughts, a species of poetry altogether his own, were begun immediately after the mournful event of 1741. The first Night appears in the books of the Company of Stationers, as the property of Dodsley, in 1742. The preface to Night seventh, is dated July 7. 1744.

In the short preface to the Complaint, he tells us, "that the occasion of the poem was real, not fictitious; and that the facts mentioned did naturally pour these reflections on the thought of the writer."

Whatever names belong to these facts, or if the names be those generally supposed; whatever heightening a poet's sorrow may have given the facts, it is generally understood, that he had really felt domestic grief; and that disappointed prospects afforded him an ostensible and sufficient cause of complaint.

The passages respecting Philander, Narcissa, Lucia, and Lorenzo, have been applied to his son-in-law, his daughter-in-law, his wife, and his son. It is probable, that he had his wife and daughter-in-law in view for the characters of Lucia and Narcissa; but all the circumstances relating to Philander, do not appear to suit his son-in-law. He thus deplores his loss in an apostrophe to death.

Insatiate archer! could not one suffice?
Thy shaft flew thrice, and thrice my peace was slain;
And thrice, ere thrice yon moon had fill'd her horn.

It is probable, from the following circumstances, that, in these three contradictory lines, the poet complains more than the father-in-law, the friend, or the widower.

When Young married Lady Elizabeth Lee, she had a son and two daughters living by her former husband. The son was an officer; he married, and died soon after, leaving no child. The eldest daughter was married to Mr. Temple, son of Lord Palmerston. She fell into a declining state of health, and was accompanied by her mother, &c. to the south of France, and died at Lyons, on her way to Nice, in 1736, within a year after her marriage, and only seventeen years old. It is more than poetically true, that Young accompanied her to the Continent.

I flew, I snatched her from the rigid north,
And bore her nearer to the sun.

Her funeral was attended with the difficulties painted in such animated colours in Night Third. She was secretly buried in the King's Garden at Montpelier. "The spot, a little gloomy grove, is known—I saw it," says Lord Gardenstone; "it is indeed a doleful shade." After her death, the remainder of the party passed the ensuing winter at Nice. Mr. Temple married again, and left a son by his second wife, a daughter of Sir John Barnard's, who, in 1757, succeeded to his grandfather's title. He died in 1740, and the poet's wife seven months after, in 1741. How could the insatiate archer thrice slay his peace in these three persons, "ere thrice the moon had fill'd her horn!"

From the great friendship which constantly subsisted between Mr. Temple and Young, as well as from other circumstances, Mr. Croft seems to be of opinion, that Mr. Temple was the person whom he lamented under the name of Philander. It is not, however, very probable, that so young a man as Mr. Temple must have been, should have been the friend of twenty years, whom the poet mourned. Besides, Philander died before Mrs. Temple.

Narcissa follows ere his tomb is clos'd, &c.

Perhaps those passages respecting Philander, which do not appear to suit Mr. Temple, may be found applicable to Mrs. Temple's brother, the officer, who died before her; and may, with more probability be reckoned the third victim over whom Young has hitherto been pitied, for having to pour the midnight sorrows of his religious poetry.

Lady Elizabeth left her youngest daughter under the care of Young, with whom she lived till her marriage with Major Haviland, whom she accompanied to Ireland, and lived but a short time after.

Mr. Croft has taken much pains to prove, that the character of Lorenzo, applied to the poet's son in the "Biographia," could not be meant for him; nor, indeed, does it seem possible. Mr. Frederick Young was not born till June 1733. In 1741, this Lorenzo, this finished infidel, this father, to whose education vice had, for some years, put the last hand, was only eight years old. Lorenzo is evidently a feigned character; and the readers of the Night Thoughts are much indebted to Mr. Croft, "for discovering that no such character ever yet disgraced human nature, or broke a father's heart."

This report, so open to contradiction, and so impossible to be true, seems to have arisen from an unhappy misunderstanding between Young and his son; whose boyish follies, it is said, "cast a gloom over the evening of his father's days," and, at last, brought "his gray hairs with sorrow to the grave."

On this accusation, and on the charge advanced in the "Biographia," of his having been forbidden his college at Oxford for misbehaviour, Mr. Croft observes, "From juvenile follies who is free? But whatever the "Biographia" choose to relate, the son of Young experienced no dismission from his college, either lasting or temporary. Yet, were nature to indulge him with a second youth, and to leave him, at the same time, the experience of that which is past, he would probably spend it differently—who would not? He would certainly be the occasion of less uneasiness to his father. But, from the same experience, he would certainly, in the same case, be treated differently by his father.

“Young was a poet: poets, with reverence be it spoken, do not make the best parents. Fancy and imagination seldom deign to stoop from their heights; always stoop unwillingly to the low level of common duties.

“But the son of Young would sooner, I know, pass for a Lorenzo, than see himself vindicated at the expence of his father's memory; from follies which, if it may be thought blameable in a boy to have committed them, it is surely praiseworthy in a man to lament, and certainly not only unnecessary, but cruel in a biographer to record.

“The famous De mortuis nil nisi bonum, always appeared to me to favour more of female weakness than of manly reason. He that has too much feeling to speak ill of the dead (who, if they cannot defend themselves, are at least ignorant of his abuse), will not hesitate, by the most wanton calumny, to destroy the quiet, the reputation, and the fortune of the living. Yet censure is not heard beneath the tomb, any more than praise. De mortuis nil nisi verum—De vivis nil nisi bonum, would be nearer to the truth.”

The elaborate zeal Mr. Croft exhibits in defence of his injured friend, does equal credit to his genius and humanity: but the traits and resemblances in the picture of Lorenzo, were not sufficiently strong to render so much industry and effort necessary to prevent our mistaking it for a family likeness.

Of the Night Thoughts, all, except the seventh and eighth, are inscribed to great, or to growing names—Mr. Onslow, Lord Wilmington, the Duke of Portland, the Earl of Litchfield, Mr. Pelham, and the Duke of Newcastle.

The fourth Night was addressed, by “a much-indebted muse,” to the Honourable Mr. Yorke, the late Lord Hardwicke, who meant to have laid the muse under still greater obligations, by the living of Shenfield in Essex, if it had become vacant.

The five first Nights have been perused, perhaps, more eagerly and more frequently than the rest. Philander and Narcissa, are often mentioned and often lamented. He seems, perhaps, to dwell with more melancholy on the death of Philander and Narcissa, than of his wife. When he got as far as the sixth or seventh, his original motive for taking up the pen was answered; his grief was naturally either diminished or exhausted. We still find the same pious poet; but we hear less of Philander and Narcissa, and less of the mourner whom he loved to pity.

By these extraordinary poems, written after he was sixty, it was the desire of Young to be principally known. He intitled the four volumes which he published himself, The Works of the Author of the Night Thoughts. From these he excluded many of his writings; but the rejected pieces contained nothing prejudicial to the cause of virtue, or of religion.

In them he would only appear, perhaps, in a less respectable light as a poet; and though despicable as a dedicatory, he would not pass for a worse Christian, or for a worse man. This enviable praise, which cannot be claimed by every writer, is due to the author of the Night Thoughts.

Notwithstanding the farewell which he seemed to have taken in the Night Thoughts, of ambition, he relapsed into politics. In 1745, he wrote Some Thoughts, occasioned by the Present Juncture, inscribed to the Duke of Newcastle. This political poem might be called a Night Thought. Indeed it was originally printed as the conclusion of the Night Thoughts, though he omitted it in his works.

Prefixed to the second edition of “Rowe's Devout Meditations,” is a letter from Young, addressed to Archibald Macaulay, Esq., thanking him for the books; which, he says, “he shall never lay far out of his reach; for a greater demonstration of a sound head, and a sincere heart, he never saw.”

In 1753, his tragedy of The Brothers, when it had lain by him above thirty years, was acted at the theatre in Drury-Lane. The plot is taken from the history of Macedonia, in the reign of the last Philip. The two characters of Demetrius and Perseus, are well drawn, and the contest before their father, in the third act, is a fine piece of oratory; but their speeches are, in a great measure, translations from Livy. The play itself, though the profits were generously bestowed on the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, was but coldly received, being undrammatical in its conduct, and imperfect in its catastrophe. This latter defect is acknowledged in his own epilogue, which was never used; the place of it being supplied by one furnished by Mallet, at the instigation of Garrick. Some indelicate allusions in it to the author's charity, gave just offence. Young was much offended by it; nor would he suffer it to be printed at the end of his piece.

The profits of The Brothers, he hoped, would amount to a thousand pounds. In his calculation he was deceived; but, by the bad success of his play, the society was not a loser. He made up the sum he originally intended, from his own pocket. While it failed to increase his reputation for genius, it added to the character of his humanity.

His next publication was, The Centaur not fabulous, in six Letters to a Friend, on the Life in Vogue. In the third letter, is described the death-bed of the "gay, young, noble, ingenious, accomplished, and most wretched Altamont." His last words were: "My principles have poisoned my friend, my extravagance has beggared my boy, and my unkindness has murdered my wife." The character of Altamont bears no little resemblance, in the perfection of wickedness, to the Lorenzo of the Night Thoughts. Report has been accustomed to call Altamont Lord Euston.

In 1756, Dr. Warton dedicated the first volume of his admirable "Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope," to Young; who "appears," says Mr. Croft, "in his old age, to have bartered for a dedication an opinion entertained of his friend, through all that part of life, when he must have been best able to form opinions."

"I know not," says an intelligent writer in the "Gentleman's Magazine," Vol. LII. p. 71, "why it should be supposed, because Dr. Warton dedicated his 'Essay' to Young, that, therefore, he must either have changed his opinion of Pope, or have bartered his opinion for a dedication. He was neither greedy of praise, nor was he reduced to the necessity of bartering any thing to procure it. The compliment paid him, I have no doubt, was a voluntary compliment."

In 1758, he again became a dedicator, and published A Sermon, preached before their Majesties at Kensington, addressed to the King. If he composed many sermons, he did not oblige the public with many.

The following letter, from Secker to Young, dated July 8. 1758, given by Mr. Croft, serves to show at what a late period of life the author of the Night Thoughts solicited preferment.

"I have long wondered, that more suitable notice of your great merit hath not been taken by persons in power. But how to remedy the omission, I see not. No encouragement hath ever been given me to mention things of this nature to his Majesty; and, therefore, in all likelihood, the only consequence of doing it, would be weakening the little influence, which else I may possibly have on some other occasions. Your fortune and your reputation, set you above the need of advancement; and your sentiments above that concern for it, on your own account, which, on that of the public, is sincerely felt by your, &c."

The neglect of Young is, by some, ascribed to his having attached himself to the Prince of Wales, and to his having preached an offensive sermon at St. James's. It is said, however, that he had two hundred a-year in the late reign, by the patronage of Walpole; and that whenever any one reminded the King of Young, his only answer was, "he has a pension."

One obstacle must have stood not a little in the way of that preferment, after which his whole life seems to have panted. Though he took orders, he never entirely shook off politics. By this conduct, if he gained some friends, he made many enemies. Besides, in the latter part of his life, he was fond of holding himself out for a man retired from the world. He who retires from the world, will find himself in reality deserted as fast, if not faster, by the world. Young seems to have been taken at his word. Notwithstanding his frequent complaints of being neglected, no hand was reached out to pull him from that retirement, of which he declared himself enamoured.

In 1759, he employed his pious pen for almost the last time, in doing justice to the death-bed of Addison, in a Letter, on Original Composition, addressed to Richardson, the author of "Clarissa." His chief inducement to write it, was, as he confesses, that he might "erect a monumental marble to the memory of an old friend." In this lively letter, Pope is severely censured for his "fall from Homer's numbers, free as air, lofty and harmonious as the spheres, into childish shackles and tinkling sounds; for putting Achilles into petticoats a second time." But we are told, that our English Homer talked over an epic plan with Young a few weeks before his death. In the postscript, he writes to Richardson, that he will see, in his next, how far Addison is an original. But no other letter appears.

In 1761, his friend Lord Melcombe, not long before his death, sent him an "Ode," which he called "The Muse's Latest Spark," accompanied by a letter; in which he says, "if you are willing that our friendship should be known when we are gone, you will be pleased to leave this among those of your papers that may possibly see the light by a posthumous publication."

At the accession of his present Majesty, his name was struck out from the list of Court-Chaplains; but he was almost immediately after, upon the death of Dr. Hales, appointed Clerk of the Closet to the Princess-Dowager of Wales.

In 1762, he published Resignation, in two parts, and A Postscript to Mrs. B——, 4to. It was written at the request of Mrs. Montague, the famous champion of Shakspeare, and is addressed to the Hon. Mrs. Boscawen, the Admiral's widow, to teach her resignation under the affliction caused by the death of her husband. Notwithstanding he administered consolation to his own grief in blank verse—"verse unfallen, uncurst; verse reclaimed, re-inthroned in the true language of the gods;" he comforted Mrs. Boscawen in rhyme.

While the poet and the Christian were applying this comfort, Young had himself occasion for comfort, in consequence of the sudden death of Richardson, who was engaged in printing the first edition of the poem. He laments him as a friend, and has given some sketches of his genius.

To touch our passions' secret springs,

Was his peculiar care;

And deep his happy genius divid'd

In bosoms of the fair.

Nature, which favours to the few,

All art beyond imparts,

To him presented, at his birth,

The key of human hearts.

To Resignation was prefixed an apology for its appearance; to which more credit is due, than to the generality of such apologies, from Young's unusual anxiety, that no more productions of his old age should disgrace his former fame.

"This was not intended for the public: there were many and strong reasons against it, and are so still; but some extracts of it, from the few copies which were given away (a few copies were printed, and given to the author's friends), being got into the printed papers; it was thought necessary to publish something, lest a copy still more imperfect than this should fall into the press: and, it is hoped, that this unwelcome occasion of publication may be some excuse for it."

It must be owned, that the reasons were sufficient for reprinting the poem; but then it may be asked, why did he ever suffer so imperfect a performance to pass through the press? He should have considered that true observation of Horace:

Semel emissum, volat irrevocabile verbum.

With great propriety, too, he might have answered the importunity of his friends, in the language of the same poet, who had not then seen many more than half the years of Young:

Spectatum satis, et donatum jam rude, quæris

Mæcenas iterum antiquo me includere ludo?

Non eadem est ætas, non mens——

The Resignation was the last publication which Young gave to the world. From this time, the infirmities of age rendered him incapable of performing any duty; and he suffered himself to be in pupilage to his housekeeper Mrs. Hallows, whose ascendancy in his family is ridiculed with more ill-nature than wit, in a novel published by Kidgell, in 1755, called "The Card," under the name of Mrs. Fusby. Young is characterised under the name of Dr. Elwes.

Of Mrs. Hallows, the writer in the "Gentleman's Magazine," above quoted, tells us, that she was the daughter of a Rector of All-Hallows, Hertford; and that, upon the marriage of Miss Caroline Lee, she was invited by Young, who knew her family, to his house; that she had some fortune of her own, perhaps very small, as her father left many children; that she was advanced in years, and was a woman of piety, improved by reading; and that she was always treated by him and by his guests, even those of the highest rank, with the politeness and respect due to a gentlewoman.

"Of the domestic manners, and petty habits of the author of the Night Thoughts," Mr. Croft writes Dr. Johnson, September 1780.: "I hoped to have given you an account from the best authority; but who shall dare to say, to-morrow I will be wise or virtuous; or, to-morrow I will do a particular thing? Upon inquiring for his housekeeper, I learned that she was buried two days before I reached the town of her abode."

It appears from the epistolary correspondence of Mr. Jones, his curate, and executor, printed in the Gentleman's Magazine, Vol. lii. p. 283. that the last years of his life were embittered by the unhappy economy of his family. The letters are well authenticated, and not incurious. If they discover the foibles of a great man, they illustrate a part of his personal history; and Mr. Croft has well remarked that we ought to say De mortuis nil nisi verum—De vivis nil nisi bonum.

"The old gentleman here," says Mr. Jones, in a letter to his friend in London, dated Welwyn, July 25. 1762., "seems to me to be in a pretty odd way of late, moping, dejected, self-willed, and as if surrounded with some perplexing circumstances. There is much mystery in almost all his temporal affairs, as well as in many other of his speculative opinions. There is thought to be an irremovable obstruction to his happiness within his walls, as well as another without them; but the former is the more powerful, and likely to continue so. He has this day been trying anew to engage me to stay with him. No lucrative views can tempt me to sacrifice my liberty or my health to such measures as are proposed here."

"You remember," he writes his friend, St. Neots, Hunts, August 28. 1762., "what I suggested to you about my resolution of leaving Welwyn, of which I had given very early notice to the worthy Doctor, that he might have sufficient time to provide. After repeated trials, and repeated disappointments, though seven or eight offered, he thought proper to apply to me anew; and though lucrative motives could not, earnest importunities did prevail with me at last to cheer up his dejected heart, by promising to continue with him for some time longer at least. By the way, I privately intimated to you, the Doctor is, in various respects, a very unhappy man. Few know so much of him as I do in these respects, and have often observed with concern. If he would be advised by some who wish him well, he might be happy, though his state of health is lately much altered for the worse."

"The mismanagement too well known," he writes his friend, Welwyn, January 1. 1763., "unhappily continues, and, still more unhappily, seems to be increasing, to the grief of friends, and, I need not say, to the ridicule of others, who are not a few. Penuriousness and obstinacy are two bad things; and a disregard to the general judgment and friendly wishes of the wiser part of mankind, another. There seems to be no hope, so long as the ascendancy is so great."

"My ancient gentleman here," he writes his friend, Welwyn, September 4. 1764., "is still full of troubles, which moves my concern, though it moves only the secret laughter of many, and some untoward surmises in disfavour of him and his household. The loss of a very large sum of money, 200 l., is talked of, whereof this vill and neighbourhood are full. Some disbelieve, others say it is no wonder, where about eighteen, or more servants, are sometimes taken and dismissed in the course of a year. The gentleman himself, is allowed by all to be far more harmless and easy in his family than some one else, who hath too much the lead in it."

Of his last illness, the following account is given by Mr. Jones, in a letter to his friend, dated Welwyn, April 2. 1765.: "As soon as I got home, I inquired after Dr. Young, and found that he had gone through very great pains since I left him; and the pains return pretty frequently. Dr. Cotton of St. Albans, and Dr. Yates of Hertford, meet at his house every day, on consultation. I find that opiates are frequently administered to him, I suppose to render him less sensible of his pain. His intellects, I am told, are still clear; though what effect the frequent use of opiates may by degrees have upon him, I know not. I am pretty much of his son's sentiments as to this, viz. that those ingredients, if for some time longer continued, may have an ill effect upon the brain. Having mentioned this young gentleman, I would acquaint you next, that he came hither this morning, having been sent for, as I am told, by the direction of Mrs. Hallows. Indeed, she intimated to me as much herself. And, if this be so, I must say it is one of the most prudent acts she ever did, or could have done, in such a case as this, as it may prove a means of preventing much confusion. If have had some little discourse with the son. He seems much affected, and, I believe, really is so. He earnestly wishes his father may be pleased to ask after him. For, you must know, he has not yet done this, nor is, in my opinion, likely to do it. And it has been said farther, upon a very late application made to him on the behalf of his son, he desired that no more might be said to him about it. Mrs. H. has fitted up a suitable apartment in the house for Mr. Young, where, I suppose, he will continue till some farther event. I heartily wish the ancient man's heart may grow tender towards his son; though, knowing him so well, I can scarce hope to hear such desirable news. He took to his bed yesterday, about eleven in the forenoon, and has not been up since. I called soon after my coming home, but did not see him: he was then in a dose."

Of his death, which happened April 5. 1765., in the eighty-fourth year of his age, the following account is given by Mr. Jones, in a letter to his friend, dated Welwyn, April 13. 1765.: "I have now the pleasure to acquaint you, that the late Dr. Young, though he had for many years kept his son at a distance, yet has now, at last, left him all his possessions, after the payment of certain legacies. So that the young gentleman, who bears a fair character, and behaves well, as far as I can hear or see, will, I hope, soon enjoy, and make a prudent use of a very handsome fortune. The father, on his death-bed, and since my return from London, was applied to, in the tenderest manner, by one of his physicians, and by another person, to admit the son into his presence, to make submission, entreat forgiveness, and obtain his blessing. As to an interview with his son, he intimated, he chose to decline it, as his spirits were then low, and his nerves weak: with regard to the next particular, he said, "I heartily forgive him;" and, upon mention of the last, he gently lifted up his hand, and gently letting it fall, pronounced these words—"God blefs him!" After about a fortnight's illness, and bearing excessive pains, he expired a little before eleven of the clock, in the night of Good Friday last, the 5th instant, and was decently buried yesterday, about six in the afternoon, in the chancel of this church, close by the remains of his lady, under the communion-table. The clergy, who are the trustees for his charity-school, and one or two more, attending the funeral, the last office at interment being performed by me.

"I know it will give you pleasure to be farther informed, that he was pleased to make respectful mention of me in his will, expressing his satisfaction in my care of his parish, bequeathing to me a handsome legacy, and appointing me one of his executors, next after his sister's son [Mr. Harris], a clergyman of Hampshire, who this morning set out for London, in order to prove the will in Doctor's Commons. So that, much according to my wishes, I shall have little or nothing to do, in respect of executorship."

In his will, dated February 1760., he desires of his executors, in a particular manner, that all his manuscript-books, and writings whatever, might be burned, except his book of accounts. In a codicil, dated September 1764., he made it his dying entreaty to his housekeeper, to whom he left 1000*l.*, "that all his manuscripts might be destroyed as soon as he was dead, which would greatly oblige her deceased friend." The legacy was not more than might be due to one whom he had never degraded by paying her wages. She did not, however, strictly comply with his last injunctions, in destroying his manuscripts. He left also a legacy to his "friend Henry Stephens, a hatter at the Temple-Gate," who went before him.

The same humility which had marked a hatter and a housekeeper for his friends, had before bestowed the same title on his footman, in an Epitaph in Welwyn Church-yard, upon James Barker, dated 1749.

The author of that Epitaph is not without a stone to mark the place of his dust. Though he inscribed no monument to the memory of his lamented wife, yet the piety of his son has erected a monument, in Welwyn church, to the memory of his parents, with the following inscription; which "contains," says Mr. Croft, "none of that praise, which no marble can make the bad or the foolish merit; which, without the direction of a stone or a turf, will find its way, sooner or later, to the deserving:"

In the edition of Young's works, published during his life, in 4 vols, 12mo, several pieces, which he judged to be of a temporary nature, or of inferior merit, were omitted. After his death, a fifth volume was published, with the design of completing his works. But several pieces, and some of considerable length, were omitted. These were collected in an additional volume, making the sixth, in 1778. The contents are—Epistle to Lord Lansdowne, 1712; Imperium Pelagi, a Naval Lyric, 1730; The Foreign Address, 1734; Reflections on the Public Situation of the Kingdom, 1745; Miscellanies [in verse], viz. on Michael Angelo's famous piece of the Crucifixion; To Mr. Addison, on the Tragedy of Cato; A Letter to Mr. Tickell, on the Death of Mr. Addison, 1719; Epitaph on Lord Aubrey Beauclerc, killed at Carthage, 1740; Miscellanies in Prose, viz. Epitaph on Mr. James Barker, 1749; Oratio de Bibliotheca Codringtoniana, habita in Sacello Coll. Omn. Ann. 1716; A Discourse on Lyric Poetry; A Sermon preached before the King at Kensington, June 1758; Preface to "Mrs. Rowe's Friendship on Death;" Dedications to the Last Day, to Vanquished Love, to the Paraphrase on Job, to Busiris, and the Revenge. The Merchant, an Ode on the British Trade and Navigation, is mentioned also in the contents as a separate poem, though it seems only a second title to the Lyric, or, perhaps, only a part of it; and that more was intended, seems probable from its being styled Ode the First. The Epitaph on Lord Aubrey Beauclerc, is improperly dated 1740. Lord Aubrey was killed at Carthage, March 24. 1740-1. The epitaph, therefore, could not be written, at soonest, till the year after. The second line of the second couplet is, on the monument, expressed thus—O'er dauntless loyal, &c. The volume concludes with "some thoughts on reading Mr. Young's Last Day," in a letter to Mrs. Rowe, by Dr. Bowden, a worthy physician and ingenious poet of Frome, the friend of Mrs. Rowe, Lord Orrery, &c.

His Poetical Works have been frequently reprinted in 4 vols 12mo, and in 3 vols 8vo, 1792. Of the Night Thoughts, the editions are too numerous to be specified. The edition in 8vo 1794, is ornamented with engravings, and illustrated with notes by Mr. de Coetlogon. A French translation of the Night Thoughts, by M. le Tourneur, was published in 2 vols 8vo, 1769. "Observations on the Night Thoughts," by Mr. Pratt, appeared in 8vo, 1776.

Of the private habits, and domestic manners of Young, whose great genius, abilities, and piety, placed him in the foremost rank of literature for almost half a century, curiosity will require more ample information than is to be found in the few scattered notices which the diligence of his biographers has collected, or the zeal and veneration of his friends have supplied.

Singularity is said to have predominated in his most juvenile practices. The late Dr. Ridley remembered a report current at Oxford, that, when he was composing, he would shut up his windows, and sit by a lamp, even at mid-day; and that skulls, bones, and instruments of death, were among the ornaments of his study. Thus encouraging the habitual gloom that hung over his imagination, it soon became peopled with the phantoms of discontent. He indulged an early luxury in describing the miseries of a world, that did not immediately forward his designs and gratify his expectations. It has been said, that if he had been a bishop, he would never have written the Night Thoughts. But he was far advanced in the pathetic strains of complaint, at a time when hope is warm in the bosom of other men; and had he attained the mitre, a disappointment in the primacy might have produced the same effects on a mind which seems to have been endued with much sensibility, and to have been depressed with temporary obstructions of his prospects, which every man struggling through life naturally expects to meet with; and, if he cannot surmount them, does not think himself justified in retiring to the cloister, or the hermitage. It cannot be supposed, that his disposition brightened up when he had suffered from real disappointments, and the weight of years sat heavier upon him. His discourse, even to the last, it is said, was rather expressive of a restless than a settled mind. In the character of Young, much of that melancholy cast of mind may be observed which is ever attendant upon genius, but at the same time so tempered by the sober tints of science and philosophy, that it seldom breaks in upon the province of judgment and right ratiocination. The melancholy of Young was so repressed by the chastening hand of reason and education, as never to infringe upon the duties of life. The spirit, the energy of his soul, his rational and sublime piety, powerfully withheld the accession of a state of mind so inimical to the rights of society.

It is generally known that Young, after his first sleep, spent the greatest part of the night in meditation, and in the composition of his works; and that he had only to transcribe them when he rose, which was at an early hour. Every night he read prayers to his family, and every morning when there was no public service.

While his health permitted him to walk abroad, he preferred a solitary ramble in his churchyard, to exercise with a companion on a more cheerful spot. He was moderate in his meals, and rarely drank wine, except when he was ill; being (as he said) unwilling to waste the succours of sickness on the stability of health.

After a slight refreshment, he retired to bed at eight in the evening, although he might have guests in his house, who wished to prolong his stay among them to a later hour. He lived at a moderate expence, rather inclining to parsimony than profusion, and yet continued anxious for increase of preferment, after it could have added nothing to his enjoyments; for he expended annually little more than half of his income.

"He appeared," says the writer in the "Gentleman's Magazine," above quoted, Vol. LII, p. 72. "neither as a man of sorrow," nor yet as "a fellow of infinite jest." The dignity of a great and a good man appeared in all his actions and in all his words. He conversed on religious subjects with the cheerfulness of virtue. His piety was undebaſed by gloom or enthusiasm; he was regular in the performance of all its duties, both in public and in private. I have been told that, before his time, divine service was performed only on Sunday morning, but he likewise read prayers in the afternoon, and on Wednesdays, Fridays, and all holidays."

"In his domestic character, he was as amiable as he was venerable in the Christian. His politeness was such as I never saw equalled; it was invariable; to his superiors in rank, to his equals, and to his inferiors, it differed only in the degrees of elegance. I never heard him speak with roughness to his meanest servant; yet he well knew how to keep up his dignity, and, with all the majesty of superior worth, to repress the bold and the forward. In conversation upon lively subjects, he had a brilliancy of wit which was peculiar to himself. I know not how to describe it, but by saying, that it was both heightened and softened by the great and the amiable qualities of his soul. I have seen him ill, and in pain, yet the serenity of his mind remained unruffled; I never heard a peevish expression fall from his lips; nor was he, at such times, less kindly and politely attentive to those around him, than when in the company of strangers, who came only to visit him for the first time."

"Dr. Young," says Dr. Warton, who knew him well, "was one of the most amiable and benevolent of men; most exemplary in his life, and sincere in his religion: nobody ever said more brilliant things in conversation. The late Lord Melcombe informed me, that when he and Voltaire were on a visit to his Lordship at Eastbury, the English poet was far superior to the French, in the variety and novelty of his bon-mots and repartees: and Lord Melcombe was himself a good judge of wit and humour, of which he had a large portion."

Tſcharner, a noble foreigner, in a letter to Count Haller, says, he has lately spent four days with Young at Welwyn, where he tastes all the ease and pleasure man can desire. "Every thing about him shows the man; each individual being placed by rule. All is neat without art. He is very pleasant in conversation, and extremely polite."

"That domestic grief," says Mr. Croft, "is, in the first instance, to be thanked for these ornaments to our language [The Night Thoughts], it is impossible to deny. Nor would it be common hardness to contend, that worldly discontent had no hand in these joint productions of poetry and piety. Yet I am by no means sure that, at any rate, we should not have had something of the same colour from Young's pencil, notwithstanding the liveliness of his satires. In so long a life, causes for discontent, and occasions for grief, must have occurred. It is not clear to me that his muse was not sitting upon the watch for the first which happened. Night Thoughts were not uncommon to her, even when first she visited the poet; and, at a time when he himself was remarkable, neither for gravity nor gloominess. In his Last Day, almost his earliest poem, he calls her the melancholy maid;

— whom dismal scenes delight
Frequent at tombs, and in the realms of night.

"When Young was writing a tragedy, Grafton is said by Spence to have sent him a human skull with a candle in it as a lamp; and the poet is reported to have used it.

"Still, is it altogether fair to dress up the poet for the man, and to bring the gloominess of the Night Thoughts to prove the gloominess of Young; and, to show that his genius, like the genius of Swift, was, in some measure, the sullen inspiration of discontent?

"From them who answer in the affirmative, it should not be concealed, that, though Invisibilia non decipiunt appeared upon a deception in Young's grounds, and ambulantes in horto audierunt vocem Dei, in a building in his garden, his parish was indebted to the good humour of the author of the Night Thoughts, for an assembly and a bowling-green.

"Of Young, an anecdote which wanders among readers, it is not true, that he was Fielding's Parson Adams. The original of that famous painting was William Young, who was a clergyman, [author of the Latin and English Dictionary.] Yet, the facility with which this report has gained belief in the world, argues, were it not sufficiently known, that the author of the Night Thoughts, bore some resemblance to Adams. It is known, that, during some part of his life, Young was abroad; and, that he once wandered into the camp, with a classic in his hand, which he was reading intensely, and had some difficulty to prove that he was only an absent poet, and not a spy.

"The attention which Young bestowed upon the perusal of books, is not unworthy imitation. When any passage pleased him, he appears to have folded down the leaf. On those passages he bestowed a second reading. But the labours of man are too frequently vain. Before he returned to much of what he once approved, he died. Many of his books which I have seen, are, by those notes of approbation, so swelled beyond their real bulk, that they would hardly shut."

His extemporaneous wit and colloquial talents, have been much extolled; but, from the few specimens of his unpremeditated acuteness, and successful pleasantry which are preserved, it would seem, that his powers of delighting were, in great measure, confined to his pen. The following anecdotes are distinguished by their novelty and importance.

Young, walking in his garden at Welwyn, in company with two ladies (one of whom was Lady Elifabeth Lee), a servant came to tell him a gentleman wished to speak with him, "Tell him," says Young, "I am too happily engaged to change my situation." The ladies insisted upon it that he should go, as his visitor was a man of rank, his patron, his friend; and, as persuasion had no effect, one took him by the right arm, and the other by the left, and led him to the garden-gate, when, finding resistance was vain, he bowed, laid his hand upon his heart, and in that expressive manner for which he was so remarkable, spoke the following lines:

Thus Adam look'd, when from the garden driven,
And thus disputed orders sent from heaven:
Like him I go, and yet to go am loth;
Like him I go, for angels drove us both.
Hard was his fate, but mine still more unkind,
His Eve went with him, but mine stays behind.

Young, in the early part of his life, was fond of music, and touched the German flute with much taste. Being once on the Thames with some ladies, he played them several tunes, and then put the flute in his pocket. Some officers rowing by just as he ceased playing, one of them rudely asked why he left off, "For the same reason that I began;" replied Young, "to please myself." One of them immediately told him, that if he did not continue playing, he would directly throw him into the river. His female friends began to be much alarmed; and Young, on their account, played till they reached Vauxhall, where both parties spent the evening. Young had marked his man, and took an opportunity, in one of the dark walks, to tell the officer, that he expected him to meet him at such a place in the morning, to give him a gentleman's satisfaction; and, that he chose swords for the weapons. The officer was surprised on their meeting, to see Young advance towards him with a large horse pistol, with which he told him he would instantly shoot him through the head if he did not dance a minuet.

After some difficulties, he complied; the officer felt how impertinent he had been, and acknowledged the justice of the treatment he had met with.

One Sunday, preaching in office at St. James's, he found, that though he strove to make his audience attentive, he could not prevail; upon which his pity for their folly got the better of all decorum, and he sat back in the pulpit, and burst into a flood of tears.

The writings of Young may be distinctly considered, as comprising essays, plays, and poems. As an essayist, his Gentle not Fabulous and his Conjectures on Original Composition, are his most considerable productions. Of the one, it must be confessed, that though its general tendency is favourable to religion and morality, the pictures it exhibits of the life in vogue, are often overcharged, and the diction, though sometimes animated and energetic, is commonly inflated and affected, or harsh and severe. Of the other, though the style is vitiated by affectation, and the expression is sometimes hyperbolical, the sentiments are frequently bold, original, penetrating, brilliant, and sublime. Though he despair "of breaking through the frozen ocean of age and care's incumbent cloud, into that flow of thought and brightness of expression, which subjects so polite require;" yet it shows no marks of exhausted genius. It is more like the production of untamed, unbridled youth, than of jaded fourscore.

As a dramatist, he has not been successful in imitating the beauties of art, with the energies of natural fire and spirit. He is, without doubt, superior to his contemporaries, Rowe and Congreve, in strength and warmth of conception; but he is inferior to them in elegance and neatness of diction, beauty of cadence, correctness, chastity, and regularity. None of his dramas, except The Revenge, are in possession of the stage. Though they are animated, brilliant, and classical; though they paint, in glowing language, the fury of rage and revenge, and the agonies of jealousy, love, and despair; yet, it must be confessed, their beauties are disgraced by puerile rant and conceit, and, occasionally, by fustian and bombast. In Carey's "Chrononhotontologos," his dramatical eccentricities are portrayed in caricature, particularly the violent speech on the blow, which furnished a plot to The Revenge. Bombardinian, the general, on receiving a box on the ear from his royal master, breaks out into the most furious hyperbole; calls on the sun and moon to put themselves into eclipse; bids hills, dales, seas, and cities, run together, and into chaos pulverize the world, because Bombardinian hath received a blow.

As a poet, his compositions discover more fancy than judgment, more originality and invention, than correctness of taste and variety and extent of knowledge. He possessed, as Addison says of Lee, true poetic fire, though clouded and obscured by thick volumes of smoke. But he has merit of the highest kind. He is an original, though an unequal writer. It would be difficult to point out a single line or expression that he has borrowed from any other English writer. His defects and beauties are alike his own. Of the epigrammatic tenor of his Satires, there is no example; nor was he indebted to any poet, ancient or modern, for the plan of his Night Thoughts. The lyric muse has always been peculiarly unfavourable to him. He has some of the greatest beauties, and some of the greatest absurdities which English poetry affords. The general character of his versification is that of harshness and ruggedness, though many passages may be produced as exceptions.

Of his earlier poetical productions, his Last Day, Vanquished Love, and Paraphrase on Job, have deservedly obtained the greatest popularity. They have all their brighter passages. In the Last Day, and the Paraphrase in particular, there are some admirable lines. But they are in general stiff, unpleasing, and incorrect. Instead of endeavouring to support the glow of imagery, he seems rather sedulous to gather the ornaments of wit; and thus, while he aims at the fancy, he misses the heart.

His Universal Passion was published before Pope's Satirical Epistles made their appearance; and has therefore the merit of giving the lead to that kind of writing. It contains much just satire, good verse, and laughable humour. The country squire, who welcomes his friend with a thump upon the back; the coffee-house beau, who values himself upon the learning of his heels; and the lady on horseback, who whistles sweet her diuretic strains, are justly conceived, and happily expressed. But its character is debility—it wants point and terseness. The satirist, as Swift has justly said, should have either been more angry or more merry. He has the fault of Seneca, of Ovid, of Cowley; a profusion and an unseasonable application of wit. A lover of originality, he did not regard models. Had he endeavoured to imitate Juvenal and Persius, he would have avoided this fault.

Those great masters were too much engrossed by the importance of their subjects, to fall into the puerility of witticism. There is something in the versification, which a good ear does not approve.

For his Night Thoughts, that species of composition which he may be said to have created; that mass of the grandest and richest poetry which human genius has ever produced, the applause which he has received is unbounded. "The unhappy bard, whose griefs in melting numbers flow, and melancholy joys diffuse around," has been sung by the profane, as well as the pious. It is to this work, begun when

He long had buried what gives life to live,
Firmness of nerve, and energy of thought,

that he deserves, and will continue to deserve his reputation. He appears to have been conscious of its merit, when he called his collected compositions The Works of the Author of the Night Thoughts. It may not improperly be considered as a good poetical contrast to Thomson's "Seasons." One delighted as much to exhibit the gloomy, as the other the cheerful face of things. In the article of sublimity, it may vie with "Paradise Lost itself," though in every other respect it would be absurd to attempt a comparison between them. The beauties of the Night Thoughts are numerous, and its blemishes are not few. Among its distinguishing excellencies, are the spirit of sublime piety and strict morality, which breathes through the whole; dignity of thought and language, bold and lively descriptions, proper and well supported similes, and striking repetitions, or breaks in the expression. Among its principal faults, are the unnecessary repetition of the same ideas and images, redundancy of metaphor, bombast, and extravagant ideas and expressions; crowded and ill-chosen epithets, allusions drawn out beyond their proper bounds; a puerile play on words, the use of gross and inelegant images or terms, and negligence in the harmony of versification. Its principal excellence, the present writer apprehends to be—elevation and dignity of thought and expression; its capital defect—elevation and dignity pursued into extravagance or bombast. It abounds in unnatural flights of fancy, is often obscure, and sometimes unintelligible; and the poet, occasionally, perplexes both himself and the reader, in a playfame pursuit of trifling figures, allegories, and allusions, not always apt. Yet, with all its faults, it irresistibly seizes the mind of the reader, arrests his attention, and powerfully interests him in the midnight sorrows of the plaintive bard; it has a merit which no production, but those of real genius, ever possesses: with scarce any facts or incidents to awaken curiosity, it speaks to the heart through the medium of the imagination; it instructs, but does not fatigue us; it amuses, but never is languid.

The pathetic and sublime passages in the Night Thoughts, are familiar to the general readers of poetry. Amidst the profusion of beauties which may be produced, his description of Death from his secret stand, noting down the follies of a Bacchanalian society, the epitaph upon the departed world; the issuing of Satan from his dungeon on the day of judgment, are distinguished by great strength and boldness of invention, and rise, in many parts, to the terrible and sublime. The simile of the traveller, with which The Consolation opens, is highly pleasing, striking, and beautiful. His view of the nature and faculties of an immortal soul, of different natures, marvellously mixed, clogged by the finite and perishable materials of its house of clay, is profound, striking, comprehensive, and, what in him is rare, closely comprehensive. His arguments in favour of infinite duration in a future state, though not logically conclusive, are beautifully poetic.

O ye blest scenes of permanent delight,—
Could ye so rich in rapture fear an end;
That ghastly thought would drink up all your joy,
And quite unparadise the realms of light.

Who does not regret, that such a powerful though gloomy advocate for religion and morality, should degrade himself by prostituting his poetry to the servile purposes of adulation; or that his addiction to licentious flattery should have induced him to dress up his patron in the attributes of a Being, whose greatness and whose goodness admit of no approximation!

Wits spare not heaven, O Wilmington! nor thee.

His Resignation was represented on its first appearance, as a striking instance of the senescence of genius. It has never obtained much popularity; though the sentiments are strongly characteristic of their author, and many of them are beautiful and new. The style also is like that of the author of the Night Thoughts, but the resemblance is rather in its blemishes than its beauties. Here is the same fondness for antitheses, the same hunting down of figures, and lowness of metaphors, that are to be found in his other poems, but little of their strength or harmony remains. His exchanging the solemn plaintive species of verse, peculiar to himself, for the easy measure of lyric poetry, was an unfortunate determination. Of his smaller poems, the Epistles to Pope, and the Epitaph on Lord Aubrey Beauclerc, are entitled to particular commendation. Of those puerile trifles, his Odes, Sea-Piece, &c. in which words over-power ideas, and loyalty triumphs at the expence of imagination, the present writer is no admirer.

Yet, excepting his licentious flattery, which appears in the body of his works, as well as in his fulsome dedications, a few of his tragical rants, his poetical flights into the obscure, and the imbecilities of his age, which his friends ought to have suppressed, Young is entitled to the rare but important praise of not having left a line, which, for moral or religious reasons, on his death-bed, he could wish to have erased.

"If the friendship, with which Dr. Young honoured me," says Dr. Warton, "does not mislead me, I think I may affirm, that many high strokes of character in his Zanga, many sentiments and images in his Night Thoughts, and many strong and forcible descriptions in his Paraphrase on Job, mark him for a sublime and original genius. Though, at the same time, I am ready to confess, that he is not a correct and equal writer, and was too often turgid and hyperbolic."

"Among moral and didactic poets, Dr. Young is of too great eminence," says Dr. Blair, "to be passed over without notice. In all his works, the marks of strong genius appear. His Universal Passion possesses the full merit of that animated conciseness of style, and lively description of characters, which I mentioned, as particularly requisite in satirical and didactic compositions. Though his wit may often be thought too sparkling, and his sentences too pointed, yet the vivacity of his fancy is so great as to entertain every reader. In his Night Thoughts, there is much energy of expression; in the three first there are several pathetic passages, and scattered through them, all happy images and allusions, as well as pious reflections occur; but the sentiments are frequently overstrained and turgid, and the style is too harsh and obscure to be pleasing."

"There is in the Night Thoughts," says Mr. Boswell, "a power of the pathetic beyond almost any example that I have seen. He who does not feel his nerves shaken, and his heart moved by many passages in this extraordinary work, particularly by that most affecting one, which describes the gradual torment suffered by the contemplation of an object of affectionate attachment, visibly and certainly decaying into dissolution, must be of a hard and obstinate frame."

"To all the other excellencies of the Night Thoughts, let me add the great and peculiar one, that they contain not only the noblest sentiments of virtue and the immortality of the soul: but the Christian sacrifice, the divine propitiation, with all its interesting circumstances and consolations to "a wounded spirit," solemnly and poetically displayed in such imagery and language, as cannot fail to exalt, animate, and sooth the truly pious. No book whatever can be recommended to young persons, with better hopes of seasoning their minds with vital religion, than Young's Night Thoughts."

"Of Young's poems it is difficult to give any general character; for he has no uniformity of manner: one of his pieces has no great resemblance to another. He began to write early, and continued long; and at different times had different modes of poetical excellence in view. His numbers are sometimes smooth, and sometimes rugged; his style is sometimes concatenated, and sometimes abrupt; sometimes diffusive, and sometimes concise. His plan seems to have started in his mind at the present moment, and his thoughts appear the effect of chance, sometimes adverse, and sometimes lucky, with very little operation of judgment."

"He was not one of the writers whom experience improves, and who observing their own faults become gradually correct. His poem on the Last Day, his first great performance, has an equability and propriety, which he afterwards either never endeavoured or never attained. Many paragraphs are noble, and few are mean, yet the whole is languid; the plan is too much extended, and a succession of images divides and weakens the general conception; but the great reason why the reader is disappointed, is, that the Last Day makes every man more than poetical, by spreading over his mind a general obscurity of sacred horror, that oppresses distinction, and disdains expression."

"His story of Jane Gray was never popular. It is written with elegance enough, but Jane is too heroic to be pitied."

"The Universal Passion is indeed a very great performance. It is said to be a series of epigrams: but, if it be, it is what the author intended: his endeavour was at the production of striking distichs and pointed sentences; and his distichs have the weight of solid sentiment, and his points the sharpness of resolute truth.

"His characters are often selected with discernment, and drawn with nicety; his illustrations are often happy, and his reflections often just. His species of satire is between those of Horace and Juvenal; and he has the gaiety of Horace without his laxity of numbers, and the morality of Juvenal with greater variation of images. He plays, indeed, only on the surface of life; he never penetrates the recesses of the mind, and therefore the whole power of his poetry is exhausted by a single perusal; his conceits please only when they surprise.

"To translate he never condescended, unless his Paraphrase on Job may be considered as a version; in which he has not, I think, been unsuccessful; he indeed favoured himself, by choosing those parts which most easily admit the ornaments of English poetry.

"He had least success in his lyric attempts, in which he seems to have been under some malignant influence: he is always labouring to be great, and at last is only turgid.

"In his Night Thoughts he has exhibited a very wide display of original poetry, variegated with deep reflections and striking allusions; a wilderness of thought, in which the fertility of fancy scatters flowers of every hue and of every odour. This is one of the few poems in which blank verse could not be changed for rhyme but with disadvantage. The wild diffusion of the sentiments, and the digressive sallies of imagination, would have been compressed and restrained by confinement to rhyme. The excellence of this work is not exactness, but copiousness; particular lines are not to be regarded; the power is in the whole, and in the whole there is a magnificence like that ascribed to Chinese plantation, the magnificence of vast extent and endless diversity.

"His last poem was the Resignation; in which he made, as he was accustomed, an experiment of a new mode of writing, and succeeded better than in his Ocean or his Merchant. It was very falsely represented as a proof of decaying faculties. There is Young in every stanza, such as he often was in his highest vigour.

"It must be allowed of Young's poetry, that it abounds in thought, but without much accuracy or selection. When he lays hold of an illustration, he pursues it beyond expectation, sometimes happily, as in his parallel of Quicksilver with Pleasure, which is very ingenious, very subtle, and almost exact; but sometimes he is less lucky, as when, in his Night Thoughts, having dropped it into his mind, that the orbs, floating in space, might be called the cluster of creation, he thinks on a cluster of grapes, and says, that they all hang on the great vine, drinking the "nectareous juice of immortal life."

"His conceits are sometimes yet less valuable. In the Last Day, he hopes to illustrate the re-assembling of the atoms that compose the human body at the "Trump of Doom," by the collection of bees into a swarm at the tinkling of a pan.

"The Prophet says of Tyre, that "her Merchants are Princes." Young says in his Merchant

Her Merchants Princes, and each deck a Throne.

Let burlesque try to go beyond him.

"He has the trick of joining the turgid and familiar: to buy the alliance of Britain, "Climes were paid down." Antithesis is his favourite. "They for kindness hate;" and "because she's right she's ever in the wrong."

"His versification is his own; neither his blank nor his rhyming lines have any resemblance to those of former writers; he picks up no hemistichs, he copies no favourite expressions; he seems to have laid up no stores of thought or diction, but to owe all to the fortuitous suggestions of the present moment. Yet I have reason to believe that, when once he had formed a new design, he then laboured it with very patient industry, and that he composed with great labour, and frequent revisions.

"His verses are formed by no certain model: for he is no more like himself in his different productions than he is like others. He seems never to have studied prosody, nor to have had any direction but from his own ear. But with all his defects, he was a man of genius and a poet."

THE WORKS OF YOUNG.

VERSES TO THE AUTHOR.

Now let the Atheist tremble; thou alone
Can bid his conscious heart the Godhead own.
Whom shalt thou not reform? O thou hast seen,
How God descends to judge the souls of men.
Thou heard'st the sentence how the guilty mourn,
Driven out from God, and never must return.

Yet more, behold ten thousand thunders fall,
And sudden vengeance wrap the flaming ball:
When nature sunk, when every bolt was hurl'd,
Thou saw'st the boundless ruins of the world.

When guilty Sodom felt the burning rain,
And sulphur fell on the devoted plain;
The patriarch thus, the fiery tempest past,
With pious horror view'd the desert waste;
The restless smoke still wav'd its curls around,
For ever rising from the glowing ground.

But tell me, oh! what heavenly pleasure tell,
To think so greatly, and describe so well!
How wast thou pleas'd the wondrous theme to try,
And find the thought of man could rise so high?
Beyond this world the labour to pursue,
And open all eternity to view?

But thou art best delighted to rehearse
Heaven's holy dictates in exalted verse:
O thou hast power the harden'd heart to warm,
To grieve, to raise, to terrify, to charm;
To fix the soul on God; to teach the mind
To know the dignity of human kind;
By stricter rules well-govern'd life to scan,
And practise o'er the angel in the man.

TO A LADY,

WITH THE LAST DAY.

MADAM,
HERE, sacred truths, in lofty numbers told,
The prospect of a future state unfold:
The realms of night to mortal view display,
And the glad regions of eternal day.
This daring author scorns, by vulgar ways
Of guilty wit, to merit worthless praise.

VOL. X.

Full of her glorious theme, his towering muse,
With gen'rous zeal, a nobler fame pursues:
Religion's cause her ravish'd heart inspires,
And with a thousand bright ideas fires;
Transports her quick, impatient, piercing eye,
O'er the strait limits of mortality,
To boundless orbs, and bids her fearless soar,
Where only Milton gain'd renown before;
Where various scenes alternately excite
Amazement, pity, terror, and delight.

Thus did the muses sing in early times,
Ere skill'd to flatter vice and varnish crimes:
Their lyres were tun'd to virtuous songs alone,
And the chaste poet, and the priest, were one.
But now, forgetful of their infant state,
They soothe the wanton pleasures of the great:
And from the press, and the licentious stage,
With luscious poison taint the thoughtless age;
Deceitful charms attract our wondering eyes
And specious ruin unsuspected lies.
So the rich soil of India's blooming shores,
Adorn'd with lavish nature's choicest stores, [sight,
Where serpents lurk, by flowers conceal'd from
Hides fatal danger under gay delight.

These purer thoughts from gross alloys refin'd,
With heavenly raptures elevate the mind:
Not fram'd to raise a giddy short-liv'd joy,
Whose false allurements, while they please destroy;
But bliss resembling that of saints above,
Sprung from the vision of th' Almighty love:
Firm, solid bliss, for ever great and new,
The more 'tis known, the more admir'd, like you;
Like you, fair nymph, in whom united meet
Endearing sweetness, unaffected wit,
And all the glories of your sparkling race,
While inward virtues heighten every grace.
By these secur'd, you will with pleasure read
"Of future judgment, and the rising dead; [thrown
"Of time's grand period, heaven and earth o'er-
"And gasping nature's last tremendous groan."
These, when the stars and sun shall be no more,
Shall beauty to your ravag'd form restore,
Then shall you shine with an immortal ray,
Improv'd by death, and brighten'd by decay.

T. TRISTRAM.

TO THE AUTHOR,

ON HIS LAST DAY AND UNIVERSAL PASSION.

AND must it be as thou hast sung,
 Celestial bard, seraphic Young?
 Will there no trace, no point be found
 Of all this spacious glorious round?
 Yon lamps of light, must they decay?
 On nature's self destruction prey?
 Then fame, the most immortal thing
 Ev'n thou canst hope, is on the wing.
 Shall Newton's system be admir'd,
 When time and motion are expir'd?
 Shall souls be curious to explore
 Who rul'd an orb that is no more?

Or shall they quote the pictur'd age,
 From Pope's and thy corrective page,
 When vice and virtue lose their name
 In deathless joy, or endless shame?
 While wears away the grand machine,
 The works of genius shall be seen:
 Beyond, what laurels can there be,
 For Homer, Horace, Pope, or thee?
 Through life we chase, with fond pursuit,
 What mocks our hope, like Sodom's fruit:
 And sure, thy plan was well design'd,
 To cure this madness of the mind;
 First, beyond time our thoughts to raise;
 Then lash our love of transient praise.
 In both, we own thy doctrine just;
 And fame's a breath, and men are dust.

THE LAST DAY.

IN THREE BOOKS.

"Venit summa dies." — VIRG.

BOOK I.

"Ipse pater, media nimborum in nocte, corusca
"Fulmina molitur dextra. Quo maxima motu
"Terra tremit: fugere feræ! et mortalia corda
"Per gentes humilis stravit pavor." VIRG.

WHILE others sing the fortune of the great;
Empire and arms, and all the pomp of state;
With Britain's hero * set their souls on fire,
And grow immortal as his deeds inspire;
I draw a deeper scene: a scene that yields
A louder trumpet, and more dreadful fields;
The world alarm'd, both earth and heav'n o'er-thrown,
And gasping nature's last tremendous groan;
Death's ancient sceptre broke, the teeming tomb,
The righteous Judge, and man's eternal doom.
'Twixt joy and pain I view the bold design,
And ask my anxious heart, if it be mine.
Whatever great or dreadful has been done
Within the sight of conscious stars or sun,
Is far beneath my daring: I look down
On all the splendours of the British crown.
This globe is for my verse a narrow bound;
Attend me, all ye glorious worlds around!
O! all ye angels, howsoe'er disjoin'd,
Of every various order, place, and kind,
Hear, and assist, a feeble mortal's lays;
'Tis our Eternal King I strive to praise.

But chiefly Thou, great Ruler! Lord of all!
Before whose throne archangels prostrate fall;
If at thy nod, from discord, and from night,
Sprang beauty, and yon sparkling worlds of light,
Exalt e'en me; all inward tumults quell;
The clouds and darkness of my mind dispel;
To my great subject thou my breast inspire,
And raise my labouring soul with equal fire.

* The Duke of Marlborough.

Man, bear thy brow aloft, view every grace
In God's great offspring, beauteous nature's face:
See spring's gay bloom; see golden autumn's
store;
See how earth smiles, and hear old ocean roar.
Leviathans but heave their cumberous mail,
It makes a tide, and wind-bound navies sail.
Here forests rise, the mountain's awful pride;
Here, rivers measure climes, and worlds divide;
There, vallies fraught with gold's resplendent
seeds,

Hold kings, and kingdom's fortunes, in their beds:
There, to the skies, aspiring hills ascend,
And into distant lands their shades extend.
View cities, armies, fleets; of fleets the pride,
See Europe's law, in Albion's channel ride.
View the whole earth's vast landskip unconfin'd,
Or view in Britain all her glories join'd.

Then let the firmament thy wonder raise;
'Twill raise thy wonder, but transcend thy praise.
How far from east to west? The labouring eye
Can scarce the distant azure bounds descry:
Wide theatre! where tempests play at large,
And God's right hand can all its wrath discharge.
Mark how those radiant lamps inflame the pole,
Call forth the seasons, and the year controul:
They shine through time, with an unalter'd ray:
See this grand period rise, and that decay:
So vast, this world's a grain; yet myriads grace,
With golden pomp, the throng'd ethereal space;
So bright, with such a wealth of glory stor'd,
'Twere sin in heathens not to have ador'd.

How great, how firm, how sacred all appears!
How worthy an immortal round of years!
Yet all must drop, as autumn's sickliest grain,
And earth and firmament be sought in vain:
The tract forgot where constellations shone,
Or where the Stuarts fill'd an awful throne;
Time shall be slain, all nature be destroy'd,
Nor leave an atom in the mighty void.

THE WORKS OF YOUNG.

Sooner, or later, in some future date,
(A dreadful secret in the book of fate!)
This hour, for aught all human wisdom knows,
Or when ten thousand harvests more have rose;
When scenes are chang'd on this revolving earth,
Old empires fall, and give new empires birth;
While other Bourbons rule in other lands,
And (if man's sins forbid not) other Annes;
While the still busy world is treading o'er
The paths they trod five thousand years before,
Thoughtless as those who new life's mazes run,
Of earth dissolv'd, or an extinguish'd sun;
(Ye sublunary worlds, awake, awake!
Ye rulers of the nation, hear, and shake)
Thick clouds of darkness shall arise on day;
In sudden night all earth's dominions lay;
Impetuous winds the scatter'd forests rend;
Eternal mountains, like their cedars bend;
The vallies yawn, the troubled ocean roar,
And break the bondage of his wonted shore;
A sanguine stain the silver moon o'erspread;
Darkness the circle of the sun invade;
From inmost heaven incessant thunders roll,
And the strong echo bound from pole to pole.

When, lo, a mighty trump, one half conceal'd
In clouds, one half to mortal eye reveal'd,
Shall pour a dreadful note; the piercing call
Shall rattle in the centre of the ball;
Th' extended circuit of creation shake,
The living die with fear, the dead awake.

Oh powerful blast! to which no equal sound
Did e'er the frighted ear of nature wound,
Though rival clarions have been strain'd on high,
And kindled wars immortal through the sky,
Though God's whole enginery discharg'd, and all
The rebel angels bellow'd in their fall.

Have angels sinn'd? and shall not man beware?
How shall a son of earth decline the snare?
Not folded arms, and slackness of the mind,
Can promise for the safety of mankind:
None are supinely good: through care and pain,
And various arts, the steep ascent we gain.
This is the scene of combat, not of rest,
Man's is laborious happiness at best;
On this side death his dangers never cease,
His joys are joys of conquest, not of peace.

If then, obsequious to the will of fate,
And bending to the terms of human state,
When guilty joys invite us to their arms,
When beauty smiles, or grandeur spreads her charms,
The conscious soul would this great scene display,
Call down th' immortal hosts in dread array,
The trumpet sound, the Christian banner spread,
And raise from silent graves the trembling dead;
Such deep impression would the picture make,
No power on earth her firm resolve could shake;
Engag'd with angels she would greatly stand,
And look regardless down on sea and land;
Not proffer'd worlds her ardour could restrain,
And death might shake his threatening lance in vain!
Her certain conquest would endear the fight,
And danger serve but to exalt delight.

Instructed thus to shun the fatal spring,
Whence flows the terrors of that day I sing;

More boldly we our labours may pursue,
And all the dreadful image set to view.

The sparkling eye, the sleek and painted breast,
The burnish'd scale, curl'd train, and rising crest,
All that is lovely in the noxious snake,
Provokes our fear, and bids us flee the brake:
The sting once drawn, his guiltless beauties rise
In pleasing lustre, and detain our eyes;
We view with joy, what once did horror move,
And strong aversion softens into love.

Say then, my muse, whom dismal scenes delight,
Frequent at tombs, and in the realms of night;
Say, melancholy maid, if bold to dare
The last extremes of terror and despair;
Oh say, what change on earth, what heart in man,
This blackest moment since the world began.

Ah mournful turn! the blissful earth, who late
At leisure on her axle roll'd in state;
While thousand golden planets knew no rest,
Still onward in their circling journey prest;
A grateful change of seasons come to bring,
And sweet vicissitude of fall and spring:
Some through vast oceans to conduct the keel,
And some those watery worlds to sink, or swell:
Around her some their splendours to display,
And gild her globe with tributary day:
This world so great, of joy the bright abode,
Heaven's darling child, and favourite of her God,
Now looks an exile from her Father's care,
Deliver'd o'er to darkness and despair.
No sun in radiant glory shines on high;
No light, but from the terrors of the sky:
Fall'n are her mountains, her fam'd rivers lost,
And all into a second chaos tost:
One universal ruin spreads abroad;
Nothing is safe beneath the throne of God.

Such, earth, thy fate: what then canst thou afford

To comfort and support thy guilty lord?
Man, haughty lord of all beneath the moon,
How must he bend his soul's ambition down?
Prostrate, the reptile own, and disavow
His boasted stature, and assuming brow?
Claim kindred with the clay, and curse his form,
That speaks distinction from his sister worm?
What dreadful pangs the trembling heart invade!
Lord, why dost thou forsake whom thou hast made?
Who can sustain thy anger? Who can stand
Beneath the terrors of thy lifted hand?
It flies the reach of thought; oh save me, Power
Of powers supreme, in that tremendous hour!
Thou who beneath the frown of fate hast stood,
And in thy dreadful agony sweat blood;
Thou, who for me, through every throbbing vein,
Hast felt the keenest edge of mortal pain;
Whom death led captive through the realms below,
And taught those horrid mysteries of woe;
Defend me, O my God! Oh save me, Power
Of powers supreme, in that tremendous hour!

From east to west they fly, from pole to line,
Imploring shelter from the wrath divine;
Beg flames to wrap, or whelming sea to sweep,
Or rocks to yawn, compassionately deep:
Seas cast the monster forth to meet his doom,
And rocks but prison up for wrath to come.

So fares a traitor to an earthly crown;
While death sits threatening in his prince's frown,
His heart's dismay'd; and now his fears command,
To change his native for a distant land:
Swift orders fly, the king's severe decree
Stands in the channel, and locks up the sea;
The port he seeks, obedient to her lord,
Hurls back the rebel to his lifted sword.

But why this idle toil to paint that day?
This time elaborately thrown away?
Words all in vain pant after the distress,
The height of eloquence would make it less;
Heavens! how the good man trembles!—

And is there a Last Day? and must there come
A sure, a fix'd, inexorable doom!
Ambition swell, and, thy proud sails to show,
Take all the winds that vanity can blow:
Wealth on a golden mountain blazing stand,
And reach an India forth in either hand;
Spread all thy purple clusters, tempting vine,
And thou, more dreaded foe, bright beauty, shine;
Shine all; in all your charms together rise,
That all, in all your charms, I may despise,
While I mount upward on a strong desire,
Borne, like Elijah, in a car of fire.

In hopes of glory to be quite involv'd!
To smile at death! to long to be dissolv'd!
From our decays a pleasure to receive!
And kindle into transport at a grave!
What equals this? And shall the victor now
Boast the proud laurels on his loaded brow?
Religion! Oh thou cherub, heavenly bright!
Oh joys unmix'd, and fathomless delight!
Thou, thou art all; nor find I in the whole
Creation aught, but God and my own soul.

For ever then my soul, thy God adore,
Nor let the brute creation praise him more.
Shall things inanimate my conduct blame,
And flush my conscious cheek with spreading shame?
They all for him pursue, or quit their end;
The mounting flames their burning power suspend;
In solid heaps th' unfrozen billows stand,
To rest and silence aw'd by his command:
Nay, the dire monsters that infest the flood,
By nature dreadful, and athirst for blood,
His will can calm, their savage tempers bind,
And turn to mild protectors of mankind.
Did not the prophet this great truth maintain
In the deep chambers of the gloomy main;
When darkness round him all her horrors spread,
And the loud ocean bellow'd o'er his head?

When now the thunder roars, the lightning flies,
And all the warring winds tumultuous rise;
When now the foaming surges, tost on high,
Disclose the sands beneath, and touch the sky;
When death draws near, the mariners aghast
Look back with terror on their actions past;
Their courage sickens into deep dismay,
Their hearts, through fear and anguish, melt away;

Nor tears, nor prayers, the tempest can appease;
Now they devote their treasure to the seas;
Unload their shatter'd barque, though richly fraught,
And think the hopes of life are cheaply bought

With gems and gold; but oh, the storm so high!
Nor gems nor gold the hopes of life can buy.

The trembling prophet then, themselves to save,
They headlong plunge into the briny wave;
Down he descends, and, booming o'er his head,
The billows close; he's number'd with the dead, (Hear, O ye just! attend, ye virtuous few!
And the bright paths of piety pursue)

Lo! the great Ruler of the world, from high,
Looks smiling down with a propitious eye,
Covers his servant with his gracious hand,
And bids tempestuous nature silent stand;
Commands the peaceful waters to give place,
Or kindly fold him in a soft embrace:

He bridles in the monsters of the deep:
The bridled monsters awful distance keep:
Forget their hunger, while they view their prey;
And guiltless gaze, and round the stranger play.

But still arise new wonders; nature's Lord
Sends forth into the deep his powerful word,
And calls the great leviathan: the great
Leviathan attends in all his state;
Exults for joy, and, with a mighty bound, [sound;
Makes the sea shake, and heav'n and earth re-
Blackens the waters with the rising sand,
And drives vast billows to the distant land.

As yawns an earthquake, when imprison'd air
Struggles for vent, and lays the centre bare,
The whale expands his jaws enormous size;
The prophet views the cavern with surprise;
Measures his monstrous teeth, afar descry'd,
And rolls his wondering eyes from side to side:
Then takes possession of the spacious seat,
And sails secure within the dark retreat.

Now is he pleas'd the northern blast to hear,
And hangs on liquid mountains, void of fear;
Or falls immers'd into the depths below;
Where the dead silent waters never flow;
To the foundations of the hills convey'd,
Dwells in the shelving mountain's dreadful shade:
Where plummet never reach'd, he draws his breath,
And glides serenely through the paths of death.

Two wondrous days and nights through coral groves,
Through labyrinths of rocks and sands he roves:
When the third morning with its level rays
The mountains gilds, and on the billows plays,
It sees the king of waters rise, and pour
His sacred guest uninjur'd on the shore:
A type of that great blessing, which the muse
In her next labour ardently pursues.

BOOK II.

— *Ἐκ γῆς ἐλπίζομεν ἐς φῶς ἔλθειν
Λείψαν ἀποικοινομένων· ὀπίσω δὲ θεοὶ τελέθουσαι.*
PHOCYL.

“ — We hope, that the departed will rise
“ again from the dust: after which, like
“ the gods, they will be immortal.”

Now man awakes, and from his silent bed,
Where he has slept for ages, lifts his head;

Shakes off the slumber of ten thousand years,
 And on the borders of new worlds appears.
 Whate'er the bold, the rash, adventure cost,
 In wide eternity I dare be lost.
 The muse is wont in narrow bounds to sing,
To teach the swain, or celebrate the king.
 I grasp the whole, no more to parts confin'd,
 I lift my voice, and sing to human kind:
 I sing to men and angels; angels join, [mine.
 While such the theme, their sacred songs with
 Again the trumpet's intermitted sound
 Rolls the wide circuit of creation round,
 An universal concourse to prepare
 Of all that ever breath'd the vital air:
 In some wide field, which active whirlwinds sweep,
 Drive cities, forests, mountains, to the deep,
 To smooth and lengthen out th' unbounded space,
 And spread an area for all human race.

Now monuments prove faithful to their trust,
 And render back their long-committed dust.
 Now charnels rattle; scatter'd limbs, and all
 The various bones, obsequious to the call,
 Self-mov'd, advance; the neck perhaps to meet
 The distant head, the distant legs the feet.
 Dreadful to view, see through the dusky sky
 Fragments of bodies in confusion fly,
 To distant regions journeying, there to claim
 Deserted members, and complete the frame.

When the world bow'd to Rome's almighty sword,
 Rome bow'd to Pompey, and confess'd her lord.
 Yet one day lost, this deity below
 Became the scorn and pity of his foe.
 His blood a traitor's sacrifice was made,
 And smok'd indignant on a ruffian's blade.
 No trumpet's sound, no gasping army's yell,
 Bid, with due horror, his great soul farewell.
 Obscure his fall! all weltering in his gore,
 His trunk was cast to perish on the shore!
 While Julius frown'd the bloody monster dead,
 Who brought the world in his great rival's head.
 This sever'd head and trunk shall join once more,
 Though realms now rise between, and oceans roar.
 The trumpet's sound each fragrant mote shall hear,
 Or fix'd in earth, or if afloat in air,
 Obey the signal wafted in the wind,
 And not one sleeping atom lag behind.

So swarming bees, that on a summer's day
 In airy rings and wild meanders play, [end,
 Charm'd with the brazen sound, their wanderings
 And, gently circling, on a bough descend.

The body thus renew'd, the conscious soul,
 Which has perhaps been fluttering near the pole,
 Or 'midst the burning planets wondering stray'd,
 Or hover'd o'er where her pale corpse was laid:
 Or rather coasted on her final state,
 And fear'd, or wish'd for, her appointed fate;
 This soul, returning with a constant flame,
 Now weds for ever her immortal frame.
 Life, which ran down before, so high is wound,
 The springs maintain an everlasting round.

Thus a frail model of the work design'd
 First takes a copy of the builder's mind,
 Before the structure firm with lasting oak,
 And marble bowels of the solid rock,

Turns the strong arch, and bids the columns rise;
 And bear the lofty palace to the skies;
 The wrongs of time enabled to surpass,
 With bars of adamant, and ribs of brass.

That ancient, sacred, and illustrious * dome,
 Where soon or late fair Albion's heroes come,
 From camps, and courts, though great, or wise, or
 To feed the worm, and moulder into dust; [just,
 That solemn mansion of the royal dead,
 Where passing slaves o'er sleeping monarch's tread,
 Now populous o'erflows: a numerous race
 Of rising kings fill all th' extended space:
 A life well spent, not the victorious sword,
 Awards the crown, and styles the greater lord.

Nor monuments alone, and burial-earth,
 Labours with man to this his second birth;
 But where gay palaces in pomp arise,
 And gilded theatres invade the skies,
 Nations shall wake, whose unrespected bones
 Support the pride of their luxurious sons.
 The most magnificent and costly dome
 Is but an upper chamber to a tomb.

No spot on earth but has supply'd a grave,
 And human skulls the spacious ocean pave.
 All's full of man; and, at this dreadful turn,
 The swarm shall issue, and the hive shall burn.

Not all at once, nor in like manner, rise:
 Some lift with pain their slow unwilling eyes;
 Shrink backward from the terror of the light,
 And bless the grave, and call for lasting night.
 Others, whose long-attempted virtue stood
 Fix'd as a rock, and broke the rushing flood,
 Whose firm resolve nor beauty could melt down,
 Nor raging tyrants from their posture frown;
 Such, in this day of horrors, shall be seen
 To face the thunders with a godlike mien;
 The planets drop, their thoughts are fix'd above;
 The centre shakes, their hearts disdain to move:
 An earth dissolving, and a heaven thrown wide,
 A yawning gulf, and fiends on every side,
 Serene they view, impatient of delay,
 And bless the dawn of everlasting day.

Here greatness prostrate falls, there strength gives place,

Here lazars smile, there beauty hides her face.
 Christians, and Jews, and Turks, and Pagans stand
 A blended throng, one undistinguish'd band.
 Some who, perhaps, by mutual wounds expir'd,
 With zeal for their distinct persuasions fir'd,
 In mutual friendship their long slumber break,
 And hand in hand their Saviour's love partake.

But none are flush'd with brighter joy, or warm
 With juster confidence, enjoy the storm,
 Than those whose pious bounties unconfin'd
 Have made them public fathers of mankind.
 In that illustrious rank, what shining light
 With such distinguish'd glory fills my sight?
 Bend down, my grateful muse, that homage show
 Which to such worthies thou art proud to owe.
 Wickham! Fox! Chicheley! hail, illustrious * names,
 Who to far distant times dispense your beams;

* Westminster Abbey.

† Founders of New-College, Corpus Christi, and All-Souls, in Oxford; of all which the author was a member.

Beneath your shades, and near your crystal springs,
I first presum'd to touch the trembling strings.
All hail, thrice honour'd! 'Twas your great re-
To bless a people, and oblige a crown. [nown
And now you rise, eternally to shine,
Eternally to drink the rays divine.

Indulgent God! Oh, how shall mortal raise
His soul to due returns of grateful praise,
For bounty so profuse to human kind,
Thy wondrous gift of an eternal mind?
Shall I, who some few years ago was less
Than worm, or mite, or shadow, can express,
Was nothing; shall I live, when every fire
And every star shall languish and expire?
When earth's no more, shall I survive above,
And through the radiant files of angels move?
Or, as before the throne of God I stand,
See new worlds rolling from his spacious hand,
Where our adventures shall perhaps be taught,
As we now tell how Michael sung or fought;
All that has being in full concert join,
And celebrate the depths of love divine.

But oh! before this blissful state, before
Th' aspiring soul this wondrous height can soar,
The Judge, descending, thunders from afar,
And all mankind is summon'd to the bar.

This mighty scene I next presume to draw:
Attend, great Anna, with religious awe.
Expect not here the known successful arts
To win attention, and command our hearts:
Fiction, be far away; let no machine
Descending here, no fabled God, be seen;
Behold the God of Gods indeed descend,
And worlds unnumber'd his approach attend!

Lo! the wide theatre, whose ample space
Must entertain the whole of human race,
At heaven's all-powerful edict is prepar'd,
And fenc'd around with an immortal guard.
Tribes, provinces, dominions, worlds, o'erflow
The mighty plain, and deluge all below:
And every age and nation pours along;
Nimrod and Bourbon mingle in the throng:
Adam salutes his youngest son; no sign
Of all those ages which their births disjoin.

How empty learning, and how vain is art,
But as it mends the life, and guides the heart!
What volumes have been swell'd, what time been Spent,

To fix a hero's birth-day or descent!
What joy must it now yield, what rapture raise,
To see the glorious race of ancient days;
To greet those worthies, who perhaps have stood
Illustrious on record before the flood:
Alas! a nearer care your soul demands.
Cæsar unnoted in your presence stands.

How vast the concourse! not in number more
The waves that break on the resounding shore,
The leaves that tremble in the shady grove,
The lamps that gild the spangled vaults above:
Those overwhelming armies, whose command
Said to one empire, fall, another, stand;
Whose rear lay wrapt in night, while breaking dawn

Rous'd the broad front, and call'd the battle on:
Great Xerxes' world in arms, proud Cannæ's field,
Where Carthage taught victorious Rome to yield,

(Another blow had broke the fate's decree,
And earth had wanted her fourth monarchy)
Immortal Blenheim, fam'd Ramillia's host,
They all are here, and here they all are lost:
Their millions swell to be discern'd in vain,
Lost as a billow in th' unbounded main.

This echoing voice now rends the yielding air,
"For judgment, judgment, sons of men prepare!"
Earth shakes anew; I hear her groans profound;
And hell through all her trembling realms resound.

Whoe'er thou art, thou greatest power of earth;
Blest with most equal planets at thy birth;
Whose valour drew the most successful sword,
Most realms united in one common lord;
Who, on the day of triumph, saidst, Be thine
The skies, Jehovah, all this world is mine:
Dare not to lift thine eye—Alas! my muse,
How art thou lost! what numbers canst thou choose?
A sudden blush inflames the waving sky,
And now the crimson curtains open fly;
Lo! far within, and far above all height,
Where heaven's great Sovereign reigns in world's of light,

Whence nature He informs, and with one ray
Shot from his eye, does all her works survey,
Creates, supports, confounds! Where time and place;
Matter, and form, and fortune, life, and grace,
Wait humbly at the footstool of their God,
And move obedient at his awful nod;
Whence he beholds us vagrant emmets crawl
At random on this air-suspended ball
(Speck of creation): if he pour one breath,
The bubble breaks, and 'tis eternal death.

Thence issuing I behold (but mortal sight Sustains not such a rushing sea of light)
I see, on an empyreal flying throne
Sublimely rais'd, Heaven's everlasting Son;
Crown'd with that majesty that form'd the world,
And the grand rebel flaming downward hurl'd.
Virtue, dominion, praise, omnipotence,
Support the train of their triumphant prince.
A zone, beyond the thought of angels bright,
Around him, like the zodiac, winds its light.
Night shades the solemn arches of his brows,
And in his cheek the purple morning glows.
Where'er serene he turns propitious eyes,
Or we expect, or find, a paradise:

But if resentment reddens their mild beams,
The Eden kindles, and the world's in flames.
On one hand, Knowledge shines in purest light;
On one, the sword of Justice, fiercely bright.
Now bend the knee in sport, present the reed;
Now tell the scourg'd Impostor he shall bleed!

Thus glorious through the courts of heaven, the source

Of life and death eternal bends his course;
Loud thunders round him roll, and lightnings play;
Th' angelic host is rang'd in bright array: [shell,
Some touch the string, some strike the sounding
And mingling voices in rich concert swell;
Voices seraphic; blest with such a strain,
Could Satan hear, he were a god again.

Triumphant King of Glory! Soul of Bliss!
What a stupendous turn of fate is this?
O! whither art thou rais'd above the scorn
And indigence of him in Beth'lem born;

A needful, helpless, unaccounted, guest,
 And but a second to the fodder'd beast?
 How chang'd from him, who meekly prostrate laid,
 Vouchsaf'd to wash the feet himself had made?
 From him who was betray'd, forsook, deny'd,
 Wept, languish'd, pray'd, bled, thirsted, groan'd, and dy'd;
 Hung pierc'd and bare, insulted by the foe, [low?
 All heaven in tears above, earth unconcern'd be-
 And was't enough to bid the sun retire?
 Why did not nature at thy groan expire?
 I see, I hear, I feel, the pangs divine;
 The world is vanish'd—I am wholly thine.

Mistaken Caiaphas! Ah! which blasphem'd;
 Thou, or thy prisoner? which shall be condemn'd?
 Well might'st thou rend thy garments, well exclaim;

Deep are the horrors of eternal flame!
 But God is good! 'Tis wond'rous all! Ev'n he 'Thou gav'st to death, shame, torture, dy'd for thee.

Now the descending triumph stops its flight,
 From earth full twice a planetary height.
 There all the clouds condens'd, two columns raise,
 Distinct with orient veins and golden blaze.
 One fix'd on earth, and one in sea, and round
 Its ample foot the swelling billows found.
 These an immeasurable arch support,
 The grand tribunal of this awful court.
 Sheets of bright azure, from the purest sky,
 Stream from the crystal arch, and round the columns fly.

Death, wrapt in chains, low at the basis lies,
 And on the point of his own arrow dies.

Here high enthron'd th' Eternal Judge is plac'd,
 With all the grandeur of his godhead grac'd;
 Stars on his robes in beauteous order meet,
 And the sun burns beneath his awful feet.

Now an archangel eminently bright,
 From off his silver staff of wond'rous height,
 Unfurls the Christian flag, which waving flies,
 And shuts and opens more than half the skies:
 The cross so strong a red, it sheds a stain,
 Where'er it floats, on earth, in air, or main;
 Flushes the hill, and sets on fire the wood,
 And turns the deep-dy'd ocean into blood.

Oh, formidable glory! dreadful bright!
 Refulgent torture to the guilty sight.
 Ah turn! unwary muse, nor dare reveal
 What horrid thoughts with the polluted dwell.
 Say, (not to make the sun shrink in his beam)
 Dare not affirm, they wish it all a dream;
 Wish, or their souls may with their limbs decay,
 Or God be spoil'd of his eternal sway.
 But rather, if thou know'st the means, unfold
 How they with transport might the scene behold.

Ah how! but by repentance, by a mind
 Quick, and severe its own offence to find?
 By tears, and groans, and never-ceasing care,
 And all the pious violence of prayer?
 Thus then, with fervency till now unknown,
 I cast my heart before th' eternal throne,
 In this great temple, which the skies surround,
 For homage to its Lord, a narrow bound.

"O thou! whose balance does the mountains weigh,

Whose will the wild tumultuous seas obey,

"Whose breath can turn those watery worlds to flame,

"That flame to tempest, and that tempest tame;
 "Earth's meanest son, all trembling, prostrate falls,
 "And on the boundless of thy goodness calls.

"Oh! give the winds all past offence to sweep,
 "To scatter wide, or bury in the deep:

"Thy power, my weakness, may I ever see,

"And wholly dedicate my soul to thee:

"Reign'd o'er my will; my passions ebb and flow
 "At thy command, nor human motive know!

"If anger boil, let anger be my praise,

"And sin the graceful indignation raise.

"My love be warm to succour the distress'd,

"And lift the burden from the soul oppress'd.

"Oh, may my understanding ever read

"This glorious volume, which thy wisdom made!

"Who decks the maiden spring with flowery pride?

"Who calls forth summer, like a sparkling bride?

"Who joys the mother autumn's bed to crown?

"And bids old winter lay her honours down!

"Not the great Ottoman, or greater Czar,

"Not Europe's abitrers of peace and war:

"May sea and land, and earth and heaven be join'd,

"To bring th' Eternal Author to my mind!

"When oceans roar, or awful thunders roll,

"May thoughts of thy dread vengeance shake my soul!

"When earth's in bloom, or planets proudly shine,

"Adore, my heart, the Majesty Divine!

"Through every scene of life, or peace, or war,

"Plenty, or want, thy glory be my care!

"Shine we in arms? or sing beneath our vine?

"Thine is the vintage, and the conquest thine:

"Thy pleasure points the shaft, and bends the bow;

"The cluster blasts, or bids it brightly glow:

"'Tis thou that lead'st our powerful armies forth,

"And giv'st great Anne thy sceptre o'er the north.

"Grant I may ever, at the morning-ray,

"Open with prayer the consecrated day;

"Tune thy great praise, and bid my soul arise,

"And with the mounting sun ascend the skies:

"As that advances, let my zeal improve,

"And glow with ardour of consummate love;

"Nor cease at eve, but with the setting sun

"My endless worship shall be still begun.

And, oh! permit the gloom of solemn night

"To sacred thought may forcibly invite.

"When this world's shut, and awful planets rise,

"Call on our minds, and raise them to the skies;

"Compose our souls with a less dazzling light,

"And show all nature in a milder light;

"How every boisterous thought in calms subsides!

"How the smooth'd spirit into goodness glides!

"O how divine! to tread the milky way,

"To the bright palace of the Lord of Day;

"His court admire, or for his favour sue,

"Or leagues of friendship with his saints renew;

"Pleas'd to look down, and see the world asleep,

"While I long vigils to its founder keep!

"Canst thou not shake the centre? Oh! controul

"Subdue by force, the rebel in my soul:

"Thou, who canst still the raging of the flood,

"Restrain the various tumults of my blood;

"Teach me with equal firmness to sustain

"Alluring pleasure, and assaunting pain.

"O may I pant for thee in each desire!
 "And with strong faith soment the holy fire!
 "Stretch out my soul in hope, and grasp the prize,
 "Which in eternity's deep bosom lies!
 "At the great day of recompence behold,
 "Devoid of fear, the fatal book unfold!
 "Then wafted upward to the blissful seat,
 "From age to age, my grateful song repeat;
 "My light, my life, my God, my Saviour see,
 "And rival angels in the praise of thee."

BOOK III.

"Esse quoque in fatis reminiscitur, affore tempus,
 "Quo mare, quo tellus, correptaque regia cœli
 "Ardeat; et mundi moles operosa laboret."
 OVID. MET.

THE book unfolding; the resplendent seat
 Of saints and angels; the tremendous fate
 Of guilty souls; the gloomy realms of woe;
 And all the horrors of the world below;
 I next presume to sing: What yet remains
 Demands my last, but most exalted strains.
 And let the muse or now affect the sky,
 Or in inglorious shades for ever lie.
 She kindles, she's inflam'd so near the goal;
 She mounts, she gains upon the starry pole;
 The world grows less as she pursues her flight,
 And the sun darkens to her distant sight.
 Heaven opening, all its sacred pomp displays,
 And overwhelms her with the rushing blaze!
 The triumph rings! archangels shout around!
 And echoing nature lengthens out the sound!
 Ten thousand trumpets now at once advance;
Now deepest silence lulls the vast expanse:
 So deep the silence, and so strong the blast,
 As nature dy'd, when she had groan'd her last.
 Nor man, nor angel, moves; the Judge on high
 Looks round, and with his glory fills the sky:
 Then on the fatal book his hand he lays,
 Which high to view supporting seraphs raise;
 In solemn form the rituals are prepar'd,
 The seal is broken, and a groan is heard.
 And thou, my soul, (oh fall to sudden prayer,
 And let the thought sink deep!) shalt thou be there?

See on the left (for by the great command
 The throng divided falls on either hand;)
 How weak, how pale, how haggard, how obscene,
 What more than death in every face and mien?
 With what distress, and glarings of affright,
 They shock the heart, and turn away the sight?
 In gloomy orbs their trembling eye-balls roll,
 And tell the horrid secrets of the soul.
 Each gesture mourns, each look is black with care,
 And every groan is laden with despair.
 Reader, if guilty, spare the muse, and find
 A truer image pictur'd in thy mind.

Shouldst thou behold thy brother, father, wife,
 And all the soft companions of thy life,
 Whose blended interests levell'd at one aim,
 Whose mix'd desires sent up one common flame,
 Divided far; thy wretched self alone
 Cast on the left, of all whom thou hast known;

How would it wound? What millions wouldst thou give

For one more trial, one more day to live?
 Flung back in time an hour, a moment's space,
 To grasp with eagerness the means of grace;
 Contend for mercy with a pious rage,
 And in that moment to redeem an age?
 Drive back the tide, suspend a storm in air,
 Arrest the sun; but still of this despair.

Mark, on the right, how amiable a grace!
 Their Maker's image fresh in every face!
 What purple bloom my ravish'd soul admires,
 And their eyes sparkling with immortal fires!
 Triumphant beauty! charms that rise above
 This world, and in blest angels kindle love!
 To the Great Judge with holy pride they turn,
 And dare behold th' Almighty's anger burn;
 Its flash sustain, against its terror rise,
 And on the dread tribunal fix their eyes.
 Are these the forms that moulder'd in the dust?
 Oh the transcendent glory of the just!
 Yet still some thin remains of fear and doubt,
 Th' infected brightness of their joy pollute.

Thus the chaste bridegroom, when the priest draws nigh,
 Beholds his blessing with a trembling eye,
 Feels doubtful passions throb in every vein,
 And in his cheeks are mingled joy and pain,
 Lest still some intervening chance should rise,
 Leap forth at once, and snatch the golden prize;
 Inflame his woe, by bringing it so late,
 And stab him in the crisis of his fate.

Since Adam's family, from first to last,
 Now into one distinct survey is cast;
 Look round, vain-glorious muse, and you whoe'er
 Devote yourselves to fame, and think her fair;
 Look round, and seek the lights of human race,
 Whose shining acts time's brightest annals grace;
 Who sounded sects; crowns conquer'd, or resign'd;
 Gave names to nations; or fam'd empires join'd;
 Who rais'd the vale, and laid the mountain low;
 And taught obedient rivers where to flow;
 Who with vast fleets, as with a mighty chain,
 Could bind the madness of the roaring main:
 All lost? all undistinguish'd? no-where found?
 How will this truth in Bourbon's palace sound?

That hour, on which th' Almighty King on high
 From all eternity has fix'd his eye,
 Whether his right-hand favour'd, or annoy'd,
 Continued, alter'd, threaten'd, or destroy'd;
 Southern or eastern sceptre downward hurl'd,
 Gave north or west dominion o'er the world;
 The point of time, for which the world was built,
 For which the blood of God himself was spilt,
 That dreadful moment is arriv'd---

Aloft, the seats of bliss their pomp display
 Brighter than brightness, this distinguish'd day;
 Less glorious, when of old th' eternal Son
 From realms of night return'd with trophies won;
 Through heaven's high gates, when he triumphant rode,
 And shouting angels hail'd the victor God.
 Horrors, beneath, darkness in darkness, hell
 Of hell, where torments behind torments dwell;

A furnace formidable, deep, and wide,
O'er-boiling with a mad sulphureous tide,
Expands its jaws, most dreadful to survey,
And roars outrageous for the destin'd prey.
The sons of light scarce unappall'd look down,
And nearer press heaven's everlasting throne.

Such is the scene; and one short moment's space
Concludes the hopes and fears of human race.
Proceed who dares!—I tremble as I write;
The whole creation swims before my sight:
I see, I see, the Judge's frowning brow;
Say not, 'tis distant; I behold it now;
I faint, my tardy blood forgets to flow,
My soul recoils at the stupendous woe;
That woe, those pangs, which from the guilty
breast,

In these, or words like these, shall be express'd.

"Who burst the barriers of my peaceful grave?"

"Ah! cruel death, that would no longer save,

"But grudg'd me e'en that narrow dark abode,

"And cast me out into the wrath of God;

"Where shrieks, the roaring flame, the rattling chain,

"And all the dreadful eloquence of pain,

"Our only song; black fire's malignant light,

"The sole refreshment of the blasted sight.

"Must all those powers, heaven gave me to supply

"My soul with pleasure, and bring in my joy,

"Rise up in arms against me, join the foe,

"Sense, reason, memory, increase my woe?

"And shall my voice, ordain'd on hymns to dwell,

"Corrupt to groans, and blow the fires of hell?

"Oh! must I look with terror on my gain,

"And with existence only measure pain?

"What! no reprieve, no least indulgence given,

"No beam of hope, from any point of heaven!

"Ah, Mercy! Mercy! art thou dead above?

"Is love extinguish'd in the source of love?

"Bold that I am, did heaven stoop down to hell?

"Th' expiring Lord of life my ransom seal?

"Have I not been industrious to provoke?

"From his embraces obstinately broke?

"Pursued, and panted for his mortal hate,

"Earn'd my destruction, labour'd out my fate?

"And dare I on extinguish'd love exclaim?

"Take, take full vengeance, rouse the slackening
flame;

"Just is my lot—but oh! must it transcend

"The reach of time, despair a distant end?

"With dreadful growth shoot forward, and arise,

"Where thought can't follow, and bold fancy dies! [sound?

"NEVER! where falls the soul at that dread

"Down an abyss how dark, and how profound?

"Down, down, (I still am falling, horrid pain!)

"Ten thousand thousand fathoms still remain;

"My plunge but still begun—And this for sin!

"Could I offend, if I had never been,

"But still increas'd the senseless happy mass,

"Flow'd in the stream, or shiver'd in the grass?

"Father of mercies! why from silent earth

"Didst thou awake, and curse me into birth,

"Tear me from quiet, ravish me from night,

"And make a thankless present of thy light?

"Push into being a reverse of thee,

"And animate a clod with misery! [keep

"The beasts are happy; they come forth, and

"Short watch on earth, and then lie down to sleep.

"Pain is for man; and oh! how vast a pain

"For crimes, which made the Godhead bleed in vain?

"Annul'd his groans, as far as in them lay,

"And flung his agonies, and death, away?

"As our dire punishment for ever strong,

"Our constitution too for ever young.

"Curs'd with returns of vigour, still the same

"Powerful to bear, and satisfy the flame:

"Still to be caught, and still to be pursued!

"To perish still, and still to be renew'd!

"And this, my Help! my God! at thy decree?

"Nature is chang'd, and hell should succour me.

"And canst thou then look down from perfect
bliss,

"And see me plunging in the dark abyss?

"Calling thee Father, in a sea of fire?

"Or pouring blasphemies at thy desire?

"With mortals anguish wilt thou raise thy name,

"And by my pangs omnipotence proclaim?

"Thou, who canst toss the planets to and fro,

"Contract not thy great vengeance to my woe;

"Crush worlds; in hotter flames fall'n angels
lay;

"On me Almighty wrath is cast away.

"Call back thy thunders, Lord, hold in thy rage,

"Nor with a speck of wretchedness engage:

"Forget me quite, nor stoop a worm to blame;

"But lose me in the greatness of thy name.

"Thou art all love, all mercy, all divine,

"And shall I make those glories cease to shine?

"Shall sinful man grow great by his offence,

"And from its course turn back Omnipotence?

"Forbid it! and oh! grant, great God, at least

"This one, this slender, almost no request;

"When I have wept a thousand lives away,

"When torment is grown weary of its prey,

"When I have rav'd ten thousand years in fire,

"Ten thousand thousand, let me then expire."

Deep anguish! but too late; the hopeless soul

Bound to the bottom of the burning pool,

Though loth, and ever loud blaspheming, owns

He's justly doom'd to pour eternal groans;

Enclos'd with horrors, and transfix'd with pain,

Rolling in vengeance, struggling with his chain;

To talk to fiery tempests; to implore

The raging flame to give its burnings o'er;

To toss, to writhe, to pant beneath his load,

And bear the weight of an offended God.

The savour'd of their Judge in triumph move,

To take possession of their thrones above;

Satan's accurs'd desertion to supply,

And fill the vacant stations of the sky;

Again to kindle long-extinguish'd rays,

And with new lights dilate the heavenly blaze;

To crop the roses of immortal youth,

And drink the fountain-head of sacred truth;

To swim in seas of bliss, to strike the string,

And list the voice to their Almighty King;

To lose eternity in grateful lays,

And fill heaven's wide circumference with praise.

But I attempt the wondrous height in vain,
And leave unfinish'd the too lofty strain:
What boldly I begin, let others end;
My strength exhausted, fainting I descend,
And choose a less, but no ignoble theme,
Dissolving elements, and worlds, in flame.

The fatal period, the great hour, is come,
And nature shrinks at her approaching doom;
Loud peals of thunder give the sign, and all
Heaven's terrors in array surround the ball;
Sharp lightnings with the meteors blaze conspire
And, darted downward, set the world on fire;
Black rising clouds the thicken'd ether choke,
And spiry flames dart through the rolling smoke,
With keen vibrations cut the fullen night,
And strike the darken'd sky with dreadful light;
From heaven's four regions, with immortal force,
Angels drive on the wind's impetuous course,
T' enrage the flame: It spreads, it soars on high,
Swells in the storm, and billows through the sky:
Here winding pyramids of fire ascend,
Cities and desarts in one ruin blend;
Here blazing volumes wafted, overwhelm
The spacious face of a far distant realm;
There, undermin'd, down rush eternal hills,
The neighbouring vales the vast destruction fills.
Hear'st thou that dreadful crack? that sound which broke

Like peals of thunder, and the centre shook?
What wonders must that groan of nature tell!
Olympus there, and mightier Atlas, fell;
Which seem'd above the reach of fate to stand,
A towering monument of God's right hand;
Now dust and smoke, whose brow so lately spread
O'er shelter'd countries its diffusive shade.

Show me that celebrated spot, where all
The various rulers of the sever'd ball
Have humbly sought wealth, honour, and redress,
That land which heaven seem'd diligent to bless,
Once call'd Britannia: Can her glories end?
And can't surrounding seas her realms defend?
Alas! in flames behold surrounding seas!
Like oil, their waters but augment the blaze.

Some angel, say where ran proud Asia's bound?
Or where with fruits was fair Europa crown'd?
Where stretch'd waste Libya? Where did India's store

Sparkle in diamonds, and her golden ore?
Each lost in each, their mingling kingdoms glow,
And all dissolv'd, one fiery deluge flow:
Thus earth's contending monarchies are join'd,
And a full period of ambition find.

And now whate'er or swims, or walks, or flies,

Inhabitants of sea, or earth, or skies;
All on whom Adam's wisdom fix'd a name,
All plunge, and perish in the conquering flame.

This globe alone would but defraud the fire,
Starve its devouring rage: the flakes aspire,
And catch the clouds, and make the heavens their prey;

The sun, the moon, the stars, all melt away;
All, all is lost; no monument, no sign,
Where once so proudly blaz'd the gay machine.
So bubbles on the foaming stream expire,
So sparks that scatter from the kindling fire;
The devastations of one dreadful hour
The great Creator's six days work devour.
A mighty, mighty ruin! yet one soul
Has more to boast, and far outweighs the whole;
Exalted in superior excellence,
Casts down to nothing, such a vast expence.
Have you not seen th' eternal mountains nod,
An earth dissolving, a descending God?
What strange surprises through all nature ran?
For whom these revolutions, but for man?
For him, Omnipotence new measures takes,
For him, through all eternity, awakes;
Pours on him gifts sufficient to supply
Heaven's loss, and with fresh glories fill the sky.

Think deeply then, O man, how great thou art;

Pay thyself homage with a trembling heart;
What angels guard, no longer dare neglect,
Slighting thyself, affront not God's respect.
Enter the sacred temple of thy breast,
And gaze, and wander there, a ravish'd guest;
Gaze on those hidden treasures thou shalt find,
Wander through all the glories of thy mind.
Of perfect knowledge, see, the dawning light
Foretels a noon most exquisitely bright!
Here, springs of endless joy are breaking forth!
There, buds the promise of celestial worth!
Worth, which must ripen in a happier clime,
And brighter sun, beyond the bounds of time.
Thou, minor, canst not guess thy vast estate,
What stores, on foreign coasts, thy landing wait;
Lose not thy claim, let virtue's path be trod;
Thus glad all heaven, and please that bounteous
God,

Who, to light thee to pleasures, hung on high
Yon radiant orb, proud regent of the sky:
That service done, its beams shall fade away,
And God shine forth in one eternal day.

THE FORCE OF RELIGION; OR, VANQUISHED LOVE.

BOOK I.

"—Ad cœlum ardentia lumina tollens,
"Lumina; nam teneras arcebant vincula pal-
"mas."

VIRG.

FROM lofty themes, from thoughts that soar'd on high,

And open'd wondrous scenes above the sky,
My muse descend: indulge my fond desire;
With softer thoughts my melting soul inspire,
And smooth my numbers to a female's praise:
A partial world will listen to my lays,
While Anna reigns, and sets a female name
Unrival'd in the glorious lists of fame.

Hear, ye fair daughters of this happy land,
Whose radiant eyes the vanquish'd world command,

Virtue is beauty: but when charms of mind
With elegance of outward form are join'd;
When youth makes such bright objects still more bright,

And fortune sets them in the strongest light:
'Tis all of heaven that we below may view,
And all, but adoration, is your due.

Fam'd female virtue did this isle adorn,
Ere Ormond, or her glorious queen was born:
When now Maria's powerful arms prevail'd,
And haughty Dudley's bold ambition fail'd,
The beauteous daughter of great Suffolk's race,
In blooming youth adorn'd with every grace;
Who gain'd a crown by treason not her own,
And innocently fill'd another's throne;
Hurl'd from the summit of imperial state,
With equal mind sustain'd the stroke of fate.

But how will Guilford, her far dearer part,
With manly reason fortify his heart?
At once she longs, and is afraid to know:
Now swift she moves, and now advances slow,

To find her lord; and finding passes by,
Silent with fear, nor dares she meet his eye;
Left that unmask'd, in speechless grief, disclose
The mournful secret of his inward woes.
Thus after sickness doubtful of her face,
The melancholy virgin shuns the glass.
At length with troubled thought, but look serene,

And sorrow soften'd by her heavenly mien,
She clasps her lord, brave, beautiful, and young,
While tender accents melt upon her tongue;
Gentle and sweet, as vernal zephyr blows,
Fanning the lily or the blooming rose.

"Grieve not, my lord; a crown indeed is lost;

"What far outshines a crown, we still may boast;

"A mind compos'd; a mind that can disdain

"A fruitless sorrow for a loss so vain.

"Nothing is loss that virtue can improve

"To wealth eternal; and return above;

"Above, where no distinction shall be known

"'Twixt him whom storms have shaken from a throne,

"And him who basking in the smiles of fate,

"Shone forth in all the splendor of the great:

"Nor can I find the difference here below;

"I lately was a queen; I still am so,

"While Guilford's wife: thee rather I obey,

"Than o'er mankind extend imperial sway.

"When we lie down in some obscure retreat,

"Incens'd Maria may her rage forget;

"And I to death my duty will improve,

"And what you miss in empire, add in love—

"Your god-like soul is open'd in your look,

"And I have faintly your great meaning spoke.

"For this alone I'm pleas'd I wore the crown,

"To find with what content we lay it down.

"Heroes may win, but 'tis a heavenly race

"Can quit a throne with a becoming grace."

Thus spoke the fairest of her sex, and cheer'd
Her drooping lord; whose boding bosom fear'd

A darker cloud of ills would burst, and shed
 Severer vengeance on her guiltless head:
 Too just, alas, the terrors which he felt!
 For, lo! a guard!—forgive him, if he melt—
 How sharp her pangs, when sever'd from his side,
 The most sincerely lov'd, and loving bride,
 In space confin'd, the muse forbears to tell;
 Deep was her anguish, but she bore it well.
 His pain was equal, but his virtue less;
 He thought in grief there could be no excess.
 Pensive he sat, o'ercast with gloomy care,
 And often fondly clasp'd his absent fair;
 Now silent wander'd through his rooms of state,
 And sicken'd at their pomp, and tax'd his fate;
 Which thus adorn'd, in all her shining store,
 A splendid wretch, magnificently poor.
 Now on the bridal-bed his eyes were cast,
 And anguish fed on his enjoyments past;
 Each recollected pleasure made him smart,
 And every transport stabb'd him to the heart.

That happy moon, which summon'd to delight,
 That moon which shone on his dear nuptial night,
 Which saw him fold her yet untasted charms
 (Deny'd to princes) in his longing arms;
 Now sees the transient blessing fleet away,
 Empire and love! the vision of a day.

Thus, in the British clime, a summer-storm
 Will oft the smiling face of heaven deform;
 The winds with violence at once descend, [bend;
 Sweep flowers and fruits, and make the forest
 A sudden winter, while the sun is near,
 O'ercomes the season and inverts the year.

But whither is the captive borne away,
 The beauteous captive, from the cheerful day?
 The scene is chang'd indeed; before her eyes
 Ill-boding looks and unknown horrors rise:
 For pomp and splendor, for her guard and crown,
 A gloomy dungeon, and a keeper's frown:
 Black thoughts each morn invade the lover's
 breast,

Each night, a ruffian locks the queen to rest.

Ah mournful change, if judg'd by vulgar minds!
 But Suffolk's daughter its advantage finds,
 Religion's force divine is best display'd
 In deep desertion of all human aid:
 To succour in extremes, is her delight,
 And cheer the heart, when terror strikes the fight.
 We, disbelieving our own senses, gaze,
 And wonder what a mortal's heart can raise
 To triumph o'er misfortune's, smile in grief,
 And comfort those who come to bring relief:
 We gaze; and as we gaze, wealth, fame, decay,
 And all the world's vain glories fade away.
 Against her cares she rais'd a dauntless mind,
 And with an ardent heart, but most resign'd,
 Deep in the dreadful gloom with pious heat,
 Amid the silence of her dark retreat,
 Address'd her God—"Almighty power divine!
 "'Tis thine to raise, and to depress is thine;
 "With honour to light up the name unknown,
 "Or to put out the lustre of a throne.
 "In my short span both fortunes I have prov'd,
 "And though with ill frail nature will be mov'd,
 "I'll bear it well: (O strengthen me to bear!)
 "And if my piety may claim thy care;

"If I remember'd, in youth's giddy heat,
 "And tumult of a court, a future state;
 "O favour, when thy mercy I implore
 "For one who never guilty sceptre bore!
 "'Twas I receiv'd the crown; my lord is free!
 "If it must fall, let vengeance fall on me.
 "Let him survive, his country's name to raise,
 "And in a guilty land to speak thy praise!
 "O may th' indulgence of a father's love,
 "Pour'd forth on me, be doubled from above!
 "If these are safe, I'll think my prayers succeed,
 "And bless thy tender mercies, whilst I bleed."
 'Twas now the mournful eve before that day
 In which the queen to her full wrath gave way;
 Through rigid justice, rush'd into offence,
 And drank in zeal the blood of innocence:
 The sun went down in clouds, and seem'd to mourn

The sad necessity of his return;
 The hollow wind, and melancholy rain,
 Or did, or was imagin'd to complain:
 The tapers cast an inauspicious light;
 Stars there were none, and doubly dark the night.
 Sweet innocence in chains can take her rest;
 Soft slumber gently creeping through her breast,
 She sinks; and in her sleep is re-enthron'd,
 Mock'd by a gaudy dream, and vainly crown'd.
 She views her fleets and armies, seas and land,
 And stretches wide her shadow of command:
 With royal purple is her vision hung;
 By phantom hosts are shouts of conquests rung;
 Low at her feet the suppliant rival lies;
 Our prisoner mourns her fate, and bids her rise.

Now level beams upon the waters play'd,
 Glanc'd on the hills, and westward cast the shade;
 The busy trades in cities had began
 To sound, and speak the painful life of man.
 In tyrants breasts the thoughts of vengeance rouse,
 And the fond bridegroom turns him to his spouse.
 At this first birth of light, while morning breaks,
 Our spouseless bride, our widow'd wife awakes;
 Awakes, and smiles; nor night's imposture blames;
 Her real pomps were little more than dreams;
 A short-liv'd blaze, a lightning quickly o'er,
 That dy'd in birth, that shone, and was no more:
 She turns her side, and soon resumes a state
 Of mind, well suited to her alter'd fate,
 Serene, though serious; when dread tidings come
 (Ah wretched Guilford!) of her instant doom.
 Sun, hide thy beams: in clouds as black as night
 Thy face involve; be guiltless of the fight;
 Or haste more swiftly to the western main;
 Nor let her blood the conscious day-light stain!

Oh! how severe! to fall so new a bride,
 Yet blushing from the priest, in youthful pride;
 When time had just matur'd each perfect grace,
 And open'd all the wonders of her face!
 To leave her Guilford dead to all relief,
 Fond of his woe, and obstinate in grief.
 Unhappy fair! whatever fancy drew,
 (Vain promis'd blessings) vanish from her view;
 No train of cheerful days, endearing nights,
 No sweet domestic joys, and chaste delights;
 Pleasures that blossom ev'n from doubts and fears;
 And bliss and rapture rising out of cares;

No little Guilford, with paternal grace,
Lull'd on her knee, or smiling in her face;
Who, when her dearest father shall return,
From pouring tears on her untimely urn,
Might comfort to his silver hairs impart,
And fill her place in his indulgent heart:
As where fruits fall, quick-rising blossoms smile,
And the blest Indian of his care beguile.

In vain these various reasons jointly press,
To blacken death, and heighten her distress;
She, through th' encircling terrors, darts her sight
To the blest regions of eternal light,
And fills her soul with peace: to weeping friends
Her father, and her lord, she recommends;
Unmov'd herself: her foes her air survey,
And rage to see their malice thrown away.
She soars; now nought on earth detains her care—
But Guilford; who still struggles for his share.
Still will his form importunately rise,
Clog and retard her transport to the skies;
As trembling flames now take a feeble flight,
Now catch the brand with a returning light,
Thus her soul onward from the seats above
Falls fondly back, and kindles into love:
At length she conquers in the doubtful field;
That heaven she seeks will be her Guilford's shield.
Now death is welcome; his approach is slow;
'Tis tedious longer to expect the blow.

Oh! mortals, short of sight, who think the past
O'erblown misfortune still shall prove the last:
Alas! misfortunes travel in a train,
And oft in life form one perpetual chain;
Fear buries fear, and ills on ills attend,
Till life and sorrow meet one common end.
She thinks that she has nought but death to fear,
And death is conquer'd. Worse than death is near:

Her rigid trials are not yet complete;
The news arrives of her great father's fate.
She sees his hoary head, all white with age,
A victim to th' offended monarch's rage.
How great the mercy, had she breath'd her last,
Ere the dire sentence on her father past!

A fonder parent nature never knew;
And as his age increas'd, his fondness grew.
A parent's love ne'er better was bestow'd;
The pious daughter in her heart o'erflow'd.
And can she from all weakness still refrain?
And still the firmness of her soul maintain?
Impossible! a sigh will force its way;
One patient tear her mortal birth betray;
She sighs and weeps! but so she weeps and sighs,
As silent dews descend, and vapours rise.

Celestial patience! how dost thou defeat
The foe's proud menace, and elude his hate?
While passion takes his part, betrays our peace;
To death and torture swells each slight disgrace;
By not opposing, thou dost ills destroy,
And wear thy conquer'd sorrows into joy.
Now she revolves within her anxious mind,
What woe still lingers in reserve behind.
Griefs rise on griefs, and she can see no bound,
While nature lasts, and can receive a wound.
The sword is drawn: The queen to rage inclin'd,
By mercy, nor by piety, confin'd.

What mercy can the zealot's heart assuage,
Whose piety itself converts to rage?
She thought, and sigh'd. And now the blood began
To leave her beauteous cheek all cold and wan.
New sorrow dimm'd the lustre of her eye,
And on her cheek the fading roses die.
Alas! should Guilford too—when now she's brought
To that dire view, that precipice of thought,
While there she trembling stands, nor dares look down,

Nor can recede, till heaven's decrees are known;
Cure of all ills, till now her lord appears—
But not to cheer her heart and dry her tears!
Not now, as usual, like the rising day,
To chase the shadows and the damps away:
But, like a gloomy storm at once to sweep
And plunge her to the bottom of the deep.
Black were his robes, dejected was his air,
His voice was frozen by his cold despair:
Slow, like a ghost, he mov'd with solemn pace;
A dying paleness sat upon his face.
Back she recoil'd, she smote her lovely breast,
Her eyes the anguish of her heart confess'd;
Struck to the soul, she stagger'd with the wound,
And sunk, a breathless image, to the ground.

Thus the fair lily, when the sky's o'ercast,
At first but shudders in the feeble blast;
But when the winds and weighty rains descend,
The fair and upright stem is forc'd to bend;
Till broke at length, its snowy leaves are shed,
And strew with dying sweets their native bed.

BOOK II.

"Hic pietatis honos? sic nos in sceptra reponis?"
VIRG.

HER Guilford clasps her, beautiful in death,
And with a kiss recalls her fleeting breath,
To tapers thus, which by a blast expire,
A lighted taper, touch'd, restores the fire:
She rear'd her swimming eye, and saw the light,
And Guilford too, or she had loath'd the sight:
Her father's death she bore, despis'd her own,
But now she must, she will, have leave to groan:
Ah! Guilford, she began, and would have spoke;
But sobs rush'd in, and every accent broke:
Reason itself, as gusts of passion blew,
Was ruffled in the tempest, and withdrew.

So the youth lost his image in the well,
When tears upon the yielding surface fell:
The scatter'd features slid into decay,
And spreading circles drove his face away.

To touch the soft affections, and controul
The manly temper of the bravest soul,
What with afflicted beauty can compare,
And drops of love distilling from the fair?
It melts us down; our pains delight bestow;
And we with fondness languish o'er our woe.

This Guilford prov'd; and, with excess of pain,
And pleasure too, did to his bosom strain
The weeping fair: sunk deep in soft desire,
Indulg'd his love, and nurs'd the raging fire:
Then tore himself away; and, standing wide,
As fearing a relapse of fondness, cry'd,

With ill-dissembled grief; " My life, forbear!
 " You wound your Guilford with each cruel tear;
 " Did you not chide my grief? Repress your own:
 " Nor want compassion for yourself alone:
 " Have you beheld, how, from the distant main,
 " The thronging waves roll on, a numerous train,
 " And foam, and bellow, till they reach the shore;
 " There burst their noisy pride, and are no more;
 " Thus the successive flows of human race,
 " Chas'd by the coming, the preceding chase;
 " They found, and swell, their haughty heads they rear;

" Then fall, and flatten, break, and disappear.
 " Life is a forfeit we must shortly pay;
 " And where's the mighty lucre of a day?
 " Why should you mourn my fate? 'Tis most unkind;
 " Your own you bore with an unshaken mind:
 " And which, can you imagine, was the dart
 " That drank most blood, sunk deepest in my heart?
 " I cannot live without you; and my doom
 " I meet with joy, to share one common tomb.—
 " And are again your tears profusely spilt!
 " Oh! then, my kindness blackens to my guilt;
 " It soils itself, if it recall your pain;
 " Life of my life, I beg you to refrain!
 " The load which fate imposes, you increase;
 " And help Maria to destroy my peace."

But, oh! against himself his labour turn'd;
 The more he comforted, the more she mourn'd:
 Compassion swells our grief; words soft and kind
 But soothe our weakness, and dissolve the mind:
 Her sorrow flow'd in streams; nor her's alone,
 While that he blam'd, he yielded to his own.
 Where are the smiles she wore, when she, so late,
 Hail'd him great partner of the regal state;
 When orient gems around her temples blaz'd,
 And bending nations on the glory gaz'd? [treat,
 'Tis now the queen's command, they both re-
 So weep with dignity, and mourn in state:
 She forms the decent misery with joy,
 And loads with pomp the wretch she would destroy.
 A spacious hall is hung with black; all light
 Shut out, and noon-day darken'd into night.
 From the mid-roof a lamp depends on high,
 Like a dim crescent in a clouded sky:
 It sheds a quivering melancholy gloom,
 Which only shows the darkness of the room.
 A shining ax is on the table laid;
 A dreadful sight! and glitters through the shade.

In this sad scene the lovers are confin'd;
 A scene of terrors, to a guilty mind!
 A scene that would have damp'd with rising cares,
 And quite extinguish'd every love but theirs.
 What can they do? They fix their mournful eyes—
 Then Guilford, thus abruptly; " I despise
 " An empire lost; I fling away the crown;
 " Numbers have laid that bright delusion down;
 " But where's the Charles, or Dioclesian where,
 " Could quit the blooming, wedded, weeping fair?
 " Oh! to dwell ever on thy lip! to stand
 " In full possession of thy snowy hand!
 " And, through th' unclouded crystal of thine eye,
 " The heavenly treasures of the mind to spy!
 " Till rapture reason happily destroys,
 " And my soul wanders through immortal joys!

" Give me the world, and ask me, Where's my
 " bliss?

" I clasp thee to my breast, and answer, This.

" And shall the grave"—He groans, and can no
 more;

But all her charms in silence traces o'er;
 Her lip, her cheek, and eye, to wonder wrought;
 And, wondering, sees, in sad presaging thought,
 From that fair neck, that world of beauty fall,
 And roll along the dust, a ghastly ball!

Oh! let those tremble, who are greatly blest'd!
 For who, but Guilford, could be thus distress'd?
 Come hither, all you happy, all you great,
 From flowery meadows, and from rooms of state;
 Nor think I call, your pleasures to destroy,
 But to refine, and to exalt your joy:
 Weep not; but, smiling, fix your ardent care
 On nobler titles than the brave or fair.

Was ever such a mournful, moving sight?
 See, if you can, by that dull, trembling light:
 Now they embrace; and, mix'd with bitter woe,
 Like Isis and her Thames, one stream they flow:
 Now they start wide; fix'd in benumbing care,
 They stiffen into statues of despair:
 Now, tenderly severe, and fiercely kind,
 They rush at once; they fling their cares behind,
 And clasp, as if to death; new vows repeat;
 And, quite wrapp'd up in love, forget their fate.
 A short delusion! for the raging pain
 Returns; and their poor hearts must bleed again."

Meantime, the queen new cruelty decreed;
 But, ill content that they should only bleed,
 A priest is sent; who, with insidious art,
 Instills his poison into Suffolk's heart;
 And Guilford drank it: Hanging on the breast,
 He from his childhood was with Rome possess'd.
 When now the ministers of death draw nigh,
 And in her dearest lord she first must die,
 The subtle priest, who long had watch'd to find
 The most unguarded passes of her mind,
 Bespoke her thus: " Grieve not; 'tis in your " power

" Your lord to rescue from this fatal hour."
 Her bosom pants; she draws her breath with pain;
 A sudden horror thrills through every vein;
 Life seems suspended, on his words intent;
 And her soul trembles for the great event.

The priest proceeds: " Embrace the faith of " Rome,

" And ward your own, your lord's, and father's doom.

Ye blessed spirits! now your charge sustain;
 The past was ease; now first she suffers pain.
 Must she pronounce her father's death? must she Bid Guilford bleed?—It must not, cannot, be.
 It cannot be! But 'tis the Christian's praise,
 Above impossibilities to raise

The weakness of our nature; and deride
 Of vain philosophy the boasted pride.
 What though our feeble sinews scarce impart
 A moment's swiftness to the feather'd dart;
 Though tainted air our vigorous youth can break,
 And a chill blast the hardy warrior shake,
 Yet are we strong: Hear the loud tempest roar;
 From east to west, and call us weak no more;

The lightning's unresisted force proclaims
Our might; and thunders raise our humble names;
'Tis our Jehovah fills the heavens; as long
As he shall reign Almighty, we are strong:
We, by devotion, borrow from his throne;
And almost make Omnipotence our own:
We force the gates of heaven, by fervent prayer;
And call forth triumph out of man's despair.

Our lovely mourner, kneeling, lifts her eyes
And bleeding heart, in silence, to the skies,
Devoutly sad—Then, brightening, like the day,
When sudden winds sweep scatter'd clouds away,
Shining in majesty, till now unknown;
And breathing life and spirit scarce her own;
She, rising, speaks: "If these the terms——"

Here, Guilford, cruel Guilford, (barbarous man!

Is this thy love?) as swift as lightning ran;
O'erwhelm'd her with tempestuous sorrow fraught,
And stifled, in its birth, the mighty thought;
Then bursting fresh into a flood of tears,
Fierce, resolute, delirious with his fears;
His fears for her alone: he beat his breast,
And thus the fervour of his soul express:

"Oh! let thy thought o'er our past converse
"rove,

"And show one moment uninflam'd with love!

"Oh! if thy kindness can no longer last,

"In pity to thyself, forget the past!

"Else wilt thou never, void of shame and fear,

"Pronounce his doom, whom thou hast held so
"dear:

"Thou who hast took me to thy arms, and swore

"Empires were vile, and fate could give no more;

"That to continue, was its utmost power,

"And make the future like the present hour,

"Now call a ruffian; bid his cruel sword

"Lay wide the bosom of thy worthless lord;

"Transfix his heart (since you its love disclaim),

"And stain his honour with a traitor's name.

"This might perhaps be borne without remorse;

"But sure a father's pangs will have their force!

"Shall his good age, so near its journey's end,

"Through cruel torment to the grave descend?

"His shallow blood all issue at a wound,

"Wash a slave's feet, and smoke upon the ground?

"But he to you has ever been severe;

"Then take your vengeance"—Suffolk now drew near;

Bending beneath the burden of his care;

His robes neglected, and his head was bare;

Decrepit winter, in the yearly ring,

Thus slowly creeps, to meet the blooming spring:

Downward he cast a melancholy look;

Thrice turn'd, to hide his grief; then faintly spoke,

"Now deep in years, and forward in decay,

"That ax can only rob me of a day;

"For thee, my soul's desire! I can't refrain;

"And shall my tears, my last tears, flow in
"vain?

"When you shall know a mother's tender name,

"My heart's distress no longer will you blame."

At this, afar his bursting groans were heard;

The tears ran trickling down his silver beard:

He snatch'd her hand, which to his lips he prest,
And bid her plant a dagger in his breast;
Then, sinking, call'd her piety unjust,
And soil'd his hoary temples in the dust.

Hard-hearted men! will you no mercy know?
Has the queen brib'd you to distress her foe?

O weak deserters to misfortune's part,

By false affection thus to pierce her heart!

When she had soar'd, to let your arrows fly,

And fetch her bleeding from the middle sky!

And can her virtue, springing from the ground,

Her flight recover, and disdain the wound,

When cleaving love and human interest bind

The broken force of her aspiring mind;

As round the generous eagle, which in vain

Exerts her strength, the serpent wreathes his train,

Her struggling wings entangles, curling plies

His poisonous tail, and stings her as she flies!

While yet the blow's first dreadful weight she feels,

And with its force her resolution reels;

Large doors, unfolding with a mournful sound,

To view discover, weltering on the ground,

Three heedless trunks, of those whose arms maintain'd,

And in her wars immortal glory gain'd;

The lifted ax assur'd her ready doom,

And silent mourners sadden'd all the room.

Shall I proceed; or here break off my tale?

Nor truths, to stagger human faith, reveal.

She met this utmost malice of her fate

With Christian dignity, and pious state:

The beating storm's propitious rage she blest,

And all the martyr triumph'd in her breast:

Her lord and father, for a moment's space,

She strictly folded in her soft embrace!

Then thus she spoke, while angels heard on high,

And sudden gladness smil'd along the sky:

"Your over-fondness has not mov'd my hate;

"I am well pleas'd you make my death so great;

"I joy I cannot save you; and have given

"Two lives, much dearer than my own to heaven,

"If so the queen decrees*:—But I have cause

"To hope my blood will satisfy the laws;

"And there is mercy still, for you, in store:

"With me the bitterness of death is o'er.

"He shot his sting in that farewell embrace;

"And all, that is to come, is joy and peace.

"Then let mistaken sorrow be suppress'd,

"Nor seem to envy my approaching rest."

Then, turning to the ministers of fate,

She, smiling, says, "My victory's complete:

"And tell your queen, I thank her for the blow,

"And grieve my gratitude I cannot show:

"A poor return I leave in England's crown,

"For everlasting pleasure and renown:

"Her guilt alone allays this happy hour;

"Her guilt—the only vengeance in her power."

Not Rome, untouch'd with sorrow, heard her fate;

And fierce Maria pity'd her too late.

* Here she embraces them.

LOVE OF FAME, THE UNIVERSAL PASSION.

IN SEVEN CHARACTERISTICAL SATIRES.

“ — Fulgente trahit constrictos gloria curru
“ Non minus ignotos generosis.” — Hor.

PREFACE.

THESE satires have been favourably received at home and abroad. I am not conscious of the least malevolence to any particular person through all the characters; though some persons may be so selfish as to engross a general application to themselves. A writer in polite letters should be content with reputation; the private amusement he finds in his compositions; the good influence they have on his severer studies; that admission they give him to his superiors; and the possible good effect they may have on the public; or else he should join to his politeness some more lucrative qualification.

But it is possible, that satire may not do much good: men may rise in their affections to their follies, as they do to their friends, when they are abused by others: It is much to be feared, that misconduct will never be chased out of the world by satire; all therefore that is to be said for it is, that misconduct will certainly be never chased out of the world by satire, if no satires are written: nor is that term unapplicable to graver compositions. Ethics, Heathen and Christian, and the Scriptures themselves, are in a great measure a satire on the weakness and iniquity of men; and some part of that satire is in verse too: nay, in the first ages, philosophy and poetry were the same thing; wisdom wore no other dress: so that I hope these satires will be the more easily pardoned that misfortune by the severe. If they like not the fashion, let them take them by the weight; for some weight they have, or the author has failed in his aim. Nay, historians themselves may be considered as satirists, and satirists most severe; since such are most human actions, that to relate is to expose them.

No man can converse much in the world, but at what he meets with, he must either be insensible, or grieve, or be angry, or smile. Some passion (if we are not impassive) must be moved; for the general conduct of mankind is by no means a thing indifferent to a reasonable and virtuous man. Now to smile at it, and turn it into ridicule, I think most eligible; as it hurts ourselves least, and gives vice and folly the greatest offence: and that for this reason; because what men aim at by them, is generally public opinion and esteem; which truth is the subject of the following satires; and joins them together, as several branches from the same root: an unity of design, which has not, I think, in a set of satires, been attempted before.

Laughing at the misconduct of the world, will in a great measure ease us of any more disagreeable passion about it. One passion is more effectually driven out by another, than by reason; whatever some may teach: For to reason we owe our passions: had we not reason, we should not be offended at what we find amiss: and the cause seems not to be the natural cure of any effect.

Moreover, laughing satire bids the fairest for success: the world is too proud to be fond of a serious tutor; and when the author is in a passion, the laugh generally, as in conversation, turns against him. This kind of satire only has any delicacy in it. Of this delicacy, Horace is the best master: he appears in good humour while he censures; and therefore his censure has the more weight, as supposed to proceed from judgment, not from passion. Juvenal is ever in a passion: He has little valuable but his eloquence and morality: The last of which I have had in my eye; but rather for emulation than imitation, through my whole work.

But though I comparatively condemn Juvenal in part of the sixth satire (where the occasion most required it), I endeavoured to touch on his manner; but was forced to quit it soon, as disagreeable to the writer, and reader too. Boileau has joined both the Roman satirists with great success; but has too much of Juvenal in his very serious Satire on Woman, which should have been the gayest of all. An excellent critic of our own, commends Boileau's closeness, or, as he calls it, pressness, particularly; whereas, it appears to me, that repetition is his fault, if any fault should be imputed to him.

There are some prose satirists of the greatest delicacy and wit; the last of which can never, or should never, succeed without the former. An author without it, betrays too great a contempt for mankind, and opinion of himself; which are had advocates for reputation and success. What a difference is there between the merit, if not the wit, of Cervantes and Rabelais! The last has a particular art of throwing a great deal of genius and learning into frolic and jest; but the genius and the scholar is all you can admire; you want the gentleman to converse with in him: he is like a criminal who receives his life for some services; you commend, but you pardon too. Indecency offends our pride, as men; and our unaffected taste, as judges of composition: Nature has wisely formed us with an aversion to it; and he that succeeds in spite of it, is * "aliena venia, quam sua providentia tutior."

Such wits, like false oracles of old (which were wits and cheats), should set up for reputation among the weak, in some Bæotia, which was the land of oracles; for the wife will hold them in contempt. Some wits too, like oracles, deal in ambiguities; but not with equal success: for though ambiguities are the first excellence of an impostor, they are the last of a wit.

Some satirical wits and humourists, like their father Lucian, laugh at every thing indiscriminately; which betrays such a poverty of wit, as cannot afford to part with any thing; and such a want of virtue, as to postpone it to a jest. Such writers encourage vice and folly, which they pretend to combat, by setting them on an equal foot with better things: and while they labour to bring every thing into contempt, how can they expect

SATIRE I.

TO HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF DORSET.

"— Tanto major Famæ sitis est, quam
"Virtutis."—— Juv. Sat. x.

My verse is satire; Dorset, lend your ear,
And patronise a muse you cannot fear.
To poets sacred is a Dorset's name:
Their wonted passport through the gates of fame;
It bribes the partial reader into praise,
And throws a glory round the shelter'd lays:
The dazzled judgment fewer faults can see,
And gives applause to Blackmore, or to me.
But you decline the misstress we pursue;
Others are fond of fame, but fame of you.

Instructive satire, true to virtue's cause!
Thou shining supplement of public laws!
When flatter'd crimes of a licentious age
Reproach our silence, and demand our rage;
When purchas'd follies, from each distant land,
Like arts, improve in Britain's skilful hand;
When the law shows her teeth, but dares not bite,
And South-sea treasures are not brought to light;
When churchmen Scripture for the classics quit,
Polite apostates from God's grace to wit;
When men grow great from their revenue spent,
And fly from bailiffs into parliament;

their own parts should escape? Some French writers particularly, are guilty of this in matters of the last consequence; and some of our own. They that are for lessening the true dignity of mankind, are not sure of being successful, but with regard to one individual in it. It is this conduct that justly makes a wit a term of reproach.

Which puts me in mind of Plato's fable of the Birth of Love: one of the prettiest fables of all antiquity; which will hold likewise with regard to modern poetry. Love, says he, is the son of the Goddess of Poverty, and the God of Riches: he has sent from his father his daring genius; his elevation of thought; his building castles in the air; his prodigality; his neglect of things serious and useful; his vain opinion of his own merit; and his affectation of preference and distinction: from his mother he inherits his indigence, which makes him a constant beggar of favours; that importunity with which he begs; his flattery; his servility; his fear of being despised, which is inseparable from him. This addition may be made, viz. That poetry, like love, is a little subject to blindness, which makes her mistake her way to preferments and honours; that she has her satirical quiver; and lastly, that she retains a dutiful admiration of her father's family; but divides her favours, and generally lives with her mother's relations.

However, this is not necessity, but choice: were wisdom her governess, she might have much more of the father than the mother; especially in such an age as this, which shows a due passion for her charms.

When dying sinners, to blot out their score,
Bequeath the church the leavings of a whore;
To chafe our spleen, when themes like these increase,

Shall panegyric reign, and censure cease?
Shall poesy, like law, turn wrong to right,
And dedications wash an Æthiop white,
Set up each senseless wretch for nature's boast,
On whom praise shines, as trophies on a post?
Shall funeral eloquence her colours spread,
And scatter roses on the wealthy dead?
Shall authors smile on such illustrious days,
And satirise with nothing—but their praise?

Why slumbers Pope, who leads the tuneful train,
Nor hears that virtue, which he loves, complain?
Donne, Dorset, Dryden, Rochester, are dead,
And guilt's chief foe, in Addison, is fled;
Congreve, who crown'd with laurels, fairly won,
Sits smiling at the goal, while others run,
He will not write; and (more provoking still)
Ye gods! he will not write, and Mævius will.

Doubly distressed, what author shall we find,
Discreetly daring, and severely kind,
The courtly * Roman's shining path to tread,
And sharply smile prevailing folly dead?

* Horace.

Will no superior genius snatch the quill,
And save me, on the brink, from writing ill?
Though vain the strife, I'll strive my voice to raise.
What will not men attempt for sacred praise?
The love of praise, howe'er conceal'd by art,
Reigns, more or less, and glows, in every heart:
The proud, to gain it, toils on toils endure;
The modest shun it, but to make it sure.
O'er globes, and sceptres, now on thrones it swells;
Now, trims the midnight lamp in college cells:
'Tis Tory, Whig; it plots, prays, preaches, pleads,
Harangues in senates, squeaks in masquerades.
Here, to Steele's humour makes a bold pretence;
There, bolder, aims at Pulteney's éloquence.
It aids the dancer's heel, the writer's head,
And heaps the plain with mountain's of the dead;
Nor ends with life; but nods in fable plumes,
Adorns our berse, and flatters on our tombs.

What is not proud? The pimp is proud to see
So many like himself in high degree:
The whore is proud her beauties are the dread
Of preevish virtue and the marriage-bed;
And the brib'd cuckold, like crown'd victims borne
To slaughter, glories in his gilded horn.

Some go to church, proud humbly to repent,
And come back much more guilty than they went:
One way they look, another way they steer,
Pray to the gods, but would have mortals hear;
And when their sins they set sincerely down,
They'll find that their religion has been one.

Others with wishful eyes on glory look,
When they have got their picture tow'rd's a book:
Or pompous title, like a gaudy sign,
Meant to betray dull sots to wretched wine.
If at his title T—— had drop'd his quill,
T—— might have pass'd for a great genius still.
But T—— alas! (excuse him, if you can)
Is now a scribbler, who was once a man.
Imperious some a classic fame demand,
For heaping up, with a laborious hand,
A waggon-load of meanings for one word,
While A's depos'd, and B with pomp restor'd.

Some, for renown, on scraps of learning doat,
And think they grow immortal as they quote.
To patch-work learn'd quotations are ally'd;
Both strive to make our poverty our pride.

On glass how witty is a noble peer!
Did ever diamond cost a man so dear?

Polite diseases make some ideots vain;
Which, if unfortunately well, they feign.

Of folly, vice, disease, men proud we see;
And (stranger still!) of blockheads' flattery;
Whose praise defames; as if a fool should mean,
By spitting on your face, to make it clean.

Nor is't enough all hearts are swoln with pride,
Her power is mighty, as her realm is wide.
What can she not perform? The love of fame
Made bold Alphonfus his Creator blame:
Empedocles hurl'd down the burning steep:
And (stronger still!) made Alexander weep.
Nay, it holds Delia from a second bed,
Though her lov'd lord has four half-months been bed.

This passion with a pimple have I seen
Retard a cause, and give a judge the spleen,

By this inspir'd (O ne'er to be forgot!)
Some lords have learn'd to spell, and some to knot.
It makes Globose a speaker in the house;
He hems, and is deliver'd of his mouse.
It makes dear self on well-bred tongues prevail,
And I the little hero of each tale.
Sick with the love of fame, what throngs pour in,
Unpeople court, and leave the senate thin?
My growing subject seems but just begun,
And, chariot-like, I kindle as I run.

Aid me, great Homer! with thy epic rules,
To take a catalogue of British fools.
Satire! had I thy Dorset's force divine,
A knave or fool should perish in each line;
Though for the first all Westminster should plead,
And for the last all Gresham intercede.

Begin. Who first the catalogue shall grace?
To quality belongs the highest place.
My lord comes forward; forward let him come!
Ye vulgar! at your peril, give him room:
He stands for fame on his forefathers' feet,
By heraldry, prov'd valiant or discreet.

With what a decent pride he throws his eyes
Above the man by three descents less wise!
If virtues at his noble hands you crave,
You bid him raise his father's from the grave.
Men should press forward in fame's glorious chase;
Nobles look backward, and so lose the race.

Let high birth triumph! What can be more great?

Nothing—but merit in a low estate.
To virtue's humblest son let none prefer
Vice, though descended from the conqueror.
Shall men, like figures, pass for high, or base,
Slight, or important, only by their place?
Titles are marks of honest men, and wise;
The fool, or knave, that wears a title, lies.

They that on glorious ancestors enlarge,
Produce their debt, instead of their discharge.
Dorset, let those who proudly boast their line,
Like thee, in worth hereditary, shine.

Vain as false greatness is, the muse must own
We want not fools to buy that Bristol stone.
Mean sons of earth, who, on a South-sea tide
Of full success, swam into wealth and pride.
Knock with a purse of gold at Anstis' gate,
And beg to be descended from the great.

When men of infamy to grandeur soar,
They light a torch to show their shame the more.
Those governments which curb not evils, cause!
And a rich knave's a libel on our laws.

Belus with solid glory will be crown'd;
He buys no phantom, no vain empty sound;
But builds himself a name; and, to be great,
Sinks in a quarry an immense estate!
In cost and grandeur, Chandos he'll out-do;
And, Burlington, thy taste is not so true.
The pile is finish'd; every toil is past;
And full perfection is arriv'd at last;
When, lo! my lord to some small corner runs,
And leaves state-rooms to strangers and to duns.

The man who builds, and wants wherewith to
Provides a home from which to run away. [pay
In Britain, what is many a lordly seat,
But a discharge in full for an estate?

In smaller compass lies Pygmalion's fame;
Not domes, but antique statues, are his flame:
Not Fountaine's self more Parian charms has known;

Nor is good Pembroke more in love with stone.
The bailiffs come (rude men profanely bold!)
And bid him turn his Venus into gold.

"No, sirs, he cries; I'll sooner rot in jail:
"Shall Grecian arts be truck'd for English bail?"
Such heads might make their very busts's laugh:
His daughter starves; but * Cleopatra's safe.

Men, overloaded with a large estate,
May spill their treasure in a nice conceit:
The rich may be polite; but, oh! 'tis sad
To say you're curious, when we swear you're mad.

By your revenue measure your expence;
And to your funds and acres join your sense.

No man is blest'd by accident or guess;

True wisdom is the price of happiness;

Yet few without long discipline are sage;

And our youth only lays up sighs for age.

But how, my muse, canst thou resist so long
The bright temptation of the courtly throng,
Thy most inviting theme: The court affords
Much food for satire;—it abounds in lords.

"What lords are those saluting with a grin?"

One is just out, and one as lately in.

"How comes it then to pass we see preside

"On both their brows an equal share of pride?"

Pride, that impartial passion, reigns through all,
Attends our glory, nor deserts our fall.

As in its home it triumphs in high place,

And frowns a haughty exile in disgrace.

Some lords it bids admire their wands so white,

Which bloom, like Aaron's, to their ravish'd sight:

Some lords it bids reign; and turns their wands,

Like Moses', into serpents in their hands.

These sink, as divers, for renown; and boast,

With pride inverted, of their honours lost.

But against reason sure 'tis equal sin,

The boast of merely being out, or in.

What numbers here, through odd ambition, strive

To seem the most transported things alive?

As if by joy, desert was understood:

And all the fortunate were wise and good.

Hence aching bosoms wear a visage gay,

And stifled groans frequent the ball and play.

Completely dress'd by † Monteuil and grimace,

They take their birth-day suit and public face:

Their smiles are only part of what they wear.

Put off at night, with Lady B——'s hair,

What bodily fatigue is half so bad?

With anxious care they labour to be glad.

What numbers, here, would into fame advance,

Conscious of merit, in the coxcomb's dance;

The tavern, park, assembly, mask, and play,

Those dear destroyers of the tedious day!

That wheel of fops! that saunter of the town!

Call it diversion, and the pill goes down.

Fools grin on fools, and, stoic-like support,

Without one sigh, the pleasures of a court.

* A famous statue.

† A famous taylor.

Courts can give nothing, to the wise and good,
But scorn of pomp, and love of solitude.

High stations tumult, but not bliss, create:

None think the great unhappy, but the great:

Fools gaze, and envy; envy darts a sting,

Which makes a swain as wretched as a king.

I envy none their pageantry and show;

I envy none the gilding of their woe.

Give me, indulgent gods! with mind serene,

And guiltless heart, to range the sylvan scene;

No splendid poverty, no smiling care,

No well-bred hate, or servile grandeur, there:

There pleasing objects useful thoughts suggest;

The sense is ravish'd, and the soul is blest;

On every thorn delightful wisdom grows;

In every rill a sweet instruction flows.

But some, untaught, o'erhear the whispering rill,

In spite of sacred leisure, blockheads still:

Nor shoots up folly to a nobler bloom

In her own native soil, the drawing-room.

The squire is proud to see his couriers strain,

Or well-breath'd beagles sweep along the plain.

Say, dear Hippolytus (whose drink is ale,

Whose erudition is a Christmas-tale,

Whose mistress is saluted with a smack,

And friend receiv'd with thumps upon the back)

When thy sleek gelding nimbly leaps the mound,

And Ringwood opens on the tainted ground,

Is that thy praise? Let Ringwood's fame alone;

Just Ringwood leaves each animal his own;

Nor envies, when a gypsy you commit,

And shake the clumsy bench with country wit;

When you the dullest of dull things have said,

And then ask pardon for the jest you made.

Here breathe, my muse! and then thy task re-

new!

Ten thousand fools unsung are still in view.

Fewer lay-atheists made by church debates;

Fewer great beggars fam'd for large estates;

Ladies, whose love is constant as the wind;

Cits, who prefer a guinea to mankind;

Fewer grave lords to Scrope discreetly bend;

And fewer books a statesman gives his friend.

Is there a man of an eternal vein,

Who lulls the town in winter with his strain,

At Bath, in summer, chants the reigning lads,

And sweetly whistles as the waters pass?

Is there a tongue, like Delia's o'er her cup,

That runs for ages without winding-up?

Is there, whom his tenth epic mounts to fame?

Such, and such only, might exhaust my theme:

Nor would these heroes of the task be glad,

For who can write so fast as men run mad?

SATIRE II.

My muse, proceed, and reach thy destin'd end;

Though toils and danger the bold task attend,

Heroes and Gods make other poems fine;

Plain satire calls for sense in every line:

Then, to what swarms thy faults I dare expose!

All friends to vice and folly are thy foes.

When such the foe, a war eternal wage;

'Tis most ill-nature to repress thy rage;

And if these strains some nobler muse excite,
I'll glory in the verse I did not write.

So weak are human-kind by nature made,
Or to such weakness by their vice betray'd.
Almighty vanity! to thee they owe
Their rest of pleasure, and their balm of woe.
Thou, like the sun, all colours dost contain,
Varying, like rays of light, on drops of rain.
For every soul finds reasons to be proud,
Though hiss'd and hooted by the pointing crowd.

Warm in pursuit of foxes and renown,
* Hippolytus demands the sylvan crown;
But Florio's fame the product of a shower,
Grows in his garden, an illustrious flower!
Why teems the earth? Why melt the vernal skies?
Why shines the sun? To make Paul † Diack rise.
From morn to night has Florio gazing stood,
And wonder'd how the gods could be so good;
What shape! What hue! Was ever nymph so fair?
He doats! he dies! he too is rooted there.
O solid bliss! which nothing can destroy,
Except a cat, bird, snail, or idle boy.

In fame's full bloom lies Florio down at night,
And wakes next day a most inglorious wight;
The tulip's dead! See thy fair sister's fate
O C——! and be kind ere 'tis too late.

Nor are those enemies I mention'd, all;
Beware, O Florist, thy ambition's fall.
A friend of mine indulg'd this noble flame;
A Quaker serv'd him, Adam was his name;
To one lov'd tulip oft the master went,
Hung o'er it, and whole days in rapture spent;
But came and miss'd it one ill-fated hour:
He rag'd! he roar'd! "What demon cropt my flower?"

Serene, quoth Adam, "Lo! 'twas crush'd by me;
"Fall'n is the Baal to which thou bow'dst thy knee."

But all men want amusement; and what crime
In such a paradise to fool their time?
None: but why proud of this? To fame they soar;
We grant they're idle, if they'll ask no more.

We smile at florists, we despise their joy,
And think their hearts enamour'd of a toy:
But are those wiser whom we most admire,
Survey with envy, and pursue with fire?
What's he who fights for wealth, or fame, or power?
Another Florio doating on a flower!
A short-liv'd flower; and which has often sprung
From fordid arts, as Florio's out of dung.

With what, O Codrus! is thy fancy smit?
The flower of learning, and the bloom of wit.
The gaudy shelves with crimson bindings glow,
And Epictetus is a perfect beau.
How fit for thee, bound up in crimson too,
Gilt, and, like them, devoted to the view!
Thy books are furniture. Methinks 'tis hard
That science should be purchas'd by the yard;
And Tonsen, turn'd upholsterer, send home
The gilded leather to fit up thy room.

If not to some peculiar end design'd,
Study's the specious trifling of the mind;

* This refers to the first satire.

† The name of a tulip.

Or is at best a secondary aim,
A chase for sport alone, and not for game.
If so, sure they who the mere volume prize,
But love the thicket where the quarry lies.

On buying books Lorenzo long was bent,
But found at length that it reduc'd his rent;
His farms were flown; when, lo! a sale comes on,
A choice collection! what is to be done?
He sells his last; for he the whole will buy;
Sells ev'n his house; nay, wants whereon to lie:
So high the generous ardour of the man
For Romans, Greeks, and Orientals ran.
When terms were drawn, and brought him by the clerk,

Lorenzo sign'd the bargain—with his mark.
Unlearned men of books assume the care,
As eunuch's are the guardians of the fair.

Not in his authors' liveries alone
Is Codrus' erudite ambition shown:
Editions various, at high prices bought,
Inform the world what Codrus would be thought;
And to this cost another must succeed,
To pay a sage, who says that he can read;
Who titles knows, and indexes has seen;
But leaves to Chesterfield what lies between;
Of pompous books who shuns the proud expence,
And humbly is contented with their sense.

O Stanhope, whose accomplishments make good
The promise of a long illustrious blood,
In arts and manners eminently grac'd,
The strictest honour! and the finest taste!
Accept this verse; if satire can agree
With so consummate an humanity.

By your example would Hilario mend;
How would it grace the talents of my friend,
Who, with the charms of his own genius smit,
Conceives all virtues are compris'd in wit!
But time his fervent petulance may cool;
For though he is a wit, he is no fool.
In time he'll learn to use, not waste, his sense;
Nor make a frailty of an excellence.
He spares nor friend nor foe; but calls to mind;
Like doom's-day, all the faults of all mankind.

What though wit tickles? tickling is unsafe,
If still 'tis painful while it makes us laugh.
Who, for the poor renown of being smart,
Would leave a sting within a brother's heart?

Parts may be prais'd, good-nature is ador'd;
Then draw your wit as seldom as your sword;
And never on the weak; or you'll appear
As there no hero, no great genius here.
As in smooth oil the razor best is whet,
So wit is by politeness sharpest set:
Their want of edge from their offence is seen;
Both pain us least when exquisitely keen.
The same men give is for the joy they find;
Dull is the jest, when the joke's unkind.

Since Marcus, doubtless, thinks himself a wit,
To pay my compliment, what place so fit?
His most facetious * letters came to hand,
Which my first satire sweetly reprimand:
If that a just offence to Marcus gave,
Say, Marcus, which art thou, a fool, or knave?

* Letters sent to the author, signed Marcus.

For all but such with caution I forbore;
That thou was either, I ne'er knew before:
I knew thee now, both what thou art, and who;
No mask so good, but Marcus must shine through:
False names are vain, thy lines their author tell;
Thy best concealment had been writing well:
But thou a brave neglect of fame hast shown,
Of others' fame, great genius! and thy own.
Write on unheeded; and this maxim know,
The man who pardons, disappoints his foe.

In malice to proud wits, some proudly lull
Their peevish reason; vain of being dull;
When some home joke has stung their solemn souls,
In vengeance they determine—to be fools;
Through spleen, that little nature gave, make less,
Quite zealous in the ways of beaviness;
To lumps inanimate a fondness take;
And disinherit sons that are awake.
These, when their utmost venom they would spit,
Most barbarously tell you—"He's a wit."
Poor negroes, thus, to show their burning spite
To cacodemons, say, they're devilish white.

Lampridius, from the bottom of his breast,
Sighs o'er one child; but triumphs in the rest.
How just his grief! one carries in his head
A less proportion of the father's lead;
And is in danger, without special grace,
To rise above a justice of the peace.
The dunghill-breed of men a diamond scorn,
And feel a passion for a grain of corn;
Some stupid, plodding, money-loving wight,
Who wins their hearts by knowing black from white,

Who with much pains, exerting all his sense,
Can range aright his shillings, pounds, and pence.

The booby father craves a bobby son;
And by heaven's blessing thinks himself undone,
Wants of all kinds are made to fame a plea;
One learns to lisp; another, not to see:
Miss D——, tottering, catches at your hand:
Was ever thing so pretty born to stand? [pride,
Whilst these, what nature gave, disown, through
Others affect what nature has deny'd;
What nature has deny'd, fools will pursue:
As apes are ever walking upon two.

Crassus, a grateful sage, our awe and sport!
Supports grave forms; for forms the sage support.
He hems; and cries, with an important air,
"If yonder clouds withdraw, it will be fair:"
Then quotes the Stagyrte, to prove it true;
And adds, "The learn'd delight in something new."
Is't not enough the blackhead scarce can read,
But must he wisely look, and gravely plead?
As far a formalist from wisdom sits,
In judging eyes, as libertines from wits.

These subtle wights (so blind are mortal men,
Though satire couch them with her keenest pen)
For ever will hang out a solemn face,
To put off nonsense with a better grace:
As pedlars with some hero's head make bold,
Illustrious mark! where pins are to be sold.
What's the bent brow, or neck in thought reclin'd?
The body's wisdom to conceal the mind.
A man of sense can artifice disdain;
As men of wealth may venture to go plain;

And be this truth eternal ne'er forgot,
Solemnity's a cover for a fool.

I find the fool, when I behold the screen;
For 'tis the wise man's interest to be seen.

Hence, Chesterfield, that openness of heart,
And just disdain for that poor mimic art;
Hence (manly praise!) that manner nobly free,
Which all admire, and I commend, in thee.

With generous scorn how oft hast thou survey'd
Of court and town the noontide masquerade;
Where swarms of knaves the vizor quite disgrace,
And hide secure behind a naked face?
Where nature's end of language is declin'd,
And men talk only to conceal the mind;
Where generous hearts the greatest hazard run,
And he who trusts a brother, is undone?

These all their care expend on outward show
For wealth and fame; for fame alone, the beau.
Of late at White's was young Florello seen!
How blank his look! how discompos'd his mien!
So hard it proves in grief sincere to feign!
Sunk were his spirits; for his coat was plain.

Next day his breast regain'd its wonted peace;
His health was mended with a silver lace.
A curious artist, long inur'd to toils
Of gentler sort, with combs, and fragrant oils,
Whether by chance, or by some god inspir'd,
So touch'd his curls, his mighty soul was fir'd.
The well-swoln ties an equal homage claim,
And either shoulder has its share of fame;
His sumptuous watch case, though conceal'd it lies,
Like a good conscience, solid joy supplies.
He only thinks himself (so far from vain!)
Stanhope in wit, in breeding Deloraine.
Whene'er, by seeming chance, he throws his eye
On mirrors that reflect his Tyrian dye,
With how sublime a transport leaps his heart!
But fate ordains that dearest friends must part.
In active measures, brought from France, he wheels,

And triumphs, conscious of his learned beels.

So have I seen, on some bright summer's day,
A calf of genius, debonnair and gay,
Dance on the bank, as if inspir'd by fame,
Fond of the pretty fellow in the stream.

Morose is sunk with shame, whene'er surpris'd
In linen clean, or peruke undisguis'd.
No sublunary chance his vestments fear;
Valued, like leopards, as their spots appear.
A fam'd furtout he wears, which once was blue,
And his foot swims in a capacious shoe;
One day his wife (for who can wives reclaim?)
Level'd her barbarous needle at his fame:
But open force was vain; by night she went,
And, while he slept, surpris'd the darling rent:
Where yawn'd the frieze is now become a doubt;
"And glory, at one entrance, quite shut out*."

He scorns Florello, and Florello him;
This hates the filthy creature, that the prim:
Thus in each other both these fools despise
Their own dear selves, with undiscerning eyes;
Their methods various, but alike their aim;
The flaven and the fopling are the same.

* Milton.

Ye whigs and tories! thus it fares with you,
When party-rage too warmly you pursue;
Then both club nonsense and impetuous pride,
And folly joins whom sentiments divide,
You vent your spleen as monkeys when they pass,
Scratch at the mimic monkey in the glass;
While both are one: and henceforth be it known,
Fools of both sides shall stand for fools alone.

"But who art thou?" methinks Florello cries:
"Of all thy species art thou only wise?"
Since smallest things can give our sins a twitch,
As crossing straws retard a passing witch,
Florello, thou my monitor shalt be;
I'll conjure thus some profit out of thee.
O thou myself! abroad our counsels roam,
And, like ill husbands, take no care at home:
Thou too art wounded with the common dart,
And love of fame lies throbbing at thy heart;
And what wise means to gain it hast thou chose?
Know fame and fortune both are made of prose.
Is thy ambition sweating for a rhyme,
Thou unambitious fool, at this late time?
While I a moment name, a moment's past;
I'm nearer death in this verse than the last:
What then is to be done? Be wise with speed;
A fool at forty is a fool indeed.

And what so foolish as the chase of fame?
How vain the prize! how impotent our aim!
For what are men who grasp at praise sublime,
But bubbles on the rapid stream of time,
That rise, and fall, that swell, and are no more,
Burn, and forgot, ten thousand in an hour?

SATIRE III.

TO THE RIGHT HON. MR. DODINGTON.

LONG, Dodington, in debt, I long have sought
To ease the burden of my grateful thought;
And now a poet's gratitude you see;
Grant him two favours, and he'll ask for three:
For whose the present glory or the gain?
You give protection, I a worthless strain.
You love and feel the poet's sacred flame,
And know the basis of a solid fame;
Though prone to like, yet cautious to commend,
You read with all the malice of a friend;
Nor favour my attempts that way alone,
But, more to raise my verse, conceal your own.

An ill-tim'd modesty! turn ages o'er,
When wanted Britain bright examples more?
Her learning, and her genius too, decays;
And dark and cold are her declining days;
As if men now were of another cast,
They meanly live on alms of ages past.
Men still are men; and they who boldly dare,
Shall triumph o'er the sons of cold despair;
Or, if they fail, they justly still take place
Of such who run in debt for their disgrace;
Who borrow much, then fairly make it known,
And damn it with improvements of their own.
We bring some new materials, and what's old
New cast with care, and in no borrow'd mould;
Late times the verse may read, if these refuse;
And from four critics vindicate the muse.

"Your work is long," the critics cry. 'Tis true,
And lengthens still, to take in fools like you:
Shorten my labour, if its length you blame;
For, grow but wise, you rob me of my game;
As hunted hags, who, while the dogs pursue,
Renounce their four legs, and start up on two.

Like the bold bird upon the banks of Nile,
That picks the teeth of the dire crocodile,
Will I enjoy (dread feast!) the critic's rage,
And with the fell destroyer feed my page.
For what ambitious fools are more to blame
Than those who thunder in the critic's name?
Good authors damn'd, have their revenge in this;
To see what wretches gain the praise they miss.

Balbutius, muffled in his fable cloak,
Like an old druid from his hollow oak,
As ravens solemn, and as boding, cries,
"Ten thousand worlds for the three unities!"
Ye doctors sage, who through Parnassus teach,
Or quit the tub, or practise what you preach.

One judges as the weather dictates; right
The poem is at noon, and wrong at night:
Another judges by a surer gauge,
An author's principles, or parentage;
Since his great ancestors in Flanders fell,
The poem doubtless must be written well.
Another judges by the writer's look;
Another judges, for he bought the book;
Some judge, their knack of judging wrong to keep;
Some judge, because it is too soon to sleep.

Thus all will judge, and with one single aim,
To gain themselves, not give the writer, fame.
The very best ambitiously advise,
Half to serve you, and half to pass for wise.

Critics on verse, as squibs on triumphs wait,
Proclaim the glory, and augment the state;
Hot, envious, noisy, proud, the scribbling fry
Burn, hiss, and bounce, waste paper, stink, and die.
Rail on, my friends! what more my verse can crown

Than Compton's smile, and your obliging frown?
Not all on books their criticism waste:
The genius of a disb some justly taste,
And eat their way to fame; with anxious thought
The salmon is refus'd, the turbot bought.
Impatient art rebukes the sun's delay,
And bids December yield the fruits of May;
Their various cares in one great point combine
The business of their lives, that is—to dine.
Half of their precious day they give the feast;
And to a kind digestion spare the rest.
Apicius, here, the taster of the town,
Feeds twice a week, to settle their renown.

These worthies of the palate guard with care
The sacred annals of their bills of fare;
In those choice books their panegyrics read,
And scorn the creatures that for hunger feed.
If man by feeding well commences great,
Much more the worm to whom that man is meat.
To glory some advance a lying claim,
Thieves of renown, and pilferers of fame:
Their front supplies what their ambition lacks;
They know a thousand lords, behind their backs.
Cottil is apt to wink upon a peer,
When turn'd away, with a familiar leer;

And Harvey's eyes, unmercifully keen,
Have murder'd fops, by whom she ne'er was seen.
Niger adopts stray libels; wisely prone
To covet shame still greater than his own.
Bathyllus, in the winter of threescore,
Belies his innocence, and keeps a whore.
Absence of mind Brabantio turns to fame,
Learns to mistake, nor knows his brother's name;
Has words and thoughts in nice disorder set,
And takes a memorandum to forget.
Thus vain, not knowing what adorns or blots,
Men forge the patents that create them sots.

As love of pleasure into pain betrays,
So most grow infamous through love of praise.
But whence for praise can such an ardour rise,
When those, who bring that incense, we despise?
For such the vanity of great and small,
Contempt goes round, and all men laugh at all.
Nor can even Satire blame them; for 'tis true,
They have most ample cause for what they do.
O fruitful Britain! doublest thou wast meant
A nurse of fools, to stock the continent.
Though Phœbus and the Nine for ever mow,
Rank folly underneath the scythe will grow.
The plenteous harvest calls me forward still,
Till I surpass in length my lawyer's bill;
A Welsh descent, which well-paid heralds damn;
Or, longer still, a Dutchman's epigram.
When cloy'd, in fury I throw down my pen,
In comes a coxcomb, and I write again.

See, Tityrus, with merriment possess'd,
Is burst with laughter, ere he hears the jest:
What need he stay? for when the joke is o'er,
His teeth will be no whiter than before.
Is there of these, ye fair! so great a dearth,
That you need purchase monies for your mirth?

Some, vain of paintings, bid the world admire;
Of houses some; nay, houses that they bire:
Some (perfect wisdom!) of a beauteous wife;
And boast, like Cordeliers, a scourge for life.

Sometimes, through pride, the sexes change their airs;

My lord has vapours, and my lady swears;
Then, stranger still! on turning of the wind,
My lord wears breeches, and my lady's kind.

To show the strength, and infamy of pride,
By all 'tis follow'd, and by all deny'd.
What numbers are there, which at once pursue
Praise, and the glory to condemn it, too?
Vincenna knows self-praise betrays to shame,
And therefore lays a stratagem for fame;
Makes his approach in modesty's disguise,
To win applause; and takes it by surprise.
"To err," says he, "in small things, is my fate."
You know your answer, "he's exact in great."
"My style," says he, "is rude and full of faults."
"But oh! what sense! what energy of thoughts!"
That he wants algebra, he must confess;
"But not a soul to give our arms success."
"Ah! That's an hit indeed," Vincenna cries;
"But who in heat of blood was ever wise? [back,
"I own 'twas wrong, when thousands call'd me
"To make that hopeless, ill-advis'd, attack;
"All say, 'twas madness; nor dare I deny;
"Sure never fool so well deserv'd to die."

Could this deceive in others, to be free,
It ne'er, Vincenna, could deceive in thee;
Whose conduct is a comment to thy tongue,
So clear, the dullest cannot take thee wrong.
Thou on one sleeve wilt thy revenues wear;
And haunt the court, without a prospect there.
Are these expedients for renown? Confess
Thy little self, that I may scorn thee less.

Be wise, Vincenna, and the court forsake;
Our fortunes there, nor thou, nor I, shall make.
Even men of merit, ere their point they gain,
In hardy service make a long campaign;
Most manfully besiege the patron's gate,
And oft repuls'd, as oft attack the great
With painful art, and application warm,
And take, at last, some little place by storm;
Enough to keep two shoes on Sunday clean,
And starve upon discreetly, in Sheer-Lane.
Already this thy fortune can afford;
Then starve without the favour of my lord.

'Tis true, great fortunes some great men confer:
But often, even in doing right, they err:
From caprice, not from choice, their favours come:
They give, but think it tail to know to whom:
The man that's nearest, yawning, they advance:
'Tis inhumanity to blest by chance.

If merit sues, and greatness is so loth
To break its downy trance, I pity both.

I grant at court, Philander, at his need,
(Thanks to his lovely wife) finds friends indeed.
Of every charm and virtue she's possess'd:
Philander! thou art exquisitely blest;
The public envy! now then, 'tis allow'd,
The man is found, who may be justly proud:
But, see! how sickly is ambition's taste!
Ambition feeds on trash, and lothes a feast;
For, lo! Philander, of reproach afraid,
In secret loves his wife, but keeps her maid.

Some nymphs sell reputation; others buy;
And love a market where the rates run high:
Italian music's sweet, because 'tis dear;
Their vanity is tickled, not their ear:
Their tastes would lessen if the prices fell,
And Shakspeare's wretched stuff do quite as well;

Away the disenchant'd fair would throng,
And own, that English is their mother tongue.

To show how much our northern tastes refine,
Imported nymphs our peeresses outshine;
While tradesmen starve, these Philomels are gay;
For generous lords had rather give than pay.

Behold the masquerade's fantastic scene!
The legislature join'd with Drury-Lane!
When Britain calls, th' embroider'd patriots run,
And serve their country—if the dance is done.
"Are we not then allow'd to be polite?"
Yes, doubtless; but first set your notions right.
Worth of politeness is the needful ground;
Where that is wanting, this can ne'er be found.
Triflers not ev'n in trifles can excel;
'Tis solid bodies only polish well.

Great, chosen prophet! for these latter days,
To turn a willing world from righteous ways!
Well, Heydegger, dost thou thy master serve;
Well has he seen his servant should not starve,

Thou to his name hast splendid temples rais'd;
 In various forms of worship seen him prais'd,
 Gaudy devotion, like a Roman, shown,
 And sung sweet anthems in a tongue unknown.
 Inferior offerings to thy god of vice
 Are duly paid, in fiddles, cards, and dice;
 Thy sacrifice supreme, an hundred maids!
 That solemn rite of midnight masquerades!
 If maids the quite exhausted town denies,
 An hundred head of cuckolds may suffice.
 Thou smil'st, well pleas'd with the converted land,
 To see the fifty churches at a stand.
 And that thy minister may never fail,
 But what thy hand has planted still prevail,
 Of minor prophets a succession sure
 The propagation of thy zeal secure.

See commons, peers, and ministers of state,
 In solemn council met, and deep debate!
 What godlike enterprise is taking birth?
 What wonder opens on th' expecting earth?
 'Tis done! with loud applause the council rings!
 Fix'd is the fate of vobores and fiddle-strings!

Though bold these truths, thou, muse, with truths like these,
 Wilt none offend, whom 'tis a praise to please:
 Let others flatter to be flatter'd, thou,
 Like just tribunals, bend an awful brow,
 How terrible it were to common sense,
 To write a Satire which gave none offence!
 And, since from life I take the draughts you see,
 If men dislike them, do they censure me!
 The fool and knave, 'tis glorious to offend,
 And godlike an attempt the world to mend;
 The world, where lucky throws to blockheads fall,
Knaves know the game, and honest men pay all.

How hard for real worth to gain its price!
 A man shall make his fortune in a trice,
 If blest with pliant, though but slender, sense,
 Feign'd modesty, and real impudence:
 A supple knee, smooth tongue, an easy grace,
 A curse within, a smile upon his face;
 A beauteous sister, or convenient wife,
 Are prizes in the lottery of life;
 Genius and virtue they will soon defeat,
 And lodge you in the bosom of the great.
 To merit, is but to provide a pain
 For men's refusing what you ought to gain.

May, Dodington, this maxim fail in you,
 Whom my presaging thoughts already view
 By Walpole's conduct fir'd, and friendship grac'd,
 Still higher in your prince's favour plac'd;
 And lending, here, those awful councils aid,
 Which you, abroad, with such success obey'd!
 Bear this from one, who holds your friendship dear;
 What most we wish, with ease we fancy near.

SATIRE IV.

TO THE RIGHT HON. SIR SPENCER COMPTON.

ROUND some fair tree th' ambitious woodbine grows,
 And breathes her sweets on the supporting boughs:
 So sweet the verse, th' ambitious verse should be,
 (O! pardon mine) that hopes support from thee;

Thee, Compton, born o'er senates to preside,
 Their dignity to raise, their councils guide;
 Deep to discern, and widely to survey,
 And kingdoms fates without ambition weigh;
 Of distant virtues nice extremes to blend,
 The crown's affirmer, and the people's friend:
 Nor dost thou scorn, amid sublimer views,
 To listen to the labours of the muse;
 Thy smiles protect her, while thy talents fire,
 And 'tis but half thy glory to inspire.
 Vex'd at a public fame, so justly won,
 The jealous Chremes is with spleen undone;
 Chremes, for airy pensions of renown,
 Devotes his service to the state and crown;
 All schemes he knows, and, knowing, all improves,

Though Britain's thankless, still this patriot loves:
 But patriots differ; some may shed their blood,
 He drinks his coffee, for the public good;
 Consults the sacred steam, and there foresees
 What storms, or sun-shine, providence decrees;
 Knows, for each day, the weather of our fate;
 A Quidnunc is an almanack of state.

You smile, and think this statesman void of use;
 Why may not time his secret worth produce;
 Since apes can roast the choice Castanian Nut,
 Since fleets of genius are expert at Put;
 Since half the senate "Not content" can say,
Geese nations save, and puppies plots betray.

What makes him model realms, and counsel kings?

An incapacity for smaller things:
 Poor Chremes can't conduct his own estate,
 And thence has undertaken Europe's fate.
 Gehenna leaves the realm to Chremes' skill,
 And boldly claims a province higher still:
 To raise a name, th' ambitious boy has got,
 At once, a Bible, and a shoulder-knot;
 Deep in the secret, he looks through the whole,
 And pities the dull rogue that saves his soul;
 To talk with reverence you must take good heed,
 Nor shock his tender reason with the Creed;
 Howe'er well-bred, in public he complies,
 Obliging friends alone with blasphemies.

Peerage is poison, good estates are bad
 For this disease; poor rogues run seldom mad.
 Have not attainders brought unhop'd relief,
 And falling stocks quite cur'd an unbelief?
 While the sun shines, Blunt talks with wondrous force;

But thunder mars small beer, and weak discourse.
 Such useful instruments the weather show,
 Just as their mercury is high or low:
 Health chiefly keeps an Atheist in the dark:
 A fever argues better than a Clarke:
 Let but the logic in his pulse decay,
 The Grecian he'll renounce, and learn to pray;
 While C—— mourns, with an unfeigned zeal,
 Th' apostate youth, who reason'd once so well.

C——, who makes merry with the Creed,
 He almost thinks he disbelieves indeed;
 But only thinks so; to give both their due,
 Satan, and he, believe, and tremble too.
 Of some for glory such the boundless rage,
 That they're the blackest scandal of their age.

Narcissus the Tartarian club disclaims;
 Nay, a free-mason, with some terror, names;
 Omits no duty; nor can envy say,
 He miss'd, these many years, the church, or play:
 He makes no noise in parliament, 'tis true;
 But pays his debts, and visit, when 'tis due;
 His character and gloves are ever clean,
 And then, he can out-bow the bowing dean;
 A smile eternal on his lip he wears,
 Which equally the wise and worthless shares.
 In gay fatigues, this most undaunted chief,
 Patient of idleness beyond belief,
 Most charitably lends the town his face,
 For ornament, in every public place;
 As sure as cards, he to th' assembly comes,
 And is the furniture of drawing-rooms:
 When ombre calls, his hand and heart are free,
 And, join'd to two, he fails not—to make three:
 Narcissus is the glory of his race;
 For who does nothing with a better grace?

To deck my list, by nature were design'd
 Such shining expletives of human kind,
 Who want, while through blank life they dream along,

Sense to be right, and passion to be wrong.

To counterpoise this hero of the mode,
 Some for renown are singular and odd;
 What other men dislike, is sure to please,
 Of all mankind, these dear antipodes;
 Through pride, not malice, they run counter still,
 And birth-days are their days of dressing ill.
 Arbuthnot is a fool, and F—— a sage,
 S——ly will fright you, E—— engage;
 By nature streams run backward, flame descends,
 Stones mount, and Suffex is the worst of friends;
 They take their rest by day, and wake by night,
 And blush, if you surprise them in the right;
 If they by change blurt out, ere well aware,
 A swan is white, or Queensberry is fair.

Nothing exceeds in ridicule, no doubt,
 A fool in fashion, but a fool that's out.
 His passion for absurdity's so strong,
 He cannot bear a rival in the wrong;
 Though wrong the mode, comply; more sense is shown

In wearing others' follies, than your own.
 If what is out of fashion most you prize,
 Methinks you should endeavour to be wise.
 But what in oddness can be more sublime
 Than Sloane the foremost toyman of his time?
 His nice ambition lies in curious fancies,
 His daughter's portion a rich shell enhances,
 And Ashmole's baby-house is, in his view,
 Britannia's golden mine, a rich Peru!
 How his eyes languish! how his thoughts adore
 That painted coat, which Joseph never wore!
 He shows, on holidays, a sacred pin,
 That touch'd the ruff, that touch'd Queen Bess's chin.

"Since that great dearth our chronicles deplore,
 "Since that great plague that swept as many more,
 "Was ever year unblest as this? he'll cry,
 "It has not brought us one new butterfly!"
 In times that suffer such learn'd men as these,
 Unhappy I——y! how came you to please?

Not gaudy butterflies are Lico's game;
 But, in effect, his chase is much the same:
 Warm in pursuit, he levées all the great,
 Staunch to the foot of title and estate:
 Where'er their lordships go, they never find
 Or Lico, or their shadow, lag behind;
 He sets them sure, where'er their lordships run,
 Close at their elbows, as a morning-dun;
 As if their grandeur, by contagion wrought,
 And fame was like a fever, to be caught:
 But after seven years dance, from place to place,
 The * Dane is more familiar with his grace.

Who'd be a crutch to prop a rotten peer;
 Or living pendant dangling at his ear,
 For ever whispering secrets, which were blown
 For months before, by trumpets, through the town?
 Who'd be a glass, with flattering grimace,
 Still to reflect the temper of his face;
 Or happy pin to stick upon his sleeve,
 When my lord's gracious, and vouchsafes it leave;
 Or cushion, when his heaviness shall please
 To loll, or thump it, for his better ease;
 Or a vile butt, for noon, or night, bespoke,
 When the peer rashly swears he'll club his joke?
 Who'd shake with laughter, though he could not find

His lordship's jest; or, if his nose broke wind,
 For blessings to the gods profoundly bow,
 That can cry, "Chimney sweep," or drive a plough?
 With terms like these, how mean the tribe that close!
 Scarce meaner they, who terms like these impose.

But what's the tribe most likely to comply?
 The men of ink, or ancient authors lie;
 The writing tribe, who shameless auctions hold
 Of praise, by inch of candle to be sold:
 All men they flatter, but themselves the most,
 With deathless fame, their everlasting boast:
 For fame no cully makes so much her jest,
 As her old constant spark, the bard profess.
 "Boyle shines in council, Mordaunt in the fight,
 "Pelham's magnificent; but I can write,
 "And what to my great soul like glory dear?"
 Till some god whispers in his tingling ear,
 That fame's unwholesome taken without meat,
 And life is best sustain'd by what is eat:
 Grown lean, and wise, he curses what he writ,
 And wishes all his wants were in his wit.

Ah! what avails it, when his dinner's lost,
 That his triumphant name adorns a post?
 Or that his shining page (provoking fate!)
 Defends firloins, which sons of dulness eat?

What foe to verse without compassion hears,
 What cruel prose-man can refrain from tears,
 When the poor muse, for less than half a crown,
 A prostitute on every bulk in town,
 With other whores undone, though not in print,
 Clubs credit for Geneva in the Mint?

Ye bards! why will you sing, though uninspir'd?
 Ye bards! why will you starve, to be admir'd?
 Defunct by Phœbus' laws beyond redress,
 Why will your spectres haunt the frightened press?
 Bad metre, that excrescence of the head,
 Like hair, will sprout, although the poet's dead.

* A Danish dog of the Duke of Argyll.

All other trades demand, verse-makers beg;
A dedication is a wooden leg;
A barren Labeo, the true mumpster's fashion,
Exposes borrow'd brats to move compassion.
Though such myself, vile bards I discommend;
Nay more, though gentle Damon is my friend.
"Is 't then a crime to write?"—If talent rare
Proclaim the god, the crime is to forbear:
For some, though few, there are, large-minded men,
Who watch unseen the labours of the pen;
Who know the muse's worth, and therefore court,
Their deeds her theme, their bounty her support;
Who serve, unask'd, the least pretence to wit;
My sole excuse, alas! for having writ.
Argyll true wit is studious to restore;
And Dorset smiles, if Phœbus smil'd before;
Pembroke in years the long-lov'd arts admires,
And Henrietta like a muse inspires.

But, ah! not inspiration can obtain
That fame, which poets languish for in vain.
How mad their aim, who thirst for glory, strive
To grasp, what no man can possess alive!
Fame's reversion, in which men take place
(O late reversion!) at their own decease.
This truth sagacious Lintot knows so well,
He starves his authors, that their works may sell.
That fame is wealth, fantastic poets cry;
That wealth is fame, another clan reply;
Who know no guilt, no scandal, but in rags;
And swell in just proportion to their bags.
Not only the low born, deform'd, and old,
Think glory nothing but the beams of gold;
The first young lord, which in the Mall you meet,

Shall match the veriest hunks in Lombard-street,
From rescued candles' ends, who rais'd a sum,
And starves, to join a penny to a plumb.
A beardless miser! 'Tis a guilt unknown
To former times, a scandal all our own.

Of ardent lovers, the true modern band
Will mortgage Celia to redeem their land.
For love, young, noble, rich, Castalio dies;
Name but the fair, love swells into his eyes.
Divine Monimia, thy fond fears lay down;
No rival can prevail—but half a crown.

He glories to late times to be convey'd,
Not for the poor he has reliev'd, but made:
Not such ambition his great fathers fir'd,
When Harry conquer'd, and half France expir'd:
He'd be a slave, a pimp, a dog, for gain:
Nay, a dull sheriff for his golden chain.

"Who'd be a slave?" the gallant Colonel cries,
While love of glory sparkles from his eyes:
To deathless fame he loudly pleads his right—
Just is his title—for he will not fight:
All soldiers valour, all divines have grace,
As maids of honour beauty—by their place:
But, when indulging on the last campaign,
His lofty terms climb o'er the hills of slain;
He gives the foes he slew, at each vain word,
A sweet revenge, and half absolves his sword.

Of boasting more than of a bomb afraid,
A soldier should be modest as a maid:
Fame is a bubble the reserv'd enjoy;
Who strive to grasp it, as they touch, destroy:

'Tis the world's debt to deeds of high degree;
But if you pay yourself, the world is free.

Were there no tongue to speak them but his own,
Augustus' deeds in arms had ne'er been known.
Augustus' deeds! if that ambiguous name
Confounds my reader, and misguides his aim,
Such is the prince's worth, of whom I speak;
The Roman would not blush at the mistake.

SATIRE V.

ON WOMEN.

"O fairest of creation! last and best! [cell'd,
"Of all God's works! Creature in whom ex-
"Whatever can to fight, or thought, be form'd
"Holy, divine, good, amiable, or sweet!
"How art thou lost!"— MILTON.

Nor reigns ambition in bold man alone;
Soft female hearts the rude invader own:
But there, indeed, it deals in nicer things,
Than routing armies, and dethroning kings:
Attend, and you discern it in the fair
Conduct a finger, or reclaim a bair;
Or roll the lucid orbit of an eye;
Or, in full joy, elaborate a sigh. [blame;
The sex we honour, though their faults we
Nay, thank their faults for such a fruitful theme:
A theme, fair——! doubly kind to me,
Since satirizing those is praising thee;
Who wouldst not bear, too modestly refin'd,
A panegyric of a grosser kind.

Britannia's daughters, much more fair, than nice,
Too fond of admiration, lose their price;
Worn in the public eye, give cheap delight
To throngs, and tarnish to the sated sight:
As unreserv'd, and beauteous as the sun,
Through every sign of vanity they run;
Assemblies, parks, coarse feasts in city halls,
Lectures, and trials, plays, committees, balls,
Wells, bedlams, executions, Smithfield scenes,
And fortune-tellers caves, and lions dens,
Taverns, exchanges, bridewells, drawing-rooms,
Installments, pillories, coronations, tombs,
Tumblers, and funerals, puppet-shows, reviews,
Sales, races, rabbits, (and, still stranger!) pews.

Clarinda's bosom burns, but burns for fame;
And love lies vanquish'd in a nobler flame;
Warm gleams of hope she, now, dispenses; then,
Like April suns, dives into clouds again:
With all her lustre, now, her lover warms;
Then, out of ostentation, hides her charms:
'Tis, next, her pleasure sweetly to complain,
And to be taken with a sudden pain;
Then, she starts up, all ecstasy and bliss,
And is, sweet soul! just as sincere in this:
O how she rolls her charming eyes in spite!
And looks delightfully with all her might!
But, like our heroes, much more brave than wise,
She conquers for the triumph, not the prize.

Zara resembles Ætna crown'd with snows;
Without she freezes, and within she glows:
Twice ere the sun descends, with zeal inspir'd,
From the vain converse of the world retir'd,

She reads the psalms and chapters for the day,
In — Cleopatra, or the last new play.
Thus gloomy Zara, with a solemn grace,
Deceives mankind, and bides behind her face.

Nor far beneath her in renown is she,
Who through good-breeding is ill company;
Whose manners will not let her larum cease,
Who thinks you are unhappy, when at peace;
To find you new, who racks her subtle head,
And vows—"that her great-grandfather is dead."

A dearth of words a woman need not fear;
But 'tis a task indeed to learn—to bear;
In that the skill of conversation lies;
That shows, or makes you both polite and wise.

Xantippe cries, "Let nymphs who nought can " say

" Be lost in silence and resign the day;
" And let the guilty wife her guilt confess,
" By tame behaviour, and a soft address!"
Through virtue, she refuses to comply
With all the dictates of humanity;
Through wisdom, she refuses to submit
To wisdom's rules, and raves to prove her wit;
Then, her unblemish'd honour to maintain,
Rejects her husband's kindness with disdain:
But if by chance an ill-adapted word
Drops from the lip of her unwary lord,
Her darling china, in a whirlwind sent,
Just intimates the lady's discontent.

Wine may indeed excite the meekest dame;
But keen Xantippe, scorning borrow'd flame,
Can vent her thunders, and her lightnings play,
O'er cooling gruel, and composing tea:
Nor rests by night, but, more sincere than nice,
She shakes the curtains with her kind advice:
Doubly like echo, sound is her delight,
And the last word is her eternal right.

Is't not enough plagues, wars, and famines, rise
To lash our crimes, but must our wives be wife?

Famine, plague, war, and an unnumber'd throng
Of guilt-avenging ills, to man belong:
What black, what ceaseless cares besiege our state!
What strokes we feel from fancy, and from fate!
If fate forbears us, fancy strikes the blow;

We make misfortune; suicides in woe.
Superfluous aid! unnecessary skill!
Is nature backward to torment, or kill?
How oft the noon, how oft the midnight bell,
(That iron tongue of death!) with solemn knell,
On folly's errands as we vainly roam, [home?
Knocks at our hearts, and finds our thoughts from Men drop so fast, ere life's mid stage we tread,
Few know so many friends alive, as dead.

Yet, as immortal, in our up-hill chase,
We press coy fortune with unslacken'd pace;
Our ardent labours for the toys we seek,
Join night to day, and Sunday to the week:
Our very joys are anxious, and expire
Between satiety and fi ree desire.

Now what reward for all this grief and toil?
But one; a female friend's endearing smile;
A tender smile, our sorrows' only balm,
And, in life's tempest, the sad sailor's calm.

How have I seen a gentle nymph draw nigh,
Peace in her air, persuasion in her eye;

Victorious tenderness! it all o'ercame,
Husbands look'd mild, and savages grew tame;
The sylvan race our active nymphs pursue;
Man is not all the game they have in view:
In woods and fields their glory they complete;
There Master Betty leaps a five-barr'd gate;
While fair Miss Charles to toilets is confin'd,
Nor rashly tempts the barbarous sun and wind.
Some nymphs affect a more heroic breed,
And volt from hunters to the manag'd steed;
Command his prancings with a martial air,
And Fobert has the forming of the fair.

More than one steed must Delia's empire feel,
Who sits triumphant o'er the flying wheel;
And as she guides it through th' admiring throng;
With what an air she sinacks the filken thong!
Graceful as John, she moderates the reins,
And whistles sweet her diuretic strains:
Sesostris like, such charioteers as these
May drive six harness'd monarchs, if they please:
They drive, row, run, with love of glory smit,
Leap, swim, shoot flying, and pronounce on wit.

O'er the belle-lettres lovely Daphne reigns;
Again the god Apollo wears her chains:
With legs toss'd high, on her sophee she sits,
Vouchsafing audience to contending wits:
Of each performance she's the final test;
One act read o'er, she prophesies the rest;
And then, pronouncing with decisive air,
Fully convinces all the town—she's fair.

Had lovely Daphne Hecate's face,
How would her elegance of taste decrease:
Some ladies' judgment in their features lies,
And all their genius sparkles from their eyes.

But hold, she cries, lampooner! have a care;
Must I want common sense, because I'm fair?
O no: see Stella: her eyes shine as bright,
As if her tongue was never in the right;
And yet what real learning, judgment, fire!
She seems inspir'd, and can herself inspire:
How then (if malice rul'd not all the fair)
Could Daphne publish, and could she forbear?
We grant that beauty is no bar to sense,
Nor is 't a sanction for impertinence.

Sempronia lik'd her man; and well she might
The youth in person, and in parts, was bright;
Possess'd of every of virtue, grace, and art,
That claims just empire o'er the female heart:
He met her passion, all her sighs return'd,
And, in full rage of youthful ardour burn'd:
Large his possessions, and beyond her own;
Their bliss the theme and envy of the town:
The day was fix'd, when, with one acre more,
In stepp'd deform'd, debauch'd, diseas'd, three score.

The fatal sequel I, through shame, forbear:
Of pride and avarice who can cure the fair?

Man's rich with little, were his judgment true;
Nature is frugal, and her wants are few;
Those few wants answer'd, bring sincere delights;
But fools create themselves new appetites:
Fancy and pride seek things at vast expense,
Which relish not to reason, nor to sense.
When surfeit, or unthankfulness, destroys,
In nature's narrow sphere, our solid joys,

In fancy's airy land of noise and show,
Where nought but dreams, no real pleasures grow;
Like cats in air-pumps, to subsist we strive
On joys too thin to keep the soul alive.
Lemira's sick; make haste; the doctor call:
He comes; but where's his patient? At the ball.
The doctor stares; her woman curtsies low,
And cries, "My Lady, Sir, is always so:
"Diversions put her maladies to flight;
"True, she can't stand, but she can dance all night:
"I've known my lady (for she loves a tune)
"For fevers take an opera in June:
"And, though perhaps you'll think the practice
"bold,

"A midnight park is sovereign for a cold;
"With colics, breakfasts of green fruit agree;
"With indigestions, supper just at three."
A strange alternative, replies Sir Hans,
Must women have a doctor, or a dance?
Though sick to death, abroad they safely roam,
But droop and die, in perfect health, at home:
For want—but not of health, are ladies ill;
And tickets cure beyond the doctor's bill.

Alas, my heart! how languishingly fair
Yon lady lolls! with what a tender air!
Pale as a young dramatic author, when,
O'er darling lines, fell Cibber waves his pen.
Is her lord angry, or has "Venny chid?
Dead is her father, or the mask forbid?
"Late sitting-up has turn'd her roses white."
Why went she not to bed? "Because 'twas night."
Did she then dance, or play? "Nor this, nor
"that."

Well night soon steals away in pleasing chat.
"No, all alone, her prayers she rather chose;
"Than be that wretch to sleep till morning rose."
Then Lady Cynthia, mistress of the shade,
Goes with the fashionable owls, to bed:
"This her pride covets, this her health denies;
Her soul is silly, but her body's wise.

Others, with curious arts, dim charms revive,
And triumph in the bloom of fifty-five.
You, in the morning, a fair nymph invite;
To keep her word, a brave one comes at night:
Next day she shines in glossy black; and then
Revolves into her native red again:
Like a dove's neck, she shifts her transient charms,
And is her own dear rival in your arms.

But one admirer has the painted lass;
Nor finds that one, but in her looking-glass:
Yet Laura's beautiful to such excess,
That all her art scarce makes her please us less.
To deck the female cheek, he only knows,
Who paints less fair the lily and the rose.

How gay they smile! such blessings nature
pours,
O'erstock'd mankind enjoy but half her stores:
In distant wilds, by human eyes unseen,
She rears her flowers, and spreads her velvet green:
Pure gurgling rills the lonely desert trace,
And waste their music on the savage race.
Is nature then a niggard of her bliss?
Repine we guiltless in a world like this?

* Lap dog.

But our lewd tastes her lawful charms refuse,
And painted art's deprav'd allurements choose.
Such Fulvia's passion for the town; fresh air
(An odd effect!) gives vapours to the fair;
Green fields, and shady groves, and crystal springs,
And larks, and nightingales, are odious things;
But smoke, and dust, and noise, and crowds, delight;
And to be press'd to death, transports her quite;
Where silver rivulets play through flowery meads,
And woodbines give their sweets, and limes their shades,

Black kennels' absent odours she regrets,
And stops her nose at beds of violets.

Is stormy life prefer'd to the serene?
Or is the public to the private scene?
Retir'd, we tread a smooth and open way; [stray;
Through briars and brambles in the world we
Stiff opposition, and perplex'd debate,
And thorny care, and rank and stinging hate,
Which choke our passage, our career controul,
And wound the firmest temper of our soul.
O sacred solitude! divine retreat!
Choice of the prudent! envy of the great!
By thy pure stream, or in thy waving shade,
We court fair wisdom, that celestial maid:
The genuine offspring of her lov'd embrace,
(Strangers on earth!) are innocence and peace:
There, from the ways of men laid safe ashore,
We smile to hear the distant tempest roar;
There, bless'd with health, with business unper-
plex'd,

This life we relish, and insure the next;
There too the muses sport; these numbers free,
Pierian Eastbury! I owe to thee.

There sport the muses; but not there alone:
Their sacred force Amelia feels in town.
Nought but a genius can a genius fit;
A wit herself, Amelia weds a wit:
Both wits! though miracles are said to cease.
Three days, three wondrous days! they liv'd in peace;

With the fourth sun a warm dispute arose,
On Dursley's poetry, and Bunyan's prose:
The learned war both wage with equal force,
And the fifth morn concluded the divorce.

Phœbe, though she possesses nothing less,
Is proud of being rich in happiness:
Laboriously pursues delusive toys,
Content with pains, since they're reputed joys.
With what well-acted transport will she say,
"Well, sure, we were so happy yesterday!"
"And then that charming party for to-morrow!"
Though, well she knows, 'twill languish into for-row:

But she dares never boast the present hour;
So gross that cheat, it is beyond her power:
For such is our weakness, or our curse,
Or rather such our crime, which still is worse,
The present moment, like a wife, we shun,
And ne'er enjoy, because it is our own.

Pleasures are few, and fewer we enjoy;
Pleasure, like quicksilver, is bright and coy;
We strive to grasp it with our utmost skill,
Still it eludes us, and it glitters still:

If seiz'd at last, compute your mighty gains;
What is it, but rank poison in your veins?

As Flavia in her glass an angel spies,
Pride whispers in her ear pernicious lies;
Tells her, while she surveys a face so fine,
There's no satiety of charms divine:
Hence, if her lover yawns, all chang'd appears
Her temper, and she melts (sweet soul!) in tears:
She, fond and young, last week her wish enjoy'd,
In soft amusement all the night employ'd;
The morning came, when Strephon, waking, found
(Surprising sight!) his bride in sorrow drown'd.
"What miracle (says Strephon) makes thee weep?"
"Ah, barbarous man! (she cries) how could you
—sleep?"

Men love a mistress, as they love a feast;
How grateful one to touch, and one to taste!
Yet sure there is a certain time of day,
We wish our mistress and our meat away:
But soon the sated appetites return,
Again our stomachs crave, our bosoms burn:
Eternal love let man then never swear;
Let women never triumph, nor despair;
Nor praise, nor blame too much the warm or chill;
Hunger and love are foreign to the will.

There is indeed a passion more refin'd,
For those few nymphs whose charms are of the mind:

But not of that unfashionable set
Is Phyllis; Phyllis and her Damon met.
Eternal love exactly hits her taste;
Phyllis demands eternal love at least.
Embracing Phyllis with soft-smiling eyes,
Eternal love I vow, the swain replies:
But say, my all, my mistress, and my friend!
What day next week th' eternity shall end?

Some nymphs prefer astronomy to love;
Elope from mortal man, and range above.
The fair philosopher to Rowley flies,
Where in a box the whole creation lies:
She sees the planets in their turns advance,
And scorns, Poitier, thy sublunary dance:
Of Desaguliers she bespeaks fresh air;
And Whiston has engagements with the fair.
What vain experiments Sophronia tries!
'Tis not in air-pumps the gay colonel dies.
But though to-day this rage of science reigns,
(O fickle sex!) soon end her learned pains.
Lo! Pug from Jupiter her heart has got,
Turns out the stars, and Newton is a sot.

To — turn; she never took the height
Of Saturn, yet is ever in the right.
She strikes each point with native force of mind,
While puzzled learning blunders far behind,
Graceful to sight, and elegant to thought,
The great are vanquish'd, and the wise are taught.
Her breeding finish'd, and her temper sweet,
When serious, easy; and when gay, discreet;
In glittering scenes o'er her own heart severe;
In crowds, collected; and in courts, sincere;
Sincere and warm, with zeal well understood,
She takes a noble pride in doing good;
Yet not superior to her sex's cares,
The modes she fixes by the gown she wears;
Of silks and chisa she's the last appeal;
In these great points she leads the commonweal;

And if disputes of empire rise between
Mechlin the queen of lace, and Colberteen,
'Tis doubt! 'tis darkness! till suspended fate
Assumes her nod, to close the grand debate.
When such her mind, why will the fair express
Their emulation only in their dress?

But oh! the nymph that mounts above the skies,
And gratis clears religious mysteries,
Resolv'd the church's welfare to ensure,
And make her family a sine-cure:
The theme divine at cards she'll not forget,
But takes in texts of Scripture at picquet;
In those licentious meetings acts the prude,
And thanks her Maker that her cards are good.
What angels would those be, who thus excel
In theologies, could they sew as well!
Yet why should not the fair her text pursue?
Can she more decently the doctor woo?
'Tis hard, too, she who makes no use but chat
Of her religion, should be barr'd in that.

Isaac, a brother of the canting strain,
When he has knock'd at his own skull in vain,
To beauteous Marcia often will repair
With a dark text, to light it at the fair.
O! how his pious soul exults to find
Such love for boly men in womankind!
Charm'd with her learning, with what rapture he Hangs on her bloom, like an industrious bee;
Hums round about her, and with all his power
Extracts sweet wisdom from so fair a flower!

The young and gay declining, Appia flies
At nobler game, the mighty and the wise:
By nature more an eagle than a dove,
She impiously prefers the world to love.

Can wealth give happiness? look round, and see
What gay distress! what splendid misery!
Whatever fortune lavishly can pour,
The mind annihilates, and calls for more.
Wealth is a cheat; believe not what it says;
Like any lord it promises—and pays.
How will the miser startle, to be told
Of such a wonder, as insolvent gold!
What nature wants has an intrinsic weight;
All more is but the fashion of the plate,
Which, for one moment, charms the fickle view;
It charms us now; anon we cast anew;
To some fresh birth of fancy more inclin'd:
Then wed not acres, but a noble mind.

Mistaken lovers, who make worth their care,
And think accomplishments will win the fair:
The fair, 'tis true, by genius should be won,
As flowers unfold their beauties to the sun;
And yet in female scales a sop out-weighs,
And wit must wear the wilcox and the bays.
Nought shines so bright in vain Liberia's eye
As riot, impudence, and perfidy;
The youth of fire, that has drunk deep, and play'd,
And kill'd his man, and triumph'd o'er his maid;
For him, as yet unhang'd, she spreads her charms,
Snatches the dear destroyer to her arms;
And amply gives (though treated long amiss)
The man of merit his revenge in this.
If you resent, and wish a woman ill,
But turn her o'er one moment to her will.

The languid lady next appears in state,
Who was not born to carry her own weight;

She lolls, reels, staggers, till some foreign aid
To her own stature lifts the feeble maid.
Then, if ordain'd to so severe a doom,
She, by just stages, journeys round the room:
But, knowing her own weakness, she despairs
To scale the Alps—that is, ascend the stairs.
My fan! let others say, who laugh at toil;
Fan! hood! glove! scarf! is her laconic style;
And that is spoke with such a dying fall,
That Betty rather sees, than bears the call:
The motion of her lips, and meaning eye,
Piece out th' idea her faint words deny.
O listen with attention most profound!
Her voice is but the shadow of a sound.
And help, oh help! her spirits are so dead,
One hand scarce lifts the other to her head.
If there a stubborn pin it triumphs o'er,
She pants! she sinks away! and is no more.
Let the robust and the gigantic carve,
Life is not worth so much, she'd rather starve:
But chew she must herself! ah cruel fate!
That Rosalinda can't by proxy eat.

An antidote in female caprice lies
(Kind heaven!) against the poison of their eyes.

Thalestris triumphs in a manly mien;
Loud is her accent, and her phrase obscene.
In fair and open dealing where's the shame?
What nature dares to give, she dares to name.
This bonest fellow is sincere and plain,
And justly gives the jealous husband pain.
(Vain is the task to petticoats assign'd,
If wanton language shows a naked mind.)
And now and then, to grace her eloquence,
An oath supplies the vacancies of sense.
Hark! the shrill notes transpierce the yielding air,
And teach the neighbouring echoes how to swear.
By Jove, is faint, and for the simple swain;
She, on the the Christian system, is profane.
But though the volley rattles in your ear,
Believe her dress, she's not a grenadier.
If thunder's awful, how much more our dread,
When Jove deposes a lady in his stead?
A lady? pardon my mistaken pen,
A shameless woman is the worst of men.

Few to good-breeding make a just pretence;
Good-breeding is the blossom of good-sense;
The last result of an accomplish'd mind.
With outward grace, the body's virtue, join'd.
A violated decency now reigns;
And nymphs for sailings take peculiar pains.
With Chinese painters modern toasts agree,
The point they aim at is deformity:
They throw their persons with a hoyden air
Across the room, and tofs into the chair.
So far their commerce with mankind is gone,
They, for our manners, have exchange'd their own.
The modest look, the castigated grace,
The gentle movement, and slow-measur'd pace,
For which her lovers dy'd, her parents pay'd,
Are indecuments with the modern maid.
Stiff forms are bad; but let not worse intrude,
Nor conquer art and nature, to be rude.
Modern good-breeding carry to its height,
And Lady D——'s self will be polite.

Ye rising fair! ye bloom of Britain's isle!
When high-born Anna, with a soften'd smile,

Leads on your train, and sparkles at your head,
What seems most hard, is not to be well-bred.
Her bright example with success pursue,
And all, but adoration, is your due.

But adoration! give me something more,
Cries Lycé, on the borders of threescore:
Nought treads so silent as the foot of time;
Hence we mistake our autumn for our prime;
'Tis greatly wise to know, before we're told,
The melancholy news, that we grow old.
Autumnal Lycé carries in her face
Memento mori to each public place.
O! how your beating breast a mistress warms,
Who looks through spectacles to see your charms!
While rival undertakers hover round,
And with his spade the sexton marks the ground,
Intent not on her own, but others' doom,
She plans new conquests, and defrauds the tomb.
In vain the cock has summon'd sprites away,
She walks at noon, and blasts the bloom of day.
Gay rainbow silks her mellow charms infold,
And nought of Lycé but herself is old.
Her grizzled locks assume a smirking grace,
And art has levell'd her deep furrow'd face.
Her strange demand no mortal can approve,
We'll ask her bleffing, but can't ask her love.
She grants, indeed, a lady may decline
(All ladies but herself) at ninety-nine.

O! how unlike her was the sacred age
Of prudent Portia! Her gray hairs engage;
Whose thoughts are suited to her life's decline:
Virtue's the paint that can with wrinkles shine.
That, and that only, can old age sustain;
Which yet all wish, nor know they wish for pain.
Not numerous are our joys, when life is new;
And yearly some are falling of the few;
But when we conquer life's meridian stage,
And downward tend into the vale of age,
They drop apace; by nature some decay,
And some the blasts of fortune sweep away;
Till, naked quite of happiness, aloud
We call for death, and shelter in a shroud.
Where's Portia now?—But Portia left behind
Two lovely copies of her form and mind.
What heart untouch'd their early grief can view,
Like blushing rose-buds dipp'd in morning dew?
Who into shelter takes their tender bloom,
And forms their minds to flee from ills to come?
The mind, when turn'd adrift, no rules to guide,
Drives at the mercy of the wind and tide;
Fancy and passion tofs it to and fro;
A while torment, and then quite sink in woe.
Ye beauteous orphans, since in silent dust
Your best example lies, my precepts trust.
Life swarms with ills; the boldest are afraid;
Where then is safety for a tender maid?
Unfit for conflict, round beset with woes,
And man, whom least she fears, her worst of foes!
When kind, most cruel; when oblig'd the most,
The least obliging; and by favours lost.
Cruel by nature, they for kindness hate;
And scorn you for those ills themselves create.
If on your fame our sex a blot has thrown,
'Twill ever stick, through malice of your own.
Most hard! in pleasing your chief glory lies;
And yet from pleasing your chief dangers rise:

Then please the Best; and know, for men of sense,
Your strongest charms are native innocence.
Arts on the mind, like paint upon the face,
Fright him, that's worth your love, from your embrace.

In simple manners all the secret lies;
Be kind and virtuous, you'll be blest and wise.
Vain show and noise intoxicate the brain,
Begin with giddiness, and end in pain.
Affect not empty fame, and idle praise,
Which, all those wretches I describe, betrays.
Your sex's glory 'tis, to shine unknown;
Of all applause, be fondest of your own.
Beware the fever of the mind! that thirst
With which the age is eminently curst:
To drink of pleasure, but inflames desire;
And abstinence alone can quench the fire;
Take pain from life, and terror from the tomb;
Give peace in band; and promise blifs to come.

SATIRE VI.

ON WOMEN.

Inscribed to the Right Honourable

THE LADY ELIZABETH GERMAIN.

"Interdum tamen & tollit comœdia vocem."

HOR.

I sought a patroness, but sought in vain.
Apollo whisper'd in my ear—"Germain."—
I know her not.—"Your reason's somewhat odd;
"Who knows his patron, now?" reply'd the god.
"Men write, to me, and to the world, unknown;
"Then steal great names, to shield them from the "town:

"Detected worth, like beauty disarray'd,
"To covert flies, of praise itself afraid:
"Should she refuse to patronize your lays,
"In vengeance write a volume in her praise.
"Nor think it hard so great a length to run;
"When such the theme, 'twill easily be done."

Ye fair! to draw your excellence at length,
Exceeds the narrow bounds of human strength;
You, here, in miniature your picture see;
Nor hope from Zinck more justice than from me.
My portraits grace your mind, as his your side;
His portraits will inflame, mine quench, your pride:
He's dear, you frugal; choose my cheaper lay;
And be your reformation all my pay.

Lavinia is polite, but not profane;
To church as constant as to Drury-lane.
She decently, in form, pays heaven its due;
And makes a civil visit to her pew.
Her lifted fan, to give a solemn air,
Conceals her face, which passes for a prayer:
Curt'sies to curt'sies, then, with grace, succeed;
Not one the fair omits, but at the Creed.
Or if she joins the service, 'tis to speak;
Through dreadful silence the pent heart might break;
Untaught to bear it, women talk away
To God himself, and fondly think they pray.
But sweet their accent, and their air refin'd;
For they're before their Maker—and mankind:
When ladies once are proud of praying well,
Satan himself will toll the parish bell.

Acquainted with the world, and quite well bred
Drusa receives her visitants in bed;
But, chaste as ice, this Vesta, to defy
The very blackest tongue of calumny,
When from the sheets her lovely form she lifts,
She begs you just would turn you, while she shifts.

Those charms are greatest which decline the sight,

That makes the banquet poignant and polite.
There is no woman, where there's no reserve;
And 'tis on plenty your poor lovers starve.

But with a modern fair, meridian merit
Is a fierce thing, they call a nymph of spirit.
Mark well the rollings of her flaming eye;
And tread on tiptoe, if you dare draw nigh,
"Or if you take a lion by the beard",
"Or dare defy the fell Hyrcanian bard,
"Or arm'd rhinoceros, or rough Russian bear;"

First make your will, and then converse with her.

This lady glories in profuse expence;

And thinks distraction is magnificence.

To beggar her gallant, is some delight;

To be more fatal still, is exquisite;

Had ever nymph such reason to be glad?

In duel fell two lovers; one run mad.

Her foes their honest execrations pour;

Her lovers only should detest her more.

Flavia is constant to her old gallant,
And generously supports him in his want.

But marriage is a fetter, is a snare,

A hell, no lady so polite can bear.

She's faithful, she's observant, and with pains

Her angel-brood of bastards she maintains.

Nor least advantage has the fair to plead,

But that of guilt, above the marriage-bed.

Amasia hates a prude, and scorns restraint;

Whate'er she is, she'll not appear a faint:

Her soul superior flies formality;

So gay her air, her conduct is so free,

Some might suspect the nymph not over-good—

Nor would they be mistaken, if they should.

Unmarried Abra puts on formal airs; [ers.

Her cushion's threadbare with her constant pray—

Her only grief is, that she cannot be

At once engag'd in prayer and charity.

And this, to do her justice, must be said,

"Who would not think that Abra was a maid?"

Some ladies are too beauteous to be wed;

For where's the man that's worthy of their bed?

If no disease reduce her pride before,

Lavinia will be ravish'd at threescore.

Then she submits to venture in the dark;

And nothing now is wanting—but her spark.

Lucia thinks happiness consists in state;

She weds an idiot, but she eats in plate.

The goods of fortune, which her soul possesses,

Are but the ground of unmade happiness;

The rude material: wisdom add to this,

Wisdom, the sole artificer of blifs;

She from herself, if so compell'd by need,

Of thin content can draw the subtle thread;

But (no detraction to her sacred skill)

If she can work in gold, 'tis better still.

* Shakspeare.

If Tullia had been blest with half her sense,
None could too much admire her excellence :
But since she can make error shine so bright,
She thinks it vulgar to defend the right.
With understanding she is quite o'er-run ;
And by too great accomplishments undone :
With skill she vibrates her eternal tongue,
For ever most divinely in the wrong.

Naked in nothing should a woman be ;
But veil her very wit with modesty :
Let man discover, let not her display,
But yield her charms of mind with sweet delay.

For pleasure form'd, perversely some believe,
To make themselves important, men must grieve.
Lesbia the fair, to fire her jealous lord,
Pretends, the sop she laughs at, is ador'd.
In vain she's proud of secret innocence ;
The fact she feigns were scarce a worse offence.

Mira endow'd with every charm to bless,
Has no design, but on her husband's peace :
He lov'd her much ; and greatly was he mov'd
At small inquietudes in her he lov'd.
" How charming this ! "—The pleasure lasted
long ;

Now every day the fits come thick and strong :
At last he found the charmer only feign'd ;
And was diverted when he should be pain'd.
What greater vengeance have the gods in store !
How tedious life, now she can plague no more !
She tries a thousand arts ; but none succeed :
She's forc'd a fever to procure indeed ;
Thus strictly prov'd this virtuous, loving wife,
Her husband's pain was dearer than her life.

Anxious Melania rises to my view,
Who never thinks her lover pays his due :
Visit, present, treat, flatter, and adore ;
Her majesty, to-morrow, calls for more.
His wounded ears complaints eternal fill,
As unoil'd hinges, querulously shrill.
" You went last night with Celia to the ball."
You prove it false. " Not go ! that's worst of all."
Nothing can please her, nothing not inflame ;
And arrant contradictions are the same.
Her lover must be sad, to please her spleen ;
His mirth is an inexpressible sin :
For of all rivals that can pain her breast,
There's one, that wounds far deeper than the rest ;
To wreck her quiet, the most dreadful self
Is if her lover dares enjoy himself.

And this, because she's exquisitely fair :
Should I dispute her beauty, how she'd stare ?
How would Melania be surpris'd to hear
She's quite deform'd ? And yet the case is clear ;
What's female beauty, but an air divine,
Through which the mind's all-gentle graces shine ?
They, like the sun, irradiate all between ;
The body charms because the soul is seen.
Hence, men are often captives of a face,
They know not why, of no peculiar grace : [bear ;
Some forms, though bright, no mortal man can
Some, none refuse though not exceeding fair.

Arpasia's highly born, and nicely bred,
Of taste refin'd, in life and manners read ;
Yet reaps no fruit from her superior sense,
But to be teas'd by her own excellence.

VOL. X.

" Folks are so awkward ! things so unpolite !"
She's elegantly pain'd from morn till night.
Her delicacy's shock'd where'er she goes ;
Each creature's imperfections are her woes.
Heaven by its favour has the fair distressed,
And pour'd such blessings—that she can't be blest.

Ah ! why so vain, though blooming in thy spring ?

Thou shining, frail, ador'd, and wretched thing ;
Old age will come ; disease may come before ;
Fifteen is full as mortal as threescore.

Thy fortune, and thy charms, may soon decay :
But grant these fugitives prolong their stay,
Their basis totters, their foundation shakes ;
Life, that supports them, in a moment breaks ;
Then wrought into the soul let virtues shine ;
The ground eternal, as the work divine.

Julia's a manager ; she's born for rule ;
And knows her wiser husband is a fool ;
Assemblies holds, and spins the subtle thread
That guides the lover to his fair-one's bed :
For difficult amours can smooth the way,
And tender letters dictate, or convey.

But, if depriv'd of such important cares,
Her wisdom condescends to less affairs.
For her own breakfast she'll project a scheme,
Nor take her tea without a stratagem ;
Presides o'er trifles with a serious face ;
Important, by the virtue of grimace.
Ladies supreme among amusements reign ;
By nature born to soothe, and entertain.
Their prudence in a share of folly lies :
Why will they be so weak, as to be wise ?

Syrena is for ever in extremes.
And with a vengeance she commends, or blames,
Conscious of her discernment, which is good,
She strains too much to make it understood.
Her judgment just, her sentence is too strong ;
Because she's right, she's ever in the wrong.

Brunetta's wife in actions, great, and rare :
But scorns on trifles to bestow her care.
Thus every hour Brunetta is to blame,
Because th' occasion is beneath her aim.
Think nought a trifle, though it small appear ;
Small sands the mountain, moments make the year,
And trifles life. Your care to trifles give,
Or you may die, before you truly live.

Go breakfast with Alicia, there you'll see,
Simplex munditiis, to the last degree :
Unlac'd her stays, her night-gown is unty'd,
And what she has of head dress, is aside.
She draws her words, and waddles in her pace ;
Unwash'd her hands, and much besnuff'd her face.
A nail uncut, and head uncomb'd she loves ;
And would draw on jack-boots, as soon as gloves.
Gloves by queen Bess's maidens might be mist ;
Her blessed eyes ne'er saw a female fig.
Lovers, beware ! to wound how can she fail
With scarlet finger, and long jetty nail ?
For Harvey, the first wit she cannot be,
Nor, cruel Richmond, the first toast, for thee.
Since full each other station of renown,
Who would not be the greatest trapes in town ?
Women were made to give our eyes delight ;
A female sloven is an odious sight.

C

Fair Isabella is so fond of fame,
 That her dear self is her eternal theme ;
 Through hopes of contradiction, oft she'll say,
 " Methinks I look so wretchedly to day !"
 When most the world applauds you, most beware ;
 'Tis often less a bleffing than a snare.
 Distrust mankind ; with your own heart confer ;
 And dread even there to find a flatterer.
 The breath of others raises our renown ;
 Our own as surely blows the pageant down.
 Take up no more than you by worth can claim,
 Lest soon you prove a bankrupt in your fame.

But own I must, in this perverted age,
 Who most deserve, can't always most engage.
 So far is worth from making glory sure,
 It often hinders what it should procure. [wise ?
 Whom praise we most ? the virtuous, brave, and
 No ; wretches whom in secret we despise.
 And who so blind, as not to see the cause ?
 No rivals rais'd by such discreet applause ;
 And yet, of credit it lays in a store, [more.
 By which our spleen may wound true worth the Ladies there are who think one crime is all :

 Can women, then, no way but backward fall ?
 So sweet is that one crime they don't pursue,
 To pay its loss, they think all others few.
 Who hold that crime so dear, must never claim
 Of injur'd modesty the sacred name.

But Clio thus : " What ! railing without end ?
 " Mean task ! how much more generous to com-
 " mend !"

Yes, to commend as you are wont to do,
 My kind instructor, and example too.

" Daphnis," says Clio, " has a charming eye :
 " What pity 'tis her shoulder is awry !
 " Aspasia's shape indeed—But then her air—
 " The man has parts who finds destruction there.
 " Almeria's wit has something that's divine ;
 " And wit's enough—how few in all things shine !
 " Selina serves her friends, relieves the poor—
 " Who was it said Selina's near threescore ?
 " At Lucia's match I from my soul rejoice ;
 " The world congratulates so wise a choice ;
 " His lordship's rent-roll is exceeding great—
 " But mortgages will sap the best estate.
 " In Shirley's form might cherubims appear ;
 " But then—she has a freckle on her ear."

Without a but, Hortensia she commends,
 The first of women, and the best of friends ;
 Owns her in person, wit, fame, virtue, bright :
 But how comes this to pass ?—She dy'd last night.

Thus nymphs commend, who yet at satire rail :
 Indeed that's needless, if such praise prevail.
 And whence such praise ? our virulence is thrown
 On other's fame, through fondness for our own.

Of rank and riches proud, Cleora frowns ;
 For are not coronets a-kin to crowns ?
 Her greedy eye, and her sublime address,
 The height of avarice and pride confess.
 You seek perfections worthy of her rank ;
 Go, seek for her perfections at the bank.
 By wealth unquench'd, by reason uncontroul'd,
 For ever burns her sacred thirst of gold.
 As fond of five-pence, as the veriest cit ;
 And quite as much detested as a wit.

Can gold calm passion, or make reason shine ?
 Can we dig peace, or wisdom, from the mine ?
 Wisdom to gold prefer ; for 'tis much less
 To make our fortune, than our happiness.
 That happiness which great ones often see.
 With rage and wonder, in a low degree :
 Themselves unblest. The poor are only poor ;
 But what are they who droop amid their store ?
 Nothing is meaner than a wretch of state ;
 The happy only are the truly great.
 Peasants enjoy like appetites with kings ;
 And those best satisfied with cheapest things.
 Could both our Indies buy but one new sense,
 Our envy would be due to large expense.
 Since not, those pomps which to the great belong,
 Are but poor arts to mark them from the throng.
 See how they beg an alms of flattery !
 They languish ! oh support them with a lie !
 A decent competence we fully taste ;
 It strikes our sense, and gives a constant feast :
More, we perceive by dint of thought alone ;
 The rich must labour to possess their own.
 To feel their great abundance ; and request
 Their humble friends to help them to be blest ;
 To see their treasures, bear their glory told,
 And aid the wretched impotence of gold. [divine,
 But some, great souls ! and touch'd with warmth
 Give gold a price, and teach its beams to shine.
 All boarded treasures they repute a load ;
 Nor think their wealth their own, till well bestow'd.
 Grand reservoirs of public happiness,
 Through secret streams diffusively they bless ;
 And, while their bounties glide, conceal'd from view,

Relieve our wants, and spare our blushes too.
 But satire is my task ; and these destroy
 Her gloomy province, and malignant joy.
 Help me, ye misers ! help me to complain,
 And blast our common enemy, Germain :
 But our invectives must despair success ;
 For, next to praise, she values nothing less.

What picture's yonder, loosen'd from its frame ?
 Or is't Asturia, that affected dame ?
 The brightest forms, through affectation, fade
 To strange new things, which nature never made.
 Frown not, ye fair ! so much your sex we prize,
 We hate those arts that take you from our eyes.
 In Albucinda's native grace is seen
 What you, who labour at perfection mean.
 Short is the rule, and to be learn'd with ease,
 Retain your gentle selves, and you must please.
 Here might I sing of Memmia's mincing mien,
 And all the movements of the soft machine :
 How two red lips affected zephyrs blow,
 To cool the bohea, and inflame the beau :
 While one white finger and a thumb conspire
 To lift the cup, and make the world admire.

Tea ! how I tremble at thy fatal stream !
 As Lethe, dreadful to the love of fame.
 What devastations on thy banks are seen !
 What shades of mighty names which once have been !
 An hecatomb of characters supplies
 Thy painted altars daily sacrifice.
 H——, P——, B——, aspers'd by thee, decay,
 As grains of finest sugars melt away,

And recommend the more to mortal taste;
Scandal's the sweet'ner of a female feast.

But this inhuman triumph shall decline,
And thy revolting naiads call for wine;
Spirits no longer shall serve under thee;
But reign in thy own cup, exploded tea!
Citronia's nose declares thy ruin nigh,
And who dares give Citronia's nose the lie!

The ladies long at men of drink exclaim'd,
And what impair'd both health and virtue, blam'd;
At length, to rescue man, the generous lass
Stole from her consort the pernicious glass.
As glorious as the British queen renown'd,
Who suck'd the poison from her husband's wound.

Nor to the glass alone are nymphs inclin'd,
But every bolder vice of bold mankind.

O Juvenal! for thy severer rage,
To lash the ranker follies of our age.

Are there, among the females of our isle,
Such faults, at which it is a fault to smile?
There are. Vice, once by modest nature chain'd
And legal ties, expatiates unrestrain'd;
Without thin decency held up to view,
Naked she stalks o'er law and gospel too.
Our matrons lead such exemplary lives,
Men sigh in vain for none but for their wives;
Who marry to be free, to range the more,
And wed one man, to wanton with a score.
Abroad too kind, at home 'tis steadfast hate,
And one eternal tempest of debate.
What foul eruptions, from a look most meek!
What thunders bursting, from a dimpled cheek!
Their passions bear it with a lofty hand!
But then, their reason is at due command.
Is there whom you detest, and seek his life?
Trust no soul with the secret—but his wife.
Wives wonder that their conduct I condemn,
And ask, what kindred is a spouse to them?

What swarms of amorous grandmothers I see!
And misses, ancient in iniquity!
What blasting whispers, and what loud declaiming!
What lying, drinking, bawding, swearing, gaming!

Friendship so cold, such warm incontinence;
Such griping avarice, such profuse expence;
Such dead devotion, such a zeal for crimes;
Such licens'd ill, such masquerading times;
Such venal faith, such misapply'd applause;
Such flatter'd guilt, and such inverted laws;
Such dissolution through the whole I find,
'Tis not a world, but chaos of mankind.

Since Sundays have no balls, the well-dress'd belle Shines in the pew, but smiles to hear of bell;
And casts an eye of sweet disdain on all,
Who listen less to Collins than St. Paul.
Atheists have been but rare; since nature's birth,
Till now, she-atheists ne'er appear'd on earth.
Ye men of deep researches, say, whence springs
This daring character, in timorous things?
Who start at feathers, from an insect fly,
A match for nothing—but the Deity.
But, not to wrong the fair, the muse must own,
In this pursuit they court not fame alone;
But join to that a more substantial view,
"From thinking free, to be free agents too."

They strive with their own hearts, and keep them down,

In complaisance to all the fools in town.
O, how they tremble at the name of prude!
And die with shame at thought of being good!
For what will Artimis, the rich and gay,
What will the wits, that is, the coxcombs, say?
They heaven defy, to earth's vile dregs a slave;
Through cowardice, most execrably brave.
With our own judgments durst we to comply,
In virtue should we live, in glory die.
Rise then, my muse, in honest fury rise;
They dread a satire, who defy the skies.

Atheists are few: most nymphs a godhead own;
And nothing but his attributes dethrone.
From Atheists far, they steadfastly believe
God is, and is Almighty—to forgive.
His other excellence they'll not dispute;
But mercy, sure, is his chief attribute.
Shall pleasures of a short duration chain
A lady's soul in everlasting pain?
Will the great author us poor worms destroy,
For now and then a sp of transient joy?
No, he's for ever in a smiling mood;
He's like themselves; or how could he be good?
And they blaspheme, who blacker schemes suppose —

Devoutly thus Jehovah they depose,
The pure! the just! and set up in his stead
A deity that's perfectly well bred.

"Dear Tillotson! be sure the best of men;
"Nor thought he more, than thought great Origen.
"Though once upon a time he misbehav'd;
"Poor Satan! doubtless he'll at length be sav'd.
"Let priests do something for their one in ten;
"It is their trade; so far they're honest men.
"Let them cant on, since they have got the knack;
"And dress their notions, like themselves, in black;
"Fright us with terrors of a world unknown,
"From joys of this, to keep them all their own.
"Of earth's fair fruits, indeed, they claim a fee;
"But then they leave our unlith'd virtue free.
"Virtue's a pretty thing to make a show:
"Did ever mortal write like a Rochefoucault?"
Thus pleads the devil's fair apologist,
And, pleading, safely enters on his list.

Let angel-forms angelic truths maintain;
Nature disjoins the beautiful and profane.
For what's true beauty, but fair virtue's face?
Virtue made visible in outward grace?
She then that's haunted with an impious mind,
The more she charms, the more she shocks mankind.
But charms decline: the fair long vigils keep:
They sleep no more! Quadrille has * murder'd sleep.

"Poor K—p! cries Livia! I have not been there
"These two nights; the poor creature will despair.
"I hate a crowd—but to do good, you know—
"And people of condition should bestow."
Convinc'd, o'ercome, to K—p's grave matrons run;
Now set a daughter, and now stake a son;
Let health, fame, temper, beauty, fortune, fly;
And beggar half their race—through charity.

* Shakspeare.

C ij

Immortal were we, or else mortal quite,
 I less should blame this criminal delight:
 But since the gay assembly's gayest room
 Is but an upper story to some tomb,
 Methinks, we need not our short being shun,
 And, thought to fly, contend to be undone.
 We need not buy our ruin with our crime,
 And give eternity to murder time.

The love of gaming is the worst of ills;
 With ceaseless storms the blacken'd soul it fills;
 Inveighs at Heaven, neglects the ties of blood;
 Destroys the power and will of doing good;
 Kills health, pawns honour, plunges in disgrace,
 And what is still more dreadful—spoils your face.

See yonder set of thieves that live on spoil,
 The scandal and the ruin of our isle!
 And see (strange sight!), amid that ruffian band,
 A form divine high wave her snowy hand;
 That rattles loud a small enchanted box,
 Which, loud as thunder, on the board she knocks.
 And as fierce storms, which earth's foundation shook,

 From Æolus's cave impetuous broke,
 From this small cavern a mix'd tempest flies,
 Fear, rage, convulsion, tears, oaths, blasphemies!
 For men, I mean—the fair discharges none;
 She (guiltless creature!) swears to Heaven alone.

See her eyes start! cheeks glow! and muscles swell!

Like the mad maid in the Cumean cell.
 Thus that divine one her soft nights employs!
 Thus tunes her soul to tender nuptial joys!
 And when the cruel morning calls to bed,
 And on her pillow lays her aching head,
 With the dear images her dreams are crown'd,
 'The die spins lovely, or the cards go round;
 Imaginary ruin charms her still;
 Her happy lord is cuckold'd by spadille:
 And if she's brought to bed, 'tis ten to one,
 He marks the forehead of her darling son.

O! scene of horror, and of wild despair,
 Why is the rich Atrides' splendid heir
 Constrain'd to quit his ancient lordly seat,
 And hide his glories in a mean retreat?

Why that drawn sword? and whence that dismal cry?

Why pale distraction through the family?
 See my lord threaten, and my lady weep,
 And trembling servants from the tempest creep.
 Why that gay son to distant regions sent?
 What fiends that daughter's destin'd match prevent?
 Why the whole house in sudden ruin laid?
 O nothing, but last night—my lady play'd.

But wanders not my satire from her theme!
 Is this too owing to the love of fame?
 Though now your hearts on lucre are bestow'd,
 'Twas first a vain-devotion to the mode;
 Nor cease we here, since 'tis a vice so strong;
 The torrent sweeps all womankind along.
 This may be said, in honour of our times,
 That none now stand distinguish'd by their crimes.

If sin you must, take nature for your guide;
 Love has some soft excuse to soothe your pride:
 Ye fair apostates from love's ancient power!
 Can nothing ravish, but a golden shower?

Can cards alone your glowing fancy seize;
 Must Cupid learn to punt, e'er he can please?
 When you're enamour'd of a lift or cast,
 What can the preacher more, to make us chaste?
 Why must strong youths unmarry'd pine away?
 They find no woman disengag'd—from play.
 Why pine the marry'd?—O severer fate!
 They find from play no disengag'd—estate.
 Flavia, at lovers false, untouch'd, and hard,
 Turns pale, and trembles at a cruel card.
 Nor Arria's Bible can secure her age;
 Her threescore years are shuffling with her page.
 While death stands by, but till the game is done,
 To sweep that flake, in justice, long his own;
 Like old cards ting'd with sulphur, she takes fire;
 Or, like snuffs sunk in sockets, blazes higher.
 Ye gods! with new delights inspire the fair;
 Or give us sons, and save us from despair.

Sons, brothers, fathers, husbands, tradesmen, close
 In my complaint, and brand your sins in prose:
 Yet I believe, as firmly as my creed,
 In spite of all our wisdom, you'll proceed:
 Our pride so great, our passion is so strong,
 Advice to right confirms us in the wrong.
 I hear you cry, "This fellow's very odd."
 When you chastise, who would not kiss the rod?
 But I've a charm your anger shall controul,
 And turn your eyes with coldness on the volt.

The charm begins! to yonder flood of light,
 That bursts o'er gloomy Britain, turn your sight.
 What guardian power o'erwhelms your souls with awe?

Her deeds are precepts, her example law;
 'Midst empire's charms, how Carolina's heart
 Glows with the love of virtue, and of art!
 Her favour is diffus'd to that degree,
 Excess of goodness! it has dawn'd on me:
 When in my page, to balance numerous faults,
 Or godlike deeds were shown, or generous thoughts,
 She smil'd, industrious to be pleas'd, nor knew
 From whom my pen the borrow'd lustre drew.

Thus * the majestic mother of mankind,
 To her own charms most amiably blind,
 On the green margin innocently stood,
 And gaz'd indulgent on the crystal flood;
 Survey'd the stranger in the painted wave,
 And, smiling, prais'd the beauties which she gave.

SATIRE VII.

TO THE RIGHT HON. SIR ROBERT WALPOLE.

"Carmina tum melius, cum venerit Ipse, canemus."
 VIRG.

ON this last labour, this my closing strain,
 Smile, Walpole, or the Nine inspire in vain:
 To thee, 'tis due; that verse how justly thine,
 Where Brunswick's glory crowns the whole design?
 That glory, which thy counsels make so bright;
 That glory, which on thee reflects a light.
 Illustrious commerce, and but rarely known;
 To give, and take, a lustre from the throne.

Nor think that thou art foreign to my theme;
 The fountain is not foreign to the stream.

* Milton.

How all mankind will be surpris'd to see
 This flood of British folly charg'd on thee!
 Say, Britain! whence this caprice of thy sons,
 Which through their various ranks with fury runs?
 The cause is plain, a cause which we must bless;
 For caprice is the daughter of success,
 (A bad effect, but from a pleasing cause!)
 And gives our rulers undesign'd applause;
 Tells how their conduct bids our wealth increase,
 And lulls us in the downy lap of peace.
 While I survey the blessings of our isle,
 Her arts triumphant in the royal smile,
 Her public wounds bound up, her credit high,
 Her commerce spreading sails in every sky,
 The pleasing scene recalls my theme again,
 And shows the madness of ambitious men,
 Who, fond of bloodshed, draw the murdering
 sword,

And burn to give mankind a single lord.

The follies past are of a private kind;
 Their sphere is small; their mischief is confin'd:
 But daring men there are (awake, my muse,
 And raise thy verse!) who bolder phrenzy choose;
 Who, stung by glory, rave, and bound away;
 The world their field, and humankind their prey.

The Grecian chief, th' enthusiast of his pride,
 With rage and terror stalking by his side,
 Raves round the globe; he soars into a god!
 Stand fast, Olympus! and sustain his nod.
 The pest divine in horrid grandeur reigns,
 And thrives on mankind's miseries and pains.
 What slaughter'd hosts! what cities in a blaze!
 What wasted countries! and what crimson seas!
 With orphans tears his impious bowl o'erflows,
 And cries of kingdoms lull him to repose.

And cannot thrice ten hundred years unpraise
 The boisterous boy, and blast his guilty bays?
 Why want we then encomiums on the storm,
 Or famine, or volcano? They perform
 Their mighty deeds; they, hero like, can slay,
 And spread their ample desarts in a day.
 O great alliance! O divine renown!
 With dearth, and pestilence, to share the crown.
 When men extol a wild destroyer's name,
 Earth's Builder and Preserver they blaspheme.

One to destroy, is murder by the law;
 And gibbets keep the lifted hand in awe;
 To murder thousands, takes a specious name,
 War's glorious art, and gives immortal fame.

When, after battle, I the field have seen [men;
 Spread o'er with ghastly shapes, which once were
 A nation crush'd, a nation of the brave!
 A realm of death! and on this side the grave!
 Are there, said I, who from this sad survey,
 This human chaos, carry smiles away?
 How did my heart with indignation rise!
 How honest nature swell'd into my eyes!
 How was I shock'd to think the hero's trade
 Of such materials, fame and triumph, made!

How guilty these! yet not less guilty they,
 Who reach false glory by a smoother way:
 Who wrap destruction up in gentle words,
 And bows, and smiles, more fatal than their swords;
 Who stifle nature, and subsist on art;
 Who coin the face, and petrify the heart;

All real kindness for the show discard,
 As marble polish'd, and as marble hard;
 Who do for gold what Christians do through grace,
 "With open arms their enemies embrace;"
 Who give a nod when broken hearts repine;
 "The thinnest food on which a wretch can dine:"
 Or, if they serve you, serve you disinclin'd,
 And, in their height of kindness, are unkind.
 Such courtiers were, and such again may be,
 Walpole, when men forget to copy thee.

Here cease, my muse! the catalogue is writ;
 Nor one more candidate for fame admit,
 Though disappointed thousands justly blame
 Thy partial pen, and boast an equal claim:
 Be this their comfort, fools, omitted here,
 May furnish laughter for another year.
 Then let Crispino, who was ne'er refus'd
 The justice yet of being well abus'd,
 With patience wait; and be content to reign
 The pink of puppies in some future strain.

Some future strain, in which the muse shall tell
 How science dwindles, and how volumes swell.

How commentators each dark passage shun,
 And hold their farthing candle to the sun.

How tortur'd texts to speak our sense are made,
 And every vice is to the scripture laid.

How misers squeeze a young voluptuous peer;
 His sins to Lucifer not half so dear.

How Versus is less qualify'd to steal
 With sword and pistol, than with wax and seal.

How lawyers fees to such excess are run,
 That clients are redress'd till they're undone.

How one man's anguish is another's sport;
 And ev'n denials cost us dear at court.

How man eternally false judgments makes,
 And all his joys and sorrows are mistakes.

This swarm of themes that settles on my pen,
 Which I, like summer flies, shake off again,
 Let others sing; to whom my weak essay
 But sounds a prelude, and points out their prey:
 That duty done, I hasten to complete
 My own design; for Tonson's at the gate.

The love of fame in its effect survey'd,
 The muse has sung! be now the cause display'd:
 Since so diffusive, and so wide its sway,
 What is this power, whom all mankind obey?

Shot from above, by heaven's indulgence, came
 This generous ardour, this unconquer'd flame,
 To warm, to raise, to deify, mankind,
 Still burning brightest in the noblest mind.
 By large-soul'd men, for thirst of fame renown'd,
 Wise laws were fram'd, and sacred arts were found;

Desire of praise first broke the patriot's rest;
 And made a bulwark of the warrior's breast;
 It bids Argyll in fields and senate shine.
 What more can prove its origin divine?

But, oh! this passion planted in the soul,
 On eagle's wings to mount her to the pole,
 The flaming minister of virtue meant,
 Set up false gods, and wrong'd her high descent.

Ambition, hence, exerts a doubtful force,
 Of blots, and beauties, an alternate source;
 Hence Gildon rails, that raven of the pit,
 Who thrives upon the carcases of wit;

And in art-loving Scarborough is seen
How kind a pattern Pollia might have been.
Pursuit of fame with pedants fills our schools,
And into coxcombs burnishes our fools;
Pursuit of fame makes solid learning bright,
And Newton lifts above a mortal height;
That key of nature, by whose wit she clears
Her long, long secrets of five thousand years.

Would you then fully comprehend the whole,
Why, and in what degrees, pride sways the soul?
(For, though in all not equally, she reigns)
Awake to knowledge, and attend my strains.

Ye doctors! hear the doctrine I disclose,
As true, as if 'twere writ in dullest prose;
As if a letter'd dunce had said, "'Tis right,"
And imprimatur usher'd it to light.

Ambition in the truly noble mind,
With sister-virtue is for ever join'd;
As in fam'd Lucrece, who, with equal dread,
From guilt and shame, by her last conduct, fled:
Her virtue long rebell'd in firm disdain,
And the sword pointed at her heart in vain;
But, when the slave was threaten'd to be laid
Dead by her side, her love of fame obey'd.

In meaner minds ambition works alone;
But with such art puts virtue's aspect on,
That not more like in feature and in mien,
The God and mortal in the comic scene*.
False Julius, ambush'd in this fair disguise,
Soon made the Roman liberties his prize.

No mask in basest minds ambition wears,
But in full light pricks up her ass's ears:
All I have sung are instances of this,
And prove my theme unfolded not amiss.

Ye vain! desist from your erroneous strife;
Be wise, and quit the false sublime of life.
The true ambition there alone resides,
Where justice vindicates, and wisdom guides;
Where inward dignity joins outward state;
Our purpose good, as our achievement great;
Where public blessings public praise attend;
Where glory is our motive, not our end.
Would'st thou be fam'd? Have those high deeds in view

Brave men would act, though scandal should ensue.
Behold a prince! whom no Twon thoughts in-
flame;

No pride of thrones, no fever after fame;
But when the welfare of mankind inspires,
And death in view to dear-bought glory fires,

* Amphitryon.

Proud conquests then, then regal pomps delight;
Then crowns, then triumphs, sparkle in his sight;
Tumult and noise are dear, which with them bring
His people's blessings to their ardent king:
But, when those great heroic motives cease,
His swelling soul subsides to native peace;
From tedious grandeur's faded charms withdraws,
A sudden foe to splendor and applause;
Greatly deferring his arrears of fame,
Till men and angels jointly shout his name.

O pride celestial! which can pride disdain;
O blest ambition! which can ne'er be vain. [sky,
From one fam'd Alpine hill, which props the
In whose deep womb unfathom'd waters lie,
Here burst the Rhone and sounding Po; there shine,
In infant rills, the Danube and the Rhine;
From the rich store one fruitful urn supplies,
Whole kingdoms smile, a thousand harvests rise.

In Brunswick such a source the muse adores,
Which public blessings through half Europe pours,
When his heart burns with such a godlike aim,
Angels and George are rivals for the fame;
George, who in foes can soft affections raise,
And charm envenom'd satire into praise.

Nor human rage alone his power perceives,
But the mad winds, and the tumultuous *waves.
Ev'n storms (death's fiercest ministers!) forbear,
And, in their own wild empire, learn to spare.
Thus, nature's self, supporting man's decree,
Styles Britain's sovereign, sovereign of the sea.

While sea and air, great Brunswick! shook our state,
And sported with a king's and kingdom's fate,
Depriv'd of what she lov'd, and press'd by fear
Of ever losing what she held most dear,
How did Britannia, like Achilles, weep,
And tell her sorrows to the kindred deep!
Hang o'er the floods, and, in devotion warm,
Strive, for thee, with the surge, and fight the storm!

What felt thy Walpole, pilot of the realm!
Our Palinurus slept not at the helm;
His eye ne'er clos'd; long since inur'd to wake,
And out-watch every star for Brunswick's sake;
By thwarting passions tofs'd, by cares oppress'd,
He found the tempest pictur'd in his breast:
But, now, what joys that gloom of heart despoil,
No powers of language—but his own, can tell;
His own, which nature and the graces form,
At will, to raise, or hush, the civil storm.

* The king in danger by sea.

OCEAN; AN ODE.

OCCASIONED BY HIS MAJESTY'S ROYAL ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE SEA SERVICE.

TO WHICH IS PREFIXED

AN ODE TO THE KING; AND A DISCOURSE ON ODE.

I THINK myself obliged to recommend to you a consideration of the greatest importance; and I should look upon it as a great happiness, if, at the beginning of my reign, I could see the foundation laid of so great and necessary a work, as the increase and encouragement of our seamen in general; that they may be invited, rather than compelled by force and violence, to enter into the service of their country, as oft as occasion shall require it: A consideration worthy the representatives of a people great and flourishing in trade and navigation. This leads me to mention to you the case of Greenwich Hospital, that care may be taken, by some addition to that fund, to render comfortable and effectual that charitable provision for the support and maintenance of our seamen, worn out, and become decrepit by age and infirmities, in the service of their country.

[SPEECH, Jan. 27. 1727-8.]

TO THE KING.

OLD Ocean's praise
Demands my lays;
A truly-British theme I sing;
A theme so great,
I dare complete,
And join with Ocean, Ocean's king.
To gods and kings,
The poet sings;
To kings and gods the muse is dear;
The muse inspires
With all her fires;
Begin, my soul! thy bold career.
From awful state,
From high debate,
From morning-splendors of a crown,
From homage pay'd,
From empires weigh'd
From plans of blessings and renown;
Great monarch! bow
Thy beaming brow;
ethee I strike the sounding lyre,
With proud design
In verse to shine;
To rival Greek and Roman fire.
The Roman ode
Majestic flow'd;
Its stream divinely clear and strong;
In sense, and sound,
Thebes roll'd profound;
The torrent roar'd, and foam'd along.

Let Thebes, nor Rome,
So fam'd, presume
To triumph o'er a northern isle;
Late time shall know
The north can glow,
If dread Augustus deign to smile.

The work is done!
The distant sun
His smile supplies! exalts my voice!
Through earth's wide bound
Shall George resound,
My theme, by duty, and by choice.

The naval crown
Is all his own!
Our fleet, if war or commerce call,
His will performs
Through waves and storms,
And rides in triumph round the ball.

Since then the main
Sublimes my strain,
To whom should I address my song?
To whom but thee?
The boundless sea,
And grateful muse to George belong.

Hail, mighty theme!
Rich mine of fame!
If gods invok'd extend their aid;
Hail subject new!
As Britain's due
Reserv'd by the Pierian maid.

C iiiij.

Durst Homer's muse,
Or Pindar's, choose
To pour the billows on his string?
No, both defraud
The tuneful god;
Scarce more sublime, when Jove they sing.

No former race,
With strong embrace,
This theme to ravish durst aspire;
With virgin charms
My soul it warms,
And melts melodious on my lyre.

Now low, now high,
My fingers fly,
Now pause, and now fresh music spring;
Now dance, now creep,
Now dive, now sweep,
And fetch the sound from every string.

Now numbers rise,
Like virgin's sighs;
The soft Favonians melt away;
As from the north
Now rushes forth
A blast, that thunders in my lay.

My lays I file
With curious toil;
Ye graces! turn the glowing lines;
On anvils neat
Your strokes repeat;
At every stroke the work refines!

How music charms!
How metre warms!
Parent of actions good and brave!
How vice it tames!
And worth inflames!
And holds proud empire o'er the grave!

Jove mark'd for man
A scanty span,
But lent him wings to fly his doom;
Wit scorns the grave;
To wit he gave
The life of gods! immortal bloom!

Since years will fly,
And pleasures die,
Day after day, as years advance;
Since, while life lasts,
Joy suffers blasts
From frowning fate, and fickle chance;

Nor life is long;
But soon we throng,
Like autumn leaves, death's pallid shore;
We make, at least,
Of bad the best,
If in life's phantom, fame, we soar.

Our strains divide
The laurel's pride;
With those we list to life, we live;
By fame enroll'd
With heroes bold,
And share the blessings which we give.

What hero's praise
Can fire my lays,
Like his, with whom my lay begun?
"Justice sincere,
"And courage clear,
"Rise the two columns of his throne.
"How form'd for sway!
"Who look, obey;
"They read the monarch in his port.
"Their love and awe
"Supply the law;
"And his own lustre makes the court;
"But shines supreme,
"Where heroes flame;
"In war's high-hearted pomp he prides!
"By godlike arts
"Enthron'd in hearts,
"Our bosom-lord o'er wills presides."

Our factions end!
The nations bend!
For when Britannia's sons, combin'd
In fair array,
All march one way;
They march the terror of mankind.
If equal all
Who tread the ball,
Our bounded prospect, here, would end;
But heroes prove
As steps to Jove,
By which our thoughts, with ease, ascend.

From what we view
We take the clue,
Which leads from great, to greater things;
Men doubt no more,
But gods adore,
When such resemblance shines in kings.

On yonder height,
What golden light
Triumphant shines, and shines alone?
Unrivall'd blaze!
The nations gaze!
'Tis not the sun, 'tis Britain's throne.

Our monarch, there,
Rear'd high in air,
Should tempests rise, disdains to bend;
Like British oak,
Derides the stroke;
His blooming honours far extend!

Beneath them lies,
With lifted eyes,
Fair Albion, like an amorous maid;
While interest wings
Bold foreign kings
To fly, like eagles, to his shade.

At his proud foot
The sea pour'd out,
Immortal nourishment supplies;
Thence wealth and state,
And power, and—Fate,
Which Europe reads in George's eyes.

ON LYRIC POETRY.

How imperfect soever my own composition may be, yet am I willing to speak a word or two of the nature of Lyric Poetry; to show that I have, at least, some idea of perfection in that kind of poem in which I am engaged; and that I do not think myself poet enough entirely to rely on inspiration for my success in it.

To our having, or not having this idea of perfection in the poem we undertake, is chiefly owing the merit or demerit of our performances, as also the modesty or vanity of our opinions concerning them. And in speaking of it I shall show how it unavoidably comes to pass, that bad poets, that is, poets in general, are esteemed, and really are, the most vain, the most irritable, and most ridiculous set of men upon earth. But poetry in its own nature is certainly

“ —Non hos quæsitum munus in usus.”

VIRG.

He that has an idea of perfection in the work he undertakes may fail in it; he that has not, must: and yet he will be vain. For every little degree of beauty, how short or improper soever, will be looked on fondly by him; because it is all pure gains, and more than he promised to himself; and because he has no test, or standard in his judgment, with which to chastise his opinion of it.

Now this idea of perfection is, in poetry, more refined than in other kinds of writing; and because more refined, therefore more difficult, and because more difficult, therefore more rarely attained; and the non-attainment of it is, as I have said, the source of our vanity. Hence the poetic clan are more obnoxious to vanity than others. And from vanity consequentially flows that great sensibility of disrespect, that quick resentment, that rinder of the mind that kindles at every spark, and justly marks them out for the “genus irritabile” among mankind. And from this combustible temper, this serious anger for no very serious things, things looked on by most as foreign to the important points of life, as consequentially flows that inheritance of ridicule, which devolves on them, from generation to generation. As soon as they become authors, they become like Ben Jonson’s angry boy, and learn the art of quarrel.

“ —Concordes animæ—dum nocte prementur;
 “ Heu! quantum inter se bellum, si lumina vitæ
 “ Attigerint, quantas acies, stragemque ciebunt!
 “ Qui Juvenes! quantas ostentant, aspice, vires.
 “ Ne, pueri! ne tanta animis assuescite bella.
 “ Tuque prior, tu parce, genus qui ducis Olympo,
 “ Syderio flagrans clypeo, et cœlestibus armis,
 “ Projice tela manu, sanguis meus!
 “ Nec te ullæ facies, non terruit ipse Typhœus
 “ Arduus, arma tenens; non te Messapus et Ufens, “ Contemptorque Deûm Mezentius.”

VIRG.

But to return. He that has this idea of perfection in the work he undertakes, however successful he is, will yet be modest; because to rise up to that idea, which he proposed for his model, is almost, if not absolutely, impossible.

These two observations account for what may seem as strange, as it is infallibly true; I mean, they show us why good writers have the lowest, and bad writers the highest, opinion of their own performances. They who have only a partial idea of this perfection, as their proportionable degrees of modesty or conceit.

Nor, though natural good understanding makes a tolerably just judgment in things of this nature, will the reader judge the worse, for forming to himself a notion of what he ought to expect from the piece he has in hand, before he begins his perusal of it.

The ode, as it is the eldest kind of poetry, so it is more spirituous, and more remote from prose than any other, in sense, sound, expression, and conduct. Its thoughts should be uncommon, sublime, and moral; its numbers full, easy, and most harmonious; its expression pure, strong, delicate, yet unaffected; and of a curious felicity beyond other poems; its conduct should be rapturous, somewhat abrupt, and immethodical to a vulgar eye. That apparent order, and connection, which gives form and life to some compositions, takes away the very soul of this. Fire, elevation, and select thought, are indispensable; an humble, tame, and vulgar ode is the most pitiful error a pen can commit.

And as its subjects are sublime, its writer’s genius should be so too; otherwise it becomes the meanest thing in writing, viz. an involuntary burlesque.

It is the genuine character, and true merit of the ode, a little to startle some apprehensions. Men of cold complexions are very apt to mistake a want of vigour in their imaginations, for a delicacy of taste in their judgments; and, like persons of a tender sight, they look on bright objects, in their natural lustre, as too glaring; what is most delightful to a stronger eye, is painful to them. Thus Pindar, who has as much logic at the bottom as Aristotle or Euclid, to some critics has appeared as mad; and must appear so to all who enjoy no portion of his own divine spirit. Dwarf-understandings, measuring others by their own standard, are apt to think they see a monster, when they see a man.

And indeed it seems to be the amends which nature makes to those whom she has not blessed with an elevation of mind, to indulge them in the comfortable mistake, that all is wrong, which falls not within the narrow limits of their own comprehensions and relish.

Judgment, indeed, that masculine power of the mind, in ode, as in all compositions, should bear the supreme sway; and a beautiful imagination, as its mistress, should be subdued to its dominion. Hence, and hence only, can proceed the fairest offspring of the human mind.

But then in ode, there is this difference from other kinds of poetry; that, there, the imagination, like a very beautiful mistress, is indulged in the appearance of domineering; though the judgment, like an artful lover, in reality carries its point; and the less it is suspected of it, it shows the more masterly conduct, and deserves the greater commendation.

It holds true in this province of writing, as in war, "The more danger, the more honour." It must be very enterprising; it must, in Shakspeare's style, have hair-breadth 'scapes; and often tread the very brink of error: nor can it ever deserve the applause of the real judge, unless it renders itself obnoxious to the misapprehensions of the contrary.

Such is Casimire's strain among the moderns, whose lively wit, and happy fire, is an honour to them. And Buchanan might justly be much admired, if any thing more than the sweetness of his numbers, and the purity of his diction, were his own: his original, from which I have taken my motto, through all the disadvantages of a northern prose translation, is still admirable; and, Cowley says, as preferable in beauty to Buchanan, as Judæa is to Scotland.

Pindar, Anacreon, Sappho, and Horace, are the great masters of Lyric poetry among Heathen writers. Pindar's muse, like Sacharissa, is a stately, imperious, and accomplished beauty; equally disdainful the use of art, and the fear of any rival; so intoxicating that it was the highest commendation that could be given an ancient, that he was not afraid to taste of her charms;

"Pindarici fontis qui non expalluit haustus;"

a danger which Horace declares he durst not run.

Anacreon's muse is like Amoret, most sweet, natural, and delicate; all over flowers, graces, and charms; inspiring complacency, not awe; and she seems to have good-nature enough to admit a rival, which she cannot find.

Sappho's muse, like Lady —, is passionately tender, and glowing; like oil set on fire, she is soft, and warm, in excess. Sappho has left us a few fragments only; time has swallowed the rest; but that little which remains, like the remaining jewel of Cleopatra, after the other was dissolved at her banquet, may be esteemed (as was that jewel) a sufficient ornament for the goddess of beauty herself.

Horace's muse (like one I shall not presume to name) is correct, solid, and moral; she joins all the former, in the justest proportions and degrees; superadding a felicity of dress entirely her own. She moreover is distinguishable by this particularity, That she abounds in bidden graces, and secret charms, which none but the discerning can discover; nor are any capable of doing full justice, in their opinion, to her excellencies, without giving the world, at the same time, an incontestable proof of refinement in their own understandings.

But, after all, to the honour of our own country I must add, that I think Mr. Dryden's Ode on St. Cecilia's Day inferior to no composition of this kind. Its chief beauty consists in adapting the numbers most happily to the variety of the occasion. Those by which he has chosen to express Majesty, (viz.)

Assumes the God,
Affects to nod,
And seems to shake the spheres,

are chosen in the following Ode, because the subject of it is great.

For the more harmony likewise, I chose the frequent return of rhyme; which laid me under great difficulties. But difficulties overcome give grace and pleasure. Nor can I account for the pleasure of rhyme in general (of which the moderns are too fond) but from this truth.

But then the writer must take care that the difficulty is overcome. That is, he must make rhyme consistent with as perfect sense, and expression, as could be expected if he was free from that shackle. Otherwise, it gives neither grace to the work, nor pleasure to the reader, nor, consequently, reputation to the poet.

To sum the whole: Ode should be peculiar, but not strained; moral, but not flat; natural, but not obvious; delicate, but not affected; noble, but not ambitious; full, but not obscure; fiery, but not mad; thick, but not loaded in its numbers, which should be most harmonious, without the least sacrifice of expression, or of sense. Above all, in this, as in every work of genius, somewhat of an original spirit should be, at least, attempted; otherwise the poet, whose character disclaims mediocrity, makes a secondary praise his ultimate ambition; which has something of a contradiction in it. Originals only have true life, and differ as much from the best Imitations, as men from the most animated pictures of them. Nor is what I say at all inconsistent with a due deference for the great standards of antiquity; nay, that very deference is an argument for it; for doubtless their example is on my side in this matter. And we should rather imitate their example in the general motives and fundamental methods of their working, than in their works themselves. This is a distinction, I think, not hitherto made, and a distinction of consequence. For the first may make us their equals; the second must pronounce us their inferiors even in our utmost success. But the first of these prizes is not so readily taken by the moderns; as valuables too massy for easy carriage are not so liable to the thief.

The ancients had a particular regard to the choice of their subjects; which were generally national and great. My subject is, in its own nature, noble; most proper for an Englishman; never more proper than on this occasion; and (what is strange) hitherto unsung.

If I stand not absolutely condemned by my own rules; if I have hit the spirit of ode in general; if I cannot think with Mr. Cowley, that "Music alone, sometimes, makes an excellent ode,"

"Versus inopes rerum, nugæque canoræ;"

if there is any thought, enthusiasm, and picture, which are as the body, soul, and robe of poetry; in a word, if in any degree I have provided rather food for men, than air for wits; I hope smaller faults will meet indulgence for the sake of the design, which is the glory of my country and my king.

And indeed, this may be said, in general, that great subjects are above being nice; that dignity and spirit ever suffer from scrupulous exactness; and that the minuter cares effeminate a composition. Great masters of poetry, painting, and statuary, in their nobler works, have even affected the contrary: and justly; for a truly-masculine air partakes more of the negligent, than of the neat, both in writings, and in life—

“Grandis oratio haberet majestatis suæ pondus.”
PETRON.

A poem, like a criminal, under too severe correction, may lose all its spirit, and expire. We know it was Faber imus, that was such an artist at a hair or a nail. And we know the cause was

“Quia ponere totum
“Nescius.” HOR.

To close; If a piece of this nature wants an apology, I must own, that those who have strength of mind sufficient profitably to devote the whole of their time to the severer studies, I despair of imitating, I can only envy and admire. The mind is relieved and strengthened by variety; and he that sometimes is sporting with his pen, is only taking the most effectual means of giving a general importance to it. This truth is clear from the knowledge of human nature, and of history; from which I could cite very celebrated instances, did I not fear that, by citing them, I should condemn myself, who am so little qualified to follow their example in its full extent.

OCEAN;

AN ODE.

CONCLUDING WITH A WISH.

“Let the sea make a noise, let the floods clap their “hands.” PSAL. xcvi.

SWEET rural scene!
Of flocks and green!

At careless ease my limbs are spread;
All nature still,
But yonder rill;
And listening pines nod o’er my head;

In prospect wide,
The boundless tide!
Waves cease to foam, and winds to roar;
Without a breeze,
The curling seas

Dance on, in measure, to the shore,
Who sings the source
Of wealth and force?

Vast field of commerce and big war;
Where wonders dwell;
Where terrors swell:

And Neptune thunders from his car?

Where? where are they,
Whom Pæan’s ray
Has touch’d, and bid divinely rave?
What, none aspire?
I snatch the lyre,
And plunge into the foaming wave.

The wave resounds!
The rock rebounds!
The Nereids to my song reply!
I lead the choir,
And they conspire
With voice and shell to lift it high;

They spread in air
Their bosoms fair;
Their verdant tresses pour behind.
The billows beat
With nimble feet,
With notes triumphant swell the wind.

Who love the shore,
Let those adore
The god Apollo, and his Nine,
Parnassus’ hill,
And Orpheus’ skill;
But let Arion’s harp be mine.
The main! the main!
Is Britain’s reign;
Her strength, her glory, is her fleet;
The main! the main!
Be Britons’ strain;
As Tritons’ strong, as Syrens’ sweet.

Through nature wide,
Is nought descry’d
So rich in pleasure, or surprise;
When all serene,
How sweet the scene!
How dreadful, when the billows rise.

And storms deface
The fluid glass,
In which ere-while Britannia fair
Look’d down with pride,
Like Ocean’s bride,
Adjusting her majestic air.

When tempests cease,
And hush’d in peace
The flatten’d furies smoothly spread,
Deep silence keep,
And seem to sleep
Recumbent on their oozy bed;

With what a trance
The level glance,
Unbroken, shoots along the seas!
Which tempt from shore
The painted oar;
And every canvas courts the breeze!

When rushes forth
The frowning North
On blackening billows, with what dread
My shuddering soul
Beholds them roll,
And hears their roarings o’er my head!

With terror mark
Yon flying bark!
Now, centre-deep descend the brave;

Now, tofs'd on high
It takes the sky,
A feather on the towering wave!

Now, spins around
In whirls profound;
Now, whelm'd; now, pendant near the clouds;
Now, stunn'd, it reels
Midst thunder's peals;
And, now, fierce lightning fires the shrouds.

All ether burns!
Chaos returns!
And blends once more the seas and skies;
No space between
Thy bosom green,
O deep! and the blue concave, lies.

The northern blast,
The shatter'd mast,
The fyr, the whirlpool, and the rock,
The breaking spout,
The stars gone out,
The boiling freight, the monsters shock.

Let others fear;
To Britain dear
Whate'er promotes her daring claim;
Those terrors charm,
Which keep her warm
In chase of honest gain or fame.

The stars are bright
To cheer the night,
And shed, through shadows temper'd fire;
And Phœbus flames
With burnish'd beams,
Which some adore, and all admire.

Are then the seas
Outshone by these?
Bright Thetis! thou art not outshone;
With kinder beams,
And softer gleams,
Thy bosom wears them as thy own.

There, set in green,
Gold-stars are seen,
A mantle rich! thy charms to wrap;
And when the sun
His race has run,
He falls enamour'd in thy lap.

Those clouds, whose dyes
Adorn the skies,
That silver snow, that pearly rain;
Has Phœbus stole
To grace the pole,
The plunder of th' invaded main!

The gaudy bow,
Whose colours glow,
Whose arch with so much skill is bent,
To Phœbus' ray,
Which paints so gay,
By thee the watery woof was lent.

In chambers deep,
Where waters sleep,
What unknown treasures pave the floor!

The pearl in rows
Pale lustre throws;
The wealth immense, which storms devour.

From Indian mines,
With proud designs,
The merchant, swoln, digs golden ore.
The tempests rise,
And seize the prize,
And tofs him breathless on the shore.

His son complains
In pious strains
"Ah! cruel thirst of gold!" he cries;
Then ploughs the main,
In zeal for gain,
The tears yet swelling in his eyes.

Thou watery vast
What mounds are cast
To bar thy dreadful flowings-o'er?
Thy proudest foam
Must know its home;
But rage of gold disdains a shore.

Gold pleasure buys;
But pleasure dies,
Too soon the gross fruition cloy:
Though raptures court,
The sense is short;
But virtue kindles living joys;

Joys felt alone!
Joys ask'd of none!
Which time and fortune's arrows miss;
Joys that subsist,
Though fates resist,
And unprecious endless bliss!

The soul refin'd
Is most inclin'd
To every moral excellence;
All vice is dull,
A knave's a fool;
And virtue is the child of sense.

The virtuous mind
Nor wave, nor wind,
Nor civil rage, nor tyrant's frown,
The shaken ball,
Nor planets fall,
From its firm basis can dethrone.

This Britain knows,
And therefore glows
With generous passions, and expends
Her wealth and zeal
On public weal,
And brightens both by godlike ends.

What end so great,
As that which late
Awoke the genius of the main,
Which towering rose
With George to close,
And rival great Eliza's reign?

A voice has flown
From Britain's throne
To rekindle a grand design;

That voice shall rear
Yon *fabric fair,
As nature's rose at the divine.

When nature sprung,
Blest angels sung,
And shouted o'er the rising ball;
For strains as high
As man's can fly,
These sea-devoted honours call.
From boisterous seas,
The lap of ease
Receives our wounded and our old;
High domes ascend!
Stretch'd arches bend!
Proud columns swell! wide gates unfold!

So sleeps the grain,
In fostering rain,
And vital beams, till Jove descend;
Then bursts the root!
The verduries shoot!
And earth enrich, adorn, defend!

Here, soft-reclin'd
From wave, from wind,
And fortune's tempest safe ashore,
To cheat their care,
Of former war
They talk the pleasing shadows o'er.

In lengthen'd tales,
Our fleet prevails;
In tales the lenitives of age!
And, o'er the bowl,
They fire the soul
Of listening youth to martial rage.

The story done,
Their setting sun,
Serenely smiling down the west,
In soft decay,
They drop away;
And honour leads them to their rest.

Unhappy they!
And falsely gay!
Who bask for ever in success;
A constant feast
Quite palls the taste,
And long enjoyment is distress.

What charms us most,
Our joy, our boast,
Familiar, loses all its gloss;
And gold refin'd
The fated mind
Fastidious turns to perfect dross.

When, after toil,
His native soil
The painting mariner regains,
What transport flows
From bare repose!
We reap our pleasure from our pains.
Ye warlike slain!
Beneath the main,

* Greenwich.

Wrapt in a watery winding sheet;
Who bought with blood
Your country's good,
Your country's full-blown glory greet.

What powerful charm
Can death disarm?
Your long, your iron slumbers break?
By Jove, by Fame,
By George's name,
Awake! awake! awake!

Our joy so proud,
Our shout so loud,
Without a charm the dead might hear:
And see, they rouse!
Their awful brows,
Deep-scar'd, from oozy pillows rear!

With spiral shell,
Full-blasted, tell
That all your watery realms should ring;
Your pearl alcoves,
Your coral groves,
Should echo theirs and Britain's king.

As long as stars
Guide mariners,
As Carolina's virtues please,
Or suns invite
The ravish'd sight,
The British flag shall sweep the seas.

Peculiar both!
Our soil's strong growth,
And our bold natives hardy mind;
Sure Heaven bespoke
Our hearts, and oak,
To give a master to mankind.

That noblest birth
Of teeming earth,
Of forests fair that daughter proud,
To foreign coasts
Our grandeur boasts,
And Britain's pleasure speaks aloud.

Now big with war
Sends fate from far,
If rebel realms their fate demand;
Now sumptuous spoils
Of foreign soils
Pours in the bosom of our land.

Hence Britain lays
In scales, and weighs
The fates of kingdoms and of kings;
And as she frowns
Or smiles, on crowns
A night or day of glory springs.

Thus Ocean swells
The streams and rills,
And to their borders lifts them high;
Or else withdraws
The mighty cause,
And leaves their famish'd channels dry.

How mix'd, how frail,
How sure to fail,

Is every pleasure of mankind !

A damp destroys

My blooming joys,

While Britain's glory fires my mind

For who can gaze

On restless seas,

Unstruck with life's more restless state ?

Where all are toils'd,

And most are lost,

By tides of passion, blasts of fate ?

The world's the main,

How vex'd ! how vain !

Ambition swells, and anger foams ;

May good men find,

Beneath the wind,

A noiseless shore, unruffled homes !

The public scene

Of harden'd men

Teach me, O teach me to despise !

The world few know,

But to their woe,

Our crimes with our experience rise.

All tender sense

Is banish'd thence,

All maiden nature's first alarms

What shock'd before

Disgusts no more,

And what disgusted has its charms.

In landscapes green

True bliss is seen,

With innocence, in shades, she sports ;

In wealthy towns

Proud labour frowns,

And painted sorrow smiles in courts.

These scenes untry'd

Seduc'd my pride,

To fortune's arrows bar'd my breast,

Till wisdom came,

A hoary dame !

And told me pleasure was in rest.

" O may I steal

" Along the vale

" Of humble life, secure from foes !

" My friend sincere,

" My judgment clear,

" And gentle business my repose.

" My mind be strong

" To combat wrong !

" Grateful, O King ! for favours shown !

" Soft to complain

" For others' pain,

" And bold to triumph o'er my own !

" (When Fortune's kind)

" Acute to find,

" And warm to relish every boon,

" And wise to still

" Fantastic ill,

" Whose frightful spectres stalk at noon.

" No fruitless toils,

" No brainless broils,

" Each moment level'd at the mark !

" Our day so short

" Invites no sport ;

" Be sad and solemn when 'tis dark.

" Yet prudence still

" Rein thou my will !

" What's most important make most dear !

" For 'tis in this

" Resides true bliss ;

" True bliss, a deity severe !

" When temper leans

" To gayer scenes,

" And serious life void moments spares,

" The sylvan chase

" My sinews brace !

" Or song unbend my mind from cares !

" Nor shun, my soul !

" The genial bowl,

" Where mirth, good-nature, spirit, flow !

" Ingredients these

" Above to please

" The laughing gods, the wise below.

" Though rich the vine,

" More wit than wine,

" More sense than wit, good-will than art,

" May I provide !

" Fair truth, my pride !

" My joy, the converse of the heart !

" The gloomy brow

" The broken vow,

" To distant climes, ye gods, remove !

" The nobly-soul'd

" Their commerce hold

" With words of truth, and looks of love !

" O glorious aim !

" O wealth supreme !

" Divine benevolence of soul !

" That greatly glows,

" And freely flows,

" And in one blessing grasps the whole !

" Prophetic schemes,

" And golden dreams,

" May I unsanguine cast away !

" Have what I have,

" And live, not leave,

" Enamour'd of the present day !

" My hours my own,

" My faults unknown,

" My chief revenue in content !

" Then leave one beam

" Of honest fame,

" And scorn the labour'd monument !

" Unhurt my urn,

" Till that great turn

" When mighty nature's self shall die ;

" Time cease to glide,

" With human pride,

" Sunk in the ocean of eternity."

A PARAPHRASE ON PART OF THE BOOK OF JOB.

To the Right Honourable

THOMAS LORD PARKER, BARON OF MACCLESFIELD,

LORD HIGH CHANCELLOR OF GREAT-BRITAIN, &c. &c.

MY LORD,

THOUGH I have not the honour of being known to your Lordship, I presume to take a privilege which men of retirement are apt to think themselves in possession of, as being the only method they have of making their way to persons of your Lordship's high station, without struggling through multitudes for access. I may possibly fail in my respect to your Lordship, even while I endeavour to show it most; but if I err, it is because I imagined I ought not to make my first approach to one of your Lordship's exalted character with less ceremony than that of a dedication. It is annexed to the condition of eminent merit, not to suffer more from the malice of its enemies than from the importunity of its admirers; and perhaps it would be unjust that your Lordship should hope to be exempted from the troubles, when you possess all the talents, of a patron.

I have here a fair occasion to celebrate those sublime qualities, of which a whole nation is sensible, were it not inconsistent with the design of my present application. By the just discharge of your great employments, your Lordship may well deserve the prayers of the distressed, the thanks of your country, and the approbation of your Royal Master. This indeed is a reason why every good Briton should applaud your Lordship; but it is equally a reason why none should disturb you in the execution of your important affairs by works of fancy and amusement. I was therefore induced to make this address to your Lordship, by considering you rather in the amiable light of a person distinguished for a refined taste of the polite arts, and the candour that usually attends it, than in the dignity of your public character.

The greatness and solemnity of the subjects treated of in the following work, cannot fail in some measure to recommend it to a person who holds in the utmost veneration those sacred books from which it is taken; and would at the same time justify to the world my choice of the great name prefixed to it, could I be assured that the undertaking had not suffered in my hands. Thus much I think myself obliged to say, that if this little performance had not been very indulgently spoken of by some, whose judgment is universally allowed in writings of this nature, I had not dared to gratify my ambition in offering it to your Lordship. I am sensible that I am endeavouring to excuse one vanity by another; but I hope I shall meet with pardon for it, since it is visibly intended to show the great submission and respect with which I am,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient and most humble servant,

EDWARD YOUNG.

THREE happy Job long liv'd in regal state,
Nor saw the sumptuous east a prince so great;
Whose worldly stores in such abundance flow'd,
Whose heart with such exalted virtue glow'd.
At length misfortunes take their turn to reign,
And ills on ills succeed; a dreadful train!
What now but deaths, and poverty, and wrong,
The sword wide-wasting, the reproachful tongue,

And spotted plagues, that mark'd his limbs all o'er
So thick with pains, they wanted room for more!
A change so sad what mortal here could bear?
Exhausted woe had left him nought to fear;
But gave him all to grief. Low earth he prest,
Wept in the dust, and sorely smote his breast.
His friends around the deep affliction mourn'd,
Felt all his pangs, and groan for groan return'd;

In anguish of their hearts their mantles rent,
And seven long days in solemn silence spent;
A debt of reverence to distress so great!
Then Job contain'd no more; but curs'd his fate.

His day of birth, its inauspicious light,
He wishes sunk in shades of endless night,
And blotted from the year; nor fears to crave
Death, instant death; impatient for the grave,
That seat of peace, that mansion of repose,
Where rest and mortals are no longer foes;
Where counsellors are hush'd, and mighty kings
(O happy turn!) no more are wretched things.

His words were daring, and displeas'd his friends;

His conduct they reprove, and he defends;
And now they kindled into warm debate,
And sentiments oppos'd with equal heat;
Fix'd in opinion, both refuse to yield,
And summon all their reason to the field:
So high at length their arguments were wrought,
They reach'd the last extent of human thought:
A pause ensued.—When, lo! heaven interpos'd,
And awfully the long contention clos'd.
Full o'er their heads, with terrible surprise,
A sudden whirlwind blacken'd all the skies:
(They saw, and trembled!) from the darkness broke

A dreadful voice, and thus th' Almighty spoke:

Who gives his tongue a loose so bold and vain,
Censures my conduct, and reproves my reign;
Lifts up his thought against me from the dust,
And tells the world's Creator what is just?
Of late so brave, now list a dauntless eye,
Face my demand, and give it a reply:
Where didst thou dwell at nature's early birth?
Who laid foundations for the spacious earth?
Who on its surface did extend the line,
Its form determine, and its bulk confine?
Who fix'd the corner-stone? What hand, declare,
Hung it on nought, and fasten'd it on air;
When the bright morning stars in concert sung,
When heaven's high arch with loud hosannahs rung,

When shouting sons of God the triumph crown'd,
And the wide concave thunder'd with the sound?
Earth's numerous kingdoms, hast thou view'd them
all?

And can thy span of knowledge grasp the ball?
Who heav'd the mountain, which sublimely stands,
And casts its shadow into distant lands?

Who, stretching forth his sceptre o'er the deep,
Can that wide world in due subjection keep?
I broke the globe, I scoop'd its hollow side,
And did a basin for the floods provide;
I chain'd them with my word; the boiling sea,
Work'd up in tempests, hears my great decree;
"Thus far, thy floating tide shall be convey'd;
"And here, O main, be thy proud billows stay'd."

Hast thou explor'd the secrets of the deep,
Where, shut from use, unnumber'd treasures sleep?
Where, down a thousand fathoms from the day,
Springs the great fountain, mother of the sea?
Those gloomy paths did thy bold foot e'er tread,
Whose worlds of waters rolling o'er thy head?

Hath the cleft centre open'd wide to thee?
Death's inmost chambers didst thou ever see?
E'er knock at his tremendous gate, and wade
To the black portal through th' incumbent shade?
Deep are those shades; but shades still deeper hide
My counsels from the ken of human pride.

Where dwells the light? In what refulgent dome?
And where has darkness made her dismal home?
Thou know'st, no doubt, since thy large heart is fraught

With ripen'd wisdom, through long ages brought;
Since nature was call'd forth when thou was by,
And into being rose beneath thine eye!

Are mists begotten? Who their father knew?
From whom descend the pearly drops of dew?
To bind the stream by night what hand can boast,
Or whiten morning with the hoary frost?
Whose powerful breath, from northern regions blown,

Touches the sea, and turns it into stone?
A sudden desert spreads o'er realms defac'd,
And lays one half of the creation waste?

Thou know'st me not; thy blindness cannot see
How vast a distance parts thy God from thee.
Canst thou in whirlwinds mount aloft? Canst thou
In clouds and darkness wrap thy awful brow;
And, when day triumphs in meridian light,
Put forth thy hand, and shade the world with night?

Who launch'd the clouds in air, and bid them roll
Suspended seas aloft, from pole to pole?
Who can refresh the burning sandy plain,
And quench the summer with a waste of rain?
Who, in rough deserts, far from human toil,
Made rocks bring forth, and desolation smile?
There blooms the rose, where human face ne'er shone,

And spreads its beauties to the sun alone.

To check the shower, who lifts his hand on high,
And shuts the sluices of th' exhausted sky,
When earth no longer mourns her gaping veins,
Her naked mountains, and her russet plains;
But, new in life, a cheerful prospect yields
Of shining rivers, and of verdant fields;
When groves and forests lavish all their bloom,
And earth and heaven are fill'd with rich perfume?

Hast thou e'er scal'd my wintry skies, and seen
Of bail and snows my northern magazine?
These the dread treasures of mine anger are,
My funds of vengeance for the day of war,
When clouds rain death, and storms at my command

Rage through the world, or waste a guilty land.

Who taught the rapid winds to fly so fast,
Or shakes the centre with his eastern blast?
Who from the skies can a whole deluge pour?
Who strikes through nature with the solemn roar
Of dreadful thunder, points it where to fall,
And in fierce lightning wraps the flying ball?
Not he who trembles at the darted fires,
Falls at the sound, and in the flash expires.

Who drew the comet out to such a size,
And pour'd his flaming train o'er half the skies?
Did thy resentment hang him out? Does he
Glare on the nation, and denounce, from thee?

Who on low earth can moderate the rein,
That guides the stars along th' ethereal plain?
Appoint their seasons, and direct their course,
Their lustre brighten, and supply their force? 140
Canst thou the skies benevolence restrain,
And cause the Pleiades to shine in vain;
Or, when Orion sparkles from his sphere,
Thaw the cold season, and unbind the year;
Bid Mazzaroth his destin'd station know,
And teach the bright Arcturus where to glow?
Mine is the night, with all her stars; I pour
Myriads, and myriads I reserve in store.

Dost thou pronounce where day-light shall be born,
And draw the purple curtain of the morn; 150
Awake the sun, and bid him come away,
And glad thy world with his obsequious ray?
Hast thou, enthron'd in flaming glory, driven
Triumphant round the spacious ring of heaven?
That pomp of light, what haud so far displays,
That distant earth lies basking in the blaze?

Who did the soul with her rich powers invest,
And light up reason in the human breast?
To shine, with fresh increase of lustre bright,
When stars and sun are set in endless night? 160
To these my various questions make reply.
Th' Almighty spoke; and, speaking, shook the sky.

What then, Chaldean fire, was thy surprise!
Thus thou, with trembling heart and down-cast
eyes:

"Once and again, which I in groans deplore,
"My tongue has err'd; but shall presume no more.
"My voice is in eternal silence bound,
"And all my soul falls prostrate to the ground."

He ceas'd: when, lo! again th' Almighty spoke;
The same dread voice from the black whirlwind
broke. 170

Can that arm measure with an arm divine?
And canst thou thunder with a voice like mine;
Or in the hollow of thy hand contain
The bulk of waters, the wide-spreading main,
When, mad with tempests, all the billows rise
In all their rage, and dash the distant skies?

Come forth, in beauty's excellence array'd;
And be the grandeur of thy power display'd;
Put on omnipotence, and, frowning, make
The spacious round of the creation shake; 180
Dispatch thy vengeance, bid it overthrow
Triumphant vice, lay lofty tyrants low,
And crumble them to dust. When this is done,
I grant thy safety lodg'd in thee alone;
Of thee thou art, and may'st undaunted stand,
Behind the buckler of thine own right-hand.

Fond man! the vision of a moment made!
Dream of a dream! and shadow of a shade!
What worlds hast thou produc'd, what creatures
fram'd;

What insects cherish'd, that thy God is blam'd? 190
When pain'd with hunger, the wild raven's brood
Loud calls on God, importunate for food:
Who hears their cry, who grants their hoarse request,

And stills the clamour of the craving nest?

Who in the stupid ostrich has subdued
A parent's care, and fond inquietude?

VOL. X.

While far she flies, her scatter'd eggs are found,
Without an owner, on the sandy ground;
Cast out on fortune, they at mercy lie,
And borrow life from an indulgent sky: 200
Adopted by the sun, in blaze of day,
They ripen under his prolific ray.

Unmindful she, that some unhappy tread
May crush her young in their neglected bed.
What time she skims along the field with speed,
She scorns the rider, and pursuing steed.

How rich the peacock! what bright glories run
From plume to plume, and vary in the sun!
He proudly spreads them to the golden ray,
Gives all his colours, and adorns the day; 210
With conscious state the spacious round displays,
And slowly moves amid the waving blaze.

Who taught the hawk to find, in seasons wise,
Perpetual summer, and a change of skies?
When clouds deform the year, she mounts the wind
Shoots to the south, nor fears the storm behind;
The sun returning, she returns again,
Lives in his beams, and leaves ill days to men.

Though strong the hawk, though practis'd well to fly,

An eagle drops her in a lower sky; 220
An eagle, when, deserting human sight,
She seeks the sun in her unweary'd flight:
Did thy command her yellow pinion lift,
So high in air, and set her on the clift,
Where far above thy world she dwells alone,
And proudly makes the strength of rocks her own;
Thence wide o'er nature takes her dread survey,
And with a glance predestinates her prey? [o'er
She feasts her young with blood; and, hovering
Th' unslaughter'd host, enjoys the promis'd gore. 230

Know'st thou how many moons, by me assign'd,
Roll o'er the mountain goat, and forest hind,
While pregnant they a mother's load sustain?
They bend in anguish, and cast forth their pain.
Hale are their young, from human frailties freed;
Walk unsustain'd, and unassisted feed;
They live at once; forsake the dam's warm side;
Take the wide world, with nature for their guide;
Bound o'er the lawn, or seek the distant glade;
And find a home in each delightful shade. 240

Will th' tall reem, which knows no lord but me,
Low at the crib, and ask an alms of thee?
Submit his unworn shoulder to the yoke,
Break the stiff clod, and o'er thy furrow smoke?
Since great his strength, go trust him, void of care;
Lay on his neck the toil of all the year;
Bid him bring home the seasons to thy doors,
And cast his load among thy gather'd stores.

Didst thou from service the wild-afs discharge,
And break his bonds, and bid him live at large, 250
Through the wide waste, his ample mansion, roam,
And lose himself in his unbounded home?
By nature's hand magnificently fed,
His meal is on the range of mountains spread;
As in pure air aloft he bounds along,
He sees in distant smoke the city throng;
Conscious of freedom, scorns the smother'd train,
The threatening driver, and the servile rein.

Survey the warlike horse! didst thou invest
With thunder his robust distended chest? 260

D

No sense of fear his dauntless soul allays ;
 'Tis dreadful to behold his nostrils blaze ;
 To paw the vale he proudly takes delight,
 And triumphs in the fulness of his might ;
 High-raised he snuffs the battle from afar,
 And burns to plunge amid the raging war ;
 And mocks at death, and throws his foam around,
 And in a storm of fury shakes the ground.
 How does his firm, his rising heart, advance 269
 Full on the brandish'd sword, and shaken lance ;
 While his fix'd eye-balls meet the dazzling shield,
 Gaze, and return the lightning of the field !
 He sinks the sense of pain in generous pride,
 Nor feels the shaft that trembles in his side ;
 But neighs to the shrill trumpet's dreadful blast
 Till death ; and when he groans, he groans his

But, fiercer still, the lordly lion stalks, [last.
 Grimly majestic in his lonely walks ;
 When round he glares, all living creatures fly ;
 He clears the desert with his rolling eye. 280
 Say, mortal, does he rouse at thy command,
 And roar to thee, and live upon thy hand ?
 Dost thou for him in forests bend thy bow,
 And to his gloomy den the morsel throw.

Where bent on death lie hid his tawny brood,
 And, couch'd in dreadful ambush, pant for blood ;
 Or, stretch'd on broken limbs, consume the day,
 In darkness wrapt, and slumber o'er their prey ?
 By the pale moon they take their destin'd round,
 And lash their sides, and furious tear the ground.
 Now shrieks and dying groans the desert fill ; 291
 They rage, they rend ; their ravenous jaws distil
 With crimson foam ; and, when the banquet's
 o'er,

They stride away, and paint their steps with gore ;
 In flight alone the shepherd puts his trust,
 And shudders at the talon in the dust.

Mild is my Behemoth, though large his frame ;
 Smooth is his temper, and repress his flame,
 While unprovok'd. This native of the flood
 Lifts his broad foot, and puts ashore for food ; 300
 Earth sinks beneath him, as he moves along
 To seek the herbs, and mingle with the throng.
 See with what strength his harden'd loins are bound,

All over proof and shut against a wound.
 How like a mountain cedar moves his tail !
 Nor can his complicated sinews fail.
 Built high and wide, his solid bones surpass
 The bars of steel ; his ribs are ribs of brass ;
 His port majestic and his armed jaw
 Give the wide forest, and the mountain, law. 310
 The mountains feed him ; there the beasts admire
 The mighty stranger, and in dread retire,
 At length his greatness nearer they survey,
 Graze in his shadow, and his eye obey.
 The fens and marshes are his cool retreat,
 His noontide shelter from the burning heat ;
 Their sedgey bosoms his wide couch are made,
 And groves of willows give him all their shade.

His eye drinks Jordan up, when fir'd with drought,
 He trusts to turn its current down his throat ; 320
 In lessen'd waves it creeps along the plain ;
 He sinks a river, and he thirsts again.

Go to the Nile, and, from its fruitful side,
 Cast forth thy line into the swelling tide :
 With slender hair Leviathan command,
 And stretch his vastness on the loaded strand.
 Will he become thy servant ? Will he own
 Thy lordly nod, and tremble at thy frown ?
 Or with his sport amuse thy leisure day, 329
 And, bound in filk, with thy soft maidens play ?

Shall pompous banquets swell with such a prize ?
 And the bowl journey round his ample size ?
 Or the debating merchants share the prey,
 And various limbs to various marts convey ?
 Through his firm skull what steel its way can win ?
 What forceful engine can subdue his skin ?
 Fly far, and live ; tempt not his matchless might :
 The bravest shrink to cowards in his sight ;
 The rashest dare not rouse him up : Who then
 Shall turn on me, among the sons of men ? 340

Am I a debtor ? Hast thou ever heard
 Whence come the gifts that are on me conferr'd ?
 My lavish fruit a thousand valleys fills,
 And mine the herds that graze a thousand hills :
 Earth, sea, and air, all nature is my own ;
 And stars and sun are dust beneath my throne.
 And dar'st thou with the world's great Father vie,
 Thou, who dost tremble at my creature's eye ?

At full my large Leviathan shall rise, 349
 Boast all his strength, and spread his wondrous size.
 Who, great in arms, e'er stripp'd his shining mail,
 Or crown'd his triumph with a single scale !
 Whose heart sustains him to draw near ? Behold,
 Destruction yawns ; his spacious jaws unfold,
 And, marshall'd round the wide expanse, disclose
 Teeth edg'd with death, and crowding rows on rows :

What hideous fangs on either side arise !
 And what a deep abyss between them lies !
 Mete with thy lance, and with thy plumbet sound,
 The one how long, the other how profound. 360
 His bulk is charg'd with such a furious soul,
 That clouds of smoke from his spread nostrils roll,
 As from a furnace ; and when rous'd his ire,
 Fate issues from his jaws in streams of fire.
 The rage of tempests, and the roar of seas,
 Thy terror, this thy great superior please ;
 Strength on his ample shoulder sits in state ;
 His well-join'd limbs are dreadfully complete ;
 His flakes of solid flesh are slow to part ;
 As steel his nerves, as adamant his heart. 370

When, late awak'd, he rears him from the floods,
 And stretching forth his stature to the clouds,
 Writhes in the sun aloft his scaly height,
 And strikes the distant hills with transient light,
 Far round are fatal damps of terror spread,
 The mighty fear, nor blush to own their dread.

Large is his front ; and when his burnish'd eyes
 Lift their broad lids, the morning seems to rise.

In vain may death in various shapes invade,
 The swift-wing'd arrow, the descending blade ;
 His naked breast their impotence defies ; 381
 The dart rebounds, the brittle faulchion flies.
 Shut in himself, the war without he hears,
 Safe in the tempest of their rattling spears ;
 The cumber'd strand their wasted volleys strow ;
 His sport, the rage and labour of the foe.

His pastimes like a cauldron boil the flood,
And blacken ocean with the rising mud;
The billows feel him, as he works his way; 389
His hoary footsteps shine along the sea; [green,
The foam high-wrought with white divides the
And distant sailors point where death has been.

His like earth bears not on her spacious face;
Alone in nature stands his dauntless race,
For utter ignorance of fear renown'd,
In wrath he rolls his baleful eye around:
Makes every swell'n, disdainful heart, subside,
And holds dominion o'er the sons of pride.

Then the Chaldean eas'd his labouring breast,
With full conviction of his crime oppress'd. 400

"Thou canst accomplish all things, Lord of Might:

"And every thought is naked to thy sight.
"But, oh! thy ways are wonderful, and lie
"Beyond the deepest reach of mortal eye.
"Oft have I heard of thine almighty power;
"But never saw thee till this dreadful hour.
"O'erwhelm'd with shame, the Lord of Life I see,
"Abhor myself, and give my soul to thee.
"Nor shall my weakness tempt thine anger more:
"Man is not made to question, but adore." 410

NOTES ON THE PARAPHRASE.

BOOK of Job.] It is disputed amongst the critics who was the author of the Book of Job; some give it to Moses, some to others. As I was engaged in this little performance, some arguments occurred to me which favour the former of those opinions; and because I do not find them mentioned by any one else, I have flung them into the following notes, where little else is to be expected.

Ver. 1.] The Almighty's speech, chapter xxxviii, &c. which is what I paraphrase in this little work, is by much the finest part of the noblest and most ancient poem in the world. Bishop Patrick says, its grandeur is as much above all other poetry, as thunder is louder than a whisper. In order to set this distinguish'd part of the poem in a fuller light, and give the reader a clearer conception of it, I have abridged the preceding and subsequent parts of the poem, and joined them to it; so that this piece is a sort of epitome of the whole Book of Job.

I use the word paraphrase, because I want another which might better answer to the uncommon liberties I have taken. I have omitted, added, and transposed. The mountain, the comet, the sun, and other parts, are entirely added: those upon the peacock, the lion, &c. are much enlarged; and I have thrown the whole into a method more suitable to our notions of regularity. The judicious, if they compare this piece with the original, will, I flatter myself, find the reasons for the great liberties I have indulged myself in through the whole.

Longinus has a chapter on interrogations, which shows that they contribute much to the sublime. This speech of the Almighty is made up of them: Interrogations seems, indeed, the proper style of majesty incensed. It differs from other manner of reproof, as bidding a person execute himself, does from a common execution; for he that asks the guilty a proper question, makes him, in effect, pass sentence on himself.

Ver. 41.] The Book of Job is well known to be dramatic, and like the tragedies of old Greece, is fiction built on truth. Probably this most noble part of it, the Almighty speaking out of the whirlwind (so suitable to the after-practice of the Greek stage, when there happened "dignus vindice nodus"), is fictitious; but is fiction more agreeable to the time in which Job lived, than to any since. Frequent before the Law were the appearances of the Almighty after this manner, Exod. chap. xix. Ezek. chap. i. &c. Hence is he said to "dwell in thick darkness: and have his way in the "whirlwind."

Ver. 69.] There is a very great air in all that precedes, but this is signally sublime. We are struck with admiration to see the vast and ungovernable ocean receiving commands, and punctually obeying them; to find it like a managed horse, raging, tossing, and foaming, but by the rule and direction of its master. This passage yields in sublimity to that of "Let there be light," &c. so much only, as the absolute government of nature yields to the creation of it.

The like spirit in these two passages is no bad concurrent argument, that Moses is author of the Book of Job.

Ver. 191.] Another argument that Moses was the author is, that most of the creatures here are Egyptian. The reason given why the raven is particularly mentioned as an object of the care of Providence is, because by her clamorous and importunate voice, she particularly seems always calling upon it; thence καρῶσα, ἡ καρῶς, Ælian, l. ii. c. 48, is "to ask earnestly." And since there were ravens on the bank of the Nile more clamorous than the rest of that species, those probably are meant in that place.

Ver. 195.] There are many instances of this bird's stupidity: let two suffice. First, it covers its head in the reeds, and thinks itself all out of sight:

"Stat lumine clauso

"Ridendum revoluta caput, creditque latere

"Quæ non ipsa videt." CLAUD.

Secondly, They that go in pursuit of them, draw the skin of an ostrich's neck on one hand, which proves a sufficient lure to take them with the other.

They have so little brain, that Heliogabalus had six hundred heads for his supper.

Here we may observe, that our judicious, as well as sublime author, just touches the great points of distinction in each creature, and then hastens to another. A description is exact when you cannot add, but what is common to another thing; nor withdraw, but something peculiarly belonging to the thing described. A likeness is lost in too much description, as a meaning often in too much illustration.

Ver. 205.] Here is marked another peculiar quality of this creature; which neither flies nor runs directly, but has a motion composed of both, and using its wings as sails, makes great speed.

"Vasta velut Libyæ venantium vocibus ales
 "Cum premitur, calidas cursu transmittit arenas,
 "Inque modum veli sinuatis flamine pennis
 "Pulverulenta volat." CLAUD. in Eutr.

Ver. 206.] Xenophon says, Cyrus had horses that could overtake the goat and the wild ass; but none that could reach this creature. A thousand golden ducats, or a hundred camels, was the stated price of a horse that could equal their speed.

Ver. 207.] Though this bird is but just mentioned in my author, I could not forbear going a little farther, and spreading those beautiful plumes (which are there shut up) in half a dozen lines. The circumstance I have marked of his opening his plumes to the sun, is true: "Expandit colores ad-
 "verso maxime sole, quia sic fulgentius radiant."

PLIN. l. x. c. 20.

Ver. 219.] Thuanus (de Re Accip.) mentions a hawk that flew from Paris to London in a night.

And the Egyptians, in regard to its swiftness, made it their symbol for the wind; for which reason we may suppose the hawk, as well as the crow above-mentioned, to have been a bird of note in Egypt.

Ver. 227.] The eagle is said to be of so acute a sight, that when she is so high in air that man cannot see her, she can discern the smallest fish under water. My author accurately understood the nature of the creature he describes, and seems to have been a naturalist as well as a poet, which the next note will confirm.

Ver. 231.] The meaning of this question is, Knowest thou the time and circumstances of their bringing forth? For to know the time only was easy, and had nothing extraordinary in it; but the circumstances had something peculiarly expressive of God's providence, which makes the question proper in this place. Pliny observes, that the hind with young is by instinct directed to a certain herb called fœfelis, which facilitates the birth. Thunder also (which looks like the more immediate hand of Providence) has the same effect. Pl. xxix. In so early an age to observe these things, may style our author a naturalist.

Ver. 259.] The description of the horse is the most celebrated of any in the poem. There is an excellent critic on it in the Guardian. I shall therefore only observe, that in this description, as in other parts of this speech, our vulgar translation has much more spirit than the Septuagint; it always takes the original in the most poetic and exalted sense, so that most commentators, even on the Hebrew itself, fall beneath it.

Ver. 289.] Pursuing their prey by night, is true of most wild beasts, particularly the lion. Pl. cvi. 20. The Arabians have one among their 500 names for the lion, which signifies "the hunter by moon-shine."

Ver. 322.]

"Cephefi glaciale caput quo fuetos anhelam

"Ferre sitim Python, amnemque avertere pon-
 "to." STAT. Theb. v. 349.

"Qui spiris tegeret montes, hauriret hiatu

"Flumina," &c. CLAUD. Pref. in Ruf.

Let not then this hyperbole seem too much for an eastern poet, though some commentators of name strain hard in this place for a new construction, through fear of it.

Ver. 323.] The taking of the crocodile is most difficult. Diodorus says, they are not to be taken but by iron nets. When Augustus conquered Egypt, he struck a medal, the impress of which was a crocodile chained to a palm-tree, with this inscription, "Nemo antea religavit."

Ver. 339.] This alludes to a custom of this creature, which is, when fated with fish, to come ashore and sleep among the reeds.

Ver. 353.] The crocodile's mouth is exceedingly wide. When he gapes, says Pliny, "sit totum os." Martial says to his old woman,

"Cum comparata rictibus tuis ora

"Niliacus habet crocodilus angusta."

so that the expression here is barely just.

Ver. 364.] This too is nearer truth than that at first view may be imagined. The crocodile, say the naturalists, lying long under water, and being there forced to hold its breath, when it emerges, the breath long repressed is hot, and bursts out so violently, that it resembles fire and smoke. The horse suppresses not his breath by any means so long, neither is he so fierce and animated; yet the most correct of poets venture to use the same metaphor concerning him:

"Collectumque premens volvit sub naribus ig-
 "nem."

By this and the foregoing note, I would caution against a false opinion of the eastern boldness, from passages in them ill understood.

Ver. 377.] "His eyes are like the eye-lids of the morning." I think this gives us as great an image of the thing it would express, as can enter the thought of man. It is not improbable that the Egyptians stole their hieroglyphic for the morning, which is the crocodile's eye, from this passage, though no commentator I have seen mentions it. It is easy to conceive how the Egyptians should be both readers and admirers of the writings of Moses, whom I suppose the author of this poem.

I have observed already, that three or four of the creatures here described are Egyptian; the two last are notoriously so; they are the river-horse and the crocodile, those celebrated inhabitants of the Nile; and on these two it is that our author chiefly dwells. It would have been expected from an author more remote from that river than Moses, in a catalogue of creatures produced to magnify their Creator, to have dwelt on the two largest works of his hand, viz. the elephant and the whale. This is so natural an expectation, that some commentators have rendered behemoth and leviathan, the elephant and the whale, though the descriptions in our author will not admit of it: but Moses being, as we may well suppose, under an immediate terror of the hippopotamus and crocodile, from their daily mischiefs and ravages around him; it is very accountable why he should permit them to take place.

ON DR. YOUNG'S TRANSLATION OF PART OF JOB.

By Dr. Cobden.

THE poem, which originally great,
Had long sustain'd poor Job's unhappy fate,

Fallen from its grandeur, clad in mean array,
And in the dust of prose inglorious lay;
Like him now shines, with former greatness blest,
And in its native majesty confess'd.

MICELLANIES.

ON MICHAEL ANGELO'S FAMOUS PIECE OF THE CRUCIFIXION.

*Who is said to have stabbed a Person that he might draw it more naturally .

WHILST his Redeemer on his canvas dies,
Stabb'd at his feet his brother weltering lies:
The daring artist cruelly serene,
Views the pale cheek and the distorted mien;
He drains off life by drops, and deaf to cries,
Examines every spirit as it flies:
He studies torment, dives in mortal woe,
To rouse up every pang repeats his blow;
Each rising agony, each dreadful grace,
Yet warm transplanting to his Saviour's face.
Oh glorious theft! oh nobly wicked draught!
With its full charge of death each feature fraught:
Such wondrous force the magic colours boast,
From his own skill he starts in horror lost.

TO MR. ADDISON,

ON THE TRAGEDY OF CATO.

WHAT do we see is Cato then become
A greater name in Britain than in Rome?
Does mankind now admire his virtues more,
Though Lucan, Horace, Virgil wrote before?
How will posterity this truth explain?
"Cato begins to live in Anna's reign."
The world's great chiefs, in council or in arms,
Rise in your lines with more exalted charms;
Illustrious deeds in distant nations wrought,
And virtues by departed heroes taught,
Raise in your soul a pure immortal flame,
Adorn your life, and consecrate your fame;
To your renown all ages you subdue,
And Cæsar fought, and Cato bled for you.

HISTORICAL EPILOGUE TO THE BROTHERS.

A TRAGEDY.

AN Epilogue, through custom, is your right,
But ne'er perhaps was needful till this night:

* Though the report was propagated without the least truth, it may be sufficient ground to justify a poetical fancy's enlarging on it.

To night the virtuous falls, the guilty flies,
Guilt's dreadful close our narrow scene denies.
In history's authentic record read
What ample vengeance glut's Demetrius' shade;
Vengeance so great, that when his tale is told,
With pity some ev'n Perseus may behold.

Perseus surviv'd indeed, and fill'd the throne,
But ceaseless cares in conquest made him groan:
Nor reign'd he long; from Rome swift thunder flew,

And headlong from his throne the tyrant threw:
Thrown headlong down, by Rome in triumph led,
For this night's deed his perjur'd bosom bled:
His brother's ghost each moment made him start,
And all his father's anguish rent his heart, [hung,

When, robb'd in black, his children round him
And their rais'd arms in early sorrow wrung;
The younger smil'd, unconscious of their woe;
At which thy tears, O Rome! began to flow;
So sad the scene! what then must Perseus feel,
To see Jove's race attend the victor's wheel:
To see the slaves of his worst foes increase,
From such a source!—An emperor's embrace!
He sicken'd soon to death; and, what is worse,
He well deserv'd and felt, the coward's curse;
Unpity'd, scorn'd, insulted his last hour,
Far, far from home, and in a vassal's power:
His pale cheek rested on his shameful chain,
No friend to mourn, no flatterer to feign;
No suit retards, no comfort soothes his doom,
And not one tear bedews a monarch's tomb.
Nor ends it thus—dire vengeance to complete,
His ancient empire falling shares his fate:
His throne forgot! his weeping country chain'd!
And nations ask—where Alexander reign'd.
As public woes a prince's crime pursue,
So public blessings are his virtue's due.
Shout, Britons, shout—auspicious fortune blest!
And cry, Long live—Our title to success!

EPITAPH

ON LORD AUBREY BEAUCLERK *

In Westminster-Abbey, 1740.

WHILST Britain boasts her empire o'er the deep,
This marble shall compel the brave to weep:

* Lord Aubrey Beauclerk was the eight son of the Duke of St. Alban's, who was one of the sons of King

As men, as Britons, and as soldiers, mourn;
 'Tis dauntless, loyal, virtuous Beauclerk's urn.
 Sweet were his manners, as his soul was great,
 And ripe his worth, though immature his fate;
 Each tender grace that joy and love inspires,
 Living, he mingled with his martial fires:
 Dying, he bid Britannia's thunders roar;
 And Spain still felt him, when he breath'd no more.

EPITAPH

AT WELWYN, HERTFORDSHIRE.

If fond of what is rare, attend!

Here lies an honest man,

Of perfect piety,

Of lamblike patience,

My friend, James Barker;

To whom I pay this mean memorial,

For what deserves the greatest.

An example

Which shone through all the clouds of fortune,

Industrious in low estate,

The lesson and reproach of those above him.

To lay this little stone

Is my ambition;

While others rear

The polish'd marbles of the great!

Vain pomp!

A turf o'er virtue charms us more.

A LETTER TO MR. TICKELL.

Occasioned by the Death of the Right Honourable Joseph Addison, Esq. 1719.

" — Tu nunc eris alter ab illo." VIRG.

O LONG with me in Oxford groves confin'd,
 In social arts and sacred friendship join'd;
 Fair Isis' sorrow, and fair Isis' boast,
 Lost from her side, but fortunately lost;
 Thy wonted aid, my dear companion! bring,
 And teach me thy departed friend to sing:
 A darling theme! once powerful to inspire,
 And now to melt, the muses' mournful choir:
 Now, and now first, we freely dare commend
 His modest worth, nor shall our praise offend.

Early he bloom'd amid the learned train,
 And ravish'd Isis listen'd to his strain.
 See, see, she cry'd, old Maro's muse appears,
 Wak'd from her slumber of two thousand years:

Charles the Second. He was born in the year 1711; and, being regularly bred to the sea service, in 1731 he was appointed to the command of his majesty's ship the Ludlow Castle; and he commanded the Prince Frederick at the attack of the harbour of Carthagena, March 24, 1741. This young nobleman was one of the most promising commanders in the king's service. When on the desperate attack of the castle of Bocca Obica, at the entrance of the said harbour, he lost his life, both his legs being first shot off. The prose part of the Inscription on his monument, was the production of Mrs. Mary Jones of Oxford; who also wrote a poem on his death, printed in her Miscellanies, 8vo, 1752.

Her finish'd charms to Addison she brings,
 Thinks in his thought, and in his numbers sings
 All read transported his pure classic page;
 Read, and forget their climate and their age.

The state, when now his rising fame was known,
 Th' unrivall'd genius challeng'd for her own,
 Nor would that one, for scenes of action strong,
 Should let a life evaporate in song.

As health and strength the brightest charms dispense,

Wit is the blossom of the soundest sense:

Yet few, how few, with lofty thoughts inspir'd,
 With quickness pointed, and with rapture fir'd,
 In conscious pride their own importance find,
 Blind to themselves, as the hard world is blind!
 Wit they esteem a gay but worthless power,
 The slight amusement of a leisure hour;
 Unmindful that, conceal'd from vulgar eyes,
 Majestic wisdom wears the bright disguise.

Poor Dido fondled thus, with idle joy,
 Dread Cupid, lurking in the Trojan boy;
 Lightly she toy'd and trifled with his charms,
 And knew not that a god was in her arms.

Who greatest excellence of thought could boast,
 In action, too, have been distinguish'd most:
 This Sommers knew, and Addison sent forth
 From the malignant regions of the north,
 To be matur'd in more indulgent skies,
 Where all the vigour of the soul can rise;
 Through warmer veins where sprightlier spirits
 run,

And sense enliven'd sparkles in the sun,
 With secret pain the prudent patriot gave,
 The hopes of Britain to the rolling wave,
 Anxious, the charge to all the stars resign'd,
 And plac'd a confidence in sea and wind.

Aufonia soon receiv'd her wondering guest,
 And equal wonder in her turn confess'd,
 To see her fervours rivall'd by the pole,
 Her lustre beaming from a northern soul:
 In like surprise was her Æneas lost,
 To find his picture grace a foreign coast.

Now the wide field of Europe he surveys,
 Compares her kings, her thrones and empires weighs,

In ripen'd judgment and consummate thought;
 Great work! by Nassau's favour cheaply bought,

He now returns to Britain a support,
 Wise in her senate, graceful in her court;
 And, when the public welfare would permit,
 The source of learning, and the soul of wit.

O Warwick! (whom the muse is fond to name,
 And kindles, conscious of her future theme)
 O Warwick! by divine contagion bright!
 How early didst thou catch his radiant light!
 By him inspir'd, how shine before thy time,
 And leave thy years, and leap into thy prime!

On some warm bank, thus, fortunately born,
 A rose-bud opens to a summer's morn,
 Full-blown ere noon her fragrant pride displays,
 And shows th' abundance of her purple rays.

Wit, as her bays, was once a barren tree;
 We now, surpris'd, her fruitful branches see;
 Or, orange-like, till his auspicious time
 It grew indeed, but shiver'd in our clime;

He first the plant to richer gardens led,
And fix'd, indulgent, in a warmer bed:
The nation, pleas'd, enjoys the rich produce,
And gathers from her ornament her use.

When loose from public cares the grove he sought,
And fill'd the leisure interval with thought,
The various labours of his easy page,
A chance amusement, polish'd half an age.
Beyond this truth old bards could scarce invent,
Who durst to frame a world by accident.

What he has sung, how early, and how well,
The Thames shall boast, and Roman Tiber tell.
A glory more sublime remains in store,
Since such his talents, that he sung no more.

No fuller proof of power th' Almighty gave,
Making the sea, than curbing her proud wave.

Nought can the genius of his works transcend,
But their fair purpose and important end;
To rouse the war for injur'd Europe's laws,
To steel the patriot in great Brunswick's cause;
With virtue's charms to kindle sacred love,
Or paint th' eternal bowers of bliss above.
Where had'st thou room, great Author! where to roll

The mighty theme of an immortal soul? [brought Through paths unknown, unbeaten, whence were
Thy proofs so strong for immaterial thought?

One let me join, all other may excel,

"How could a mortal essence think so well?"

But why so large in the great writer's praise?

More lofty subjects should my numbers raise;

In him (illustrious rivalry) contend

The statesman, patriot, Christian, and the friend!

His glory such, it borders on disgrace

To say he sung the best of human race.

In joy once join'd, in sorrow now for years,

Partner in grief, and brother of my tears,

Tickell! accept this verse, thy mournful due;

Thou farther shalt the sacred theme pursue;

And, as thy strain describes the matchless man,

Thy life shall second what thy muse began.

Though sweet the numbers, though a fire divine

Dart through the whole, and burn in every line,

Who strives not for that excellence he draws,

Is stain'd by fame, and suffers from applause.

But haste to thy illustrious task; prepare

The noble work well trusted to thy care,

* The gift bequeath'd by Addison's command,

To Craggs made sacred by his dying hand.

Collect the labours, join the various rays,

The scatter'd light in one united blaze;

Then bear to him so true, so truly lov'd,

In life distinguish'd, and in death approv'd,

Th' immortal legacy. He hangs a-while

In generous anguish o'er the glorious pile;

With anxious pleasure the known page reviews,

And the dear pledge with falling tears bedews.

What though thy tears, pour'd o'er thy godlike friend,

Thy other cares for Britain's weal suspend?

Think not, O patriot! while thy eyes o'erflow,

Those cares suspended for a private woe;

Thy love to him is to thy country shown;

He mourns for her, who mourns for Addison.

REFLECTIONS

ON THE PUBLIC SITUATION OF THE KINGDOM.

ADDRESSED TO THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1745.

HOLLES! immortal in far more than fame!
Be thou illustrious in far more than power.
Great things are small when greater rise to view.
Though station'd high, and press'd with public cares,

Disdain not to peruse my serious song,
Which peradventure may push by the world:

Of a few moments rob Britannia's weal,

And leave Europa's counsels less mature!

For thou art noble, and the theme is great.

Nor shall or Europe or Britannia blame

Thine absent ear, but gain by the delay.

Long vers'd in senates and in cabinets,

States' intricate demands and high debates!

As thou of use to those, so this to thee;

And in a point that empire far outweighs,

That far outweighs all Europe's thrones in one.

Let greatness prove its title to be great.

'Tis power's supreme prerogative to stamp

On other's minds an image of its own.

Bend the strong influence of high place, to stem

The stream that sweeps away the country's weal;

The Stygian stream, the torrent of our guilt.

Far as thou may'st give life to virtue's cause;

D iij

Let not the ties of personal regard
Betray the nation's trust to feeble hands:
Let not fomented flames of private pique
Prey on the vitals of the public good:
Let not our streets with blasphemies resound,
Nor lewdness whisper where the laws can reach:
Let not best laws, the wisdom of our sires,
Turn satires on their sunk degenerate sons,
The bastards of their blood! and serve no point
But, with more emphasis to call them fools:
Let not our rank enormities unhinge
Britannia's welfare from divine support.

Such deeds the minister, the prince, adorn;
No power is shown but in such deeds as these:
All, all is impotence but acting right; [power?
And where's the statesman but would show his
To prince and people thou, of equal zeal!
Be it henceforward but thy second care
To grace thy country, and support the throne:
Though this supported, that adorn'd so well,
A throne superior our first homage claims;
To Caesar's Caesar our first tribute due:
A tribute which, unpaid, makes specious wrong
And splendid sacrilege of all beside:
Illustrious followers; we must first be just;
And what so just as awe for the Supreme?
Less fear we rugged ruffians of the north,
Than virtue's well-clad rebels nearer home;
Less Loyola's disguis'd, all aping sons,
Than traitors lurking in our appetites;
Less all the legions Seine and Tagus send,
Than unrein'd passions rushing on our peace:
Yon savage mountaineers are tame to these.
Against those rioters send forth the laws,
And break to reason's yoke their wild careers.

Prudence for all things points the proper hour,
Though some seem more importunate and great.
Though Britain's generous views and interests spread

Beyond the narrow circle of her shores,
And their grand entries make on distant lands;
Though Britain's genius the wide wave bestrides,
And, like a vast Colossus, towering stands
With one foot planted on the continent;
Yet be not wholly wrapp'd in public cares,
Though such high cares should call as call'd of late;
The cause of kings and emperors adjourn,
And Europe's little balance drop a while;
For greater drop it: ponder and adjust
The rival interests and contending claims
Of life and death, of now and of for ever;
Sublimest theme; and needful as sublime.
Thus great Eliza's oracles renown'd,
Thus Wallingham and Raleigh (Britain's boasts!)
Thus every statesman thought that ever—dy'd.
There's inspiration in a fable hour,
And death's approach makes politicians wise.

When, thunderstruck, that eagle Wolfey fell;
When royal favour, as an ebbing sea,
Like a leviathan, his grandeur left,
His grasping grandeur! naked on the strand,
Naked of human, doubtful of divine,
Assistance; no more wallowing in his wealth,
Spouting proud foams of insolence no more,
On what, then, smote his heart, uncardinal'd,

And sunk beneath the level of a man?
On the grand article, the sum of things!
The point of the first magnitude! that point
Tubes mounted in a court, but rarely reach;
Some painted cloud still intercepts their sight.
First right to judge; then choose; then persevere,
Stedfast, as if a crown or mistress call'd.—
These, these are politics will stand the test,
When finer politics their masters sting,
And statesmen fain would shrink to common men.
These, these are politics will answer now,
(When common men would fain to statesmen swell)
Beyond a Machiavel's or Tencin's scheme,
All safety rests on honest counsels: these Immortalize the statesman, bless the state,
Make the prince triumph, and the people smile;
In peace rever'd, or terrible in arms,
Close-leagu'd with an invincible ally,
Which honest counsels never fail to fix
In favour of an unabandon'd land;
A land—that starts at such a land as this,
A parliament, so principled, will sink
All ancient schools of empire in disgrace,
And Britain's glory, rising from the dead,
Will fill the world, loud fame's superior song.

Britain!—that word pronounc'd is an alarm;
It warms the blood, though frozen in our veins;
Awakes the soul, and sends her to the field,
Enamour'd of the glorious face of death.
Britain!—there's noble magic in the sound.
O what illustrious images arise!
Embattled, round me, blaze the pomps of war!
By sea, by land, at home, in foreign climes,
What full-blown laurels on our father's brows!
Ye radiant trophies! and imperial spoils!
Ye scenes!—astonishing to modern sight!

Let me, at least, enjoy you in a dream.
Why vanish? Stay, ye godlike strangers! stay.
Strangers!—I wrong my countrymen: they wake;
High beats the pulse: the noble pulse of war
Beats to that ancient measure, that grand march
Which then prevail'd, when Britain highest soar'd,
And every battle paid for heroes slain.
No more our great forefathers stain our cheeks
With blushes; their renown our shame no more.
In military garb, and sudden arms,
Up starts Old Britain; crossiers are laid by;
Trade wields the sword, and agriculture leaves
Her half-turn'd furrow: other harvests fire
A nobler avarice, avarice of renown!
And laurels are the growth of every field.
In distant courts is our commotion felt;
And less like gods sit monarchs on their thrones.
What arm can want or sinews or success,
Which, lifted from an honest heart, descends,
With all the weight of British wrath, to cleave
The papal mitre, or the Gallic chain,
At every stroke, and save a sinking land?

Or death or victory must be resolv'd;
To dream of mercy, O how tame! how mad!
Where, o'er black deeds the crucifix display'd
Fools think heaven purchas'd by the blood they shed;
By giving, not supporting, pains and death!
Nor simple death! where they the greatest saints

Who most subdue all tenderness of heart;
Students in torture! where, in zeal to him,
Whose darling title is The Prince of Peace,
The best turn ruthless butchers for our sakes;
To save us in a world they recommend,
And yet forbear, themselves with earth content:
What modesty!--such virtues Rome adorn!
And chiefly those who Rome's first honours wear, Whose name from Jesus, and whose hearts from hell!

And shall a Pope-bred princeling crawl ashore,
Replete with venom, guiltless of a sting, [scrap'd
And whistle cut-throats, with those swords that
Their barren rocks for wretched sustenance,
To cut his passage to the British throne?
One that has suck'd in malice with his milk,
Malice to Britain, liberty, and truth?
Less savage was his brother-robber's nurse,
The howling nurse of plundering Romulus,
Ere yet far worse than Pagan harbour'd there.

Hail to the brave! be Britain Britain still:
Britain! high favour'd of indulgent heaven!
Nature's anointed empress of the deep!
The nurse of merchants, who can purchase crowns!
Supreme in commerce! that exuberant source
Of wealth, the nerve of war; of wealth, the blood,
The circling current in a nation's veins,
To set high bloom on the fair face of peace!
This once so celebrated seat of power,
From which escap'd the mighty Cæsar triumph'd!
Of Gallic lilies this eternal blast!
This terror of armadas! this true bolt
Ethereal-temper'd, to repress the vain
Salmonean thunders from the papal chair! [awe!
This small isle wide-realm'd monarchs eye with Which says to their ambition's foaming waves,
"Thus far, not farther!"--Let her hold, in life,
Nought dear disjoin'd from freedom and renown;
Renown, our ancestors' great legacy,
To be transmitted to their latest sons.
By thoughts inglorious, and un-British deeds,
Their cancell'd will is impiously profan'd,
Inhumanly disturb'd their sacred dust.

Their sacred dust with recent laurels crown,
By your own valour won. This sacred isle,
Cut from the continent, that world of slaves;
This temple built by heaven's peculiar care,
In a recess from the contagious world,
With ocean pour'd around it for its guard;
And dedicated, long, to liberty, [life!
That health, that strength, that bloom, of civil
This temple of still more divine; of faith
Sifted from errors, purify'd by flames,
Like gold, to take anew truth's heavenly stamp,
And (rising both in lustre and in weight)
With her bless'd master's unmain'd image shine;
Why should she longer droop? why longer act
As an accomplice with the plots of Rome?
Why longer lend an edge to Bourbon's sword,
And give him leave, among his dastard troops,
To muster that strong succour, Albion's crimes?
Send his self-impotent ambition aid,
And crown the conquest of her fiercest foes?
Where are her foes most fatal? Blushing truth,
In her friends' vices,"--with a sigh replies.

Empire on virtue's rock unshaken stands;
Flux as the billows, when in vice dissolv'd.
If heaven reclaims us by the scourge of war,
What thanks are due to Paris and Madrid?
Would they a revolution?--Aid their aim,
But be the revolution--in our hearts! [bark,

Would'st thou (whose hand is at the helm) the
The shaken bark of Britain, should out-ride
The present blast, and every future storm?
Give it that balast which alone has weight
With him whom wind, and waves, and war, obey.
Persist. Are others subtle? thou be wise:
Above the Florentine's court-science raise;
Stand forth a patriot of the moral world;
The pattern, and the patron, of the just:
Thus strengthen Britain's military strength;
Give its own terror to the sword she draws.
Ask you, "What mean I?"--The most obvious
truth;

Armies and fleets alone ne'er won the day.
When our proud arms are once disarm'd, disarm'd
Of aid from him by whom the mighty fall;
Of aid from him by whom the feeble stand;
Who takes away the keenest edge of battle,
Or gives the sword commission to destroy;
Who blasts, or bids the martial laurel bloom--
Emasculated, then, most manly might;
Or, though the might remains, it nought avails:
Then wither'd weakness foils the sinewy arm
Of man's meridian and high-hearted power:
Our naval thunders, and our tented fields
With travell'd banners fanning southern climes,
What do they? This; and more what can they do?
When heap'd the measure of a kingdom's crimes,
The prince most dauntless, the first plume of war,
By such bold inroads into foreign lands,
Such elongation of our armaments,
But stretches out the guilty nation's neck,
While heaven commands her executioner,
Some less abandon'd nation, to discharge
Her full-ripe vengeance in a final blow,
And tell the world, "Not strong is human strength;
"And that the proudest empire holds of heaven."

O Britain! often rescued, often crown'd,
Beyond thy merit and most sanguine hopes,
With all that's great in war, or sweet in peace!
Know from what source thy signal blessings flow,
Though bless'd with spirits ardent in the field,
Though cover'd various oceans with thy fleets,
Though fenc'd with rocks, and moated by the main,
Thy trust repose in a far stronger guard;
In him, who thee, though naked, could defend;
Though weak, could strengthen; ruin'd, could restore.

How oft, to tell what arm defends thine isle,
To guard her welfare, and yet check her pride,
Have the winds snatch'd the victory from war?
Or, rather, won the day, when war despair'd?
How oft has providential succour aw'd,
Aw'd while it bless'd us, conscious of our guilt;
Struck dead all confidence in human aid,
And, while we triumph'd, made us tremble too!
Well may we tremble now; what manners reign?

But wherefore ask we, when a true reply [events
Would shock too much? Kind heaven! avert
Whose fatal nature might reply too plain!
Heaven's half-bar'd arm of vengeance has been wav'd

In northern skies, and pointed to the south.
Vengeance delay'd but gathers and ferments;
More formidably blackens in the wind;
Brews deeper draughts of unrelenting wrath,
And higher charges the suspended storm.

"That public vice portends a public fall"---

Is this conjecture of adventurous thought!
Or pious coward's pulpit-cushion'd dream;
Far from it. This is certain; this is fate.
What says experience, in her awful chair
Of ages, her authentic annals spread
Around her? What says reason eagle-eyed?
Nay, what says common sense, with common care
Weighing events, and causes, in her scale?
All give one verdict, one decision sign;
And this the sentence Delphos could not mend:

"Whatever secondary props may rise

"From politics, to build the public peace,

"The basis is the manners of the land.

"When rotten these, the politician's wiles

"But struggle with destruction, as a child

"With giants huge, or giants with a Jove.

"The statesman's arts to conjure up a peace,

"Or military phantoms void of force,

"But scare away the vultures for an hour;

"The scent cadaverous (for, oh! how rank

"The stench of profligates!) soon lures them
"back;

"On the proud flutter of a Gallic wing

"Soon they return; soon make their full descent;

"Soon glut their rage, and riot in our ruin;

"Their idols grac'd and gorgeous with our spoils,

"Of universal empire sure presage!

"Till now repell'd by seas of British blood."

And whence the manners of the multitude?

The colours of their manners, black or fair,

Falls from above; from the complexion falls

Of state Othellos, or white men in power:

And from the greater height example falls,

Greater the weight, and deeper its impress

In ranks inferior, passive to the stroke:

From the court-mint, of hearts the current coin,

The pupil presses, but the pattern drives.

What bonds then, bonds how manifold, and strong

To duty, double duty, are the great!

And are there Samsons that can burst them all?

Yes; and great minds that stand in need of none,

Whose pulse beats virtues, and whose generous blood

Aids mental motives to push on renown,

In emulation of their glorious fires,

From whom rolls down the consecrated stream.

Some sow good seeds in the glad people's hearts,

Some cursed tares, like Satan in the text:

This makes a foe most fatal to the state;

A foe who (like a wizard in his cell)

In his dark cabinet of crooked schemes,

Resembling Cuma's gloomy grot, the forge

Of boasted oracles, and real lies,

(Aided, perhaps, by second-sighted Scots,

French Magi, relics riding post from Rome;
A Gothic hero * rising from the dead,
And changing for spruce plaid his dirty shroud,
With succour suitable from lower still)

A foe who, these concurring to the charm,
Excites those storms that shall o'erturn the state,
Rend up her ancient honours by the root,
And lay the boast of ages, the rever'd
Of nations, the dear-bought with sumless wealth
And blood illustrious, (spite of her La Hagues,
Her Crefleys, and her Blenheims) in the dust.

How must this strike a horror through the
breast,

Through every generous breast where honour reigns,

Through every breast where honour claims a share!

Yes, and through every breast of honour void!

This thought might animate the dregs of men;

Ferment them into spirit; give them fire

To fight the cause, the black opprobrious cause,

Foul core of all! corruption at our hearts.

What wreck of empire has the stream of time

Swept, with her vices, from the mountain height

Of grandeur, deify'd by half mankind,

To dark oblivion's melancholy lake,

Or flagrant infamy's eternal brand!

Those names, at which surrounding nations shook,

Those names ador'd, a nuisance! or forget!

Nor this the caprice of a doubtful dye,

But nature's course; no single chance against it.

For know, my Lord! 'tis writ in adamant,

'Tis fixt, as is the basis of the world,

Whose kingdoms stand or fall by the decree.

What saw these eyes, surpris'd?—Yet why surpris'd?—

For aid divine the crisis seem'd to call,

And how divine was the monition given!

As late I walk'd the night in troubled thought,

My peace disturb'd by rumours from the north,

While thunder, o'er my head, portentous, roll'd,

As giving signal of some strange event,

And ocean groan'd beneath for her he lov'd,

Albion the fair! so long his empire's queen,

Whose reign is, now, contested by her foes,

On her white cliffs (a tablet broad and bright,

Strongly reflecting the pale lunar ray)

By fate's own iron pen I saw it writ,

And thus the title ran:

THE STATESMAN'S CREED.

"Ye states! and empires! nor of empires least,

"Though least in size; hear, Britain! thou whose

"Whose final lot is in the balance laid, [lot,

"Irresolutely play the doubtful scales,

"Nor know'st thou which will win.—Know then

"from me,

"As govern'd well or ill, states sink or rise:

"State-ministers, as upright or corrupt,

"Are balm or poison in a nation's veins;

"Health or distemper; hasten or retard

"The period of her pride, her day of doom:

"And though, for reasons obvious to the wise,

* The invader affects the character of Charles XII. of Sweden.

" Just Providence deals otherwise with men,
 " Yet believe, Britons ! nor too late believe,
 " 'Tis fix'd ! by fate irrevocably fix'd !
 " Virtue and vice are empire's life and death."

Thus it is written—Heard you not a groan ?
 Is Britain on her death-bed ?—No, that groan
 Was utter'd by her foes—But soon the scale,
 If this divine monition is despis'd,
 May turn against us. Read it, ye who rule !
 With reverence read ; with steadfastness believe ;
 With courage act as such belief inspires ;
 Then shall your glory stand like fate's decree ;
 Then shall your name in adamant be writ,
 In records that defy the tooth of time,
 By nations sav'd, refounding your applause. [base,

While deep beyond your monument's proud
 In black oblivion's kennel, shall be trod
 Their execrable names, who, high in power,
 And deep in guilt, most ominously shine,
 (The meteors of the state !) give vice her head,
 To license lewd let loose the public rein ;
 Quench every spark of conscience in the land,
 And triumph in the profligate's applause :
 Or who to the first bidder sell their souls,
 Their country sell, sell all their fathers bought
 With funds exhausted and exhausted veins,
 To demons, by his Holiness ordain'd
 To propagate the gospel—penn'd at Rome ;
 Hawk'd through the world by consecrated bulls ;
 And how illustrated ?—by Smithfield flames :
 Who plunge (but not like Curtius) down the gulf,
 Down narrow-minded self's voracious gulf,
 Which gapes, and swallows all they swore to save :
 Hate all that lifted heroes into gods,
 And hug the horrors of a victor's chain ;
 Of bodies politic that destin'd hell,
 Inflicted here, since here their beings end ;
 And fall from foes detested and despis'd,
 On disbelievers—of the statesman's creed.

Note, here, my Lord (unnoted yet it lies
 By most, or all) these truths political Serve more than public ends : this creed of states
 Seconds, and irresistibly supports,
 The Christian creed. Are you surpris'd ?—Attend ;
 And on the statesmen's build a nobler name.

This punctual justice exercis'd on states,
 With which authentic chronicle abounds,
 As all men know, and therefore must believe ;
 This vengeance pour'd on nations ripe in guilt,
 Pour'd on them here, where only they exist,
 What is it but an argument of sense,
 Or rather demonstration, to support
 Our feeble faith—" That they who states compose,
 " That men who stand not bounded by the grave,
 " Shall meet like measure at their proper hour ?"
 For God is equal, similarly deals
 With states and persons, or he were not God ;
 What means a rectitude immutable ?
 A pattern here of universal right.
 What, then, shall rescue an abandon'd man ?
 Nothing, it is reply'd. Reply'd, by whom ?
 Reply'd by politicians well as priests :
 Wait sacred set aside, mankind's own writ,
 The whole world's annals ; these pronounce his doom,

Thus (what might seem a daring paradox)
 Ev'n politics advance divinity :
 True masters there are better scholars here,
 Who travel history in quest of schemes
 To govern nations, or perhaps oppress,
 May there start truths that other aims inspire,
 And, like Candace's eunuch, as they read,
 By Providence turn Christians on their road :
 Digging for silver, they may strike on gold ;
 May be surpris'd with better than they sought,
 And entertain an angel unawares.

Nor is divinity ungrateful found.
 As politics advance divinity,
 Thus, in return, divinity promotes
 True politics, and crowns the statesman's praise.
 All wisdoms are but branches of the chief,
 And statesmen found but shoots of honest men.
 Are this world's witchcrafts pleaded in excuse
 For deviations in our moral line ?
 This, and the next world, view'd with such an eye
 As suits a statesman, such as keeps in view
 His own exalted science, both conspire
 To recommend and fix us in the right.
 If we reward the politics of heaven,
 The grand administration of the whole,
 What's the next world ? A supplement of this ;
 Without it, Justice is defective here ;
 Just as to states, defective as to men :
 If so, what is this world ? as sure as Right
 Sits in heaven's throne, a prophet of the next.
 Prize you the prophet ? then believe him too.
 His prophecy more precious than his smile.
 How comes it then to pass, with most on earth,
 That this should charm us, that should discompose ?
 Long as the statesman finds this case his own,
 So long his politics are uncomplete ;
 In danger he ; nor is the nation safe,
 But soon must rue his inauspicious power.

What hence results ? a truth that should resound
 For ever awful in Britannia's ear :

" Religion crowns the statesman and the man,
 " Sole source of public and of private peace."
 This truth all men must own, and therefore will,
 And praise and preach it too :—and when that's done,

Their compliment is paid, and 'tis forgot.
 What highland pole-axe half so deep can wound ?

But how dare I, so mean, presume so far ?
 Assume my seat in the dictator's chair ?
 Pronounce, predict (as if indeed inspir'd),
 Promulge my censures, lay out all my throat,
 Till hoarse in clamour on enormous crimes ?
 Two mighty columns rise in my support ;
 In their more awful and authentic voice,
 Record profane and sacred, drown the muse,
 Though loud, and far out-threat her threatening
 song.

Still farther, Holles ! suffer me to plead
 That I speak freely, as I speak to thee.
 Guilt only startles at the name of guilt ;
 And truth, plain truth, is welcome to the wise.
 Thus what seem'd my presumption is thy praise.
 Praise, and immortal praise, is virtue's claim ;
 And virtue's sphere is action : yet we grant
 Some merit to the trumpet's loud alarm.

Whose clangour kindles cowards into men.
 Nor shall the verse, perhaps, be quite forgot,
 Which talks of immortality, and bids,
 In every British breast, true glory rise,
 As now the warbling lark awakes the morn.
 To close, my Lord! with that which all should close
 And all begin, and strike us every hour,
 Though no war wak'd us, no black tempest
 frown'd.—
 The morning rises gay; yet gayest morn
 Less glorious after night's incumbent shades;

Less glorious far bright nature, rich array'd
 With golden robes, in all the pomp of noon,
 Than the first feeble dawn of moral day?
 Sole day, (let those whom statesmen serve attend
 Though the sun ripens diamonds for their crowns)
 Sole day worth his regard whom heaven ordains,
 Undarken'd, to behold noon dark, and date,
 From the sun's death, and every planet's fall,
 His all-illustrious and eternal year; [awe
 Where statesmen and their monarchs, (names of And distance here) shall rank with common men,
 Yet own their glory never dawn'd before.

THE COMPLAINT: OR, NIGHT THOUGHTS.

PREFACE.

As the occasion of this poem was real, not fictional; so the method pursued in it, was rather imposed, by what spontaneously arose in the author's mind on that occasion, than meditated or designed. Which will appear very probable from the nature of it. For it differs from the common mode of poetry, which is, from long narrations to draw short morals. Here, on the contrary, the narrative is short, and the morality arising from it makes the bulk of the poem. The reason of it is, That the facts mentioned did naturally pour these moral reflections on the thought of the writer.

NIGHT I.

ON LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY.

TO THE RIGHT HON. ARTHUR ONSLOW,

Speaker of the House of Commons.

TIR'D nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep!
 He, like the world, his ready visit pays
 Where fortune smiles; the wretched he forsakes;
 Swift on his downy pinion flies from woe,
 And lights on lids unsullied with a tear.
 From short (as usual) and disturb'd repose,
 I wake: How happy they, who wake no more!
 Yet that were vain, if dreams infest the grave.
 I wake, emerging from a sea of dreams
 Tumultuous; where my wreck'd desponding thought
 From wave to wave of fancied misery,
 At random drove, her helm of reason lost.
 Though now restor'd, 'tis only change of pain,
 (A bitter change!) severer for severe.
 The day too short for my distress; and night,
 Ev'n in the zenith of her dark domain,
 Is sunshine to the colour of my fate.
 Night, sable goddess! from her ebon throne,
 In rayless majesty, now stretches forth
 Her leaden sceptre o'er a flumbering world.
 Silence, how dead! and darkness, how profound!
 Nor eye, nor listening ear, an object finds;
 Creation sleeps. 'Tis as the general pulse
 Of life stood still, and nature made a pause;
 An awful pause! prophetic of her end.
 And let her prophecy be soon fulfill'd;
 Fate! drop the curtain; I can lose no more.
 Silence and darkness! solemn sisters! twins
 From ancient night, who nurse the tender thought!

To reason, and on reason build resolve,
 (That column of true majesty in man)
 Assist me: I will thank you in the grave; [fall
 The grave, your kingdom: There this frame shall
 A victim sacred to your dreary shrine.
 But what are ye?—

Thou, who didst put to flight
 Primeval silence, when the morning stars,
 Exulting, shouted o'er the rising ball;
 O thou, whose word from solid darkness struck
 That spark, the sun; strike wisdom from my soul;
 My soul, which flies to thee, her trust, her treasure,
 As misers to their gold, while others rest.

Through this opaque of nature and of soul,
 This double night, transmit one pitying ray,
 To lighten and to cheer. O lead my mind,
 (A mind that fain would wander from its woe)
 Lead it through various scenes of life and death;
 And from each scene the noblest truths inspire.
 Nor less inspire my conduct than my song;
 Teach my best reason, reason; my best will Teach rectitude; and fix my firm resolve
 Wisdom to wed, and pay her long arrear:
 Nor let the phial of thy vengeance, pour'd
 On this devoted head, be pour'd in vain.

The bell strikes one. We take no note of time
 But from its loss. To give it then a tongue
 Is wise in man. As if an angel spoke,
 I feel the solemn sound. If heard aright,
 It is the knell of my departed hours:
 Where are they? With the years beyond the flood.
 It is the signal that demands dispatch:
 How much is to be done? My hopes and fears
 Start up alarm'd, and o'er life's narrow verge
 Look down—On what? a fathomless abyss;
 A dread eternity! how surely mine!

And can eternity belong to me,
Poor pensioner on the bounties of an hour?

How poor, how rich, how abject, how august,
How complicate, how wonderful, is man!
How passing wonder he who made him such!
Who centred in our make such strange extremes!
From different natures marvellously mix'd,
Connection exquisite of distant worlds!
Distinguish'd link in being's endless chain!
Midway from nothing to the Deity!

A beam ethereal, fully'd, and absorb'd!
Though fully'd and dishonour'd, still divine!
Dim miniature of greatness absolute!
An heir of glory! a frail child of dust!
Helpless immortal! insect infinite!
A worm! a god!—I tremble at myself,
And in myself am lost! at home a stranger,
Thought wanders up and down, surpris'd, aghast,
And wondering at her own: How reason reels!
O what a miracle to man is man,
Triumphantly distress'd! what joy, what dread!
Alternately transported and alarm'd!
What can preserve my life, or what destroy?
An angel's arm can't snatch me from the grave;
Legions of angels can't confine me there.

'Tis past conjecture; all things rise in proof:
While o'er my limbs sleep's soft dominion spread,
What though my soul fantastic measures trod
O'er fairy fields; or mourn'd along the gloom
Of pathless woods; or down the craggy steep
Hurl'd headlong, swam with pain the mantled pool;

Or scal'd the cliff; or danc'd on hollow winds,
With antic shapes, wild natives of the brain?
Her ceaseless flight, though devious, speaks her nature

Of subtler essence than the trodden clod;
Active, aerial, towering, unconfin'd,
Unfetter'd with her gross companions fall.
Ev'n silent night proclaims my soul immortal;
Ev'n silent night proclaims eternal day.
For human weal heaven husbands all events;
Dull sleep instructs, nor sport vain dreams in vain.

Why then their loss deplore that are not lost?
Why wanders wretched thought their tombs around

In infidel distress? Are angels there?
Slumbers, rak'd up in dust, ethereal fire?

They live! they greatly live a life on earth
Unkindled, unconceiv'd; and from an eye
Of tenderness let heavenly pity fall
On me, more justly number'd with the dead.
This is the desert, this the solitude:
How populous, how vital, is the grave!
This is creation's melancholy vault,
The vale funereal, the sad cypress gloom;
The land of apparitions, empty shades!
All, all on earth, is shadow, all beyond
Is substance; the reverse is folly's creed:
How solid all, where change shall be no more!

This is the bud of being, the dim dawn,
The twilight of our day, the vestibule;
Life's theatre as yet is shut, and death,
Strong death, alone can heave the massy bar,
This gross impediment of clay remove,

And make us embryos of existence free
From real life; but little more remote
Is he, not yet a candidate for light,
The future embryo, slumbering in his fire.
Embryos we must be till we burst the shell,
Yon ambient azure shell, and spring to life,
The life of gods, O transport! and of man.

Yet man, fool man! here buries all his thoughts;
Inters celestial hopes without one sigh.
Prisoner of earth, and pent beneath the moon,
Here pinions all his wishes; wing'd by heaven
To fly at infinite; and reach it there
Where seraphs gather immortality,
On life's fair tree, fast by the throne of God.
What golden joys ambrosial clustering glow
In his full beam, and ripen for the just,
Where momentary ages are no more! [pire?
Where time, and pain, and chance, and death, ex-
And is it in the flight of threescore years
To push eternity from human thought,
And smother souls immortal in the dust?
A soul immortal, spending all her fires,
Wasting her strength in strenuous idleness,
Thrown into tumult, raptur'd or alarm'd,
At ought this scene can threaten or indulge,
Resembles ocean into tempest wrought,
To waft a feather, or to drown a fly.

Where falls this censure? It o'erwhelms myself:
How was my heart incrust'd by the world!
O how self-setter'd was my grovelling soul,
How, like a worm, was I wrapt round and round
In filken thought, which reptile fancy spun,
Till darken'd reason lay quite clouded o'er
With soft conceit of endless comfort here,
Nor yet put forth her wings to reach the skies!

Night-visions may befriend: (as sung above)
Our waking dreams are fatal. How I dream'd
Of things impossible! (Could sleep do more?)
Of joys perpetual in perpetual change!
Of stable pleasures on the tossing wave!
Eternal sunshine in the storms of life!
How richly were my noon-tide trances hung
With gorgeous tapestries of pictur'd joys!
Joy behind joy, in endless perspective!
Till at death's toll, whose restless iron tongue
Calls daily for his millions at a meal,
Starting I woke, and found myself undone.
Where now my phrenzy's pompous furniture?
The cebrwebb'd cottage, with its ragged wall
Of mouldering mud, is royalty to me!
The spider's most attenuated thread
Is cord, is cable, to man's tender tie
On earthly bliss; it breaks at every breeze.

O ye blest scenes of permanent delight!
Full above measure! lasting beyond bound!
A perpetuity of bliss is bliss.
Could you, so rich in rapture, fear an end,
That ghastly thought would drink up all your joy,
And quite unparadise the realms of light.
Safe are you lodg'd above these rolling spheres;
The baleful influence of whose giddy dance
Sheds sad vicissitude on all beneath.
Here teems with revolutions every hour;
And rarely for the better; or the best,
More mortal than the common births of fate.

Each moment has its sickle, emulous
Of Time's enormous scythe, whose ample sweep
Strikes empires from the root; each moment plays
His little weapon in the narrower sphere
Of sweet domestic comfort, and cuts down
The fairest bloom of sublunary bliss.

Bliss! sublunary bliss!—proud words, and vain!
Implicit treason to divine decree!

A bold invasion of the rights of heaven!
I clasp'd the phantoms, and I found them air.
O had I weigh'd it ere my fond embrace!
What darts of agony had miss'd my heart!

Death! great proprietor of all! 'tis thine
To tread out empire, and to quench the stars.
The sun himself by thy permission shines;
And one day thou shalt pluck him from his sphere.
Amid such mighty plunder, why exhaust
Thy partial quiver on a mark so mean?
Why thy peculiar rancour wreak'd on me?
Insatiate archer! could not one suffice? [slain!
Thy shaft flew thrice; and thrice my peace was
And thrice, ere thrice yon moon had fill'd her horn.

O Cynthia! why so pale? Dost thou lament
Thy wretched neighbour? Grieve to see thy wheel
Of ceaseless change outwhirl'd in human life?
How wanes my borrow'd bliss! from fortune's smile,
Precarious courtesy! not virtue's sure,
Self-given, solar ray of sound delight.

In every vary'd posture, place, and hour,
How widow'd every thought of every joy!
Thought, busy thought! too busy for my peace!
Through the dark postern of time long elaps'd,
Led softly, by the stillness of the night,
Led like a murderer, (and such it proves!)
Strays (wretched rover!) o'er the pleasing pass;
In quest of wretchedness perversely strays,
And finds all desert now, and meets the ghosts
Of my departed joys, a numerous train!
I rue the riches of my former fate;
Sweet comfort's blasted clusters I lament;
I tremble at the blessings once so dear;
And every pleasure pains me to the heart.

Yet why complain? or why complain for one?
Hangs out the sun his lustre but for me,
The single man? Are angels all beside?
I mourn for millions: 'tis the common lot;
In this shape, or in that, has fate entail'd
The mother's throes on all of woman born,
Not more the children than sure heirs of pain.

War, famine, pest, volcano, storm, and fire,
Intestine broils, oppression, with her heart
Wrapt up in triple brass, besiege mankind.
God's image disinherited of day,
Here, plung'd in mines, forgets a sun was made.
There, beings deathless as their haughty lord,
Are hammer'd to the galling oar for life,
And plow the winter's wave, and reap despair.
Some, for hard masters, broken under arms,
In battle lop'd away, with half their limbs,
Beg bitter bread through realms their valour sav'd,
If so the tyrant, or his minion, doom.

Want, and incurable disease, (fell pair!)
On hopeless multitudes remorseless seize
At once, and make a refuge of the grave.

How groaning hospitals eject their dead!
What numbers groan for sad admission there!
What numbers, once in fortune's lap high-fed,
Solicit the cold hand of charity!
To shock us more, solicit it in vain!
Ye filken sons of pleasure! since in pains
You rue more modish visits, visit here,
And breathe from your debauch: give, and reduce Surfeit's dominion over you: but so great
Your impudence, you blush at what is right.

Happy! did sorrow seize on such alone.
Not prudence can defend, or virtue save;
Disease invades the chastest temperance,
And punishment the guiltless, and alarm,
Through thickest shades, pursues the fond of peace.
Man's caution often into danger turns;
And his guard falling crushes him to death.
Not happiness itself makes good her name;
Our very wishes give us not our wish.
How distant oft the thing we doat on most
From that for which we doat, felicity!
The smoothest course of nature has its pains;
And truest friends, through error, wound our rest.
Without misfortune, what calamities!
And what hostilities, without a foe!
Nor are foes wanting to the best on earth.
But endless is the list of human ills,
And sighs might sooner fail, than cause to sigh.

A part how small of the terraqueous globe
Is tenanted by man! the rest a waste,
Rocks, deserts, frozen seas, and burning sands:
Wild haunts of monsters, poisons, stings, and death.
Such is earth's melancholy map! but, far
More sad! this earth is a true map of man.
So bounded are its haughty lord's delights
To noe's wide empire; where deep troubles tofs,
Loud sorrows howl, invenom'd passions bite,
Ravenous calamities our vitals seize,
And threatening fate wide opens to devour.

What then am I, who sorrow for myself!
In age, in infancy, from other's aid
Is all our hope; to teach us to be kind.
That, nature's first, last lesson to mankind;
The selfish heart deserves the pain it feels.
More generous sorrow, while it sinks, exalts;
And conscious virtue mitigates the pang.
Nor virtue, more than prudence, bids me give
Sworn thought a second channel; who divide,
They weaken too, the torrent of their grief.
Take then, O world! thy much indebted tear:
How sad a sight is human happiness,
To those whose thought can pierce beyond an hour!
O thou! whate'er thou art, whose heart exults!
Wouldst thou I should congratulate thy fate?
I know thou wouldst; thy pride demands it from me.

Let thy pride pardon, what thy nature needs,
The salutary censure of a friend.
Thou happy wretch! by blindness thou art blest;
By dotage dandled to perpetual smiles.
Know, smiler! at thy peril art thou pleas'd;
Thy pleasure is the promise of thy pain.
Misfortune, like a creditor severe,
But rises in demand for her delay;
She makes a scourge of past prosperity,

To sting thee more, and double thy distress.

Lorenzo, fortune makes her court to thee,
Thy fond heart dances, while the Siren sings.
Dear is thy welfare; think me not unkind;
I would not damp, but to secure thy joys.
Think not that fear is sacred to the storm:
Stand on thy guard against the smiles of fate.
Is heaven tremendous in its frowns? Most sure;
And in its favours formidable too:
Its favours here are trials, not rewards;
A call to duty, not discharge from care;
And should alarm us, full as much as woes;
Awake us to their cause and consequence;
And make us tremble, weigh'd with our desert;
Awe nature's tumult, and chastise her joys,
Lest, while we clasp, we kill them; nay, invert
To worse than simple misery, their charms.
Revolted joys, like foes in civil war,
Like bosom friendships to resentment sour'd,
With rage envenom'd rise against our peace.
Beware what earth calls happiness; beware
All joys, but joys that never can expire.
Who builds on less than an immortal base,
Fond as he seems, condemns his joys to death.

Mine dy'd with thee, Philander! thy last sigh
Dissolv'd the charm; the disenchanting earth
Lost all her lustre. Where her glittering towers?
Her golden mountains, where? all darken'd down
To naked waste; a dreary vale of tears;
The great magician's dead! thou poor, pale piece
Of out-cast earth, in darkness! what a change
From yesterday! Thy darling hope so near,
(Long-labour'd prize!) O how ambition flush'd
Thy glowing cheek! Ambition truly great,
Of virtuous praise. Death's subtle seed within (Sly, treacherous miner!) working in the dark,
Smil'd at thy well-concerted scheme, and beckon'd
The worm to riot on that rose so red,
Unfaded ere it fell, a one moment's prey!

Man's foresight is conditionally wise;
Lorenzo! wisdom into folly turns
Oft, the first instant, its idea fair
To labouring thought is born. How dim our eye!
The present moment terminates our sight;
Clouds, thick as those on doomsday, drown the next;
We penetrate, we prophesy in vain.
Time is dealt out by particles; and each
Ere mingled with the streaming sands of life,
By fate's inviolable oath is sworn
Deep silence, "Where eternity begins."

By nature's law, what may be, may be now;
There's no prerogative in human hours.
In human hearts what bolder thought can rise,
Than man's presumption on to-morrow's dawn?
Where is to-morrow? In another world.
For numbers this is certain; the reverse
Is sure to none; and yet on this perhaps,
This peradventure, infamous for lies,
As on a rock of adamant, we build
Our mountain hopes; spin out eternal schemes,
As we the fatal sisters could out-spin,
And, big with life's futurities, expire.

Not ev'n Philander had bespoke his shroud:
Nor had he cause; a warning was deny'd:
How many fall as sudden, not as safe!

As sudden, though for years admonish'd home.
Of human ills the last extreme beware,
Beware, Lorenzo! a slow sudden death.
How dreadful that deliberate surprise!
Be wise to-day; 'tis madness to defer;
Next day the fatal precedent will plead;
Thus on, till wisdom is push'd out of life.
Procrastination is the thief of time;
Year after year it steals, till all are fled,
And to the mercies of a moment leaves
The vast concerns of an eternal scene.
If not so frequent, would not this be strange?
That 'tis so frequent, this is stranger still.

Of man's miraculous mistakes, this bears
The palm, "That all men are about to live,"
For ever on the brink of being born.
All pay themselves the compliment to think
They one day shall not drivel: and their pride
On this reversion takes up ready praise;
At least, their own; their future selves applaud;
How excellent that life they ne'er will lead!
Time lodg'd in their own hands is folly's vails;
That lodg'd in fates, to wisdom they consign;
The thing they can't but purpose, they postpone;
'Tis not in folly, not to scorn a fool;
And scarce in human wisdom, to do more.
All promise is poor dilatory man, [deed,
And that through every stage: when young, in-
In full content we, sometimes, nobly rest,
Unanxious for ourselves; and only wish,
As duteous sons, our fathers were more wise.
At thirty man suspects himself a fool;
Knows it at forty, and reforms his plan;
At fifty chides his infamous delay,
Pushes his prudent purpose to resolve;
In all the magnanimity of thought
Resolves; and re-resolves; then dies the same.

And why? Because he thinks himself immortal.
All men think all men mortal, but themselves;
Themselves, when some alarming shock of fate
Strikes through their wounded hearts the sudden dread;

But their hearts wounded, like the wounded air,
Soon close; where, past the shaft, no trace is found.
As from the wing, no scar the sky retains;
The parted wave no furrow from the keel;
So dies in human hearts the thoughts of death,
Ev'n with the tender tear which nature sheds
O'er those we love, we drop it in their grave.
Can I forget Philander? That were strange!
O my full heart!—But should I give it vent,
The longest night, though longer far, would fail,
And the lark listen to my midnight song.

The sprightly lark's shrill matin wakes the morn;
Grief's sharpest thorn hard pressing on my breast,
I strive, with wakeful melody, to cheer
The sullen gloom, sweet Philomel! like thee,
And call the stars to listen: every star
Is deaf to mine, enamour'd of thy lay.
Yet be not vain; there are, who thine excel,
And charm through distant ages: wrapt in shade,
Prisoner of darkness! to the silent hours,
How often I repeat their rage divine,
To lull my griefs, and steal my heart from woe!
I roll their raptures, but not catch their fire.

Dark, though not blind, like thee, Mæonides!
 Or, Milton! thee; ah, could I reach your strain!
 Or his, who made Mæonides our own.
 Man too he sung: immortal man I sing;
 Oft bursts my song beyond the bounds of life;
 What, now, but immortality can please?
 O had he press'd his theme, pursued the track,
 Which opens out of darkness into day!
 O had he, mounted on his wing of fire,
 Soar'd where I sink, and sung immortal man!
 How had it blest mankind, and rescued me!

NIGHT II.

ON TIME, DEATH, AND FRIENDSHIP.

TO THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF WILMINGTON.

"WHEN the cock crew, he wept"—smote by that eye

Which looks on me, on all: That power, who bids
 This midnight centinel, with clarion shrill,
 Emblem of that which shall awake the dead,
 Rouse souls from slumber, into thoughts of heaven.
 Shall I too weep? Where then is fortitude?
 And fortitude abandon'd, where is man?
 I know the terms on which he sees the light;
 He that is born, is list'd; life is war;
 Eternal war with woe. Who bears it best,
 Deserves it least.—On other themes I'll dwell.
 Lorenzo! let me turn my thoughts on thee,
 And thine, on themes may profit; profit there,
 Where most they need. Themes too, the genuine growth

Of dear Philander's dust. He thus, though dead,
 May still befriend—what themes? time's wondrous
 price,

Death, friendship, and Philander's final scene.
 So could I touch these themes, as might obtain
 Thine ear, nor leave thy heart quite disengag'd,
 The good deed would delight me; half impress
 On my dark cloud an Iris; and from grief
 Call glory—dost thou mourn Philander's fate?
 I know thou say'st it: Says thy life the same?
 He mourns the dead, who lives as they desire.
 Where is that thirst, that avarice of time,
 (O glorious avarice!) thought of death inspires,
 As rumour'd robberies endear our gold?
 O time! than gold more sacred; more a load
 Than lead, to fools; and fools reputed wise.
 What moment granted man without account?
 What years are squander'd, wisdom's debt unpaid!
 Our wealth in days, all due to that discharge.
 Haste, haste, he lies in wait, he's at the door,
 Insidious death! should his strong hand arrest,
 No composition sets the prisoner free.

Eternity's inexorable chain

Fast binds; and vengeance claims the full arrear.

How late I shudder'd on the brink! how late
 Life call'd for her last refuge in despair!

That time is mine, O Mead! to thee I owe;

Fain would I pay thee with eternity.

But ill my genius answers my desire;

My sickly song is mortal, past thy cure.

Accept the will;—that dies not with my strain.

For what calls thy disease, Lorenzo? not
 For Esculapian, but for moral aid.

Thou think'st it folly to be wise too soon.
 Youth is not rich in time, it may be poor;
 Part with it as with money, sparing; pay
 No moment, but in purchase of its worth;
 And what its worth, ask death-beds; they can tell.
 Part with it as with life, reluctant; big
 With holy hope of nobler time to come;
 Time higher aim'd, still nearer the great mark
 Of men and angels; virtue more divine.

Is this our duty, wisdom, glory, gain?
 (These heaven benign in vital union binds)
 And sport we like the natives of the bough,
 When vernal suns inspire? Amusement reigns
 Man's great demand: To trifle, is to live:
 And is it then a trifle, too, to die?

Thou say'st I preach, Lorenzo, 'tis confess.
 What if, for once, I preach thee quite awake?
 Who wants amusement in the flame of battle?
 Is it not treason, in the soul immortal,
 Her foes in arms, eternity the prize?
 Will toys amuse, when medicines cannot cure?
 When spirits ebb, when life's enchanting scenes
 Their lustre lose, and lessen in our sight,
 As lands and cities with their glittering spires,
 To the poor shatter'd bark, by sudden storm
 Thrown off to sea, and soon to perish there?
 Will toys amuse? No: Thrones will then be toys,
 And earth and skies seem dust upon the scale.

Redeem we time?—Its loss we dearly buy.
 What pleads Lorenzo for his high-priz'd sports?
 He pleads time's numerous blanks; he loudly pleads
 The straw-like trifles on life's common stream.
 From whom those blanks and trifles, but from thee?
 No blank, no trifle, nature made, or meant.
 Virtue, or propos'd virtue, still be thine;
 This cancels thy complaint at once. This leaves
 In act no trifle, and no blank in time.
 This greatens, fills, immortalizes all;
 This, the blest art of turning all to gold;
 This, the good heart's prerogative to raise
 A royal tribute from the poorest hours;
 Immense revenue! every moment pays,
 If nothing more than purpose in thy power;
 Thy purpose firm, is equal to the deed:
 Who does the best his circumstance allows,
 Does well, acts nobly; angels could no more.
 Our outward act indeed admits restraint;
 'Tis not in things o'er thought to domineer;
 Guard well thy thought; our thoughts are heard in heaven.

On all important time through every age,
 Though much, and warm, the wise have urg'd;
 the man

Is yet unborn, who duly weighs an hour.

"I've lost a day"—the prince who nobly cry'd

Had been an emperor without his crown;

Of Rome, say rather, lord of human race:

He spoke, as if deputed by mankind,

So should all speak: So reason speaks in all:

From the soft whispers of that God in man,

Why fly to folly, why to phrenzy fly,

For rescue from the blessing we possess?

Time the supreme!—Time is eternity;

Pregnant with all eternity can give;

Pregnant with all, that makes archangels smile,

Who murders time, he crushes in the birth

A power ethereal, only not ador'd.

Ah! how unjust to nature and himself,
Is thoughtless, thankless, inconsistent man!
Like children babbling nonsense in their sports
We censure nature for a span too short;
That span too short, we tax as tedious too;
Torture invention, all expedients tire,
To lash the lingering moments into speed,
And whirl us (happy riddance!) from ourselves.
Art, brainless art! our furious charioteer
(For nature's voice unstifled would recal),
Drives headlong towards the precipice of death;
Death, most our dread; death thus more dreadful made:

O what a riddle of absurdity!

Leisure is pain; takes off our chariot wheels;
How heavily we drag the load of life!
Blest leisure is our curse; like that of Cain,
It makes us wander; wander earth around,
To fly that tyrant, thought. As Atlas groan'd
The world beneath, we groan beneath an hour.
We cry for mercy to the next amusement;
The next amusement mortgages our fields;
Slight inconvenience! prisons hardly frown,
From hateful time if prisons set us free.
Yet when death kindly tenders us relief,
We call him cruel; years to moments shrink,
Ages to years. The telescope is turn'd
To man's false optics (from his folly false)
Time, in advance, behind him hides his wings,
And seems to creep, decrepit with his age;
Behold him, when past by; what then is seen,
But his broad pinions swifter than the winds?
And all mankind, in contradiction strong,
Rueful, aghast! cry out on his career.

Leave to thy foes these errors, and these ills;
To nature just, their cause and cure explore.
Not short heaven's bounty, boundless our expence;
No niggard nature; men are prodigals.
We waste, not use our time; we breathe, not live.
Time wasted is existence, us'd is life,
And bare existence, man, to live ordain'd,
Wrings and oppresses with enormous weight.
And why? since time was given for use, not waste,
Enjoin'd to fly; with tempest, tide, and stars,
To keep his speed, nor ever wait for man;
Time's use was doom'd a pleasure: waste, a pain;
That man might feel his error, if unseen:
And, feeling, fly to labour for his cure;
Not, blundering, split on idleness for ease.
Life's cares are comforts; such by heaven design'd;
He that has none, must make them, or be wretched.
Cares are employments, and without employ
The soul is on a rack; the rack of rest,
To souls most adverse; action all their joy.

Here then the riddle mark'd above unfolds;
Then time turns torment, when man turns a fool.
We rave, we wrestle, with great nature's plan;
We thwart the Deity; and 'tis decreed,
Who thwart his will, shall contradict their own.
Hence our unnatural quarrels with ourselves;
Our thoughts at enmity; our bosom-broil;
We push time from us, and we wish him back:
Lavish of lustre, and yet fond of life;
Life we think long, and short; death seek, and shun:

VOL. X.

Body and soul, like peevish man and wife,
United jar, and yet are loth to part.

Oh the dark days of vanity! while here,
How tasteless! and how terrible, when gone!
Gone! they ne'er go; when past, they haunt us still;

The spirit walks of every day deceas'd;
And smiles an angel, or a fury frowns.
Nor death, nor life delight us. If time pass,
And time possess, both pain us, what can please?
That which the Deity to please ordain'd,
Time us'd. The man who consecrates his hours
By vigorous effort, and an honest aim,
At once he draws the sting of life and death;
He walks with nature; and her paths are peace.

Our error's cause and cure are seen: See next
Time's nature, origin, importance, speed;
And thy great gain from urging his career.—
All-sensual man, because untouch'd, unseen,
He looks on time as nothing. Nothing else
Is truly man's; 'tis fortune's—time's a god.
Hast thou ne'er heard of time's omnipotence;
For, or against, what wonders he can do!
And will: To stand blank neuter he disdains.
Not on those terms was time (heaven's stranger!)
sent

On his important embassy to man.
Lorenzo! no: On the long-destin'd hour,
From everlasting ages growing ripe,
That memorable hour of wondrous birth,
When the Dread Sire, on emanation bent,
And big with nature, rising in his might,
Call'd forth creation (for then time was born),
By godhead streaming through a thousand worlds;
Not on those terms, from the great days of heaven,
From old eternity's mysterious orb
Was time cut off, and cast beneath the skies;
The skies, which watch him in his new abode,
Measuring his motions by revolving spheres;
That horologe machinery divine. [play,
Hours, days, and months, and years, his children,
Like numerous wings around him, as he flies:
Or rather as unequal plumes, they shape
His ample pinions, swift as darted flame,
To gain his goal, to reach his ancient rest,
And join anew eternity his fire;
In his immortality to nest,
When worlds, that count his circles now, unhing'd
(Fate the loud signal sounding), headlong rush
To timeless night and chaos, whence they rose.

Why spur the speedy? why with levities
New wing thy short, short day's too rapid flight?
Know'st thou, or what thou dost, or what is done?
Man flies from time, and time from man; too soon
In sad divorce this double flight must end;
And then, where are we? where, Lorenzo, then
Thy sports? thy pomps?—I grant thee, in a state
Not unambitious; in the ruffled shroud,
Thy Parian tomb's triumphant arch beneath.
Has death his sopperies? Then well may life
Put on her plume, and in her rainbow shine.
Ye well-array'd! ye lilies of our land!
Ye lilies male! who neither toil nor spin
(As sister lilies might), if not so wise
As Solomon, more sumptuous to the sight!

E

Ye delicate ! who nothing can support,
 Yourself most insupportable ! for whom
 The winter rose must blow, the sun put on
 A brighter beam in Leo ; silky soft
 Favonius breathe still softer, or be chid ;
 And other worlds send odours, sauce, and song,
 And robes, and notions, fram'd in foreign looms !
 O ye Lorenzos of our age ! who deem
 One moment unamused a misery
 Not made for feeble man ! who call aloud
 For every bawble drivell'd o'er by sense ;
 For rattles, and conceits of every cast,
 For change of follies, and relays of joy,
 To drag your patient through the tedious length
 Of a short winter's day—say, sages, say,
 Wit's oracles ! say, dreamers of gay dreams !
 How will you weather an eternal night,
 Where such expedients fail ?

O treacherous conscience ! while she seems to sleep
 On rose and myrtle, lull'd with fyren song ;
 While she seems, nodding o'er her charge, to drop
 On headlong appetite the slacken'd rein,
 And give us up to licence, unrecall'd,
 Unmark'd ;—see, from behind her secret stand,
 The fly informer minutes every fault,
 And her dread diary with horror fills.
 Not the gross act alone employs her pen ;
 She reconnoitres fancy's airy band,
 A watchful foe ! the formidable spy,
 Listening, o'erhears the whispers of our camp :
 Our dawning purposes of heart explores,
 And steals our embryos of iniquity.
 As all rapacious usurers conceal
 Their doomday-book from all-consuming heirs ;
 Thus, with indulgence most severe, she treats
 Us spendthrifts of inestimable time ;
 Unnoted, notes each moment misapply'd ;
 In leaves more durable than leaves of brass
 Writes our whole history ; which death shall read
 In every pale delinquent's private ear ;
 And judgment publish ; publish to more worlds
 Than this ; and endless age in groans resound.
 Lorenzo, such that sleeper in thy breast !
 Such is her slumber ; and her vengeance such
 For slighted counsel ; such thy future peace !
 And think'st thou still thou canst be wise too soon ?
 But why on time so lavish is my song ?
 On this great theme kind nature keeps a school,
 To teach her sons herself. Each night we die,
 Each morn are born anew : Each day, a life !
 And shall we kill each day ? If trifling kills ;
 Sure vice must butcher. O what heaps of slain
 Cry out for vengeance on us ! Time destroy'd
 Is suicide, where more than blood is spilt.
 Time flies, death urges, knells call, heaven invites,
 Hell threatens : All exerts ; in effort, all ;
 More than creation labours !—labours more ?
 And is there in creation what, amidst
 This tumult universal, wing'd dispatch,
 And ardent energy, supinely yawns ?
 Man sleeps ; and man alone ; and man, whose fate,
 Fate irreversibile, entire, extreme,
 Endless, hair-hung, breeze-shaken, o'er the gulf
 A moment trembles ; drops ! and man, for whom
 All else is in alarm ! man, the sole cause

Of this surrounding storm ! and yet he sleeps,
 As the storm rock'd to rest.—Throw years away !
 Throw empires, and be blameless. Moments seize ;
 Heaven's on their wing : A moment we may wish,
 When worlds want wealth to buy. Bid day stand

still,
 Bid him drive back his car, and reimport
 The period past, re-give the given hour.
 Lorenzo, more than miracles we want ;
 Lorenzo—O for yesterdays to come !

Such is the language of the man awake ;
 His ardour such, for what oppresses thee.
 And is his ardour vain, Lorenzo ? No ;
 That more than miracle the gods indulge ;
 To-day is yesterday return'd ; return'd
 Full power'd to cancel, expiate, raise, adorn,
 And reinstate us on the rock of peace.
 Let it not share its predecessor's fate ;
 Nor, like its elder sisters, die a fool.
 Shall it evaporate in fume ? fly off
 Fuliginous, and stain us deeper still ?
 Shall we be poorer for the plenty pour'd ?
 More wretched for the clemencies of heaven ?

Where shall I find him ? Angels ! tell me where.
 You know him : He is near you : Point him out :
 Shall I see glories beaming from his brow ?
 Or trace his footsteps by the rising flowers ?
 Your golden wings, now hovering o'er him, shed
 Protection ; now, are waving in applause
 To that blest son of foresight ! lord of fate !
 That awful independent on to-morrow !
 Whose work is done ; who triumphs in the past ;
 Whose yesterdays look backwards with a smile ;
 Nor, like the Parthian, wound him as they fly ;
 That common, but opprobrious lot ! past hours,
 If not by guilt, yet wound us by their flight,
 If folly bounds our prospect by the grave,
 All feeling of futurity benumb'd ;
 All god-like passion for eternals quencht ;
 All relish of realities expir'd ;
 Renounc'd all correspondence with the skies ;
 Our freedom chain'd ; quite wingleless our desire ;
 In sense dark-prison'd all that ought to soar ;
 Prone to the centre ; crawling in the dust ;
 Dismounted every great and glorious aim ;
 Embruted every faculty divine ;
 Heart-bury'd in the rubbish of the world.
 The world, that gulf of souls, immortal souls,
 Souls elevate, angelic, wing'd with fire
 To reach the distant skies, and triumph there
 On thrones, which shall not mourn their masters chang'd ;

Though we from earth ; ethereal, they that fell.
 Such veneration due, O man, to man.
 Who venerate themselves, the world despise.
 For what, gay friend ! is this escutcheon'd world,
 Which hangs out death in one eternal night ;
 A night, that glooms us in the noon-tide ray,
 And wraps our thought, at banquets, in the shroud ?
 Life's little stage is a small eminence,
 Inch-high the grave above ; that home of man,
 Where dwells the multitude : We gaze around ;
 We read their monuments ; we sigh ; and while
 We sigh, we sink ; and are what we deplor'd ;
 Lamenting, or lamented, all our lot !

Is death at distance? No: he has been on thee,
And given sure earnest of his final blow.
Those hours that lately smil'd, where are they now?
Pallid to thought, and ghastly! drown'd, all drown'd
In that great deep, which nothing disembogues!
And, dying, they bequeath'd thee small renown.
The rest are on the wing: how fleet their flight!
Already has the fatal train took fire;
A moment, and the world's blown up to thee;
The sun is darkness, and the stars are dust.

'Tis greatly wise to talk with our past hours;
And ask them, what report they bore to heaven;
And how they might have borne more welcome news.

Their answers form what men experience call;
If wisdom's friend, her best; if not, worst foe.
O reconcile them! Kind experience cries,
"There's nothing here, but what as nothing weighs;
"The more our joy, the more we know it vain;
"And by success are tutor'd to despair."
Nor is it only thus, but must be so.

Who knows not this, though gray, is still a child.
Loose then from earth the grasp of fond desire!
Weigh anchor, and some happier clime explore.

Art thou so moor'd thou canst not disengage,
Nor give thy thoughts a ply to future scenes?
Since by life's passing breath, blown up from earth,
Light as the summer's dust, we take in air
A moment's giddy flight, and fall again;
Join the dull mass, increase the trodden soil,
And sleep, till earth herself shall be no more;
Since then (as emmets, their small world o'er-thrown)

We, fore amaz'd, from out earth's ruins crawl,
And rise to fate extreme of foul or fair,
As man's own choice (controuler of the skies!)
As man's despotic will, perhaps one hour,
(O how omnipotent is time!) decrees;
Should not each warning give a strong alarm?
Warning, far less than that of bosom torn
From bosom, bleeding o'er the sacred dead!
Should not each dial strike us as we pass,
Portentous, as the written wall, which struck,
O'er midnight howls, the proud Assyrian pale,
Ere-while high-flush'd with insolence and wine?
Like that, the dial speaks; and points to thee,
Lorenzo! loth to break thy banquet up:

"O man, thy kingdom is departing from thee;
"And, while it lasts, is emptier than my shade."
Its silent language such: nor need'st thou call
Thy magi, to decypher what it means.
Know, like the Median, fate is in thy walls:
Dost ask, How? Whence? Belshazzar-like, amaz'd?
Man's make incloses the sure seeds of death;
Life feeds the murderer; ingrate! he thrives
On her own meal, and then his nurse devours.

But here, Lorenzo, the delusion lies;
That solar shadow, as it measures life,
It life resembles too: life speeds away
From point to point, though seeming to stand still.
The cunning fugitive is swift by stealth:
Too subtle is the movement to be seen;
Yet soon man's hour is up, and we are gone.
Warnings point out our danger; gnomons, time:
As these are useless when the sun is set:

So these, but when more glorious reason shines.
Reason should judge in all; in reason's eye,
That sedentary shadow travels hard.
But such our gravitation to the wrong,
So prone our hearts to whisper what we wish,
'Tis later with the wise than he's aware:
A Wilmington goes slower than the sun:
And all mankind mistake their time of day;
Ev'n age itself. Fresh hopes are hourly sown
In furrow'd brows. To gentle life's descent
We shut our eyes, and think it is a plain.
We take fair days in winter, for the spring;
And turn our blessings into bane. Since oft
Man must compute that age he cannot feel,
He scarce believes he's older for his years.
Thus, at life's latest eve, we keep in store
One disappointment sure, to crown the rest;
The disappointment of a promis'd hour.

On this, or similar, Philander! thou
Whose mind was moral, as the preacher's tongue;
And strong, to wield all science, worth the name;
How often we talk'd down the summer's sun,
And cool'd our passions by the breezy stream!
How often thaw'd and shorten'd winter's eye,
By conflict kind, that struck out latent truth,
Best found, so fought; to the recluse more coy!
Thoughts disentangle passing o'er the lip;
Clean runs the thread; if not, 'tis thrown away,
Or kept to tie up nonsense for a song;
Song, fashionably fruitless; such as stains
The fancy, and unhallow'd passion fires;
Chiming her saints to Cytherea's fane.

Know'st thou, Lorenzo! what a friend contains?
As bees mixt nectar draw from fragrant flowers,
So men from friendship, wisdom and delight;
Twins ty'd by nature, if they part, they die.
Hast thou no friend to set thy mind abroad?
Good sense will stagnate. Thoughts shut up want air,
And spoil, like bales unopen'd to the sun.
Had thought been all, sweet speech had been deny'd; [too!
Speech, thought's canal! speech, thought's criterion Thought in the mine, may come forth gold, or dross;

When coin'd in word, we know its real worth.
If sterling, store it for thy future use;
'Twill buy thee benefit; perhaps renown.
Thought, too, deliver'd, is the more possess'd;
Teaching, we learn; and giving, we retain
The births of intellect; when dumb, forgot.
Speech ventilates our intellectual fire;
Speech burnishes our mental magazine;
Brightens, for ornament; and whets, for use.
What numbers, sheath'd in erudition, lie,
Plung'd to the hilts in venerable tomes,
And rusted in; who might have borne an edge,
And play'd a sprightly beam, if born to speech;
If born blest heirs of half their mother's tongue!
'Tis thought's exchange, which, like th' alternate push

Of waves conflicting, breaks the learned scum,
And defecates the student's standing pool,
In contemplation is his proud resource?
'Tis poor, as proud, by converse unsustain'd.
Rude thought runs wild in contemplation's field;

Converse, the menage, breaks it to the bit
Of due restraint; and emulation's spur
Gives graceful energy, by rivals aw'd.
'Tis converse qualifies for solitude;
As exercise, for salutary rest.

By that untutor'd, contemplation raves;
And nature's fool, by wisdom is undone.

Wisdom, though richer than Peruvian mines,
And sweeter than the sweet ambrosial hive,
What is she, but the means of happiness?
That unobtain'd, than folly more a fool;
A melancholy fool, without her bells.
Friendship, the means of wisdom, richly gives
The precious end, which makes our wisdom wise.
Nature, in zeal for human amity,
Denies, or damps, an undivided joy.
Joy is an import; joy is an exchange;
Joy flies monopolists: it calls for two;
Rich fruit! heaven-planted! never pluckt by one.
Needful auxiliars are our friends, to give
To social man true relish of himself.
Full on ourselves, descending in a line,
Pleasure's bright beam is feeble in delight:
Delight intense is taken by rebound;
Reverberated pleasures fire the breast.

Celestial happiness, whene'er she stoops
To visit earth, one shrine the goddess finds,
And one alone, to make her sweet amends
For absent heaven—the bosom of a friend;
Where heart meets heart, reciprocally soft,
Each other's pillow to repose divine.
Beware the counterfeit; in passion's flame
Hearts melt, but melt like ice, soon harder froze.
True love strikes root in reason; passion's foe:
Virtue alone entenders us for life:

I wrong her much—Entenders us for ever:
Of friendship's fairest fruits, the fruit most fair
Is virtue kindling at a rival fire,
And, emulously, rapid in her race.
O the soft enmity! endearing strife!
This carries friendship to her noon-tide point,
And gives the rivet of eternity. [themes,

From friendship, which outlives my former
Glorious survivor of old time and death;
From friendship, thus, that flower of heavenly seed;
The wise extracts earth's most Hyblean bliss,
Superior wisdom, crown'd with smiling joy.

But for whom blossoms this Elysian flower?
Abroad they find, who cherish it at home.
Lorenzo! pardon what my love extorts,
An honest love, and not afraid to frown.
Though choice of follies fasten on the great,
None clings more obstinate than fancy fond
That sacred friendship is their easy prey;
Caught by the wafture of a golden lure,
Or fascination of a high-borne smile.
Their smiles, the great, and the coquet, throw out
For others hearts, tenacious of their own;
And we no less of ours, when such the bait.
Ye fortune's cofferers! Ye powers of wealth!
Can gold gain friendship? Impudence of hope!
As well mere man an angel might beget.
Love, and love only, is the loan for love.
Lorenzo! pride repress; nor hope to find
A friend, but what has found a friend in thee.

All like the purchase; few the price will pay;
And this makes friends such miracles below.

What if (since daring on so nice a theme)
I show thee friendship delicate as dear,
Of tender violations apt to die?
Reserve will wound it; and distrust, destroy.
Deliberate in all things with thy friend.
But since friends grow not thick on every bough
Nor every friend unrotten at the core;
First, on thy friend, deliberate with thyself;
Pause, ponder, sift; not eager in the choice,
Nor jealous of the chosen; fixing, fix;
Judge before friendship, then confide till death.
Well, for thy friend; but nobler far for thee;
How gallant danger for earth's highest prize!
A friend is worth all hazards we can run.

"Poor is the friendless master of a world:
"A world in purchase for a friend is gain."

So sung he (angels hear that angels sing!
Angels from friendship gather half their joy)
So sung Philander, as his friend went round
In the rich ichor, in the generous blood
Of Bacchus, purple god of joyous wit,
A brow solute, and ever-laughing eye.
He drank long health, and virtue, to his friend;
His friend, who warm'd him more, who more in-spir'd.

Friendship's the wine of life; but friendship new
(Not such was his) is neither strong nor pure.
O for the bright complexion, cordial warmth,
And elevating spirit, of a friend,
For twenty summers ripening by my side,
All seculence of falsehood long thrown down;
All social virtues rising in his soul,
As crystal clear, and smiling as they rise!
Here nectar flows; it sparkles in our sight;
Rich to the taste, and genuine from the heart,
High-flavour'd bliss for gods! on earth how rare!
On earth how lost!—Philander is no more.

Think'st thou the theme intoxicates my song?
Am I too warm? Too warm I cannot be.
I lov'd him much, but now I love him more.
Like birds, whose beauties languish, half conceal'd,
Till, mounted on the wing, their glossy plumes
Expanded shine with azure, green, and gold:
How blessings brighten as they take their flight!
His flight Philander took; his upward flight,
If ever soul ascended. Had he dropp'd,
(That eagle genius!) O had he let fall
One feather as he flew, I then had wrote
What friends might flatter, prudent foes forbear,
Rivals scarce damn, and Zoilus reprieve.
Yet what I can, I must; it were profane
To quench a glory lighted at the skies,
And cast in shadows his illustrious close.
Strange! the theme most affecting, most sublime,
Momentous most to man, should sleep unsung!
And yet it sleeps, by genius unawak'd,
Painim or Christian; to the blush of wit
Man's highest triumph! man's profoundest fall!
The death-bed of the just, is yet undrawn
By mortal hand! it merits a divine:
Angels should paint it, angels ever there,
There, on a post of honour and of joy.

Dare I presume then?—but Philander bids,

And glory tempts, and inclination calls—
 Yet am I struck, as struck the soul beneath
 Aërial groves impenetrable gloom;
 Or in some mighty ruin's solemn shade;
 Or, gazing by pale lamps on high-born dust,
 In vaults: thin courts of poor unflatter'd kings;
 Or at the midnight altar's hallow'd flame.
 Is it religion to proceed? I pause—
 And enter, aw'd, the temple of my theme.
 Is it his death-bed? No; it is his shrine:
 Behold him there just rising to a god. [fate]

The chamber where the good man meets his
 Is privileg'd beyond the common walk
 Of virtuous life, quite in the verge of heaven.
 Fly, ye profane! if not, draw near with awe,
 Receive the blessing, and adore the chance,
 That threw in this Bethesda your disease;
 If unrestor'd by this, despair your cure.
 For here resistless demonstration dwells;
 A death-bed's a detector of the heart.
Here tir'd dissimulation drops her masque
 Through life's grimace, that mistress of the scene!
Here real and apparent are the same.

You see the man: you see his hold on heaven,
 If sound his virtue, as Philander's sound. [friends]
 Heaven waits not the last moment; owns her
 On this side death, and points them out to men,
 A lecture silent, but of sovereign power!
 To vice confusion, and to virtue peace.

Whatever farce the boastful hero plays,
 Virtue alone has majesty in death!
 And greater still, the more the tyrant frowns.
 Philander! he severely frown'd on thee.

"No warning given! Unceremonious fate!"

"A sudden rush from life's meridian joy!"

"A wrench from all we love! from all we are!"

"A restless bed of pain! a plunge opaque

"Beyond conjecture! feeble nature's dread!"

"Strong reason's shudder at the dark unknown!"

"A sun extinguish'd! a just-opening grave!"

"And, Oh! the last, last, what? (can words express?"

"Thought reach it?) the last—silence of a friend!"

Where are those horrors, that amazement, where,
 This hideous group of ills, which singly shock,
 Demand from man?—I thought him man till now.

Through nature's wreck, through vanquish'd agonies, [gloom]

(Like the stars struggling through this midnight
 What gleams of joy! what more than human peace!

Where the frail mortal? the poor abject worm?

No, not in death, the mortal to be found.

His conduct is a legacy for all;

Richer than Mammon's for his single heir.

His comforters he comforts; great in ruin,

With unreluctant grandeur, gives, not yields,

His soul sublime, and closes with his fate.

How our hearts burn'd within us at the scene;

Whence this brave bound o'er limits fix'd to man?

His God sustains him in his final hour!

His final hour brings glory to his God!

Man's glory heaven vouchsafes to call her own.

We gaze, we weep; mix'd tears of grief, of joy!

Amazement strikes! devotion bursts to flame!

Christians adore! and Infidels believe!

As some tall tower, or lofty mountain's brow,
 Detains the sun, illustrious, from its height;
 While rising vapours, and descending shades,
 With damps and darkness drown the spacious vale;

Undamp'd by doubt, undarken'd by despair,
 Philander thus augustly rears his head
 At that black hour, which general horror sheds
 On the low level of th' inglorious throng:
 Sweet peace, and heavenly hope, and humble joy,
 Divinely beam on his exalted soul;
 Destruction gild, and crown him for the skies,
 With incommunicable lustre bright.

NIGHT III.

N A R C I S S A.

TO HER GRACE THE DUCHESS OF PORTLAND.

"Ignoscenda quidem, scirent si ignoscere
 "manes."

VIRG.

From dreams, where thought in fancy's maze runs
 mad,

To reason, that heaven-lighted lamp in man,
 Once more I wake; and at the destin'd hour,
 Punctual as lovers to the moment sworn,
 I keep my assignation with my woe.

O! lost to virtue, lost to manly thought,

Lost to the noble sallies of the soul!

Who think it solitude to be alone.

Communion sweet! communion large and high!

Our reason, guardian angel, and our God!

Then nearest these when others most remote;

And all ere long shall be remote but these.

How dreadful then to meet them all alone,

A stranger! unacknowledg'd, unprov'd!

Now woo them, wed them, bind them to thy
 breast;

To win thy wish, creation has no more.

Or if we wish a fourth, it is a friend—

But friends, how mortal, dangerous the desire!

Take Phœbus to yourselves, ye basking bards!

Inebriate at fair fortune's fountain-head,

And reeling through the wilderness of joy;

Where sense runs savage, broke from reason's chain,

And sings false peace, till smother'd by the pall.

My fortune is unlike; unlike my song;

Unlike the deity my song invokes.

I to day's soft-ey'd sister pay my court,

(Endymion's rival!) and her aid implore;

Now first implor'd in succour to the muse.

Thou, who didst lately borrow Cynthia's form

And modestly forego thine own! O thou,

Who didst thyself at midnight hours inspire!

Say, why not Cynthia patroness of song?

As thou her crescent, she thy character

Assumes; still more a goddess by the change.

Are there demurring wits who dare dispute

This revolution in the world inspir'd?

Ye train Pierian! to the lunar sphere,

In silent hour, address your ardent call

For aid immortal; lest her brother's right.

* At the Duke of Norfolk's masquerade.

She, with the spheres harmonious, nightly leads
The mazy dance, and hears their matchless strain;
A strain for gods, deny'd to mortal ear.
Transmit it heard, thou silver queen of heaven!
What title, or what name, endears the most?
Cynthia! Cyllené! Phœbe! or dost hear
With higher gust fair Portland of the skies!
Is that the soft enchantment calls thee down,
More powerful than of old Circean charm?
Come; but from heavenly banquets with thee bring

The soul of song, and whisper in my ear
The theft divine; or in propitious dreams
(For dreams are thine) transfuse it through the breast

Of thy first votary, but not thy last,
If, like thy namesake, thou art ever kind.

And kind thou wilt be; kind on such a theme;
A theme so like thee, a quite lunar theme,
Soft, modest, melancholy, female, fair!

A theme that rose all pale, and told my soul
'Twas night; on her fond hopes perpetual night;
A night which struck a damp, a deadlier damp
Than that which smote me from Philander's tomb.
Narcissa follows, ere his tomb is clos'd.

Woes cluster; rare are solitary woes;
They love a train, they tread each others heel;
Her death invades his mournful right, and claims
The grief that started from my lids for him:
Seizes the faithless alienated tear,

Or shares it ere it falls. So frequent death,
Sorrow he more than causes, he confounds;
For human sighs his rival strokes contend,
And make distress, distraction. Oh Philander!
What was thy fate? A double fate to me;
Portent and pain, a menace and a blow,
Like the black raven hovering o'er my peace,
Not less a bird of omen than of prey.

It call'd Narcissa long before her hour;
It call'd her tender soul, by break of bliss,
From the first blossom, from the buds of joy;
Those few our noxious fate unblasted leaves
In this inclement clime of human life.

Sweet harmonist! and beautiful as sweet!
And young as beautiful! and soft as young!
And gay as soft! and innocent as gay!

And happy (if aught happy here) as good!
For fortune fond had built her nest on high.
Like birds quite exquisite of note and plume,
'Transfix'd by fate (who loves a lofty mark,)
How from the summit of the grove she fell,
And left it unharmonious. All its charms
Extinguish'd in the wonders of her song!
Her song still vibrates in my ravish'd ear,
Still melting there, and with voluptuous pain
(O to forget her!) thrilling through my heart!

Song, beauty, youth, love, virtue, joy; this group

Of bright ideas, flowers of paradise,
As yet unforfeit! in one blaze we bind,
Kneel and present it to the skies, as all
We guess of heaven: and these were all her own.
And she was mine; and I was—was!—most blest—

Gay title of the deepest misery!

As bodies grow more ponderous robb'd of life,
Good lost weighs more in grief than gain'd in joy,
Like blossom'd trees o'erturn'd by vernal storm,
Lovely in death the beauteous ruin lay;
And if in death still lovely, lovelier there,
Far lovelier! pity swells the tide of love.
And will not the severe excuse a sigh?
Scorn the proud man that is ashamed to weep;
Our tears indulg'd indeed deserve our shame.
Ye that e'er lost an angel, pity me!

Soon as the lustre languish'd in her eye,
Dawning a dimmer day on human sight,
And on her cheek, the residence of spring,
Pale omen sat, and scatter'd fears around
On all that saw (and who would cease to gaze
That once had seen?) with haste, parental haste,
I flew, I snatch'd her from the rigid north,
Her native bed, on which bleak Boreas blew,
And bore her nearer to the sun: the sun
(As if the sun could envy) check'd his beam,
Deny'd his wonted succour; nor with more
Regret beheld her drooping than the bells
Of lilies; fairest lilies not so fair!

Queen lilies! and ye painted populace!
Who dwell in fields, and lead ambrosial lives,
In morn and evening dew your beauties bathe,
And drink the sun; which gives your cheeks to glow,

And out-blush (mine excepted) every fair;
You gladlier grew ambitious of her hand,
Which often cropt your odours, incense meet
To thought so pure! Ye lovely fugitives!
Coeval race with man! for man you smile;
Why not smile at him too? You share indeed
His sudden pass, but not his constant pain.

So man is made; nought ministers delight
By what his glowing passions can engage;
And glowing passions, bent on aught below,
Must, soon or late, with anguish turn the scale;
And anguish, after rapture, how severe! [divine,
Rapture! Bold man! who tempt'st the wrath
By plucking fruit denied to mortal taste,
While here, presuming on the rights of heaven.

For transport dost thou call on every hour,
Lorenzo? At thy friend's expence be wise;
Lean not on earth; 'twill pierce thee to the heart;
A broken reed at best, but oft a spear;
On its sharp point peace bleeds, and hope expires.

Turn, hopeless thought! turn from her:—
Thought repell'd

Repenting rallies, and wakes every woe.
Snatch'd ere thy prime! and in thy bridal hour!
And when kind fortune, with thy lover, smil'd!
And when high flavour'd thy fresh opening joys!
And when blind man pronounc'd thy bliss complete!

And on a foreign shore, where strangers wept!
Strangers to thee; and, more surprising still,
Strangers to kindness, wept: their eyes let fall
Inhuman tears! strange tears! that trickled down
From marble hearts! obdurate tenderness!
A tenderness that call'd them more severe;
In spite of nature's soft persuasion steel'd;
While nature melted, superstition rav'd;
That mourn'd the dead, and this denied a grave.

Their sighs incens'd; sighs foreign to the will!
 Their will the tiger suck'd, outrag'd the storm.
 For, oh! the curst ungodliness of zeal!
 While sinful flesh relented, spirit nurst
 In blind infallibility's embrace,
 The fainted spirit petrify'd the breast;
 Deny'd the charity of dust, to spread
 O'er dust! a charity their dogs enjoy.
 What could I do? What succour? What resource?
 With pious sacrilege, a grave I stole;
 With impious piety, that grave I wrong'd;
 Short in my duty; coward in my grief!
 More like her murderer, than friend, I crept,
 With soft-suspended step, and muffled deep
 In midnight darkness, whisper'd my last sigh.
 I whisper'd what should echo through their realms;
 Nor writ her name, whose tomb should pierce the skies.

Presumptuous fear! How durst I dread her foes,
 While nature's loudest dictates I obey'd?
 Pardon necessity, blest shade! of grief
 And indignation rival bursts I pour'd;
 Half execration mingled with my prayer;
 Kindled at man, while I his God ador'd;
 Sore grudg'd the savage land her sacred dust;
 Stamp'd the curs'd soil; and with humanity
 (Denied Narcissa) wish'd them all a grave.

Glow's my resentment into guilt? What guilt
 Can equal violations of the dead?
 The dead how sacred! Sacred is the dust
 Of this heaven-labour'd form, erect, divine!
 This heaven-assum'd majestic robe of earth,
 He deign'd to wear, who hung the vast expanse
 With azure bright, and cloath'd the sun in gold.
 When every passion sleeps that can offend;
 When strikes us every motive that can melt;
 When man can wreak his rancour uncontroul'd,
 That strongest curb on insult and ill-will;
 Then, spleen to dust? the dust of innocence?
 An angel's dust?—This Lucifer transcends;
 When he contended for the patriarch's bones,
 'Twas not the strife of malice, but of pride;
 The strife of pontiff pride, not pontiff gall.

For less than this is shocking in a race
 Most wretched, but from streams of mutual love;
 And uncreated, but for love divine;
 And, but for love divine, this moment lost,
 Ey fate reorb'd, and sunk in endless night.
 Man hard of heart to man! of horrid things
 Most horrid! 'mid stupendous, highly strange!
 Yet oft his courtesies are smoother wrongs;
 Pride brandishes the favours he confers,
 And contumelious his humanity:
 What then his vengeance? Hear it not, ye stars!

And thou, pale moon! turn paler at the sound;
 Man is to man the forest, surest ill.
 A previous blast foretells the rising storm;
 O'erwhelming turrets threaten ere they fall;
 Volcanos bellow ere they disembogue;
 Earth trembles ere her yawning jaws devour;
 And smoke betrays the wide consuming fire:
 Ruin from man is most conceal'd when near,
 And sends the dreadful tidings in the blow.
 Is this the flight of fancy? Would it were!

Heaven's Sovereign saves all beings, but himself,
 That hideous sight, a naked human heart.

Fir'd is the muse? And let the muse be fir'd;
 Who not inflam'd, when what he speaks, he feels,
 And in the nerve most tender, in his friends?
 Shame to mankind! Philander had his foes:
 He felt the truths I sing, and I in him.
 But he, nor I, feel more: past ills, Narcissa!
 Are sunk in thee, thou recent wound of heart!
 Which bleeds with other cares, with other pangs;
 Pangs numerous, as the numerous ills that swarm'd
 O'er thy distinguish'd fate, and, clustering there
 Thick as the locusts on the land of Nile,
 Made death more deadly, and more dark the grave.
 Reflect (if not forgot my touching tale)
 How was each circumstance with aspics arm'd?
 An aspic, each! and all, an Hydra woe:
 What strong Herculean virtue could suffice?—
 Or is it virtue to be conquer'd here?
 This hoary cheek a train of tears bedews;
 And each tear mourns its own distinct distress;
 And each distress, distinctly mourn'd, demands
 Of grief still more, as heighten'd by the whole.
 A grief like this proprietors excludes:
 Not friends alone such obsequies deplore;
 They make mankind the mourner; carry sighs
 Far as the fatal fame can wing her way;
 And turn the gayest thought of gayest age,
 Down their right channel, through the vale of death.

The vale of death! that hush'd Cimmerian vale,
 Where darkness, brooding o'er unfinish'd fates,
 With raven wing incumbent, waits the day
 (Dread day!) that interdicts all future change!
 That subterranean world, that land of ruin!
 Fit walk, Lorenzo, for proud human thought!
 There let my thought expatiate, and explore
 Balsamic truths and healing sentiments,
 Of all most wanted, and most welcome, here.
 For gay Lorenzo's sake, and for thy own,
 My soul! "The fruits of dying friends survey:
 "Expose the vain of life; weigh life and death;
 "Give death his eulogy; thy fear subdue;
 "And labour that first palm of noble minds,
 "A manly scorn of terror from the tomb."

This harvest reap from thy Narcissa's grave.
 As poet's feign'd from Ajax' streaming blood
 Arose, with grief inscrib'd, a mournful flower;
 Let wisdom blossom from my mortal wound.
 And first, of dying friends; what fruit from these?
 It brings us more than triple aid; an aid
 To chase our thoughtlessness, fear, pride and guilt.

Our dying friends come o'er us like a cloud,
 To damp our brainless ardors; and abate
 That glare of life which often blinds the wise.
 Our dying friends are pioneers, to smooth
 Our rugged pass to death; to break those bars
 Of terror, and abhorrence, nature throws
 Cross our obstructed way; and, thus to make
 Welcome, as safe, our port from every storm.
 Each friend by fate snatch'd from us, is a plume
 Pluck'd from the wing of human vanity,
 Which makes us stoop from our aerial heights,
 And, damp't with omen of our own decease,
 On drooping pinions of ambition lower'd,

Just skim earth's surface, ere we break it up,
O'er putrid earth to scratch a little dust,
And save the world a nuisance. Smitten friends
Are angels sent on errands full of love;
For us they languish, and for us they die:
And shall they languish, shall they die, in vain?
Ungrateful, shall we grieve their hovering shades,
Which wait the revolution in our hearts?
Shall we disdain their silent, soft address;
Their posthumous advice, and pious prayer?
Senseless, as herds that graze their hallow'd graves,
Tread under foot their agonies and groans;
Frustrate their anguish, and destroy their deaths?

Lorenzo! no; the thought of death indulge;
Give it its wholesome empire! let it reign,
That kind chastiser of thy soul in joy!
Its reign will spread thy glorious conquests far,
And still the tumults of thy ruffled breast:
Auspicious era! golden days, begin!
The thought of death shall, like a god, inspire.
And why not think on death? Is life the theme
Of every thought? and wish of every hour?
And song of every joy? Surprising truth!
The beaten spaniel's fondness not so strange.
To wave the numerous ills that seize on life
As their own property, their lawful prey;
Ere man has measur'd half his weary stage,
His luxuries have left him no reserve,
No maiden relishes, unbroach'd delights;
On cold serv'd repetitions he subsists,
And in the tasteless present chews the past;
Disgusted chews, and scarce can swallow down.
Like lavish ancestors, his earlier years
Have disinherited his future hours,
Which starve on orts, and glean their former field.

Live ever here, Lorenzo!—shocking thought!
So shocking, they who wish, disown it too;
Disown from shame, what they from folly crave.
Live ever in the womb, nor see the light?
For what live ever here?—With labouring step
To tread our former footsteps? Pace the round
Eternal? To climb life's worn, heavy wheel,
Which draws up nothing new? To beat, and beat
The beaten track? To bid each wretched day
The former mock? To surfeit on the same,
And yawn our joys? Or thank a misery [seen?
For change, though sad? To see what we have
Hear, till unheard, the same old flabber'd tale?
To taste the tasted, and at each return
Less tasteful? O'er our palates to decant
Another vintage? Strain a fatter year,
Through loaded vessels, and a laxer tone?
Crazy machines to grind earth's wasted fruits!
Ill ground, and worse connected! load, not life!
The rational soul kennels of excess!
Still-streaming thorough-fares of dull debauch!
Trembling each gulp, lest death should snatch the bowl.

Such of our fine-ones is the wish refin'd!
So would they have it: elegant desire!
Why not invite the bellowing stalls, and wilds?
But such examples might their riot awe.
Through want of virtue, that is, want of thought, (Though on bright thought they father all their flights)

To what are they reduc'd? To love, and hate,
The same vain world; to censure, and espouse,
This painted shrew of life, who calls them fool
Each moment of each day; to flatter bad
Through dread of worse? to cling to this rude
rock,

Barren to them of good, and sharp with ills,
And hourly blacken'd with impending storms,
And infamous for wrecks of human hope—
Scar'd at the gloomy gulf, that yawns beneath.
Such are their triumphs! such their pangs of joy!

'Tis time, high time, to shift this dismal scene.
This bugg'd, this bideous state, what art can cure?
One only; but that one, what all may reach;
Virtue—she, wonder-working goddess! charms
That rock to bloom; and tames the painted shrew;
And, what will more surprise, Lorenzo! gives
To life's sick, nauseous iteration, change;
And straightens nature's circle to a line.
Believ'st thou this, Lorenzo? lend an ear,
A patient ear; thou'lt blush to disbelieve.

A languid, leaden, iteration reigns,
And ever must, o'er those, whose joys are joys
Of sight, smell, taste: the cuckoo-seasons sing
The same dull note to such as nothing prize,
But what those seasons, from the teeming earth,
To doating sense indulge. But nobler minds,
Which relish fruits unripen'd by the sun,
Make their days various; various as the dyes
On the dove's neck, which wanton in his rays,
On minds of dove-like innocence possess'd,
On lighten'd minds, that bask in virtue's beams,
Nothing hangs tedious, nothing old revolves
In that, for which they long; for which they live.
Their glorious efforts, wing'd with heavenly hope,
Each rising morning sees still higher rise;
Each bounteous dawn its novelty presents
To worth maturing, new strength, lustre, fame;
While nature's circle, like a chariot-wheel
Rolling beneath their elevated aims,
Makes their fair prospect fairer every hour;
Advancing virtue, in a line to bliss;
Virtue, which Christian motives best inspire!
And bliss, which Christian schemes alone ensure?
And shall we then, for virtue's sake, commence
Apostates; and turn infidels for joy?
A truth it is, few doubt, but fewer trust,
“He sins against this life, who flights the next.”
What is this life? How few their favourite know?
Fond in the dark, and blind in our embrace,
By passionately loving life, we make
Lov'd life unlovely; hugging her to death.
We give to time eternity's regard;
And, dreaming, take our passage for our port.
Life has no value as an end, but means;
An end deplorable! a means divine!
When 'tis our all, 'tis nothing; worse than nought;
A nest of pains: when held as nothing, much:
Like some fair humourists, life is most enjoy'd.
When courted least; most worth, when disesteem'd:
Then 'tis the seat of comfort, rich in peace;
In prospect richer far; important! awful!
Not to be mention'd, but with shouts of praise!
Not to be thought on, but with tides of joy!
The mighty basis of eternal bliss!

Where now the barren rock? the painted shew?
 Where now, Lorenzo! life's eternal round?
 Have I not made my triple promise good?
 Vain is the world; but only to the vain.
 To what compare we then this varying scene,
 Whose worth ambiguous rises, and declines?
 Waxes, and wanes? (In all propitious, night
 Afflicts me here) compare it to the moon;
 Dark in herself, and indigent; but rich
 In borrow'd lustre from a higher sphere.
 When gross guilt interposes, labouring earth,
 O'ershadow'd, mourns a deep eclipse of joy;
 Her joys, at brightest, pallid, to that fount
 Of full effulgent glory, whence they flow.

Nor is that glory distant: oh Lorenzo!
 A good man, and an angel! these between
 How thin the barrier! what divides their fate!
 Perhaps a moment, or perhaps a year;
 Or, if an age, it is a moment still;
 A moment, or eternity's forgot.
 Then be, what once they were, who now are gods;
 Be what Philander was, and claim the skies.
 Starts timid nature at the gloomy pass?
 The soft transition call it; and be cheer'd:
 Such it is often, and why not to thee?
 To hope the best, is pious, brave, and wise;
 And may itself procure, what it presumes.
 Life is much flatter'd, death is much traduc'd;
 Compare the rivals, and the kinder crown.
 "Strange competition!"—True, Lorenzo, strange!
 So little life can cast into the scale.

Life makes the soul dependent on the dust;
 Death gives her wings to mount above the spheres.
 Through chinks, styl'd organs, dim life peeps at light;

Death bursts th' involving cloud, and all is day;
 All eye, all ear, the disembod' d power.
 Death has feign'd evils, nature shall not feel;
 Life, ills substantial, wisdom cannot shun.
 Is not the mighty mind, that son of heaven!
 By tyrant life dethron'd, imprison'd, pain'd?
 By death enlarg'd, enobled, deify'd?
 Death but entombs the body; life the soul.

"Is death then guiltless! How he marks his way
 "With dreadful waste of what deserves to shine!
 "Art, genius, fortune, elevated power!
 "With various lustres these light up the world,
 "Which death puts out, and darkens human race."
 I grant, Lorenzo! this indictment just:
 The sage, peer, potentate, king, conqueror!
 Death humbles these; more barbarous life the man.
 Life is the triumph of our mouldering clay;
 Death, of the spirit infinite! divine!
 Death has no dread, but what frail life imparts;
 Nor life true joy, but what kind death improves.
 No bliss has life to boast, till death can give
 Far greater; life's a debtor to the grave,
 Dark lattice! letting in eternal day.

Lorenzo! blush at fondness for a life
 Which sends celestial souls on errands vile,
 To cater for the sense; and serve at boards,
 Where every ranger of the wilds, perhaps
 Each reptile, justly claims our upper hand.
 Luxurious feast! a soul, a soul immortal,
 In all the dainties of a brute bemir'd!
 Lorenzo! blush at terror for a death,

Which gives thee to repose in festive bowers,
 Where nectars sparkle, angels minister,
 And more than angels share, and raise, and crown,
 And eternise, the birth, bloom, bursts of bliss.
 What need I more? O death, the palm is thine.

Then welcome, death! thy dreaded harbingers,
 Age, and disease; disease, though long my guest;
 That plucks my nerves, those tender strings of life;
 Which, pluck'd a little more, will toll the bell,
 That call my few friends to my funeral;
 Where feeble nature drops, perhaps, a tear,
 While reason and religion, better taught,
 Congratulate the dead, and crown his tomb
 With wreath triumphant. Death is victory;
 It binds in chains the raging ills of life:
 Lust and ambition, wrath and avarice,
 Dragg'd at his chariot-wheel, applaud his power.
 That ills corrosive, cures importunate,
 Are not immortal too, O death! is thine.
 Our day of dissolution!—name it right;
 'Tis our great pay-day; 'tis our harvest rich
 And ripe: what though the sickle, sometimes keen,

Just scars us as we reap the golden grain?
 More than thy balm, O Gilead! heals the wound.
 Birth's feeble cry, and death's deep dismal groan,
 Are slender tributes low-tax'd nature pays
 For mighty gain: the gain of each, a life!
 But O! the last the former so transcends,
 Life dies compar'd: Life lives beyond the grave.

And feel I, death! no joy from thought of thee?
 Death, the great counsellor, who man inspires
 With every nobler thought, and fairer deed!
 Death, the deliverer, who rescues man!
 Death, the rewarder, who the rescued crowns!
 Death, that absolves my birth; a curse without it!
 Rich death, that realizes all my cares,
 Toils, virtues, hopes; without a chimera!
 Death, of all pain the period, not of joy;
 Joy's source, and subject, still subsist unhurt;
 One, in my soul; and one, in her great Sire;
 Though the four winds were warring for my dust.
 Yes, and from winds, and waves, and central night,
 Though prison'd there, my dust too I reclaim,
 To dust when drop proud nature's proudest spheres)

And live entire. Death is the crown of life:
 Were death deny'd, poor man would live in vain;
 Were death deny'd, to live would not be life;
 Were death deny'd, ev'n fools would wish to die.
 Death wounds to cure: we fall, we rise, we reign!
 Spring from our fetters; fasten in the skies;
 Where blooming Eden withers in our sight:
 Death gives us more than was in Eden lost.
 This king of terrors is the prince of peace.
 When shall I die to vanity, pain, death?
 When shall I die?—when shall I live for ever?

NIGHT IV.

THE CHRISTIAN TRIUMPH.

Containing our only Cure for the Fear of Death;
 and proper Sentiments of that Inestimable Blessing.

TO THE HONOURABLE MR. YORKE.

A MUCH-INDEBTED muse, O Yorke! intrudes,
 Amid the smiles of fortune, and of youth,

Thine ear is patient of a serious song.
 How deep implanted in the breast of man
 The dread of death! I sing its sovereign cure.
 Why start at death? Where is he? Death arriv'd,
 Is past; not come or gone, he's never here.
 Ere hope, sensation fails; black-boding man
 Receives, not suffers, death's tremendous blow.
 The knell, the shroud, the mattock, and the grave;
 The deep damp vault, the darkness, and the worm;
 These are the bugbears of a winter's eve,
 The terrors of the living, not the dead.
Imagination's fool, and error's wretch,
 Man makes a death, which nature never made;
 Then on the point of his own fancy falls;
 And feels a thousand deaths, in fearing one.

But were death frightful, what has age to fear?
 If prudent, age should meet the friendly foe,
 And shelter in his hospitable gloom.
 I scarce can meet a monument, but holds
 My younger; every date cries—"Come away."
 And what recalls me? Look the world around,
 And tell me what: the wisest cannot tell.
 Should any born of women give his thought
 Full range on just dislike's unbounded field;
 Of things, the vanity; of men, the flaws;
 Flaws in the best; the many, flaw all o'er;
 As leopards spotted, or as Ethiops dark;
 Vivacious ill; good dying immature;
 (How immature, Narcissa's marble tells!)
 And at his death bequeathing endless pain;
 His heart, though bold, would sicken at the sight,
 And spend itself in sighs for future scenes.

But grant to life (and just it is to grant
 To lucky life) some perquisites of joy;
 A time there is, when, like a thrice-told tale,
 Long-rifled life of sweet can yield no more,
 But from our comment on the comedy,
 Pleasing reflections on parts well sustain'd,
 Or purpos'd emendations where we fail'd,
 Or hopes of plaudits from our candid judge,
 When on their exit, souls are bid unrobe,
 Toss fortune back her tinsel, and her plume,
 And drop this mask of flesh behind the scene.

With me, that time is come; my world is dead;
 A new world rises, and new manners reign:
 Foreign comedians, a spruce band! arrive,
 To push me from the scene, or hiss me there,
 What a pert race starts up! the strangers gaze,
 And I at them; my neighbour is unknown;
 Nor that the worst: Ah me! the dire effect
 Of loitering here, of death defrauded long;
 Of old so gracious (and let that suffice),
 My very master knows me not.—

Shall I dare say, peculiar is the fate?
 I've been so long remember'd, I'm forgot.
 An object ever pressing dims the sight,
 And hides behind its ardour to be seen.
 When in his courtiers ears I pour my plaint,
 They drink it as the nectar of the great;
 And squeeze my hand, and beg me come to-morrow.
Refus'd! canst thou wear a smoother form?

Indulge me, nor conceive I drop my theme:
 Who cheapens life, abates the fear of death:
 Twice told the period spent on stubborn Troy,

Court favour, yet untaken, I besiege;
 Ambition's ill-judg'd effort to be rich.
 Alas! ambition makes my little less;
 Embittering the posselt: Why wish for more?
Wishing, of all employments, is the worst;
 Philosophy's reverse; and health's decay!
 Were I as plump as stall'd theology,
Wishing would waste me to this shade again.
 Were I as wealthy as a South-sea dream,
Wishing is an expedient to be poor.
Wishing, that constant beelie of a fool;
 Caught at a court; purg'd off by purer air,
 And simpler diet; gifts of rural life!

Blest be that hand divine, which gently laid
 My heart at rest, beneath this humble shed.
 The world's a stately bark, on dangerous seas,
 With pleasure seen, but boarded at our peril;
Here, on a single plank, thrown safe ashore,
 I hear the tumult of the distant throng,
 As that of seas remote, or dying storms:
 And meditate on scenes, more silent still;
 Pursue my theme, and fight the fear of death.
Here, like a shepherd gazing from his hut,
 Touching his reed, or leaning on his staff,
 Eager ambition's a fiery chace I see;
 I see the circling hunt, of noisy men,
 Burst law's enclosure, leap the mounds of right,
 Pursuing, and pursued, each other's prey;
 As wolves, for rapine; as the fox, for wiles;
 Till death, that mighty hunter, earths them all.

Why all this toil for triumphs of an hour?
 What though we wade in wealth, or soar in fame?
 Earth's highest station ends in, "Here he lies,"
 And "dust to dust," concludes her noblest song.
 If this song lives, posterity shall know
 One, though in Britain born, with courtiers bred,
 Who thought ev'n gold might come a day too late;
 Nor on his subtle death-bed plann'd his scheme
 For future vacancies in church or state;
 Some avocation deeming it—to die,
 Unbit by rage canine of dying rich;
 Guilt's blunder! and the loudest laugh of hell.

O my coevals! remnants of yourselves!
 Poor human ruins, tottering o'er the grave!
 Shall we, shall aged men, like aged trees,
 Strike deeper their vile root, and closer cling,
 Still more enamour'd of this wretched soil?
 Shall our pale, wither'd hands, be still stretch'd out,
 Trembling at once with eagerness and age?
 With avarice and convulsions grasping hard?
 Grasping at air! for what has earth beside?
 Man wants but little; nor that little long;
 How soon must he resign his very dust,
 Which frugal nature lent him for an hour!
 Years unexperienc'd rush on numerous ills;
 And soon as man, expert from time, has found
 The key of life, it opens the gates of death.

When in this vale of years I backward look,
 And miss such numbers, numbers too of such,
 Firmer in health, and greener in their age,
 And stricter on their guard, and fitter far
 To play life's subtle game, I scarce believe
 I still survive: and am I fond of life,
 Who scarce can think it possible I live?
 Alive by miracle! or what is next,

Alive by Mead! if I am still alive,
Who long have bury'd what gives life to live,
Firmness of nerve, and energy of thought.
Life's lee is not more shallow than impure
And vapid; sense and reason show the door,
Call for my bier, and point me to the dust.

O thou great arbiter of life and death!
Nature's immortal, immaterial sun!
Whose all-prolific beam late call'd me forth
From darkness, teeming darkness, where I lay
The worm's inferior, and in rank beneath
The dust I tread on, high to bear my brow,
To drink the spirit of the golden day,
And triumph in existence; and could know
No motive, but my bliss; and hast ordain'd
A rise in blessing! with the patriarch's joy,
Thy call I follow to the land unknown;
I trust in thee, and know in whom I trust;
Or life, or death, is equal; neither weighs:
All weight in this—O let me live to thee!

Though nature's terrors thus may be repress'd;
Still frowns grim death; guilt points the tyrant's spear.

And whence all human guilt? From death forgot.
Ah me! too long I set at nought the swarm
Of friendly warnings, which around me flew;
And smil'd unsmitten: small my cause to smile!
Death's admonitions, like shafts upwards shot,
More dreadful by delay, the longer ere
They strike our hearts, the deeper is their wound.
O think how deep, Lorenzo! here it stings:
Who can appease its anguish? how it burns!
What hand the barb'd, invenom'd, thought can draw?

What healing hand can pour the balm of peace,
And turn my sight undaunted on the tomb?

With joy—with grief that healing hand I see;
Ah, too conspicuous! it is fix'd on high.
On high?—What means my phrenzy? I blaspheme;
Alas, how low! how far beneath the skies!
The skies it form'd; and now it bleeds for me—
But bleeds the balm I want—yet still it bleeds;
Draw the dire steel—ah no! the dreadful blessing
What heart or can sustain, or dares forego?
There hangs all human hope; that nail supports
The falling universe: that gone, we drop;
Horror receives us, and the dismal wish
Creation had been smother'd in her birth—
Darkness is his curtain, and his bed the dust;
When stars and sun are dust beneath his throne!
In heaven itself can such indulgence dwell?
O what a groan was there! a groan not his.
He seiz'd our dreadful right; the load sustain'd;
And heav'd the mountain from a guilty world.
A thousand worlds so bought, were bought too
dear;

Sensations new in angels bosoms rise;
Suspend their song; and make a pause in bliss.

O for their song, to reach my lofty theme!
Inspire me, night! with all thy tuneful spheres;
Whilst I with seraphs share seraphic themes,
And show to men the dignity of man;
Left I blaspheme my subject with my song.
Shall Pagan pages glow celestial flame,
And Christian languish? on our hearts, not heads,

Falls the foul infamy: my heart, awake!
What can awake thee, unawak'd by this,
“Expend'd deity on human weal?”

Feel the great truths, which burst the tenfold night
Of heathen error, with a golden flood
Of endless day: to feel, is to be fir'd;
And to believe, Lorenzo! is to feel.

Thou most indulgent, most tremendous power!
Still more tremendous, for thy wondrous love!
That arms, which awe more awful, thy commands;
And foul transgression dips in sevenfold night!
How our hearts tremble at thy love immense!
In love immense, inviolably just!
Thou, rather than thy justice should be stain'd,
Didst stain the cross; and work of wonders far
The greatest, that thy dearest far might bleed.

Bold thought! shall I dare speak it, or repress?
Should man more excerate, or boast, the guilt
Which rous'd such vengeance! which such love
inflam'd? [arms,

O'er guilt (how mountainous!) with out-stretch'd
Stern justice and soft-finiling love embrace,
Supporting, in full majesty, thy throne,
When seem'd its majesty to need support,
Or that, or man, inevitably lost;
What, but the fathomless of thought divine,
Could labour such expedient from despair,
And rescue both? both rescue! both exalt!
O how are both exalted by the deed!

The wondrous deed! or shall I call it more?
A wonder in omnipotence itself!

A mystery no less to gods than men!

Not thus, our infidels th' eternal draw,
A God all o'er, consummate, absolute,
Full orb'd, in his whole round of rays complete:
They set at odds heaven's jarring attributes;
And, with one excellence, another wound;
Maim heaven's perfection, break its equal beams,
Bid mercy triumph over—God himself,
Undeify'd by their opprobrious praise:
A God all mercy, is a God unjust.

Ye brainless wits! ye baptiz'd infidels!
Ye worse for mending! wash'd to fouler stains!
The ransom was paid down; the fund of heaven,
Heaven's inexhaustible, exhausted fund,
Amazing, and amaz'd, pour'd forth the price,
All price beyond: though curious to compute,
Archangels fail'd to cast the mighty sum:
Its value vast, ungrasp'd by minds create,
For ever hides, and glows, in the Supreme.

And was the ransom paid? it was: and paid
(What can exalt the bounty more?) for you.
The sun beheld it—no, the shocking scene
Drove back his chariot: midnight veil'd his face;
Not such as this; not such as nature makes;
A midnight nature shudder'd to behold;
A midnight new! a dread eclipse (without Opposing spheres) from her Creator's frown!
Sun! didst thou fly thy Maker's pain? Or start
At that enormous load of human guilt,
Which bow'd his blessed head; o'erwhelm'd his cross; [womb,

Made groan the centre; burst earth's marble
With pangs, strange pangs! deliver'd of her dead?
Hell howl'd; and heaven that hour let fall a tear;

Heaven wept, that men might smile ! heaven bled, that man
Might never die ! ———

And is devotion virtue ? 'Tis compell'd.
What heart of stone but glows at thoughts like these ?

Such contemplations mount us ; and should mount
The mind still higher ; nor ever glance on man,
Unraptur'd, uninflam'd. — Where roll my thoughts
To rest from wonders ? other wonders rise ;
And strike where'er they roll : my soul is caught :
Heaven's sovereign blessings, clustering from the cross,

Rush on her, in a throng, and close her round,
The prisoner of amaze ! — in his blest life
I see the path, and in his death the price,
And in his great ascent the proof supreme
Of immortality. — And did he rise ?

Hear, O ye nations ! hear it, O ye dead !
He rose ! he rose ! he burst the bars of death.

Lift up your heads, ye everlasting gates !
And give the king of glory to come in.

Who is the king of glory ? he who left
His throne of glory, for the pang of death !

Lift up your heads, ye everlasting gates !
And give the king of glory to come in.

Who is the king of glory ? he who flew
The ravenous foe, that gorg'd all human race !

The king of glory, he, whose glory fill'd
Heaven with amazement at his love to man ;

And with divine complacency beheld
Powers most illumin'd, wilder'd in the theme.

The theme, the joy, how then shall man sustain ?
Oh the burst gates ! crush'd sting ! demolish'd throne ! [heaven !

Last gasp of vanquish'd death. Shout earth and
This sum of good to man. Whose nature, then,

Took wing, and mounted with him from the tomb !
Then, then, I rose ; then first humanity

Triumphant past the crystal ports of light,
(Stupendous guest !) and seiz'd eternal youth,

Seiz'd in our name. E'er since, 'tis blasphemous
To call man mortal. Man's mortality [ration

Was, then, transferr'd to death ; and heaven's du-
Unalienably seal'd to this frail frame,

This child of dust — Man, all-immortal ! hail ;
Hail, heaven ! all lavish of strange gifts to man !

Thine all the glory ; man's the boundless bliss.

Where am I rapt by this triumphant theme,
On Christian joy's exulting wing, above

Th' Aonian mount ! — Alas ! small cause for joy !

What if to pain immortal ? if extent

Of being, to preclude a close of woe ?

Where, then, my boast of immortality ?

I boast it still, though cover'd o'er with guilt ;

For guilt, not innocence, his life he pour'd,

'Tis guilt alone can justify his death ;

Nor that, unless his death can justify

Relenting guilt in Heaven's indulgent sight.

If, sick of folly, I relent ; he writes

My name in heaven, with that inverted spear

(A spear deep-dipt in blood !) which pierc'd his

And open'd there a font for all mankind, [side,

Who strive, who combat crimes, to drink, and live :

This, only this, subdues the fear of death.

And what is this ? — Survey the wondrous cure !
And at each step, let higher wonder rise !

" Pardon for infinite offence ! and pardon

" Through means that speak its value infinite !

" A pardon bought with blood ! with blood divine !

" With blood divine of him I made my foe !

" Persisted to provoke ! though woo'd, and aw'd,

" Blest, and chastis'd, a flagrant rebel still !

" A rebel, 'midst the thunders of his throne !

" Nor I alone ! a rebel universe !

" My species up in arms ! not one exempt !

" Yet for the foulest of the foul, he dies,

" Most joy'd, for the redeem'd from deepest guilt !

" As if our race were held of highest rank ;

" And Godhead dearer, as more kind to man !"

Bound, every heart ! and every bosom burn !

O what a scale of miracles is here !

Its lowest round, high planted on the skies ;

Its towering summit lost beyond the thought

Of man or angel ! O that I could climb

The wonderful ascent, with equal praise !

Praise ! flow for ever (if astonishment

Will give thee leave) : my praise ! for ever flow ;

Praise ardent, cordial, constant, to high heaven

More fragrant, than Arabia sacrific'd,

And all her spicy mountains in a flame.

So dear, so due to heaven, shall praise descend,

With her soft plume (from plausive angels wing

First pluck'd my man) to tickle mortal ears,

Thus diving in the pockets of the great ?

Is praise the perquisite of every paw,

Though black as hell, that grapples well for gold ?

Oh, love of gold ! thou meanest of amours !

Shall praise her odours waste on virtue's dead,

Embalm the base, perfume the stench of guilt,

Earn dirty bread by washing Æthiops fair,

Removing filth, or sinking it from sight,

A scavenger in scenes, where vacant posts

Like gibbets yet untenanted, expect

Their future ornaments ? From courts and thrones,

Return, apostate praise ! thou vagabond !

Thou prostitute ! to thy first love return,

Thy first, thy greatest, once unrival'd theme.

There flow redundant ; like Meander flow,

Back to thy fountain ; to that parent Power,

Who gives the tongue to sound, the thought to soar,

The soul to be. Men homage pay to men,

Thoughtless beneath whose dreadful eye they bow

In mutual awe profound of clay to clay,

Of guilt to guilt ; and turn their back on thee,

Great Sire ! whom thrones celestial ceaseless sing :

To prostrate angels, an amazing scene !

O the presumption of man's awe for man !

Man's Author ! End ! Restorer ! Law ! and Judge !

Thine, all ; day thine, and thine this gloom of

night,

With all her wealth, with all her radiant worlds :

What, night eternal, but a frown from thee ?

What, heaven's meridian glory, but thy smile ?

And shall not praise be thine, not human praise ?

While heaven's high host on hallelujahs tive ?

O may I breathe no longer, than I breathe

My soul in praise to him, who gave my soul,

And all her infinite of prospect fair,

Cut through the shades of hell, great love! by thee
O most adorable! most unador'd! [end?
Where shall that praise begin, which ne'er should Where'er I turn, what claim on all applause!
How is night's sable mantle labour'd o'er,
How richly wrought with attributes divine!
What wisdom shines! what love! this midnight
pomp,

This gorgeous arch, with golden worlds inlay'd!
Built with divine ambition! nought to thee;
For others this profusion: Thou, apart,
Above! beyond! O tell me, mighty mind!
Where art thou? Shall I dive into the deep?
Call to the sun, or ask the roaring winds,
For their Creator? Shall I question loud
The thunder, if in that th' Almighty dwells?
Or holds he furious storms in streighten'd reins,
And bids fierce whirlwinds wheel his rapid car?

What mean these questions?—Trembling I retract;

My prostrate soul adores the present God:
Praise I a distant Deity? He tunes [tains:
My voice (if tun'd): the nerve, that writes, suf-
Wrapt in his being, I resound his praise:
But though past all diffus'd, without a shore,
His essence; local is his throne (as meet),
To gather the dispers'd (as standards call
The lifted from afar): to fix a point,
A central point, collective of his sons,
Since finite every nature but his own.

The nameless He, whose nod is nature's birth;
And nature's shield, the shadow of his hand;
Her dissolution, his suspended smile!
The great First-Last! pavilion'd high he sits,
In darkness from excessive splendour borne,
By gods unseen, unless through lustre lost.
His glory, to created glory, bright,
As that to central horrors; he looks down
On all that soars; and spans immensity. [view,

Though night unnumber'd worlds unfolds to Boundless creation! what art thou? A beam,
A mere effluvia of his majesty:
And shall an atom of this atom-world
Mutter, in dust and sin, the theme of Heaven?
Down to the centre should I send my thought
Through beds of glittering ore, and glowing gems,
Their beggar'd blaze wants lustre for my lay;
Goes out in darkness: if, on towering wing,
I send it through the boundless vault of stars!
The stars, though rich, what drops their gold to
thee,

Great, good, wise, wonderful, eternal King!
If to those conscious stars thy throne around,
Praise ever-pouring, and imbibing bliss;
And ask their strain; they want it, more they want,
Poor their abundance, humble their sublime,
Languid their energy, their ardour cold,
Indebted still, their highest rapture burns;
Short of its mark defective, though divine.

Still more—This theme is man's, and man's alone;

Their vast appointments reach it not: they see
On earth a bounty not indulg'd on high;
And downward look for heaven's superior praise!
Fast-born of Ether! high in fields of light!

View man, to see the glory of your God!
Could angels envy, they had envy'd here;
And some did envy; and the rest, though gods,
Yet still gods unredeem'd (there triumphs man, Tempted to weigh the dust against the skies)
They less would feel, though more adorn, my theme,

They sung creation (for in that they shar'd):
How rose in melody, that child of love!
Creation's great superior, man! is thine;
Thine is redemption; they just gave the key:
'Tis thine to raise, and eternize, the song;
Though human, yet divine; for should not this
Raise man o'er man, and kindle seraphs here?
Redemption! 'twas creation more sublime;
Redemption! 'twas the labour of the skies;
Far more than labour---It was death in heaven.
A truth so strange! 'twere bold to think it true;
If not far bolder still to disbelieve! [heaven?

Here pause, and ponder: was there death in What then on earth? On earth, which struck the blow?

Who struck it? Who?---O how is man enlarg'd Seen through this medium! how the pigmy towers!

How counterpois'd his origin from dust!
How counterpois'd, to dust his sad return!
How voided his vast distance from the skies!
How near he presses on the seraph's wing!
Which is the seraph? Which the born of clay?
How this demonstrates, through the thickest cloud
Of guilt, and clay condens'd, the son of heaven!
The double son; the made, and the re-made!
And shall heaven's double property be lost?
Man's double madness only can destroy.
To man the bleeding cross has promis'd all;
The bleeding cross has sworn eternal grace;
Who gave his life, what grace shall he deny?
O ye! who, from this rock of ages, leap,
Apostates, plunging headlong in the deep!
What cordial joy, what consolation strong,
Whatever winds arise, or billows roll,
Our interest in the master of the storm!
Cling there, and in wreck'd nature's ruins smile;
While vile apostates tremble in a calm.

Man! know thyself. All wisdom centres there;
To none man seems ignoble, but to man;
Angels that grandeur, men o'er-look, admire:
How long shall human nature be their book,
Degenerate mortal! and unread by thee?
The beam dim reason sheds shows wonders there;
What high contents! Illustrious faculties!
But the grand comment, which displays at full
Our human height, scarce sever'd from divine,
By heaven compos'd, was publish'd on the cross.

Who looks on that, and sees not in himself
An awful stranger, a terrestrial god?
A glorious partner with the Deity
In that high attribute, immortal life?
If a God bleeds, he bleeds not for a worm:
I gaze, and, as I gaze, my mounting soul
Catches strange fire, eternity! at thee;
And drops the world—or rather, more enjoys:
How chang'd the face of nature! how improv'd!
What seem'd a chaos, shines a glorious world,

Reason alone baptiz'd? alone ordain'd
To touch things sacred? Oh for warmer still!
Guilt chills my zeal, and age benumbs my powers;
Oh for an humbler heart! and prouder song!
Thou, my much injur'd theme! with that soft
eye

Which melted o'er doom'd Salem, deign to look
Compassion to the coldness of my breast;
And pardon to the winter in my strain.

Oh ye cold-hearted, frozen, formalists!
On such a theme, 'tis impious to be calm;
Passion is reason, transport temper, here.
Shall heaven, which gave us ardour, and has shown
Her own for man so strongly, not disdain
What smooth emollients in theology,
Recumbent virtue's downy doctors, preach;
That prose of piety, a lukewarm praise?
Rise odours sweet from incense uninflam'd?
Devotion, when lukewarm, is undevout;
But when it glows, its heat is struck to heaven;
To human hearts her golden harps are strung:
High heaven's orchestra chaunts amen to man.

Hear I, or dream I hear, their distant strain,
Sweet to the soul, and tasting strong of heaven,
Soft-wafted on celestial pity's plume,
Through the vast spaces of the universe,
To cheer me in this melancholy gloom?
Oh when will death (now stingsless), like a friend,
Admit me of their choir? O when will death
This mouldering, old, partition-wall throw down?
Give beings, one in nature, one abode?
Oh death divine! that giv'st us to the skies!
Great future! glorious patron of the past,
And present! when shall I thy shrine adore?
From nature's continent, immensely wide,
Immensely blest, this little isle of life,
This dark, incarcerated colony,
Divides us. Happy day! that breaks our chain;
That manumits; that calls from exile home;
That leads to nature's great metropolis,
And re-admits us, through the guardian hand
Of elder brothers, to our Father's throne;
Who hears our Advocate, and, through his wounds
Beholding man, allows that tender name.
'Tis this makes Christian triumph a command:
'Tis this makes joy a duty to the wise;
'Tis impious in a good man to be sad.

See thou, Lorenzo! where hangs all our hope?
Touch'd by the Cross, we live; or, more than die;
That touch which touch'd not angels; more divine
Than that which touch'd confusion into form,
And darkness into glory; partial touch!
Ineffably pre-eminent regard!

Sacred to man, and sovereign through the whole
Long golden chain of miracles, which hangs
From heaven through all duration, and supports
In one illustrious and amazing plan,
Thy welfare, nature? and thy God's renown.
That touch, with charm celestial, heals the soul
Diseas'd, drives pain from guilt, lights life in death,
Turns earth to heaven, to heavenly thrones transforms

The ghastly ruins of the mouldering tomb.

Dost ask me when? When he who dy'd returns; Returns, how chang'd! Where then the man of woe?

In glory's terrors all the Godhead burns;
And all his courts, exhausted by the tide
Of deities triumphant in his train,
Leave a stupendous solitude in heaven;
Replenish'd soon, replenish'd with increase
Of pomp, and multitude; a radiant band
Of angels new; of angels from the tomb.

Is this my fancy thrown remote; and rise
Dark doubts between the promise and event?
I send thee not to volumes for thy cure;
Read nature! nature is a friend to truth;
Nature is Christian; preaches to mankind;
And bids dead matter aid us in our creed.
Hast thou ne'er seen the comet's flaming flight?
Th' illustrious stranger passing, terror sheds
On gazing nations; from his fiery train
Of length enormous, takes his ample round
Through depths of ether; coasts unnumber'd worlds,
Of more than solar glory; doubles wide
Heaven's mighty cape; and then revisits earth,
From the long travel of a thousand years.
Thus, at the destin'd period, shall return
He, once on earth, who bids the comet blaze:
And, with him, all our triumph o'er the tomb.

Nature is dumb on this important point;
Or hope precarious in low whisper breathes;
Faith speaks aloud, distinct; ev'n adders hear;
But turn, and dart into the dark again.
Faith builds a bridge across the gulf of death,
To break the shock blind nature cannot shun,
And lands thought smoothly on the farther shore.
Death's terror is the mountain faith removes;
That mountain barrier between man and peace.
'Tis faith disarms destruction; and absolves
From every clamorous charge, the guiltless tomb.

Why disbelieve? Lorenzo!—" Reason bids,
"All-sacred reason."—Hold her sacred still;
Nor shalt thou want a rival in thy flame:
All-sacred reason? source, and soul, of all
Demanding praise, on earth, or earth above!
My heart is thine: deep in its inmost folds,
Live thou with life; life dearer of the two.
Wear I the blessed Cross, by fortune stamp'd
On passive nature, before thought was born?
My birth's blind bigot! fir'd with local zeal!
No; reason re-baptiz'd me when adult;
Weigh'd true, and false, in her impartial scale;
My heart became the convert of my head,
And made that choice, which once was but my fate.

"On argument alone my faith is built:"
Reason pursu'd is faith; and, unpursued
Where proof invites, 'tis reason, then, no more:
And such our proof, that, or our faith is right,
Or reason lies, and heaven design'd it wrong:
Absolve we this? What, then, is blasphemy?

Fond as we are, and justly fond, of faith,
Reason, we grant, demands our first regard;
The mother honour'd, as the daughter dear.
Reason the root, fair faith is but the flower;
The fading flower shall die; but reason lives
Immortal, as her Father in the skies.
When faith is virtue, reason makes it so.
Wrong not the Christian; think not reason yours:
'Tis reason our great Master holds so dear;
'Tis reason's injur'd rights his wrath resents;

'Tis reason's voice obey'd his glories crown;
To give lost reason life, he pour'd his own:
Believe, and show the reason of a man;
Believe, and taste the pleasure of a God;
Believe, and look with triumph on the tomb:
Through reason's wounds alone thy faith can die;
Which dying, tenfold terror gives to death,
And dips in venom his twice-mortal sting. [due

Learn hence what honours, what loud peans,
To those, who push our antidote aside;
Those boasted friends to reason, and to man,
Whose fatal love stabs every joy, and leaves
Death's terror heighten'd, gnawing on his heart.
These pompous sons of reason idoliz'd
And vilified at once; of reason dead,
Then deify'd, as monarchs were of old;
What conduct plants proud laurels on their brow?
While love of truth through all their camp resounds,
They draw pride's curtain o'er the noon-tide ray,
Spike up their inch of reason, on the point
Of philosophic wit, call'd Argument;
And, then, exulting in their taper, cry,
"Behold the sun:" and, Indian-like, adore.

Talk they of morals? O thou bleeding Love!
Thou maker of new morals to mankind!
The grand morality is love of thee.
As wise as Socrates, if such they were,
(Nor will they 'bate of that sublime renown)
As wise as Socrates, might justly stand
The definition of a modern fool.

A Christian is the highest style of man:
And is there, who the blessed Cross wipes off,
As a foul blot from his dishonour'd brow?
If angels tremble, 'tis at such a sight:
The wretch they quit, desponding of their charge,
More struck with grief or wonder, who can tell?

Ye sold to sense! ye citizens of earth!
(For such alone the Christian banner fly)
Know ye how wise your choice, how great your gain?

Behold the picture of earth's happiest man:
"He calls his wish, it comes; he sends it back,
"And says, he call'd another; that arrives,
"Meets the same welcome; yet he still calls on;
"Till one call him, who varies not his call,
"But holds him fast, in chains of darkness bound,
"Till nature dies, and judgment sets him free;
"A freedom far less welcome than his chain."

But grant man happy; grant him happy long;
Add to life's highest prize her latest hour;
That hour, so late, is nimble in approach,
That, like a post, comes on in full career:
How swift the shuttle flies, that weaves thy shroud!

Where is the fable of thy former years!
Thrown down the gulf of time; as far from thee
As they had ne'er been thine; the day in hand,
Like a bird struggling to get loose, is going;
Scarce now possess'd, so suddenly 'tis gone;
And each swift moment fled, is death advanc'd
By strides as swift: eternity is all;
And whose eternity? Who triumphs there?
Bathing for ever in the font of bliss!
For ever basking in the Deity!
Lorenzo! who?—Thy conscience shall reply.

O give it leave to speak; 'twill speak ere long,
Thy leave unask'd: Lorenzo! hear it now,
While useful its advice, its accent mild,
By the great edict, the divine decree,
Truth is deposed with man's last hour;
An honest hour, and faithful to her trust:
Truth, eldest daughter of the Deity;
Truth, of his counsel when he made the worlds;
Nor less, when he shall judge the worlds he made;
Though silent long, and sleeping ne'er so sound,
Smother'd with errors, and oppress'd with toys,
That heaven-commission'd hour no sooner calls,
But, from her cavern in the soul's abyss,
Like him they fable under Ætna whelm'd,
The goddess, bursts in thunder, and in flame;
Loudly convinces, and severely pains.
Dark demons I discharge, and Hydra stings;
The keen vibration of bright truth—is hell:
Just definition! though by schools untaught.
Ye deaf to truth! peruse this parson'd page,
And trust, for once, a prophet, and a priest;
"Men may live fools, but fools they cannot die."

NIGHT V.

THE RELAPSE.

TO THE RIGHT MON. THE EARL OF LITCHFIELD.

LORENZO! to recriminate is just.
Fondness for fame is avarice of air.
I grant the man is vain who writes for praise.
Praise no man e'er deserv'd, who fought no more.

As just thy second charge. I grant the musè
Has often blush'd at her degenerate sons,
Retain'd by sense to plead her filthy cause;
To raise the low, to magnify the mean,
And subtilize the gross into refin'd:
As if to magic numbers' powerful charm
'Twas given to make a civet of their song
Obscene, and sweeten ordure to perfume.
Wit, a true pagan, deifies the brute,
And lifts our swine-enjoyments from the mire.

The fact notorious, nor obscure the cause.
We wear the chains of pleasure, and of pride.
These share the man; and these distract him too;
Draw different ways, and clash in their commands.
Pride, like an eagle, builds among the stars;
But pleasure, lark-like, nests upon the ground.
Joys shar'd by brute-creation, pride resents;
Pleasure embraces: man would both enjoy,
And both at once: a point how hard to gain!
But, what can't wit, when stung by strong desire?

Wit dares attempt this arduous enterprise.
Since joys of sense can't rise to reason's taste;
In subtle sophistry's laborious forge,
Wit hammers out a reason new, that stoops
To sordid scenes, and meets them with applause.
Wit calls the graces the chaste zone to loose;
Nor less than a plump god to fill the bowl:
A thousand phantoms, and a thousand spells,
A thousand opiates scatters, to delude,
To fascinate, inebriate, lay asleep,
And the fool'd mind delightfully confound.
Thus that which shock'd the judgment, shocks no
more;

That which gave pride offence, no more offends
Pleasure and pride, by nature mortal foes,
 At war eternal, which in man shall reign,
 By wit's address, patch up a fatal peace,
 And hand in hand lead on the rank debauch,
 From rank, refin'd to delicate and gay.

Art, curst art! wipes off th' indebted blush
 From nature's cheek, and bronzes every shame.
 Man smiles in ruin, glories in his guilt,
 And infamy stands candidate for praise.

All writ by man in favour of the soul,
 These sensual ethics far, in bulk, transcend.
 The flowers of eloquence, profusely pour'd
 O'er spotted vice, fill half the letter'd world.
 Can powers of genius exercise their page,
 And consecrate enormities with song?

But let not these inexpiable strains
 Condemn the muse that knows her dignity;
 Nor meanly stops at time, but holds the world
 As 'tis, in nature's ample field, a point,
 A point in her esteem; from whence to start,
 And run the round of universal space,
 To visit being universal there,
 And being's source, that utmost flight of mind!
 Yet, spite of this so vast circumference,
 Well knows, but what is moral, nought is great.
 Sing syrens only? Do not angels sing?

There is in poesy a decent pride,
 Which well becomes her when she speaks to prose,
 Her younger sister; haply, not more wise.

Think'st thou, Lorenzo! to find pastimes here?
 No guilty passion blown into a flame,
 No soible flatter'd, dignity disgrac'd,
 No fairy field of fiction, all on flower,
 No rainbow colours, here, or silken tale:
 But solemn counsels, images of awe,
Truths, which eternity lets fall on man
 With double weight, through these revolving
 spheres,

This death-deep silence, and incumbent shade:
 Thoughts, such as shall revisit your last hour;
 Visit uncall'd, and live when life expires;
 And thy dark pencil, midnight! darker still
 In melancholy dip'd, embrowns the whole.

Yet this, even this, my laughter-loving friends!
 Lorenzo! and thy brothers of the smile!
 If, what imports you most, can most engage,
 Shall steal your ear, and chain you to my song.
 Or if you fail me, know, the wise shall taste
 The truths I sing; the truths I sing shall feel;
 And, feeling, give assent; and their assent
 Is ample recompense; is more than praise.
 But chiefly thine, O Litchfield! nor mistake;
 Think not un introduc'd I force my way;
 Narcissa, not unknown, not unall'd,
 By virtue, or by blood, illustrious youth!
 To thee, from blooming amaranthine bowers,
 Where all the language harmony, descends
 Uncall'd, and asks admittance for the muse:
 A muse that will not pain thee with thy praise;
 Thy praise she drops, by nobler still inspir'd.

O thou! blest Spirit! whether the supreme,
 Great antemundane Father! in whose breast
 Embryo creation, unborn being, dwelt;
 And all its various revolutions roll'd

Present, though future; prior to themselves;
 Whose breath can blow it into nought again;
 Or, from his throne some delegated power,
 Who, studious of our peace, dost turn the thought
 From vain and vile, to solid and sublime!
 Unseen thou lead'st me to delicious draughts
 Of inspiration, from a purer stream,
 And fuller of the god, than that which burst
 From fam'd Castalia: nor is yet allay'd
 My sacred thirst; though long my soul has rang'd
 Through pleasing paths of moral, and divine,
 By thee sustain'd, and lighted by the stars.

By them best lighted are the paths of thought;
Nights are their days, their most illumin'd hours.
 By day, the soul, o'erborne by life's career,
 Stunn'd by the din, and giddy with the glare,
 Reels far from reason, jostled by the throng.
 By day the soul is passive, all her thoughts
 Impos'd, precarious, broken ere mature.
 By night, from objects free, from passion cool,
 Thoughts uncontroul'd, and unimpress'd, the births
 Of pure election, arbitrary range,
 Not to the limits of one world confin'd;
 But from ethereal travels, light on earth,
 As voyagers drop anchor, for repose.

Let Indians, and the gay, like Indians, fond
 Of feather'd fopperies, the sun adore:
Darkness has more divinity for me;
 It strikes thought inward; it drives back the soul
 To settle on herself, our point supreme!
 There lies our theatre! there sits our judge.
Darkness the curtain drops o'er life's dull scene;
 'Tis the kind hand of providence stretch'd out
 'Twixt man and vanity; 'tis reason's reign,
 And virtue's too; these tutelary shades
 Are man's asylum from the tainted throng.
Night is the good man's friend, and guardian too;
 It no less rescues virtue, than inspires.

Virtue, for ever frail, as fair, below,
 Her tender nature suffers in the crowd,
 Nor touches on the world, without a stain:
 The world's infectious; few bring back at eve,
 Immaculate, the manners of the morn.
 Something we thought, is blotted; we resolv'd,
 Is shaken; we renounc'd, returns again.
 Each salutation may slide in a sin
 Unthought before, or fix a former flaw.
 Nor is it strange: light, motion, concourse, noise,
 All, scatter us abroad; thought outward-bound,
 Neglectful of our home affairs, flies off
 In fume and dissipation, quits her charge,
 And leaves the breast unguarded to the foe.

Present example gets within our guard,
 And acts with double force, by few repell'd.
Ambition fires ambition; love of gain
 Strikes like a pestilence, from breast to breast;
Riot, pride, perfidy, blue vapours breathe;
 And inhumanity is caught from man,
 From smiling man. A flight, a single glance,
 And shot at random, often has brought home
 A sudden fever to the throbbing heart,
 Of envy, rancour, or impure desire.
 We see, we hear, with peril; safety dwells
 Remote from multitude; the world's a school
 Of wrong, and what proficients swarm around!

We must, or imitate, or disapprove;
Must list as their accomplices, or foes;
That stains our innocence, this wounds our peace.
From nature's birth, hence, wisdom has been smit
With sweet recess, and languish'd for the shade.
This sacred shade, and solitude, what is it?
'Tis the felt presence of the Deity.

Few are the faults we flatter when alone,
Vice sinks in her allurements, is ungilt,
And looks, like other objects, black by night.
By night an Atheist half-believes a God.

Night is fair virtue's immemorial friend;
The conscious moon, through every distant age,
Has held a lamp to wisdom, and let fall,
On contemplation's eye, her purging ray.
The fam'd Athenian, he who woo'd from heaven
Philosophy the fair, to dwell with men,
And form their manners, not inflame their pride,
While o'er his head, as fearful to molest
His labouring mind, the stars in silence slide,
And seem all gazing on their future guest,
See him soliciting his ardent suit
In private audience: all the live-long night,
Rigid in thought, and motionless, he stands;
Nor quits his theme, or posture, till the sun
(Rude drunkard rising rosy from the main!)
Disturbs his nobler intellectual beam,
And gives him to the tumult of the world.
Hail, precious moments! stol'n from the black waste

Of murder'd time! Auspicious midnight! hail!
The world excluded, every passion hush,
And open'd a calm intercourse with heaven,
Here the soul sits in council; ponders past,
Predestines future action; fees, not feels,
Tumultuous life, and reasons with the storm;
All her lies answers, and thinks down her charms.

What awful joy! what mental liberty!
I am not pent in darkness; rather say,
(If not too bold) in darkness I'm embower'd.
Delightful gloom! the clustering thoughts around
Spontaneous rise, and blossom in the shade;
But droop by day, and sicken in the sun.
Thought borrows light elsewhere; from that first
fire,

Fountain of animation! whence descends
Urania, my celestial guest! who deigns
Nightly to visit me, so mean; and now,
Conscious how needful discipline to man,
From pleasing dalliance with the charms of night
My wandering thought recalls, to what excites
Far other beat of heart! Narcissa's tomb!
Or is it feeble nature calls me back,
And breaks my spirit into grief again?
Is it a Stygian vapour in my blood?
A cold, slow puddle, creeping through my veins?
Or is it thus with all men?—Thus with all.
What are we? How unequal! Now we soar,
And now we sink: to be the same, transcends
Our present prowess. Dearly pays the soul
For lodging ill; too dearly rents her clay.
Reason, a baffled counsellor! but adds
The blush of weakness to the bane of woe.
The noblest spirit, fighting her hard fate,
In this damp, dusty region, charg'd with storms,

But feebly flutters, yet untaught to fly;
Or, flying short her flight, and sure her fall.
Our utmost strength, when down, to rise again;
And not to yield, though beaten, all our praise.

'Tis vain to seek in men for more than man.
Though proud in promise, big in previous thought,
Experience damps our triumph. I who late,
Emerging from the shadows of the grave,
Where grief detain'd me prisoner, mounting high,
Threw wide the gates of everlasting day,
And call'd mankind to glory, shook off pain,
Mortality shook off, in ether pure.
And struck the stars; now feel my spirits fail;
They drop me from the zenith; down I rush,
Like him whom fable fleg'd with waxen wings,
In sorrow drown'd, but not in sorrow lost.
How wretched is the man who never mourn'd!
I dive for precious pearl in sorrow's stream:
Not so the thoughtless man that only grieves:
Takes all the torment, and rejects the gain,
(Inestimable gain) and gives heaven leave
To make him but more wretched, not more wise.

If wisdom is our lesson, (and what else Ennobles man? what else have angels learnt?)
Grief: more proficient in thy school are made
Than genius or proud learning e'er could boast.
Voracious learning, often over-fed,
Digests not into sense her motley meal.
This book-case, with dark booty almost burst,
This forager on others wisdom, leaves
Her native farm, her reason, quite untill'd.
With mix'd manure she surfeits the rank soil,
Dung'd, but not dress'd, and rich to beggary.
A pomp untameable of weeds prevails.

Her servant's wealth encumber'd wisdom mourns.
And what says genius? "Let the dull be wise."
Genius, too hard for right, can prove it wrong;
And loves to boast where blush men less inspir'd.
It pleads exemption from the laws of sense;
Considers reason as a leveller;
And scorns to share a blessing with the crowd.
That wise it could be, thinks an ample claim
To glory, and to pleasure gives the rest.
Crassus but sleeps, Ardelio is undone.
Wisdom less shudders at a fool than wit.

But wisdom smiles when humbled mortals weep.
When sorrow wounds the breast, as ploughs the glebe,
And hearts obdurate feel her softening shower,
Her seed celestial then glad wisdom sows;
Her golden harvest triumphs in the soil.
If so, Narcissa, welcome my relapse;
I'll raise a tax on my calamity,
And reap rich compensation from my pain.
I'll range the plenteous intellectual field,
And gather every thought of sovereign power
To chase the moral maladies of man;
Thoughts which may bear transplanting to the skies,
Though natives of this coarse penurious soil:
Nor wholly wither there, where seraphs sing,
Refin'd, exalted, not annull'd, in heaven.
Reason, the sun that gives them birth, the same
In either clime, though more illustrious there.
These choicely cull'd, and elegantly rang'd,
Shall form a garland for Narcissa's tomb;

And, peradventure, of no fading flowers. [scend?
 Say on what themes shall puzzled choice de-
 "Th' importance of contemplating the tomb;
 "Why men decline it; suicide's foul birth;
 "The various kind of grief; the faults of age;
 "And death's dread character—invite my song."

And first th' importance of our end survey'd.
 Friends counsel quick dismissal of our grief:
 Mistaken kindness! our hearts heal too soon.
 Are they more kind than he who struck the blow?
 Who bid it do his errand in our hearts,
 And banish peace, till nobler guests arrive,
 And bring it back, a true and endless peace?
 Calamities are friends: as glaring day
 Of these unnumber'd lustres rob our sight,
 Prosperity puts out unnumber'd thoughts
 Of import high, and light divine, to man.

The man how blest, who, sick of gaudy scenes,
 (Scenes apt to thrust between us and ourselves!)
 Is led by choice to take his favourite walk
 Beneath death's gloomy, silent, cypress shades,
 Unpierc'd by vanity's fantastic ray,
 To read his monuments, to weigh his dust,
 Visit his vaults, and dwell among the tombs!
 Lorenzo! read with me Narcissa's stone;
 (Narcissa was thy favourite) let us read
 Her moral stone: few doctors preach so well;
 Few orators so tenderly can touch
 The feeling heart. What pathos in the date!
 Apt words can strike; and yet in them we see
 Faint images of what we here enjoy.
 What cause have we to build on length of life?
 Temptations seize when fear is laid asleep;
 And ill foreboded is our strongest guard.

See from her tomb, as from an humbler shrine,
 Truth, radiant goddess! sallics on my soul,
 And puts delusion's dusky train to flight;
 Disperses the mists our sultry passions raise
 From objects low, terrestrial, and obscene;
 And shows the real estimate of things;
 Which no man, unafflicted, ever saw;
 Pulls off the veil from virtue's rising charms;
 Detects temptation in a thousand lies.
 Truth bids me look on men as autumn leaves,
 And all they bleed for as the summer's dust,
 Driven by the whirlwind: lighted by her beams,
 I widen my horizon, gain new powers,
 See things invisible, feel things remote,
 Am present with futurities; think nought
 To man so foreign as the joys possess'd,
 Nought so much his as those beyond the grave.

No folly keeps its colour in her sight;
 Pale worldly wisdom loses all her charms;
 In pompous promise, from her schemes profound,
 If future fate she plans, 'tis all in leaves,
 Like Sibyl, unsubstantial, fleeting bliss!
 At the first blast it vanishes in air.
 Not so celestial: wouldst thou know, Lorenzo,
 How differ worldly wisdom and divine?
 Just as the waning and the waxing moon.
 More empty worldly wisdom every day;
 And every day more fair her rival shines.
 When later, there's less time to play the fool.
 Soon our old term for wisdom is expir'd,
 (Thou know'st she calls no council in the grave:)

And everlasting fool is writ in fire,
 Or real wisdom wafts us to the skies.

As worldly schemes resembles Sibyl's leaves,
 The good man's days to Sibyl's books compare,
 (In ancient story read, thou know'st the tale,)
 In price still rising, as in number less,
 Inestimable quite his final hour.
 For that who thrones can offer, offer thrones;
 Insolvent worlds the purchase cannot pay.
 "Oh let me die his death!" all nature cries:
 "Then live his life."—All nature falters there;
 Our great physician daily to consult,
 To commune with the grave, our only cure.

What grave prescribes the best?—A friend's;
 and yet

From a friend's grave how soon we disengage!
 Even to the dearest, as his marble, cold.
 Why are friends ravish'd from us? 'Tis to bind,
 By soft affection's ties, on human hearts,
 The thought of death, which reason, too supine,
 Or misemploy'd, so rarely fastens there.
 Nor reason, nor affection, no, nor both
 Combin'd, can break the witchcrafts of the world.
 Behold th' inexorable hour at hand!
 Behold th' inexorable hour forgot!
 And to forget it the chief aim of life,
 Though well to ponder it is life's chief end.

Is death, that ever-threatening, ne'er remote,
 That all-important, and that only sure,
 (Come when he will) an unexpected guest?
 Nay, though invited by the loudest calls
 Of blind imprudence, unexpected still?
 Though numerous messengers are sent before
 To warn his great arrival. What the cause,
 The wondrous cause, of this mysterious ill?
 All heaven looks down astonish'd at the sight.

Is it that life has sown her joys so thick,
 We can't thrust in a single care between?
 Is it that life has such a swarm of cares,
 The thought of death can't enter for the throng?
 Is it that time steals on with downy feet,
 Nor wakes indulgence from her golden dream?
 To-day is so like yesterday, it cheats;
 We take the lying filter for the same.
 Life glides away, Lorenzo, like a brook;
 For ever changing, unperceiv'd the change.
 In the same brook none ever bath'd him twice;
 To the same life none ever twice awoke.
 We call the brook the same; the same we think
 Our life, though still more rapid in its flow;
 Nor mark the much, irrevocably laps'd,
 And mingled with the sea. Or shall we say (Retaining still the brook to bear us on)
 That life is like a vessel on the stream?
 In life embark'd, we smoothly down the tide
 Of time descend, but not on time intent;
 Amus'd, unconscious of the gliding wave,
 Till on a sudden we perceive a shock;
 We start, awake, look out; what see we there?
 Our brittle bark is burst on Charon's shore.

Is this the cause death flies all human thought?
 Or is it judgment, by the will struck blind,
 That domineering mistress of the soul!
 Like him so strong, by Dalilah the fair?
 Or is it fear turns startled reason back

From looking down a precipice so steep?
 'Tis dreadful; and the dread is wisely plac'd
 By nature, conscious of the make of man.
 A dreadful friend it is, a terror kind,
 A flaming sword to guard the tree of life.
 By that unaw'd in life's most smiling hour,
 The good man would repine, would suffer joys,
 And burn impatient for his promis'd skies.
 The bad, on each punctilious pique of pride,
 Or gloom of humour, would give rage the rein;
 Bound o'er the barrier, rush into the dark,
 And mar the schemes of Providence below.

What groan was that, Lorenzo?—Furies! rise,
 And drown in your less execrable yell
 Britannia's shame. There took her gloomy flight,
 On wing impetuous, a black sullen soul,
 Blasted from hell, with horrid lust of death.
 Thy friend, the brave, the gallant Altamont,
 So call'd, so thought—And then he fled the field.
 Less base the fear of death than fear of life.
 O Britain, infamous for suicide!

An island in thy manners, far disjoin'd
 From the whole world of *rational*s beside!
 In ambient waves plunge thy polluted head,
 Wash the dire stain, nor shock the continent.

But thou be shock'd, while I detect the cause
 Of self-assault, expose the monster's birth,
 And bid abhorrence hiss it round the world.
 Blame not thy clime, nor chide the distant sun;
 The sun is innocent, thy clime absolv'd:
 Immoral climes kind nature never made.
 The cause I sing in Eden might prevail,
 And proves it is thy folly, not thy fate.

The soul of man, (let man in homage bow,
 Who names his soul) a native of the skies!
 High-born, and free, her freedom should maintain,
 Unfold, unmortgag'd for earth's little bribes.
 Th' illustrious stranger, in this foreign land,
 Like strangers, jealous of her dignity,
 Studious of home, and ardent to return,
 Of earth suspicious, earth's enchanted cup
 With cool reserve light touching, should indulge
 On immortality her godlike taste, [there.
 There take large draughts, make her chief banquet

But some reject this sustenance divine;
 To beggarly vile appetites descend;
 Ask alms of earth for guests that came from heaven;
 Sink into slaves; and sell, for present hire,
 Their rich reversion, and (what shares its fate)
 Their native freedom, to the prince who sways
 This nether world. And when his payments fail,
 When his foul basket gorges them no more,
 Or their pall'd palates loath the basket full,
 Are instantly, with wild demoniac rage,
 For breaking all the chains of Providence,
 And bursting their confinement, though fast barr'd
 By laws divine and human, guarded strong
 With horrors doubled to defend the pass,
 The blackest nature or dire guilt can raise,
 And moted round with fathomless destruction,
 Sure to receive, and overwhelm them in their fall.

Such, Britons! is the cause, to you unknown,
 Or worse o'erlook'd; o'erlook'd by magistrates,
 Thus criminals themselves. I grant the deed
 Is madness, but the madness of the heart.

And what is that? Our utmost bound of guilt.
 A sensual, unreflecting life, is big
 With monstrous births, and suicide, to crown
 The black infernal brood. The bold to break
 Heaven's law supreme, and desperately rush
 Through sacred nature's murder on their own,
 Because they never think of death, they die.
 'Tis equally man's duty, glory, gain,
 At once to shun, and meditate his end.
 When by the bed of languishment we sit,
 (The seat of wisdom! if our choice, not fate)
 Or o'er our dying friends in anguish hang,
 Wipe the cold dew, or stay the sinking head,
 Number their moments, and in every clock
 Start at the voice of an eternity;
 See the dim lamp of life just feebly lift
 An agonizing beam, at us to gaze,
 Then sink again, and quiver into death,
 That most pathetic herald of our own:
 How read we such sad scenes? As sent to man
 In perfect vengeance? No; in pity sent,
 To melt him down like wax, and then impress,
 Idelible, death's image on his heart;
 Bleeding for others, trembling for himself.
 We bleed, we tremble, we forget, we smile.
 The mind turns fool before the cheek is dry.
 Our quick-returning folly cancels all,
 As the tide rushing rases what is writ
 In yielding sands, and smooths the letter'd shore.

Lorenzo! hast thou ever weigh'd a sigh?
 Or study'd the philosophy of tears?
 (A science yet unlectur'd in our schools!)
 Hast thou descended deep into the breast,
 And seen their source? If not, descend with me,
 And trace these briny rivulets to their springs.

Our funeral tears from different causes rise,
 As if from separate cisterns in the soul,
 Of various kinds, they flow. From tender hearts,
 By soft contagion call'd, some burst at once,
 And stream obsequious to the leading eye.
Some ask more time, by curious art distill'd.
Some hearts, in secret heard, unapt to melt,
 Struck by the magic of the public eye,
 Like Moses' smitten rock, gush out amain.
Some weep to share the fate of the deceas'd,
 So high in merit, and to them so dear.
 They dwell on praises, which they think they share;
 And thus, without a blush, commend themselves.
Some mourn, in proof, that something they could love:

They weep not to relieve their grief, but show.
Some weep in perfect justice to the dead,
 As conscious all their love is in arrears.
Some mischievously weep, not unappriz'd,
 Tears, sometimes, aid the conquest of an eye.
 With what address the soft Ephesians draw
 Their sable net-work o'er entangled hearts!
 As seen through crystal, how their roses glow,
 While liquid pearl runs trickling down their cheek?
 Of her's not prouder Egypt's wanton queen,
 Carousing gems, herself dissolv'd in love.
Some weep at death, abstracted from the dead,
 And celebrate, like Charles, their own decease.
 By kind construction some are deem'd to weep,
 Because a decent veil conceals their joy.

Some weep in earnest, and yet weep in vain;
As deep in indiscretion, as in woe.

Passion, blind passion! impotently pours
Tears, that deserve more tears; while reason sleeps;
Or gazes like an idiot, unconcern'd;
Nor comprehends the meaning of the storm;
Knows not it speaks to her, and her alone.

Irrationals all sorrow are beneath,
That noble gift! that privilege of man!
From sorrow's pang, the birth of endless joy.
But these are barren of that birth divine:

They weep impetuous, as the summer storm,
And full as short! The cruel grief soon tam'd,
They make a pastime of the stings tale;
Far as the deep resounding knell, they spread
The dreadful news, and hardly feel it more.

No grain of wisdom pays them for their woe.

Half-round the globe, the tears pump'd up by death

Are spent in watering vanities of life;
In making folly flourish still more fair,
When the sick soul, her wonted stay withdrawn,
Reclines on earth, and sorrows in the dust;
Instead of learning, there, her true support,
Though there thrown down her true support to learn.

Without heaven's aid, impatient to be blest,
She crawls to the next shrub, or bramble vile,
Though from the stately cedar's arms she fell;
With stale, forsworn embraces, clings anew,
The stranger weds, and blossoms, as before,
In all the fruitless fopperies of life:
Presents her weed, well fancy'd, at the ball,
And raffles for the death's head on the ring.

So wept Aurelia, till the destin'd youth
Stept in, with his receipt for making smiles,
And blanching fables into bridal bloom.
So wept Lorenzo fair Clarissa's fate;
Who gave that angel boy, on whom he doats;
And dy'd to give him, orphan'd in his birth!
Not such, Narcissa, my distress for thee.
I'll make an altar of thy sacred tomb,
To sacrifice to wisdom. What wast thou?
"Young, gay, and fortunate!" Each yields a theme.
I'll dwell on each, to shun thought more severe;
(Heaven knows I labour with severer still!)
I'll dwell on each, and quite exhaust thy death.
A soul without reflection, like a pile
Without inhabitant, to ruin runs.

And, first, thy youth. What says it to gray hairs!
Narcissa, I'm become thy pupil now—
Early, bright, transient, chaste, as morning dew,
She sparkled, was exhal'd, and went to heaven.
Time on this head has snow'd; yet still 'tis borne
Aloft; nor thinks but on another's grave.
Cover'd with shame I speak it, age severe
Old worn-out vice sets down for virtue fair;
With graceless gravity, chastising youth,
That youth chastis'd surpassing in a fault,
Father of all, forgetfulness of death:
As if, like objects pressing on the sight,
Death had advanc'd too near us to be seen:
Or, that life's loan time ripen'd into right;
And men might plead prescription from the grave;
Deathless, from repetition of reprieve,

Deathless? far from it! such are dead already;
Their hearts are bury'd, and the world their grave.

Tell me, some god! my guardian angel! tell,
What thus infatuates? what enchantment plants
The phantom of an age 'twixt us and death
Already at the door? He knocks, we hear,
And yet we will not hear. What mail defends
Our untouch'd hearts? What miracle turns off
The pointed thought, which from a thousand quivers

Is daily darted, and is daily shunn'd?
We stand, as in a battle, throngs on throngs
Around us falling; wounded oft ourselves;
Though bleeding with our wounds, immortal still!
We see time's furrows on another's brow,
And death entrench'd, preparing his assault;
How few themselves in that just mirror see!
Or, seeing, draw their inference as strong!
There death is certain; doubtful here: he must,
And soon; we may, within an age, expire.

Though gray our heads, our thoughts and aims are green;

Like damag'd clocks, whose hand and bell dissent;
Folly sings six, while nature points at twelve.

Absurd longevity! More, more, it cries:
More life, more wealth, more trash of every kind.
And wherefore mad for more, when relish fails?
Object, and appetite, must club for joy;
Shall folly labour hard to mend the bow,
Baubles, I mean, that strike us from without,
While nature is relaxing every string?
Ask thought for joy; grow rich, and hoard within,
Think you the soul, when this life's rattles cease,
Has nothing of more manly to succeed?
Contract the taste immortal; learn ev'n now
To relish what alone subsists hereafter.

Divine, or none, henceforth your joys for ever.
Of age the glory is, to wish to die.
That wish is praise, and promise; it applauds
Past life, and promises our future bliss.
What weakness see not children in their fires?
Grand-climacterical absurdities!
Gray-hair'd authority, to faults of youth,
How shocking: it makes folly thrice a fool;
And our first childhood might our last despise.
Peace and esteem is all that age can hope.
Nothing but wisdom gives the first; the last,
Nothing, but the repute of being wise.
Folly bars both; our age is quite undone.

What folly can be ranker? Like our shadows,
Our wishes lengthen, as our sun declines.
No wish should loiter, then, this side the grave.
Our hearts should leave the world, before the knell
Calls for our carcases to mend the soil.
Enough to live in tempest, die in port;
Age should fly concourse, cover in retreat
Defects of judgment; and the will subdue;
Walk thoughtful on the silent, solemn shore
Of that vast ocean it must sail so soon;
And put good-works on board; and wait the wind
That shortly blows us into worlds unknown;
If unconsider'd too, a dreadful scene!

All should be prophets to themselves; foresee
Their future fate; their future fate foretaste;
This art would waste the bitterness of death

The thought of death alone, the fear destroys.
A disaffection to that precious thought
Is more than midnight darkness on the soul,
Which sleeps beneath it, on a precipice,
Puff'd off by the first blast, and lost for ever.

Dost ask, Lorenzo, why so warmly prest,
By repetition hammer'd on thine ear, [chime,
The thought of death? That thought is the ma-
The grand machine! that heaves us from the dust,
And rears us into men. That thought, ply'd home,
Will soon reduce the ghastly precipice
O'er-hanging hell, will soften the descent,
And gently slope our passage to the grave;
How warmly to be wish'd! What heart of flesh
Would trifle with tremendous? dare extremes?
Yawn o'er the fate of infinite? What hand,
Beyond the blackest brand of censure bold,
(To speak a language too well known to thee)
Would at a moment give its all to chance,
And stamp the die for an eternity?

Aid me, Narcissa! aid me to keep pace
With destiny; and ere her scissars cut
My thread of life, to break this tougher thread
Of moral death, that ties me to the world.
Sting thou my slumbering reason to send forth
A thought of observation on the foe;
To fally; and survey the rapid march
Of his ten thousand messengers to man;
Who, Jehu-like, behind him turns them all.
All accident apart, by nature sign'd,
My warrant is gone out, though dormant yet;
Perhaps behind one moment lurks my fate.

Must I then forward only look for death?
Backward I turn mine eye, and find him there.
Man is a self-survivor every year.
Man, like a stream, is in perpetual flow.
Death's a destroyer of quotidian prey.
My youth, my noon-tide, his; my yesterday;
The bold invader shares the present hour.
Each moment on the former shuts the grave.
While man is growing, life is in decrease;
And cradles rock us nearer to the tomb.
Our birth is nothing but our death begun;
As tapers waste that instant they take fire.

Shall we then fear, lest that should come to pass,
Which comes to pass each moment of our lives?
If fear we must, let that death turn us pale,
Which murders strength and ardour; what remains
Should rather call on death, than dread his call.
Ye partners of my fault, and my decline!
Thoughtless of death, but when your neighbour's knell

(Rude visitant!) knocks hard at your dull sense,
And with its thunder scarce obtains your ear!
Be death your theme, in every place and hour;
Nor longer want, ye monumental fires!
A brother tomb to tell you ye shall die.
That death you dread (so great is nature's skill)
Know, you shall court before you shall enjoy.

But you are learn'd; in volumes, deep you sit;
In wisdom shallow: pompous ignorance!
Would you be still more learned than the learn'd?
I learn well to know how much need not be known,

And what that knowledge, which impairs your sense.

Our needful knowledge, like our needful food,
Unhedg'd, lies open in life's common field;
And bids all welcome to the vital feast.
You scorn what lies before you in the page
Of nature, and experience, moral truth;
Of indispensable, eternal fruit;
Fruit, on which mortals feeding, turn to gods:
And dive in science for distinguish'd names,
Dishonest fomentation of your pride!
Sinking in virtue, as you rise in fame.
Your learning, like the lunar beam, affords
Light, but not heat; it leaves you undevout,
Frozen at heart, while speculation shines.
Awake, ye curious indagators! fond
Of knowing all, but what avails you known.
If you would learn death's character, attend.
All casts of conduct, all degrees of health,
All dies of fortune, and all dates of age,
Together shook in his impartial urn,
Come forth at random: or, if choice is made,
The choice is quite sarcastic, and insults
All bold conjecture, and fond hopes of man.
What countless multitudes not only leave,
But deeply disappoint us, by their deaths!
Though great our sorrow, greater our surprise.

Like other tyrants, death delights to smite,
What, smitten, most proclaims the pride of power,
And arbitrary nod. His joy supreme,
To bid the wretch survive the fortunate;
The feeble wrap th' athletic in his shroud;
And weeping fathers build their childrens tomb:
Me thine, Narcissa!—What though short thy date?
Virtue, not rolling suns, the mind matures.
That life is long, which answers life's great end.
The time that bears no fruit, deserves no name;
The man of wisdom is the man of years.
In hoary youth Methusalems may die;
O how misdated on their flattering tombs!

Narcissa's youth has lectur'd me thus far.
And can her gaiety give counsel too?
That, like the Jews fam'd oracle of gems,
Sparkles instruction; such as throws new light,
And opens more the character of death;
Ill-known to thee, Lorenzo! This thy vaunt:
"Give death his due, the wretched, and the old;
"Ev'n let him sweep his rubbish to the grave;
"Let him not violate kind nature's laws,
"But own man born to live as well as die."
Wretched and old thou giv'st him; young and gay
He takes; and plunder is a tyrant's joy.
What if I prove, "That farthest from the fear,
"Are often nearest to the stroke of fate?"

All, more than common, menaces an end.
A blaze betokens brevity of life:
As if bright embers should emit a flame,
Glad spirits sparkled from Narcissa's eye,
And made youth younger, and taught life to live.
As nature's opposites wage endless war,
For this offence, as treason to the deep
Inviolable stupor of his reign,
Where lust, and turbulent ambition, sleep,
Death took swift vengeance. As he life detests,
More life is still more odious; and, reduc'd
By conquest, aggrandizes more his power.
But wherefore aggrandiz'd? By heaven's decree,

To plant the soul on her eternal guard,
In awful expectation of our end. [so Thus runs death's dread commission: "Strike, but
"As most alarms the living by the dead."
Hence stratagem delights him, and surprise,
And cruel sport with man's securities.
Not simple conquest, triumph is his aim; [most.
And, where least fear'd, there conquest triumphs
This proves my bold assertion not too bold.

What are his arts to lay our fears asleep?
Tiberian arts his purposes wrap up
In deep dissimulation's darkest night.
Like princes unconfest in foreign courts,
Who travel under cover, death assumes
The name and look of life, and dwells among us.
He takes all shapes that serve his black designs:
Though master of a wider empire far
Than that o'er which the Roman eagle flew.
Like Nero, he's a fidler, charioteer,
Or drives his phaeton, in female guise;
Quite unsuspected, till, the wheel beneath,
His disarray'd oblation he devours.

He most affects the forms least like himself,
His slender self. Hence burly corpulence
In his familiar wear, and sleek disguise.
Behind the rosy bloom he loves to lurk,
Or ambush in a smile; or wanton dive
In dimples deep; love's eddies, which draw in Unwary hearts, and sink them in despair.
Such, on Narcissa's couch he loiter'd long
Unknown; and, when detected, still was seen
To smile; such peace has innocence in death!
Most happy they! whom least his arts deceive.
One eye on death, and one full fix'd on heaven,
Becomes a mortal, and immortal man.
Long on his wiles a piqu'd and jealous spy,
I've seen, or dreamt I saw, the tyrant dress;
Lay by his horrors, and put on his smiles.
Say, muse, for thou remember'st, call it back,
And show Lorenzo the surprising scene;
If 'twas a dream, his genius can explain.

'Twas in a circle of the gay I stood.
Death would have enter'd; nature push'd him back;
Supported by a doctor of renown,
His point he gain'd. Then artfully dismist
The sage; for death design'd to be conceal'd.
He gave an old vivacious usurer
His meagre aspect, and his naked bones;
In gratitude for plumping up his prey,
A pamp'd spendthrift; whose fantastic air,
Well-fashion'd figure, and cockaded brow,
He took in change, and underneath the pride
Of costly linen, tuck'd his filthy shroud.
His crooked bow he straiten'd to a cane;
And hid his deadly shafts in Myra's eye.

The dreadful masquerader, thus equipt,
Out-fallies on adventures. Ask you where?
Where is he not? For his peculiar haunts,
Let this suffice; sure as night follows day,
Death treads in pleasure's footsteps round the world;
When pleasure treads the path, which reason shuns.
When, against reason, riot shuts the door,
And gaiety supplies the place of sense,
Then, foremost at the banquet and the ball,
Death leads the dance, or stamps the deadly die;

Nor ever fails the midnight howl to crown.
Gaily carousing to his gay compeers,
Inly he laughs, to see them laugh at him,
As absent far: and when the revel burns,
When fear is banish'd, and triumphant thought,
Calling for all the joys beneath the moon,
Against him turns the key; and bids him sup
With their progenitors—He drops his mask;
Frowns out at full; they start, despair, expire.

Scarce with more sudden terror and surprise,
From his black mask of nitre, touch'd by fire,
He bursts, expands, roars, blazes, and devours.
And is not this triumphant treachery,
And more than simple conquest, in the fiend?

And now, Lorenzo, dost thou wrap thy soul
In soft security, because unknown
Which moment is commission'd to destroy?
In death's uncertainty thy danger lies.
Is death uncertain? Therefore thou be fit;
Fixt as a sentinel, all eye, all ear,
All expectation of the coming foe.
Rouse, stand in arms, nor lean against thy spear;
Lest slumber steal one moment o'er thy soul,
And fate surprise thee nodding. Watch, be strong;
Thus give each day the merit, and renown,
Of dying well; though doom'd but once to die.
Nor let life's period hidden (as from most)
Hide too from thee the precious use of life.

Early, not sudden, was Narcissa's fate.
Soon, not surprising, death his visit paid.
Her thought went forth to meet him on his way,
Nor gaiety forgot it was to die:
Though fortune too (our third and final theme),
As an accomplice, play'd her gaudy plumes,
And every glittering gewgaw, on her sight,
To dazzle, and debauch it from its mark.
Death's dreadful advent is the mark of man;
And every thought that misses it, is blind.
Fortune, with youth and gaiety, conspir'd
To weave a triple wreath of happiness
(If happiness on earth) to crown her brow.
And could death charge through such a shining shield?

That shining shield invites the tyrant's spear,
As if to damp our elevated aims,
And strongly preach humility to man.
O how portentous is prosperity!
How, comet-like, it threatens, while it shines!
Few years but yield us proof of death's ambition,
To cull his victims from the fairest fold,
And sheath his shafts in all the pride of life.
When flooded with abundance, purpled o'er
With recent honours, bloom'd with every bliss,
Set up in ostentation, made the gaze,
The gaudy centre, of the public eye,
When fortune thus has toss'd her child in air,
Snatched from the covert of an humble state,
How often have I seen him dropt at once,
Our morning's envy! and our evening's sigh!
As if her bounties were the signal given,
The flowery wreath to mark the sacrifice,
And call death's arrows on the destin'd prey.

High fortune seems in cruel league with fate.
Ask you for what? To give his war on man
The deeper dread, and more illustrious spoil.

Thus to keep daring mortals more in awe.
 And burns Lorenzo still for the sublime
 Of life? To hang his airy nest on high,
 On the slight timber of the topmost bough,
 Rockt at each beeze, and menacing a fall?
 Granting grim death at equal distance there;
 Yet peace begins just where ambition ends.
 What makes man wretched? Happiness deny'd?
 Lorenzo! no: 'Tis happiness disdain'd.
She comes too meanly drest to win our smile;
 And calls herself content, a homely name!
 Our flame is transport, and content our scorn.
Ambition turns, and shuts the door against her,
 And weds a toil, a tempest, in her stead;
 A tempest to warm transport near of kin.
 Unknowing what our mortal state admits,
 Life's modest joys we ruin, while we raise;
 And all our ecstasies are wounds to peace;
 Peace, the full portion of mankind below.

And since thy peace is dear, ambitious youth!
 Of fortune fond! as thoughtless of thy fate!
 As late I drew death's picture, to stir up
 Thy wholesome fears; now, drawn in contrast, see
 Gay fortune's, thy vain hope's to reprimand.
 See, high in air the sportive goddess hangs,
 Unlocks her casket, spreads her glittering ware,
 And calls the giddy winds to puff abroad
 Her random bounties o'er the gaping throng.
 All rush rapacious; friends o'er trodden friends;
 Sons o'er their fathers, subjects o'er their kings,
 Priests o'er their gods, and lovers o'er the fair,
 (Still more ador'd) to snatch the golden shower.

Gold glitters most, where virtue shines no more;
 As stars from absent suns have leave to shine.
 O what a precious pack of votaries
 Unkennel'd from the prisons, and the stews,
 Pour in, all opening in their idol's praise;
 All, ardent, eye each wafture of her hand,
 And, wide-expanding their voracious jaws,
 Morfel on morfel swallow down unchew'd,
 Untasted, through mad appetite for more;
 Gorg'd to the throat, yet lean and ravenous still.
 Sagacious all, to trace the smallest game,
 And bold to seize the greatest. If (blest chance!)
 Court zephyrs sweetly breathe, they launch, they fly.

O'er just, o'er sacred, all-forbidden ground,
 Drunk with the burning scent of place or power,
 Staunch to the foot of lucre, till they die.

Or, if for men you take them, as I mark
 Their manners, thou their various fates survey.
 With aim mis-measur'd, and impetuous speed,
 Some darting, strike their ardent wish far off,
 Through fury to possess it: Some succeed,
 But stumble, and let fall the taken prize.
 From some, by sudden blasts, 'tis whirl'd away,
 And lodg'd in bosoms that ne'er dreamt of gain.
 To some it sticks so close, that, when torn off,
 Torn is the man, and mortal is the wound.
 Some, o'er-enamour'd of their bags, run mad,
 Groan under gold, yet weep for want of bread.
 Together some (unhappy rivals!) seize,
 And rend abundance into poverty;
 Loud croaks the raven of the law, and smiles:
 Smiles too the goddess; but smiles most at those,

(Just victims of exorbitant desire!)
 Who perish at their own request, and whelm'd
 Beneath her load of lavish grants, expire.
Fortune is famous for her numbers slain,
 The number small, which happiness can bear.
 Though various for a while their fates; at last
 One curse involves them all: at death's approach,
 All read their riches backward into loss,
 And mourn, in just proportion to their store.

And death's approach (if orthodox my song)
 Is hasten'd by the lure of fortune's smiles.
 And art thou still a glutton of bright gold?
 And art thou still rapacious of thy ruin?
Death loves a shining mark, a signal blow;
 A blow, which while it executes, alarms;
 And startles thousands with a single fall.
 As when some stately growth of oak, or pine,
 Which nods aloft, and proudly spreads her shade,
 The sun's defiance, and the flock's defence;
 By the strong strokes of labouring hinds subdued,
 Loud groans her last, and, rushing from her height,
 In cumbrous ruin, thunders to the ground:
 The conscious forest trembles at the shock,
 And hill, and stream, and distant dale resound.

These high-aim'd darts of death, and these alone,
 Should I collect, my quiver would be full.
 A quiver, which, suspended in mid air,
 Or near heaven's archer, in the zodiac hung,
 (So could it be) should draw the public eye,
 The gaze and contemplation of mankind!
 A constellation awful, yet benign,
 To guide the gay through life's tempestuous wave;
 Nor suffer them to strike the common rock,
 "From greater danger, to grow more secure,
 "And, wrapt in happiness, forget their fate."

Lyfander, happy past the common lot,
 Was warn'd of danger, but too gay to fear.
 He woo'd the fair Aspasio: she was kind:
 In youth, form, fortune, fame, they both were
 blest:

All who knew envy'd; yet in envy lov'd:
 Can fancy form more finish'd happiness?
 Fixt was the nuptial hour. Her stately dome
 Rose on the sounding beach. The glittering spires
 Float in the wave, and break against the shore:
 So break those glittering shadows, human joys.
 The faithless morning smil'd: he takes his leave,
 To re-embrace, in ecstasies, at eve.
 The rising storm forbids. The news arrives:
 Untold, she saw it in her servant's eye.
 She felt it seen (her heart was apt to feel);
 And, drown'd without the furious ocean's aid,
 In suffocating sorrows, shares his tomb.
 Now, round the sumptuous bridal monument,
 The guilty billows innocently roar;
 And the rough sailor passing, drops a tear.
 A tear?—Can tears suffice?—But not for me.
 How vain our efforts! and our arts how vain!
 The distant train of thought I took to shun,
 Has thrown me on my fate—These died together;
 Happy in ruin! undivorc'd by death!
 Or ne'er to meet, or ne'er to part, is peace—
Narcissa! Pity bleeds at thought of thee.
 Yet thou wast only near me; not myself.
 Survive myself?—That cures all other woe.

Narcissa lives; Philander is forgot.
O the soft commerce! O the tender ties,
Close-twisted with the fibres of the heart!
Which, broken, break them; and drain off the soul
Of human joy; and make it pain to live—
And is it then to live? When such friends part,
'Tis the survivor dies—My heart, no more.

NIGHT VI.

THE INFIDEL RECLAIMED.

IN TWO PARTS.

Containing the Nature, Proof, and Importance of Immortality.

PART I.

Where, among other things, Glory, and Riches, are particularly considered.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HENRY PELHAM,
FIRST LORD COMMISSIONER OF THE TREASURY, AND CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER.

PREFACE.

FEW ages have been deeper in dispute about religion than this. The dispute about religion, and the practice of it, seldom go together. The shorter, therefore, the dispute the better. I think it may be reduced to this single question, Is man immortal, or is he not? If he is not, all our disputes are mere amusements, or trials of skill. In this case, truth, reason, religion, which give our discourses such pomp and solemnity, are (as will be shown) mere empty sound, without any meaning in them. But if man is immortal, it will behove him to be very serious about eternal consequences; or, in other words, to be truly religious. And this great fundamental truth, unestablished, or unawakened in the minds of men, is, I conceive, the real source and support of all our infidelity; how remote soever the particular objections advanced may seem to be from it.

Sensible appearances affect most men much more than abstract reasonings; and we daily see bodies drop around us, but the soul is invisible. The power which inclination has over the judgment, is greater than can be conceived by those that have not had an experience of it; and of what numbers is it the sad interest that souls should not survive! The heathen world confessed, that they rather hoped, than firmly believed immortality! And how many heathens have we still amongst us! The sacred page assures us, that life and immortality is brought to light by the gospel: but by how many is the gospel rejected, or overlooked! From these considerations, and from my being, accidentally, privy to the sentiments of some particular persons, I have been long persuaded that most, if not all our infidels (whatever name they take, and whatever scheme, for argument's sake, and to keep themselves in countenance, they patronize) are supported in their deplorable error, by some doubt of their immortality, at the bottom. And I am satisfied, that men once thoroughly convinced of their immortality, are not far from being Christians. For it is hard to conceive, that a man fully conscious eternal pain or happiness will certainly be his lot, should not earnestly, and impartially, inquire after the surest means of escaping one, and securing the other. And of such an earnest and impartial inquiry, I well know the consequence.

Here, therefore, in proof of this most fundamental truth, some plain arguments are offered; arguments derived from principles which infidels admit in common with believers; arguments, which appear to me altogether irresistible; and such as I am satisfied will have great weight with all who give themselves the small trouble of looking seriously into their own bosoms, and of observing, with any tolerable degree of attention, what daily passes round about them in the world. If some arguments shall, here, occur, which others have declined, they are submitted, with all deference, to better judgments in this, of all points the most important. For, as to the being of a God, that is no longer disputed; but it is indisputed for this reason only; viz. because, where the least pretence to reason is admitted, it must for ever be indisputable. And of consequence no man can be betrayed into a dispute of that nature by vanity; which has a principal share in animating our modern combatants against other articles of our belief.

SHE * (for I know not yet her name in heaven)

Not early, like Narcissa, left the scene;

Nor sudden, like Philander. What avail?

This seeming mitigation but inflames;

This fancy'd medicine heightens the disease.

The longer known, the closer still she grew;

And gradual parting is a gradual death.

'Tis the grim tyrant's engine, which extorts,

By tardy pressure's still increasing weight,

From hardest hearts, confession of distress.

O the long, dark approach through years of pain,

Death's gallery! (might I dare to call it so)

With dismal doubt, and sable terror, hung:

Sick hopes, pale lamp its only glimmering ray:

There, fate my melancholy walk ordain'd,

Forbid self-love itself to flatter, there,

How oft I gaz'd, prophetically sad!

How oft I saw her dead, while yet in smiles!

In smiles she sunk her grief to lessen mine.

She spoke me comfort, and increas'd my pain.

Like powerful armies trenching at a town,

By slow, and silent, but resistless sap,

In his pale progress gently gaining ground,

Death urg'd his deadly siege; in spite of art,

Of all the balmy blessings nature lends

To succour frail humanity. Ye stars!

(Not now first made familiar to my sight)

And thou, O moon! bear witness, many a night

He tore the pillow from beneath my head,

Ty'd down by sore attention to the shock,

* Referring to Night V.

By ceaseless depredations on a life
 Dearer than that he left me. Dreadful post
 Of observation! darker every hour!
 Less dread the day that drove me to the brink,
 And pointed at eternity below;
 When my soul shudder'd at futurity;
 When, a moment's point, th' important die,
 Of life and death spun doubtful, ere it fell,
 And turn'd up life; my title to more woe.

But why more woe? More comfort let it be.
 Nothing is dead, but that which wish'd to die;
 Nothing is dead, but wretchedness and pain;
 Nothing is dead, but what incumber'd, gall'd,
 Block'd up the pass, and barr'd from real life.
 Where dwells that wish most ardent of the wife?
 Too dark the sun to see it; highest stars
 Too low to reach it; death, great death alone,
 O'er stars and sun, triumphant lead us there.

Nor dreadful our transition; though the mind,
 An artist at creating self-alarms,
 Rich in expedients for inquietude,
 Is prone to paint it dreadful. Who can take Death's portrait true? The tyrant never fat.
 Our sketch all random strokes, conjecture all;
 Close shuts the grave, nor tells one single tale.
Death, and his image rising in the brain,
 Bear faint resemblance; never are alike;
Fear shakes the pencil; fancy loves excess;
 Dark ignorance is lavish of her shades;
 And these the formidable picture draw. [rise;

But grant the worst; 'tis past; new prospects
 And drop a veil eternal o'er her tomb.
 Far other views our contemplation claim,
 Views that o'erpay the rigours of our life;
 Views that suspend our agonies in death.
 Wrapt in the thought of immortality,
 Wrapt in the single, the triumphant thought!
 Long life might lapse, age unperceiv'd come on;
 And find the soul unfated with her theme.
 Its nature, proof, importance, fire my song.
 O that my song could emulate my soul!
 Like her immortal. No!—the soul disdains
 A mark so mean; far nobler hope inflames;
 If endless ages can outweigh an hour,
 Let not the laurel, but the palm inspire.

Thy nature, immortality! who knows?
 And yet who knows it not? It is but life
 In stronger thread of brighter colour spun,
 And spun for ever; dipt by cruel fate
 In Stygian dye, how black, how brittle here!
 How short our correspondence with the sun!
 And while it lasts, inglorious! Our best deeds,
 How wanting in their weight! Our highest joys
 Small cordials to support us in our pain,
 And give us strength to suffer. But how great
 To mingle interests, converse amities,
 With all the sons of reason, scatter'd wide
 Through habitable space, wherever born,
 Howe'er endow'd! To live free citizens
 Of universal nature! To lay hold
 By more than feeble faith on the Supreme!
 To call heaven's rich unfathomable mines
 (Mines, which support archangels in their state)
 Our own! to rise in science, as in bliss,
 Initiate in the secrets of the skies!

To read creation; read its mighty plan
 In the bare bosom of the Deity!
 The plan, and execution, to collate!
 To see, before each glance of piercing thought,
 All cloud, all shadow, blown remote; and leave
 No mystery—but that of love divine,
 Which lifts us on the seraph's flaming wing,
 From earth's aceldama, this field of blood,
 Of inward anguish, and of outward ill,
 From darkness, and from dust, to such a scene!
 Love's element! true joy's illustrious home;
 From earth's sad contrast (now deplor'd) more fair!

What exquisite vicissitude of fate!
 Blest absolution of our blackest hour!

Lorenzo, these are thoughts that make man Man,
 The wise illumine, aggrandize the great,
 How great (while yet we tread the kindred clod,
 And every moment fear to sink beneath
 The clod we tread; soon trodden by our sons)
 How great, in the wild whirl of time's pursuits,
 To stop, and pause, involv'd in high presage,
 Through the long vista of a thousand years,
 To stand contemplating our distant selves,
 As in a magnifying mirror seen,
 Enlarg'd, ennobled, elevate, divine!
 To prophesy our own futurities;
 To gaze in thought on what all thought transcends!
 To talk with fellow-candidates, of joys
 As far beyond conception as desert,
 Ourselves th' astonish'd talkers and the tale!

Lorenzo, swells thy bosom at the thought?
 The swell becomes thee: 'Tis an honest pride.
 Revere thyself;—and yet thyself despise.
 His nature no man can o'er-rate; and none
 Can under-rate his merit. Take good heed, Nor be thou modest, where thou should'st be proud;

That almost universal error shun.
 How just our pride, when we behold those heights!
 Not those ambition paints in air, but those Reason points out, and ardent virtue gains;
 And angels emulate; our pride how just!
 When mount we? When these shackles cast!

When quit
 This cell of the creation? This small nest,
 Stuck in a corner of the universe,
 Wrapt up in fleecy cloud, and fine-spun air?
 Fine-spun to sense; but gross and seculent
 To souls celestial; souls ordain'd to breathe
 Ambrosial gales and drink a purer sky;
 Greatly triumphant on time's farther shore,
 Where virtue reigns, enrich'd with full arrears;
 While pomp imperial begs an alms of peace.

In empire high, or in proud science deep,
 Ye born of earth! on what you can confer,
 With half the dignity, with half the gain,
 The gust, the glow of rational delight,
 As on this theme, which angels praise and share?
 Man's fates and favours are a theme in heaven.

What wretched repetition cloy us here!
 What periodic potions for the sick!
 Distemper'd bodies! and distemper'd minds!
 In an eternity, what scenes shall strike!
 Adventures thicken! novelties surprise!

What webs of wonder shall unravel, there
 What full day pour on all the paths of heaven!
 And light th' Almighty's footsteps in the deep,
 How shall the blessed day of our discharge
 Unwind, at once, the labyrinths of fate,
 And straiten its inextricable maze!

If inextinguishable thirst in man
 To know; how rich, how full, our banquet there,
There, not the moral world alone unfolds;
 The world material, lately seen in shades,
 And, in those shades, by fragments only seen,
 And seen those fragments by the labouring eye,
 Unbroken, then, illustrious and entire,
 Its ample sphere, its universal frame,
 In full dimensions, swells to the survey;
 And enters at one glance, the ravish'd sight.
 From some superior point (where, who can tell?
 Suffice it, 'tis a point where gods reside)
 How shall the stranger man's illumin'd eye,
 In the vast ocean of unbounded space,
 Behold an infinite of floating worlds
 Divide the crystal waves of ether pure,
 In endless voyage, without port! The least
 Of these disseminated orbs, how great!
 Great as they are, what numbers these surpass,
 Huge, as leviathan, to that small race,
 Those twinkling multitudes of little life,
 He swallows unperceiv'd? stupendous these!
 Yet what are these stupendous to the whole!
 As particles, as atoms ill perceiv'd;
 As circulating globules in our viens;
 So vast the plan. Fecundity divine!
 Exuberant source! perhaps, I wrong thee still.

If admiration is a source of joy,
 What transport hence; yet this the least in heaven.
 What this to that illustrious robe he wears,
 Who tost this mass of wonders from his hand,
 A specimen, an earnest of his power?
 'Tis to that glory, whence all glory flows,
 As the mead's meanest floweret to the sun,
 Which gave it birth. But what, this sun of heav'n?
 This bliss supreme of the supremely blest?
 Death, only death, the question can resolve.
 By death, cheap-bought th' ideas of our joy;
 The bare ideas! solid happiness
 So distant from its shadow chas'd below.

And chase we still the phantom through the fire,

O'er bog, and brake, and precipice, till death?
 And toil we still for sublunary pay?
 Defy the dangers of the field and flood,
 Or, spider-like, spin out our precious all,
 Our more than vitals spin (if no regard
 To great futurity) in curious webs
 Of subtle thought, and exquisite design;
 (Fine net-work of the brain!) to catch a fly!
 The momentary buzz of vain renown!
 A name; a mortal immortality!

Or (meaner still!) instead of grasping air
 For sordid lucre, plunge we in the mire? [gain,
 Drudge, sweat, through every shame, for every
 For vile contaminating trash; throw up
 Our hope in heaven, our dignity with man?
 And deify the dirt matur'd to gold?
Ambition, avarice; the two demons these,

Which goad through every slough our human herd,
 Hard travell'd from the cradle to the grave.
 How low the wretches stoop! How steep they climb!

These demons burn mankind; but most possessa
 Lorenzo's bosom, and turn out the skies.

Is it in time to hide eternity?
 And why not in an atom on the shore
 To cover ocean? or a mote, the sun?
Glory and wealth! have they this blinding power?
 What if to them I prove Lorenzo blind?
 Would it surprise thee? Be thou then surpris'd;
 Thou neither know'st: their nature learn from me,

Mark well, as foreign as these subjects seem,
 What close connection ties them to my theme.
 First, what is true ambition? The pursuit
 Of glory, nothing less than man can share.
 Were they as vain as gaudy-miued man,
 As flatulent with fumes of self-applause,
 Their arts and conquests animals might boast,
 And claim their laurel crowns as well as we;
 But not celestial. Here we stand alone;
 As in our form distinct, pre-eminent;
 If prone in thought, our stature is our shame:
 And man should blush, his forehead meets the skies.
 The visible and present are for brutes,
 A slender portion! and a narrow bound!
 These reason, with an energy divine,
 O'erleaps; and claims the future and unseen;
 The vast unseen! the future fathomless!
 When the great soul buoys up to this high point,
 Leaving gross nature's sediments below,
 Then, and then only, Adam's offspring quits
 The sage and hero of the fields and woods,
 Asserts his rank, and rises into man.
 This is ambition: this is human fire.

Can parts or place (two bold pretenders!) make
 Lorenzo great, and pluck him from the throng?

Genius and art, ambition's boasted wings,
 Our boast but ill deserve. A feeble aid!
 Dedalian enginery! If these alone
 Assist our flight, fame's flight is glory's fall.
 Heart merit wanting, mount we ne'er so high,
 Our height is but the gibbet of our name.
 A celebrated wretch, when I behold;
 When I behold a genius bright and base,
 Of towering talents, and terrestrial aims;
 Methinks I see, as thrown from her high sphere,
 The glorious fragments of a soul immortal,
 With rubbish mix'd, and glittering in the dust.
 Struck at the splendid, melancholy sight,
 At once compassion soft, and envy rise—
 But wherefore envy? Talents angel-bright,
 If wanting worth, are shining instruments
 In false ambition's hand, to finish faults
 Illustrious, and give infamy renown.

Great ill is an atchievment of great powers.
 Plain sense but rarely leads us far astray.
Reason the means, affections cause our end;
 Means have not merit, if our end amiss.
 If wrong our hearts, our heads are right in vain;
 What is a Pelham's head, to Pelham's heart?
 Hearts are proprietors of all applause. [wise
 Right ends, and means, make wisdom: Worldly-
 Is but half-witted, at its highest praise.

Let genius then despair to make thee great;
 Nor flatter station: What is station high?
 'Tis a proud mendicant; it boasts, and begs;
 It begs an alms of homage from the throng,
 And oft the throng denies its charity.
 Monarchs and ministers are awful names;
 Whoever wear them, challenge our devoir.
 Religion, public order, both exact
External homage, and a supple knee,
 To beings pompously set up, to serve
 The meanest slave; all more is merit's due,
 He sacred and inviolable right
 Nor ever paid the monarch, but the man.
 Our hearts ne'er bow but to superior worth;
 Nor ever fail of their allegiance there.
 Fools, indeed, drop the man in their account,
 And vote the mantle into majesty.
 Let the small savage boast his silver fur;
 His royal robe unborrow'd, and unbought,
 His own, descending fairly from his fires.
 Shall man be proud to wear his livery,
 And souls in ermin scorn a soul without?
 Can place or lessen us, or aggrandize?
 Pygmies are pygmies still, though perch'd on Alps;
 And pyramids are pyramids in vales.
 Each man makes his own stature, builds himself:
 Virtue alone outbuilds the pyramids;
 Her monuments shall last, when Egypt's fall.
 Of these sure truths dost thou demand the cause?
 The cause is lodg'd in immortality.
 Hear, and assent. Thy bosom burns for power;
 What station charms thee? I'll install thee there;
 'Tis thine. And art thou greater than before?
 Then thou before wast something less than man.
 Has thy new post betray'd thee into pride?
 That treacherous pride betrays the dignity;
 That pride defames humanity, and calls
 The being mean, which staffs or strings can raise.
 That pride, like hooded hawks, in darkness soars,
 From blindness bold, and towering to the skies.
 'Tis born of ignorance, which knows not man;
 An angel's second; nor his second, long.
 A Nero quitting his imperial throne,
 And courting glory from the tinkling string,
 But faintly shadows an immortal soul,
 With empire's self, to pride, or rapture, fir'd.
 If nobler motives minister no cure,
 Ev'n vanity forbids thee to be vain.

High worth is elevated place: 'Tis more;
 It makes the post stand candidate for thee;
 Makes more than monarchs, makes an honest man;
 Though no exchequer it commands, 'tis wealth;
 And though it wears no ribband, 'tis renown;
 Renown, that would not quit thee, though dis-

grac'd,
 Nor leave thee pendant on a master's smile.
 Other ambition nature interdicts;
 Nature proclaims it most absurd in man,
 By pointing at his origin, and end;
 Milk, and a swathe, at first, his whole demand;
 His whole domain, at last, a turf, or stone;
 To whom, between, a world may seem too small.

Souls truly great dart forward on the wing
 Of just ambition, to the grand result,
 The curtains fall; there, see the buskin'd chief

Unshod behind this momentary scene;
 Reduc'd to his own stature, low or high,
 As vice or virtue, sinks him, or sublimes;
 And laugh at this fantastic mummary,
 This antic prelude of grotesque events,
 Where dwarfs are often stilted, and betray
 A littleness of soul by worlds o'er-run,
 And nations laid in blood. Dread sacrifice
 To Christian pride! which had with horror shock'd
 The darkest pagans offer'd to their gods.

O thou most Christian enemy to peace;
 Again in arms? Again provoking fate?
 That prince, and that alone, is truly great,
 Who draws the sword reluctant, gladly sheathes;
 On empire builds what empire far outweighs,
 And makes his throne a scaffold to the skies.

Why this so rare? Because forgot of all
 The day of death; that venerable day, [nounce
 Which sits as judge; that day, which shall pro-
 On all our days, absolve them, or condemn.
 Lorenzo, never shut thy thought against it;
 Be leaves ne'er so full, afford it room,
 And give it audience in the cabinet.
 That friend consulted, flatteries apart,
 Will tell the fair, if thou art great, or mean.

To doat on aught may leave us, or be left,
 Is that ambition? Then let flames descend,
 Point to the centre their inverted spires,
 And learn humiliation from a soul,
 Which boasts her lineage from celestial fire.
 Yet these are they the world pronounces wise;
 The world which cancels nature's right and wrong,
 And casts new wisdom: ev'n the grave man lends
 His solemn face, to countenance the coin.
 Wisdom for parts is madness for the whole.
 This stamps the paradox, and gives us leave
 To call the wisest weak, the richest poor,
 The most ambitious, unambitious, mean;
 In triumph, mean; and abject, on a throne.
 Nothing can make it less than mad in man,
 To put forth all his ardour, all his art,
 And give his soul her full unbounded flight,
 But reaching him, who gave her wings to fly.
 When blind ambition quite mistakes her road,
 And downwards pores, for that which shines above,
 Substantial happiness, and true renown;
 Then, like an idiot, gazing on the brook,
 We leap at stars, and fasten in the mud;
 At glory grasp, and sink in infamy.

Ambition! powerful source of good and ill!
 Thy strength in man, like length of wing in birds,
 When disengag'd from earth, with greater ease,
 And swifter flight transports us to the skies;
 By toys entangled, or in guilt bemir'd,
 It turns a curse; it is our chain, and scourge,
 In this dark dungeon, where confin'd we lie.
 Close-grated by the sordid bars of sense;
 All prospect of eternity shut out;
 And, but for execution, ne'er set free.

With error in ambition justly charg'd,
 Find we Lorenzo wiser in his wealth?
 What if thy mental I reform? and draw
 An inventory new to set thee right?
 Where thy true treasure? Gold says, "Not in me."
 And, "Not in me," the diamond. Gold is poor;

India's insolvent; seek it in thyself,
 Seek in thy naked self, and find it there;
 In being so descended, form'd, endow'd;
 Sky-born, sky-guided, sky-returning race!
 Erect, immortal, rational, divine!
 In senses, which inherit earth, and heavens;
 Enjoy the various riches nature yields;
 Far nobler! give the riches they enjoy;
 Give taste to fruits; and harmony to groves;
 Their radiant beams to gold, and gold's bright
 fire;

Take in, at once, the landscape of the world,
 At a small inlet which a grain might close,
 And half create the wondrous world they see.
 Our senses, as our reason, are divine.

But for the magic organ's powerful charm,
 Earth were a rude, uncolour'd chaos, still.

Objects are but th' occasion; ours th' exploit;
 Ours is the cloth, the pencil, and the paint,
 Which nature's admirable picture draws;
 And beautifies creation's ample dome.
 Like Milton's Eve, when gazing on the lake
 Man makes the matchless image man admires.
 Say, then, shall man, his thoughts all sent abroad,
 Superior wonders in himself forgot,
 His admiration waste on objects round,
 When heaven makes him the soul of all he sees?
 Absurd! not rare so great, so mean is man.
 What wealth in senses such as these! What wealth
 In fancy, fir'd to form a fairer scene
 Than sense surveys! In memory's firm record,
 Which, should it perish, could this world recal
 From the dark shadows of o'erwhelm'd
 In colours fresh, originally bright,
 Preserve its portrait, and report its fate!
 What wealth in intellect, that sovereign power!
 Which sense and fancy summons to the bar;
 Interrogates, approves, or reprehends;
 And from the mass those underlings import,
 From their materials sifted, and refin'd,
 And in truth's balance accurately weigh'd,
 Forms art, and science, government, and law;
 The solid basis, and the beauteous frame,
 The vitals, and the grace of civil life!
 And manners (sad exception!) set aside,
 Strikes out, with master hand, a copy fair
 Of his idea, whose indulgent thought
 Long, long, ere chaos teem'd, plann'd human blifs.

What wealth in souls that soar, dive, range around,
 Disdaining limit, or from place, or time;
 And hear at once, in thought extensive, hear
 Th' Almighty fiat, and the trumpet's sound!
 Bold, on creation's outside walk, and view
 What was, and is, and more than e'er shall be;
 Commanding, with omnipotence of thought,
 Creations new in fancy's field to rise!
 Souls that can grasp whate'er th' Almighty made,
 And wander wild through things impossible!
 What wealth, in faculties of endless growth,
 In quenchless passions violent to crave,
 In liberty to choose, in power to reach,
 And in duration (how thy riches rise!)
 Duration to perpetuate—boundless blifs!

Ask you what power resides in feeble man
 That blifs to gain? Is virtue's, then, unknown?

Virtue, our present peace, our future prize.
 Man's unprecarious, natural estate,
 Improveable at will, in virtue lies;
 Its tenure sure; its income is divine.

High-built abundance, heap on heap, for what?
 To breed new wants, and beggar us the more;
 Then make a richer scramble for the throng?
 Soon as this feeble pulse, which leaps so long
 Almost by miracle, is tir'd with play,
 Like rubbish from dislodging engines thrown,
 Our magazines of hoarded trifles fly;
 Fly diverse; fly to foreigners, to foes;
 New masters court, and call the former fool
 (How justly!) for dependence on their stay.
 Wide scatter, first, our playthings; then our dust.

Dost court abundance for the sake of peace?
 Learn, and lament thy self-defeated scheme:
 Riches enable to be richer still;
 And, richer still, what mortal can resist?
 Thus wealth (a cruel task-master!) enjoins
 New toils, succeeding toils, an endless train!
 And murders peace, which taught it first to shine.
 The poor are half as wretched as the rich;
 Whose proud and painful privilege it is,
 At once, to bear a double load of woe;
 To feel the stings of envy, and of want,
 Outrageous want! both Indies cannot cure.

A competence is vital to content,
 Much wealth is corpulence, if not disease;
 Sick, or encumber'd, is our happiness.
 A competence is all we can enjoy.

O be content, where heaven can give no more!
 More, like a flash of water from a lock,
 Quickens our spirits' movement for an hour;
 But soon its force is spent, nor rise our joys
 Above our native temper's common stream.
 Hence disappointment lurks in every prize,
 As bees in flowers; and stings us with success.

The rich man, who denies it, proudly feigns;
 Nor knows the wise are privy to the lie.
 Much learning shows how little mortals know;
 Much wealth, how little worldlings can enjoy;
 At best, it babies us with endless toys,
 And keeps us children till we drop to dust.
 As monkeys at a mirror stand amaz'd,
 They fail to find what they so plainly see;
 Thus men, in shining riches, see the face
 Of happiness, nor know it is a shade;
 But gaze, and touch, and peep, and peep again,
 And wish, and wonder it is absent still.

How few can rescue opulence from want!
 Who lives to nature, rarely can be poor;
 Who lives to fancy, never can be rich.
 Poor is the man in debt; the man of gold,
 In debt to fortune, trembles at her power.
 The man of reason smiles at her, and death.
 O what a patrimony this! A being
 Of such inherent strength and majesty,
 Not worlds possess can raise it; worlds destroy'd
 Can't injure: which holds on its glorious course,
 When thine, O nature! ends; too blest to mourn
 Creation's obsequies. What treasure, this!

The Monarch is a beggar to the Man.
 Immortal! Ages past, yet nothing gone!
 Morn without eve! a race without a goal!

Unshorten'd by progression infinite!
Futurity for ever future! Life
Beginning still where computation ends!

'Tis the description of a Deity!

'Tis the description of the meanest slave:

The meanest slave dares then Lorenzo scorn?

The meanest slave thy sovereign glory shares.

Proud youth! fastidious of the lower world!

Man's lawful pride includes humility;

Stoops to the lowest; is too great to find

Inferiors; all immortal! brothers all!

Proprietors eternal of thy love,

Immortal! What can strike the sense so strong,

As this the soul? It thunders to the thought;

Reason amazes; gratitude o'erwhelms;

No more we slumber on the brink of fate;

Rous'd at the sound, th' exulting soul ascends,

And breathes her native air; an air that feeds

Ambitions high, and fans ethereal fires;

Quick kindles all that is divine within us;

Nor leaves one loitering thought beneath the stars.

Has not Lorenzo's bosom caught the flame?

Immortal! Were but one immortal, how

Would others envy! How would thrones adore!

Because 'tis common, is the blessing lost?

How this ties up the bounteous hand of heaven!

O vain, vain, vain, all else! Eternity!

A glorious and a needful refuge, that

From vile imprisonment, in abject view.

'Tis immortality, 'tis that alone,

Amid life's pains, abasement, emptiness,

The soul can comfort, elevate, and fill.

That only, and that amply this performs;

Lifts us above life's pains, her joys above;

Their terror those, and these their lustre lose;

Eternity depending covers all;

Eternity depending all atchieves;

Sets earth at distance; casts her into shades;

Blends her distinctions; abrogates her powers;

The low, the lofty, joyous, and severe,

Fortune's dread frowns, and fascinating smiles,

Make one promiscuous and neglected heap,

The man beneath; if I may call him man,

Whom immortality's full force inspires.

Nothing terrestrial touches his high thought;

Suns shine unseen, and thunders roll unheard,

By minds quite conscious of their high descent,

Their present province, and their future prize;

Divinely darting upward every wish,

Warm on the wing, in glorious absence lost!

Doubt you this truth? Why labours your belief?

If earth's whole orb by some due distanc'd eye

Were seen at once, her towering Alps would sink,

And levell'd Atlas leave an even sphere.

Thus earth, and all that earthly minds admire,

Is swallow'd in eternity's vast round.

To that stupendous view when souls awake,

So large of late, so mountainous to man,

Time's toys subside; and equal all below.

Enthusiastic this? Then all are weak,

But rank enthusiasts. To this godlike height

Some souls have soar'd; or martyrs ne'er had bled.

And all may do, what has by man been done.

Who beaten by these sublunary storms,

Boundless, interminable joys can weigh,

Unraptur'd, unexalted, uninflam'd?

What slave unblest, who from to-morrow's dawn

Expects an empire? He forgets his chain,

And thron'd in thought, his absent sceptre waves.

And what a sceptre waits us! what a throne!

Her own immense appointments to compute,

Or comprehend her high prerogatives,

In this her dark minority, how toils,

How vainly pants, the human soul divine!

Too great the bounty seems for earthly joy;

What heart but trembles at so strange a bliss?

In spite of all the truths the muse has sung,

Ne'er to be priz'd enough! enough revolv'd!

Are there who wrap the world so close about them,

They see no farther than the clouds; and dance

On heedless vanity's fantastic toe,

Till stumbling at a straw in their career, [song?

Headlong they plunge, where end both dance and

Are there, Lorenzo? Is it possible?

Are there on earth (let me not call them men)

Who lodge a soul immortal in their breasts;

Unconscious as the mountain of its ore;

Or rock of its inestimable gem?

When rocks shall melt, and mountains vanish, these

Shall know their treasure; treasure then no more.

Are there (still more amazing!) who resist

The rising thought? who smother in its birth

The glorious truth? who struggle to be brutes?

Who through this bosom-barrier burst their way,

And with revers'd ambition strive to sink?

Who labour downwards through th' opposing powers

Of instinct, reason, and the world against them,

To dismal hopes, and shelter in the shock

Of endless night; darker than the grave's?

Who fight the proofs of immortality?

With horrid zeal, and execrable arts,

Work all their engines, level their black fires,

To blot from man this attribute divine,

(Than vital blood far dearer to the wise)

Blasphemers, and rank atheists to themselves?

To contradict them, see all nature rise!

What object, what event, the moon beneath

But argues or endears an after-scene?

To reason proves, or weds it to desire?

All things proclaim it needful; some advance

One precious step beyond, and prove it sure.

A thousand arguments swarm round my pen,

From heaven, and earth, and man. Indulge a few

By nature, as her common habit worn;

So pressing Providence a truth to teach,

Which truth untaught, all other truths were vain.

Thou, whose all-providential eye surveys,

Whose hand directs, whose spirit fills and warms

Creation, and holds empire far beyond!

Eternity's inhabitant august!

Of two eternities amazing Lord!

One past, ere man's or angel's had begun;

Aid; while I rescue from the foe's assault

Thy glorious immortality in man:

A theme for ever, and for all, of weight,

Of moment infinite! but relish'd most

By those who love thee most, who most adore.

Nature, thy daughter, ever-changing birth

Of thee the Great Immutable, to man

Speaks wisdom; is his oracle supreme;
 And he who most consults her, is most wise.
 Lorenzo, to his heavenly Delphos haste;
 And come back all-immortal, all-divine:
 Look nature through, 'tis revolution all;
 All change; no death. Day follows night; and night

The dying day; stars rise, and set, and rise;
 Earth takes th' example. See, the summer gay,
 With her green chaplet, and ambrosial flowers,
 Droops into pallid autumn: Winter gray,
 Horrid with frost, and turbulent with storm,
 Blows autumn and his golden fruits away:
 Then melts into the spring: Soft spring, with breath
 Favonian, from warm chambers of the south
 Recalls the first. All, to re-flourish, fades;
 As in a wheel all sinks, to re-ascend.
 Emblems of man, who passes, not expires.

With this minute distinction, emblems just,
Nature revolves, but man advances; both
 Eternal, that a circle, this a line.

That gravitates, this soars. Th' aspiring soul,
 Ardent and tremulous, like flame, ascends,
 Zeal and humility her wings, to heaven.
 The world of matter, with its various forms,
 All dies into new life. Life born from death
 Rolls the vast mass, and shall for ever roll.
 No single atom once in being, lost,
 With change of counsel chargest the Most High.

What hence infers Lorenzo? Can it be!
Matter immortal? And shall spirit die?
 Above the nobler, shall less noble rise?
 Shall man alone, for whom all else revives,
 No resurrection know? Shall man alone,
 Imperial man, be sown in barren ground,
 Less privileg'd than grain on which he feeds?
 Is man, in whom alone is power to prize
 The bliss of being, or with previous pain
 Deplore its period by the spleen of fate,
 Severely doom'd death's single unredeem'd?
 If nature's revolution speaks aloud,
 In her gradation, hear her louder still.
 Look nature through, 'tis neat gradation all.
 By what minute degrees her scale ascends!
 Each middle nature join'd at each extreme,
 To that above it join'd, to that beneath.
 Parts into parts reciprocally shot,
 Abhor divorce: what love of union reigns!
 Here dormant matter waits a call to life;
 Half-life, half-death, join there; here life and sense;
 There sense from reason steals a glimmering ray;
 Reason shines out in man. But how preserv'd
 The chain unbroken upward, to the realms
 Of incorporeal life? those realms of bliss,
 Where death hath no dominion? Grant a make Half-mortal, half-immortal; earthly part,
 And part ethereal; grant the soul of man
 Eternal; or in man the series ends,
 Wide yawns the gap; connection is no more;
 Check'd reason halts; her next step wants support;
 Striving to climb, she tumbles from her scheme;
 A scheme analogy pronounc'd so true;
Analogy, man's surest guide below.

Thus far, all nature calls on thy belief.
 And will Lorenzo, careless of the call,

False attestation on all nature charge,
 Rather than violate his league with death?
 Renounce his reason, rather than renounce
 The dust belov'd, and run the risk of heaven?
 O what indignity to deathless souls!
 What treason to the majesty of man!
 Of man immortal! Here the lofty style:
 "If so decreed, th' Almighty will be done.
 "Let earth dissolve, yon ponderous orbs descend,
 "And grind us into dust. The soul is safe;
 "The man emerges; mounts above the wreck,
 "As towering flame from nature's funeral pyre;
 "O'er devastation, as a gainer, smiles;
 "His charter, his inviolable rights,
 "Well pleas'd to learn from thunder's impotence,
 "Death's pointless darts, and hell's defeated
 "storms."

But these chimeras touch not thee, Lorenzo!
 The glories of the world thy sevenfold shield.
 Other ambition than of crowns in air,
 And superlunary felicities,
 Thy bosom warm. I'll cool it, if I can;
 And turn those glories that inchant against thee.
 What ties thee to this life, proclaims the next.
 If wise, the cause that wounds thee is thy cure.

Come, my ambitious! let us mount together
 (To mount, Lorenzo, never can refuse);
 And from the clouds, where pride delights to dwell,
 Look down on earth.—What seest thou? Wondrous things!

Terrestrial wonders, that eclipse the skies.
 What lengths of labour'd lands! what loaded seas!
 Loaded by man for pleasure, wealth, or war!
 Seas, winds, and planets, into service brought,
 His art acknowledge, and promote his ends.
 Nor can th' eternal rocks his will withstand;
 What levell'd mountains! and what lifted vales!
 O'er vales and mountains sumptuous cities swell,
 And gild our landscape with their glittering spires.
 Some mid the wondering waves majestic rise;
 And Neptune holds a mirror to their charms.
 Far greater still! (what cannot mortal might?)
 See, wide dominions ravish'd from the deep!
 The narrow'd deep with indignation foams,
 Or southward turn; to delicate and grand,
 The finer arts there ripen in the sun.
 How the tall temples, as to meet their gods,
 Ascend the skies! the proud triumphal arch
 Shows us half heaven beneath its ample bend.
 Hid through mid air, here streams are taught to flow;

Whole rivers there, laid by in basins, sleep.
Here, plains turn oceans; there, vast oceans join Through kingdoms channell'd deep from shore to shore;

And chang'd creation takes his face from man.
 Beats thy brave breast for formidable scenes,
 Where fame and empire wait upon the sword?
 See fields in blood; here navel thunders rise;
 Britannia's voice! that awes the world to peace.
 How yon enormous mole projecting breaks
 The mid-sea, furious waves! Their roar amidst,
 Out-speaks the Deity, and says, "O main!
 "Thus far, nor farther; new restraints obey."
 Earth's disembowell'd! measur'd are the skies!

Stars are detected in their deep recess!
Creation widens! vanquish'd nature yields!
Her secrets are extorted! art prevails!
What monument of genius, spirit, power!

And now, Lorenzo! raptur'd at this scene,
Whose glories render heaven superfluous! say,
Whose footsteps these?—Immortals have been here.
Could less than souls immortal this have done?
Earth's cover'd o'er with proofs of souls immortal;
And proofs of immortality forgot.

To flatter thy grand foible, I confess
These are ambition's works: and these are great:
But this, the least immortal souls can do;
Transcend them all—but what can these transcend?
Dost ask me what?—one sigh for the disirest.
What then for infidels? A deeper sigh.
'Tis moral grandeur makes the mighty man:
How little they, who think ought great below!
All our ambitions death defeats, but one;
All that it crowns. Here cease we: but ere long,
More powerful proof shall take the field against
thee,
Stronger than death, and smiling at the tomb.

NIGHT VII.

BEING THE SECOND PART OF
THE INFIDEL RECLAIMED.

Containing the Nature, Proof, and Importance of Immortality.

PREFACE.

As we are at war with the power, it were well if we were at war with the manners of France. A land of levity is a land of guilt. A serious mind is the native soil of every virtue; and the single character that does true honour to mankind. The soul's immortality has been the favourite theme with the serious of all ages. Nor is it strange; it is a subject by far the most interesting and important that can enter the mind of man. Of highest moment this subject always was, and always will be. Yet this its highest moment seems to admit of increase at this day; a sort of occasional importance is superadded to the natural weight of it; if that opinion which is advanced in the preface to the preceding Night, be just. It is there supposed, that all our infidels, whatever scheme, for argument's sake, and to keep themselves in countenance, they patronize, are betrayed into their deplorable error, by some doubts of their immortality, at the bottom. And the more I consider this point, the more I am persuaded of the truth of that opinion. Though the distrust of a futurity is a strange error; yet it is an error into which bad men may naturally be distressed. For it is impossible to bid defiance to final ruin, without some refuge in imagination, some presumption of escape. And what presumption is there? There are but two in nature; but two, within the compass of human thought. And these are—That either God will not, or can not punish. Considering the divine attributes, the first is too gross to be digested by our strongest wishes. And since omnipotence is as much a divine attribute as holiness, that God can- not punish, is as absurd a supposition, as the former. God certainly can punish as long as wicked men exist. In non-existence, therefore, is their only refuge; and, consequently, non-existence is their strongest wish. And strong wishes have a strange influence on our opinions; they bias the judgment in a manner, almost, incredible. And since on this member of their alternative, there are some very small appearances in their favour, and none at all on the other, they catch at this reed, they lay hold on this chimæra, to save themselves from the shock and horror of an immediate and absolute despair.

On reviewing my subject, by the light which this argument, and others of like tendency, threw upon it, I was more inclined than ever to pursue it, as it appeared to me to strike directly at the main root of all our infidelity. In the following pages it is, accordingly, pursued at large; and some arguments for immortality, new at least to me, are ventured on in them. There also the writer has made an attempt to set the gross absurdities and horrors of annihilation in a fuller and more affecting view, than is (I think) to be met with elsewhere.

The gentlemen, for whose sake this attempt was chiefly made, profess great admiration for the wisdom of heathen antiquity: what pity it is they are not sincere! If they were sincere, how would it mortify them to consider, with what contempt and abhorrence their notions would have been received by those whom they so much admire! What degree of contempt and abhorrence would fall to their share, may be conjectured by the following matter of fact (in my opinion) extremely memorable. Of all their heathen worthies, Socrates (it is well known) was the most guarded, dispassionate, and composed: yet this great master of temper was angry; and angry at his last hour; and angry with his friend; and angry at for what deserved acknowledgement; angry for a right and tender instance of true friendship towards him. Is not this surprising? What could be the cause? The cause was for his honour; it was a truly noble, though, perhaps, a too punctilious, regard for immortality: for his friend asking him, with such an affectionate concern as became a friend, "Where he should deposit his remains?" it was resented by Socrates, as implying a dishonourable supposition, that he could be so mean, as to have a regard for any thing, even in himself, that was not immortal.

This fact well considered would make our infidels withdraw their admiration from Socrates; or make them endeavour, by their imitation of this illustrious example, to share his glory: and, consequently, it would incline them to peruse the following pages with candour and impartiality: which is all I desire; and that, for their sakes: for I am persuaded, that an unprejudiced infidel must, necessarily, receive some advantageous impressions from them.

CONTENTS.

In the sixth Night arguments were drawn, from Nature, in proof of immortality: here, others are drawn from Man: from his Discontent, Ver. 29.; from his Passions and Powers, 64; from the gradual growth of Reason, 81; from his fear of Death, 86; from the nature of Hope, 104, and of Virtue, 159, &c. from Knowledge and Love, as being the most essential properties of the soul, 253; from the Order of Creation, 290, &c. from the nature of Ambition, 337, &c. Avarice, 460; Pleasure, 477; a digression on the grandeur of the Passions, 521. Immortality alone renders our present state intelligible, 545. An objection from the Stoics, disbelief of immortality answered, 585. Endless questions unresolvable, but on supposition of our immortality, 606. The natural, most melancholy, and pathetic complaint of a worthy man, under the persuasion of no futurity, 653, &c. The gross absurdities and horrors of annihilation urged home on Lorenzo, 842, &c. The soul's vast importance, 990, &c. from whence it arises, 1078. The Difficulty of being an infidel, 1131, the Infamy, 1148, the Cause, 1183, and the Character, 1203, of an infidel state. What true free-thinking is, 1217. The necessary punishment of the false, 1271. Man's ruin is from himself, 1303. An infidel accuses himself of guilt, and hypocrisy; and that of the worst sort, 1319. His obligation to Christians, 1337. What danger he incurs by Virtue, 1345. Vice recommended to him, 1364. His high pretences to Virtue and Benevolence, exploded, 1373. The conclusion, on the nature of Faith, 1427. Reason, 1439; and Hope, 1443; with an apology for this attempt, 1470.

HEAVEN gives the needful, but neglected, call,
What day, what hour, but knocks at human hearts;
To wake the soul to sense of future scenes?
Deaths stand, like Mercuries, in every way,
And kindly point us to our journey's end.
Pope, who couldst make immortals! art thou dead?
I give thee joy: nor will I take my leave;
So soon to follow. Man but dives in death;
Dives from the sun, in fairer day to rise;
The grave, his subterranean road to bliss. 10
Yes, infinite indulgence plann'd it so;
Through various parts our glorious story runs;
Time gives the preface, endless age unrolls
The volume (ne'er unroll'd!) of human fate.

This, earth and skies * already have proclaim'd.
The world's a prophecy of worlds to come;
And who, what God foretels (who speaks in things,
Still louder than in words) shall dare deny?
If nature's arguments appear too weak,
Turn a new leaf, and stronger read in man. 20
If man sleeps on, untaught by what he sees,
Can he prove infidel to what he feels?
He, whose blind thought futurity denies,
Unconscious bears, Bellerophon! like thee,
His own indictment; he condemns himself;
Who reads his bosom, reads immortal life;
Or, nature, there, imposing on her sons,
Has written fables; man was made a lie.

* Night the Sixth.

Why discontent for ever harbour'd there?

Incurable consumption of our peace! 30

Resolve me, why the cottager and king,
He whom sea-fever'd realms obey, and he
Who steals his whole dominion from the waste,
Repelling winter blasts with mud and straw,
Disquieted alike, draw sigh for sigh,
In fate so distant, in complaint so near?

Is it, that things terrestrial can't content?
Deep in rich pasture, will thy flocks complain?
Not so; but to their master is deny'd

To share their sweet serene. Man, ill at ease, 40
In this, not his own place, this foreign field,
Where nature foddors him with other food
Than was ordain'd his cravings to suffice,
Poor in abundance, famish'd at a feast,
Sighs on for something more, when most enjoy'd.

Is heaven then kinder to thy flocks than thee?

Not so; thy pasture richer, but remote;

In part, remote; for that remoter part 48

Man bleats from instinct, though perhaps, debauch'd

By sense; his reason sleeps, nor dreams the cause.

The cause how obvious, when his reason wakes!

His grief is but his grandeur in disguise;

And discontent is immortality.

Shall sons of ether, shall the blood of heaven,

Set up their hopes on earth, and stable here

With brutal acquiescence in the mire?

Lorenzo! no! they shall be nobly pain'd;

The glorious foreigners, distress'd, shall sigh

On thrones; and thou congratulate the sigh:

Man's misery declares him born for bliss; 60

His anxious heart asserts the truth I sing,

And gives the sceptic in his head the lie.

Our heads, our hearts, our passions, and our powers;

Speak the same language; call us to the skies;

Unripen'd these in this inclement clime,

Scarce rise above conjecture and mistake;

And for this land of trifles those too strong

Tumultuous rise, and tempest human life: 68

What prize on earth can pay us for the storm?

Meet objects for our passions, heaven ordain'd,

Objects that challenge all their fire, and leave

No fault, but in defect: Blest Heaven! avert

A bounded ardour for unbounded bliss!

O for a bliss unbounded! far beneath

A soul immortal, is a mortal joy.

Nor are our powers to perish immature;

But, after feeble effort here, beneath

A brighter sun, and in a nobler soil,

Transplanted from this sublunary bed, 79

Shall flourish fair, and put forth all their bloom.

Reason progressive, instinct is complete;

Swift instinct leaps; slow reason feebly climbs.

Brutes soon their zenith reach; their little all

Flows in at once; in ages they no more

Could know, or do, or covet, or enjoy.

Were man to live coeval with the sun,

The patriarch-pupil would be learning still;

Yet, dying, leave his lesson half unlearn'd.

Men perish in advance, as if the sun

Should set ere noon, in eastern oceans drown'd; 90

If fit, with dim, illustrious to compare,

The sun's meridian with the soul of man.

To man, why, step dame nature! so severe?
 Why thrown aside thy master-piece half-wrought,
 While meaner efforts thy last hand enjoy?
 Or, if abortively poor man must die,
 Nor reach, what reach he might, why die in dread?
 Why curst with foresight? Wise to misery?
 Why of his proud prerogative the prey?
 Why less pre-eminent in rank, than pain? 100
 His immortality alone can tell;
 Full ample fund to balance all amiss,
 And turn the scale in favour of the just!

His immortality alone can solve
 The darkest of enigmas, human hope;
 Of all the darkest, if at death we die.
Hope, eager hope, th' assassin of our joy,
 All present blessings treading under foot,
 Is scarce a milder tyrant than despair. 109
 With no past toils content, still planning new,
Hope turns us o'er to death alone for ease.
Possession, why more tasteless than pursuit?
 Why is a wish far dearer than a crown?
 That wish accomplish'd, why, the grave of bliss?
 Because in the great future bury'd deep,
 Beyond our plans of empire, and renown,
 Lies all that man with ardour should pursue;
 And he who made him, bent him to the right.

Man's heart th' Almighty to the future sets,
 By secret and inviolable springs; 120
 And makes his hope his sublunary joy.
 Man's heart eats all things, and is hungry still;
 "More, more!" the glutton cries: for something new

So rages appetite, if man can't mount,
 He will descend. He starves on the possest.
 Hence, the world's master, from ambition's spire,
 In Caprea plung'd; and div'd beneath the brute.
 In that rank fly why wallow'd empire's son
 Supreme? Because he could no higher fly;
 His riot was ambition in despair. 130

Old Rome consulted birds; Lorenzo! thou,
 With more success, the flight of hope survey;
 Of restless hope, for ever on the wing.
 High-perch'd o'er every thought that falcon sits,
 To fly at all that rises in her sight;
 And, never stooping, but to mount again
 Next moment, she betrays her aim's mistake,
 And owns her quarry lodg'd beyond the grave.

There should it fail us (it must fail us there,
 If being fails) more mournful riddles rise, 140
 And virtue vies with hope in mystery.
 Why virtue? Where its praise, its being, fled?
 Virtue is true self-interest pursued:
 What true self-interest of quite-mortal man?
 To close with all that makes him happy here.
 If vice (as sometimes) is our friend on earth,
 Then vice is virtue; 'tis our sovereign good.
 In self-applause is virtue's golden prize;
 No self-applause attends it on thy scheme: [right.
 Whence self-applause? From conscience of the
 And what is right, but means of happiness? 151
 No means of happiness when virtue yields;
 That basis failing, falls the building too,
 And lays in ruin every virtuous joy.

The rigid guardian of a blameless heart,
 So long rever'd, so long reputed wise,

Is weak; with rank knight-errandries o'er-run.
 Why beats thy bosom with illustrious dreams
 Of self-exposure, laudable, and great?
 Of gallant enterprise, and glorious death? 160
 Die for thy country?—Thou romantic fool!
 Seize, seize the plank thyself, and let her sink:
 Thy country! what to thee?—The Godhead, what?
 (I speak with awe!) though he should bid thee
 bleed?

If, with thy blood, thy final hope is spilt,
 Nor can Omnipotence reward the blow,
 Be deaf; preserve thy being; disobey.
 Nor is it disobedience: know, Lorenzo!
 Whate'er th' Almighty's subsequent command,
 His first command is this:—"Man, love thyself."
 In this alone, free-agents are not free. 171
 Existence is the basis, bliss the prize;
 If virtue costs existence, 'tis a crime;
 Bold violation of our law supreme,
 Black suicide; though nations, which consult
 Their gain, at thy expence, resound applause.

Since virtue's recompence is doubtful here,
 If man dies wholly, well may we demand
 Why is man suffer'd to be good in vain?
 Why to be good in vain is man enjoin'd? 180
 Why to be good in vain is man betray'd?
 Betray'd by traitors lodg'd in his own breast,
 By sweet complacencies from virtue felt?
 Why whispers nature lies on virtue's part?
 Or if blind instinct (which assumes the name
 Of sacred conscience) plays the fool in man,
 Why reason made accomplice in the cheat?
 Why are the wisest loudest in her praise?
 Can man by reason's beam be led astray?
 Or, at his peril, imitate his God? 190
 Since virtue sometimes ruins us on earth,
 Or both are true, or man survives the grave.

Or man survives the grave; or own, Lorenzo,
 Thy boast supreme, a wild absurdity.
 Dauntless thy spirit; cowards are thy scorn.
 Grant man immortal, and thy scorn is just.
 The man immortal, rationally brave,
 Dares rush on death—because he cannot die.
 But if man loses all when life is lost,
 He lives a coward, or a fool expires. 200
 A daring infidel (and such there are,
 From pride, example, lucre, rage, revenge,
 Or pure heroical defect of thought,)
 Of all earth's madmen most deserves a chain.

When to the grave we follow the renown'd
 For valour, virtue, science, all we love,
 And all we praise; for worth, whose noon-tide beam,

Enabling us to think in higher style,
 Mends our ideas of ethereal powers, 210
 Dream we that lustre of the moral world
 Goes out in stench, and rottenness the close?
 Why was he wise to know, and warm to praise,
 And strenuous to transcribe, in human life,
 The Mind Almighty? Could it be that fate,
 Just when the lineaments began to shine,
 And dawn the Deity, should snatch the draught,
 With night eternal blot it out, and give
 The skies alarm, lest angels too might die?
 If human souls, why not angelic too,

Extinguish'd? and a solitary God 220
 O'er ghastly ruin frowning from his throne!
 Shall we this moment gaze on God in man?
 The next lose man for ever in the dust?
 From dust we disengage, or man mistakes;
 And there, where least his judgment fears a flaw,
Wisdom and worth how boldly he commends!
Wisdom and worth are sacred names; rever'd
 Where not embrac'd; applauded! deify'd!
 Why not compassion'd too? If spirits die,
 Both are calamities, inflicted both 230
 To make us but more wretched: Wisdom's eye
 Acute, for what? To spy more miseries;
 And worth, so recompens'd, new-points their stings.
 Or man surmounts the grave; or gain is loss,
 And worth exalted humbles us the more.
 Thou wilt not patronise a scheme that makes Weakness and vice the refuge of mankind.
 "Has virtue then no joys?"—Yes, joys dear bought,
 Talk ne'er so long, in this imperfect state,
 Virtue and vice are at eternal war. 240
Virtue's a combat; and who fights for nought?
 Or for precarious, or for small reward?
 Who virtue's self-reward so loud resound,
 Would take degrees angelic here below,
 And virtue, while they compliment, betray,
 By feeble motives, and unfaithful guards.
 The crown, th' unfading crown, her soul inspires;
 'Tis that, and that alone, can countervail
 The body's treacheries, and the world's assaults:
 On earth's poor pay our famish'd virtue dies. 250
 Truth incontestable! in spite of all
 A Bayle has preach'd, or a Voltaire believ'd.
 In man the more we dive, the more we see
 Heaven's signet stamping an immortal make.
 Dive to the bottom of his soul, the base
 Sustaining all; what find we? Knowledge, love.
 As light and heat essential to the sun,
These to the soul. And why, if souls expire?
 How little lovely here? How little known?
 Small knowledge we dig up with endless toil; 260
 And love unfeign'd may purchase perfect hate.
 Why starv'd on earth our angel appetites,
 While brutal are indulg'd their sullen fill?
 Were then capacities divine conferr'd,
 As a mock diadem, in savage sport,
 Rank insult of our pompous poverty,
 Which reaps but pain from seeming claims so fair?
 In future age lies no redress? And shuts
Eternity the door on our complaint?
 If so, for what strange ends were mortals made!
 The worst to wallow, and the best to weep; 270
 The man who merits most must most complain:
 Can we conceive a disregard in heaven,
 What the worst perpetrate, or best endure?
 This cannot be. To love, and know, in man
 Is boundless appetite, and boundless power;
 And these demonstrate boundless objects too.
 Objects, powers, appetites, heaven suits in all;
 Nor, nature through, e'er violates this sweet,
 Eternal concord, on her tuneful string. 280
 Is man the sole exception from her laws?
Eternity struck off from human hope,
 (I speak with truth, but veneration too)
 Man is a monster, the reproach of heaven,

A stain, a dark impenetrable cloud
 On nature's beauteous aspect, and deforms,
 (Amazing blot!) deforms her with her lord.
 If such is man's allotment, what is heaven?
 Or own the soul immortal, or blaspheme.
 Or own the soul immortal, or invert 290
 All order. Go, mock majesty! go, man!
 And bow to thy superiors of the stall;
 Through every scene of sense superior far:
 They graze the turf untill'd; they drink the stream
 Unbrew'd; and ever full, and unembitter'd
 With doubts, fears, fruitless hopes, regrets, despairs;
 Mankind's peculiar! reason's precious dower!
 No foreign clime they ransack for their robes;
 Nor brothers cite to the litigious bar;
 Their good is good entire, unmix'd, unmarr'd;
 They find a paradise in every field, 301
 On boughs forbidden where no curses hang:
 Their ill no more than strikes the sense; unstretch'd
 By previous dread, or murmur in the rear:
 When the worst comes, it comes unfear'd; one stroke
 Begins and ends their woe: they die but once;
 Blest, incommunicable privilege! for which Proud man, who rules the globe, and reads the stars,
Philosopher, or hero, sighs in vain.
 Account for this prerogative in brutes. 311
 No day, no glimpse of day, to solve the knot,
 But what beams on it from eternity.
 O sole, and sweet solution! that unties
 The difficult, and softens the severe;
 The cloud on nature's beauteous face dispels,
 Restores bright order, casts the brute beneath,
 And re-enthrones us in supremacy
 Of joy ev'n here: admit immortal life,
 And virtue is knight-errantry no more;
 Each virtue brings in hand a golden dower, 320
 Far richer in reversion: Hope exults;
 And though much bitter in our cup is thrown,
 Predominates, and gives the taste of heaven.
 O wherefore is the Deity so kind?
 Astonishing beyond astonishment!
 Heaven our reward—for heaven enjoy'd below.
 Still unsubdu'd thy stubborn heart?—For there
 The traitor lurks who doubts the truth I sing.
Reason is guiltless; will alone rebels.
 What in that stubborn heart if I should find 330
 New unexpected witnesses against thee?
Ambition, pleasure, and the love of gain!
 Canst thou suspect that these, which make the soul
 The slave of earth, should own her heir of heaven?
 Canst thou suspect what makes us disbelievers
 Our immortality, should prove it sure?
 First then ambition summon to the bar.
Ambition's shame, extravagance, disgust,
 And inextinguishable nature, speak.
 Each much deposes; hear them in their turn. 340
 Thy soul, how passionately fond of fame!
 How anxious that fond passion to conceal!
 We blush, detected in designs on praise,
 Though for best deeds, and from the best of men;
 And why? Because immortal. Art divine
 Has made the body tutor to the soul;
 Heaven kindly gives our blood a moral flow;

Bids it ascend the glowing cheek, and there
Upbraid that little heart's inglorious aim
Which stoops to court a character from man; 350
While o'er us in tremendous judgment sit
Far more than man, with endless praise, and blame.

Ambition's boundless appetite out-speaks
The verdict of its shame. When souls take fire
At high presumptions of their own desert,
One age is poor applause; the mighty shout,
The thunder by the living few begun,
Late time must echo, worlds unborn resound.
We wish our names eternally to live:
Wild dream, which ne'er had haunted human thought, 360

Had not our natures been eternal too.
Instinct points out an interest in hereafter;
But our blind reason sees not where it lies;
Or, seeing, gives the substance for the shade.

Fame is the shade of immortality,
And in itself a shadow. Soon as caught,
Contemn'd; it shrinks to nothing in the grasp.
Consult th' ambitious, 'tis ambition's cure.
"And is this all?" cry'd Cæsar at his height,
Disgusted. This third proof ambition brings 370
Of immortality. The first in fame,
Observe him near, your envy will abate:
Sham'd at the disproportion vast, between
The passion and the purchase, he will sigh
At such success, and blush at his renown.
And why? Because far richer prize invites
His heart; far more illustrious glory calls;
It calls in whispers, yet the deafest hear.

And can ambition a fourth proof supply?
It can, and stronger than the former three; 380
Yet quite o'erlook'd by some reputed wife.
Though disappointments in ambition pain,
And though success disgusts, yet still, Lorenzo,
In vain we strive to pluck it from our hearts;
By nature planted for the noblest ends.
Absurd the fam'd advice to Pyrrhus given;
More prais'd than ponder'd; specious, but unsound;
Sooner that hero's sword the world had quell'd
Than reason his ambition. Man must soar.

An obstinate activity within, 390
An insuppressible spring, will toss him up
In spite of fortune's load. Not kings alone,
Each villager has his ambition too;
No Sultan prouder than his fetter'd slave:
Slaves build their little Babylons of straw,
Echo the proud Assyrian in their hearts,
And cry, "Behold the wonders of my might!"
And why? Because immortal as their lord;
And souls immortal must for ever heave
At something great, the glitter or the gold, 400
The praise of mortals, or the praise of heaven.

Nor absolutely vain is human praise,
When human is supported by divine.
I'll introduce Lorenzo to himself;
Pleasure and pride (bad masters!) share our hearts,
As love of pleasure is ordain'd to guard
And feed our bodies, and extend our race,
The love of praise is planted to protect
And propagate the glories of the mind.

What is it but the love of praise inspires, 410
Matures, refines, embellishes, exalts,

Earth's happiness? From that the delicate,
The grand, the marvellous, of civil life,
Want and convenience, under-workers, lay
The basis on which love of glory builds.
Nor is thy life, O virtue! less in debt
To praise, thy secret stimulating friend.
Were men not proud, what merit should we miss!
Pride made the virtues of the pagan world.
Praise is the salt that seasons right to man, 420
And whets his appetite for moral good.
Thirst of applause is virtue's second guard;
Reason her first; but reason wants an aid;
Our private reason is a flatterer;
Thirst of applause calls public judgment in,
To poise our own, to keep an even scale,
And give endanger'd virtue fairer play.

Here a fifth proof arises, stronger still:
Why this so nice construction of our hearts?
These delicate moralities of sense, 430
This constitutional reserve of aid
To succour virtue when our reason fails,
If virtue, kept alive by care and toil,
And oft the mark of injuries on earth,
When labour'd to maturity (its bill
Of disciplines, and pains, unpaid) must die?
Why freighted-rich to dash against a rock?
Were man to perish when most fit to live,
O how mis-spent were all these stratagems,
By skill divine enwoven in our frame! 440
Where are heaven's holiness and mercy fled?
Laughs heaven at once at virtue and at man?
If not, why that discourag'd, this destroy'd?

Thus far ambition. What says avarice?
This her chief maxim, which has long been thine:
"The wise and wealthy are the same,"—I grant it:
To store up treasure with incessant toil,
This is man's province, this his highest praise.
To this great end keen instinct stings him on.
To guide that instinct, reason, is thy charge; 450
'Tis thine to tell us where true treasure lies:
But, reason failing to discharge her trust,
Or to the deaf discharging it in vain,
A blunder follows; and blind industry,
Gall'd by the spur, but stranger to the course,
(The course where stakes of more than gold are won)

O'erloading with the cares of distant age,
The jaded spirits of the present hour,
Provides for an eternity below.

"Thou shalt not covet," is a wise command; 460
But bounded to the wealth the sun surveys:
Look farther, the command stands quite revers'd,
And avarice is a virtue most divine.
Is faith a refuge for our happiness?
Most sure; and is it not for reason too?
Nothing this world unriddles but the next.
Whence inextinguishable thirst of gain?
From inextinguishable life in man:
Man, if not meant by worth to reach the skies,
Had wanted wing to fly so far in guilt. 470
Sour grapes, I grant, ambition, avarice,
Yet still their root is immortality:
These its wild growths, so bitter and so base,
(Pain and reproach!) religion can reclaim,
Refine, exalt, throw down their poisonous lee,

Shall re-ascend, remount their former sphere,
 Where once they soar'd illustrious; ere sin
 By wanton Eve's debauch, to stroll on earth,
 And set the sublunary world on fire.
 But grant their phrensy lasts; their phrensy fails
 To disappoint our providential end,
 For which heaven blew up ardour in our hearts:
 Were reason silent, boundless passion speaks
 A future scene of boundless objects too,
 And brings glad tidings of eternal day.
Eternal day! 'Tis that enlightens all;
 And all, by that enlighten'd, proves it true.
 Consider man as an immortal being,
 Intelligible all; and all is great;
 A crystalline transparency prevails,
 And strikes full lustre through the human sphere;
 Consider man as mortal, all is dark,
 And wretched; reason weeps at the survey.
 The learn'd Lorenzo cries, "And let her weep."
 Weak mad reason: Ancient times were wise
 "Antiquity, that venerable guide,
 Stands on my part; the fam'd Athenian sage
 "(And who for wisdom so renown'd as they)
 Deny'd this immortality to man."
 I grant it; but affirm, they prophesied
 A riddle this!—Have patience:
 What noble vanities, what mad
 Gathering through their romantic
 Make us, at once, despise them
 Table is flat to these high visions
 They leave th' extravagance of mad
 Flesh shall not live, or love
 The dagger of the rack
 A bed of roses, or the
 A man craving
 Strange desires
 As we, as you
 And, to their own

Bids it ascend the glowing cheek, and there
Upbraid that little heart's inglorious aim
Which stoops to court a character from man; 350
While o'er us in tremendous judgment sit
Far more than man, with endless praise, and blame.

Ambition's boundless appetite out-speaks
The verdict of its shame. When souls take fire
At high presumptions of their own desert,
One age is poor applause; the mighty shout,
The thunder by the living few begun,
Late time must echo, worlds unborn resound.
We wish our names eternally to live:
Wild dream, which ne'er had haunted human
thought, 360

Had not our natures been eternal too.
Instinct points out an interest in hereafter;
But our blind reason sees not where it lies;
Or, seeing, gives the substance for the shade.

Fame is the shade of immortality,
And in itself a shadow. Soon as caught,
Contemn'd; it shrinks to nothing in the grasp.
Consult th' ambitious, 'tis ambition's cure.
"And is this all?" cry'd Cæsar at his height,
Disgusted. This third proof ambition brings 370
Of immortality. The first in fame,
Observe him near, your envy will abate:
Sham'd at the disproportion vast, between
The passion and the purchase, he will sigh
At such success, and blush at his renown.
And why? Because far richer prize invites
His heart; far more illustrious glory calls;
It calls in whispers, yet the dearest hear.

And can ambition a fourth proof supply?
It can, and stronger than the former three; 380
Yet quite o'erlook'd by some reputed wise.
Though disappointments in ambition pain,
And though success disgusts, yet still, Lorenzo,
In vain we strive to pluck it from our hearts;
By nature planted for the noblest ends.
Absurd the fam'd advice to Pyrrhus given;
More prais'd than ponder'd; specious, but unsound;
Sooner that hero's sword the world had quell'd
Than reason his ambition. Man must soar.

An obstinate activity within, 390
An insuppressive spring, will toss him up
In spite of fortune's load. Not kings alone,
Each villager has his ambition too;
No Sultan prouder than his fetter'd slave:
Slaves build their little Babylons of straw,
Echo the proud Assyrian in their hearts,
And cry, "Behold the wonders of my might!"
And why? Because immortal as their lord;
And souls immortal must for ever heave
At something great, the glitter or the gold, 400
The praise of mortals, or the praise of heaven.

Nor absolutely vain is human praise,
When human is supported by divine.
I'll introduce Lorenzo to himself;
Pleasure and pride (bad masters!) share our hearts,
As love of pleasure is ordain'd to guard
And feed our bodies, and extend our race,
The love of praise is planted to protect
And propagate the glories of the mind.

What is it but the love of praise inspires, 410
Matures, refines, embellishes, exalts,

Earth's happiness? From that the delicate,
The grand, the marvellous, of civil life,
Want and convenience, under-workers, lay
The basis on which love of glory builds.
Nor is thy life, O virtue! less in debt
To praise, thy secret stimulating friend.
Were men not proud, what merit should we miss!
Pride made the virtues of the pagan world.
Praise is the salt that seasons right to man, 420
And whets his appetite for moral good.
Thirst of applause is virtue's second guard;
Reason her first; but reason wants an aid;
Our private reason is a flatterer;
Thirst of applause calls public judgment in,
To poise our own, to keep an even scale,
And give endanger'd virtue fairer play.

Here a fifth proof arises, stronger still:
Why this so nice construction of our hearts?
These delicate moralities of sense, 430
This constitutional reserve of aid
To succour virtue when our reason fails,
If virtue, kept alive by care and toil,
And oft the mark of injuries on earth,
When labour'd to maturity (its bill
Of disciplines, and pains, unpaid) must die?
Why freighted-rich to dash against a rock?
Were man to perish when most fit to live,
O how mis-spent were all these stratagems,
By skill divine enwoven in our frame! 440
Where are heaven's holiness and mercy fled?
Laughs heaven at once at virtue and at man?
If not, why that discourag'd, this destroy'd?

Thus far ambition. What says avarice?
This her chief maxim, which has long been thine:
"The wise and wealthy are the same,"—I grant it:
To store up treasure with incessant toil,
This is man's province, this his highest praise.
To this great end keen instinct stings him on.
To guide that instinct, reason, is thy charge; 450
'Tis thine to tell us where true treasure lies:
But, reason failing to discharge her trust,
Or to the deaf discharging it in vain,
A blunder follows; and blind industry,
Gall'd by the spur, but stranger to the course,
(The course where stakes of more than gold are won)

O'erloading with the cares of distant age,
The jaded spirits of the present hour,
Provides for an eternity below.

"Thou shalt not covet," is a wise command; 460
But bounded to the wealth the sun surveys:
Look farther, the command stands quite revers'd,
And avarice is a virtue most divine.

Is faith a refuge for our happiness?
Most sure; and is it not for reason too?
Nothing this world unriddles but the next.
Whence inextinguishable thirst of gain?
From inextinguishable life in man:
Man, if not meant by worth to reach the skies,
Had wanted wing to fly so far in guilt. 470
Sour grapes, I grant, ambition, avarice,
Yet still their root is immortality:
These its wild growths, so bitter and so base,
(Pain and reproach!) religion can reclaim,
Refine, exalt, throw down their poisonous lee,

And make them sparkle in the bowl of bliss.

See, the third witness laughs at bliss remote,
And falsely promises an Eden here :
Truth she shall speak for once, though prone to lie,
A common cheat, and pleasure is her name. 480
To pleasure never was Lorenzo deaf;
Then hear her now, now first thy real friend.

Since nature made us not more fond than proud
Of happiness (whence hypocrites in joy!
Makers of mirth! artificers of smiles!)
Why should the joy most poignant sense affords
Burn us with blushes, and rebuke our pride?—
Those heaven-born blushes tell us man descends,
Ev'n in the zenith of his earthly bliss:

Should reason take her infidel repose, 490
This honest instinct speaks our lineage high;
This instinct calls on darkness to conceal
Our rapturous relation to the stalls.

Our glory covers us with noble shame,
And he that's unconfounded, is unmann'd.
The man that blushes is not quite a brute.
Thus far with thee, Lorenzo! will I close,
Pleasure is good, and man for pleasure made;
But pleasure full of glory, as of joy;
Pleasure, which neither blushes, nor expires. 500

The witnesses are heard; the cause is o'er;
Let conscience file the sentence in her court,
Dearer than deeds that half a realm convey :
Thus seal'd by truth, th' authentic record runs.

" Know, all; know, infidels,—unapt to know!
" 'Tis immortality your nature solves;
" 'Tis immortality decyphers man,
" And opens all the mysteries of his make.
" Without it half his instincts are a riddle;
" Without it all his virtues are a dream, 510
" His very crimes attest his dignity;
" His fateless thirst of pleasure, gold, and fame,
" Declares him born for blessings infinite :
" What less than infinite makes un-absurd
" Passions, which all on earth but more inflames?
" Fierce passions, so mis-measur'd to this scene,
" Stretch'd out, like eagles wings, beyond our nest,
" Far, far beyond the worth of all below.
" For earth too large, presage a nobler flight,
" And evidence our title to the skies." 520

Ye gentle theologues, of calmer kind!
Whose constitution dictates to your pen, [hell!
Who, cold yourselves, think ardour comes from
Think not our passions from corruption sprung,
Though to corruption now they lend their wings;
That is their mistress, not their mother. All
(And justly) reason deem divine: I see,
I feel a grandeur, in the passions too,
Which speaks their high descent, and glorious end;
Which speaks them rays of an eternal fire. 530
In Paradise itself they burnt as strong,
Ere Adam fell; though wiser in their aim,
Like the proud Eastern, struck by Providence,
What though our passions are run mad, and sloop
With low, terrestrial appetite, to graze
On trash, on toys, dethron'd from high desire?
Yet still, through their disgrace, no feeble ray
Of greatness shines, and tells us whence they fell:
But these (like that fall'n monarch when reclaim'd),
When reason moderates the rein aright, 540

Shall re-ascend, remount their former sphere,
Where once they soar'd illustrious; ere seduc'd
By wanton Eve's debauch, to stroll on earth,
And set the sublunary world on fire.

But grant their phrensy lasts; their phrensy fails
To disappoint one providential end,
For which heaven blew up ardour in our hearts :
Were reason silent, boundless passion speaks
A future scene of boundless objects too,
And brings glad tidings of eternal day. 550
Eternal day! 'Tis that enlightens all;
And all, by that enlighten'd, proves it sure.
Consider man as an immortal being,
Intelligible all; and all is great;
A crystalline transparency prevails,
And strikes full lustre through the human sphere;
Consider man as mortal, all is dark,
And wretched; reason weeps at the survey.

The learn'd Lorenzo cries, " And let her weep,
" Weak modern reason: Ancient times were wise.
" Authority, that venerable guide, 560
" Stands on my part; the fam'd Athenian porch
" (And who for wisdom so renown'd as they?)
" Deny'd this immortality to man."

I grant it; but affirm, they prov'd it too.
A riddle this!—Have patience; I'll explain.
What noble vanities, what moral flights,
Glittering through their romantic wisdom's page,
Make us, at once, despise them, and admire?
Fable is flat to these high-season'd fires! 570
They leave th' extravagance of song below.

" Flesh shall not feel; or, feeling, shall enjoy
" The dagger or the rack; to them, alike
" A bed of roses, or the burning bull."
In men exploding all beyond the grave,
Strange doctrine, this! As doctrine, it was strange :
But not, as prophecy; for such it prov'd,
And, to their own amazement, was fulfill'd :
They feign'd a firmness Christians need not feign.
The Christian truly triumph'd in the flame: 580
The Stoic saw, in double wonder lost,
Wonder at them, and wonder at himself,
To find the bold adventures of his thought,
Not bold, and that he strove to lie in vain.

Whence, then, those thoughts? Those towering thoughts, that flew
Such monstrous heights?—From instinct, and from pride.

The glorious instinct of a deathless soul,
Confus'dly conscious of her dignity,
Suggested truths they could not understand.
In lust's dominion, and in passion's storm, 590
Truth's system broken, scatter'd fragments lay,
As light in chaos, glimmering through the gloom :
Smit with the pomp of lofty sentiments,
Pleas'd pride proclaim'd, what reason disbeliev'd,
Pride, like the Delphic priestess, with a swell,
Rav'd nonsense, destin'd to be future sense,
When life immortal, in full day, should shine;
And death's dark shadows fly the gospel sun.
They spoke, what nothing but immortal souls
Could speak; and thus the truth they question'd,
prov'd. 600

Can then absurdities, as well as crimes,
Speak man immortal? All things speak him so.

Much has been urg'd: and dost thou call for more?
Call; and with endless questions be distress'd,
All unresolvable, if earth is all.

" Why life, a moment; infinite, desire?
" Our wish, eternity? Our home, the grave?
" Heaven's promise dormant lies in human hope;
" Who wishes life immortal, proves it too. 609
" Why happiness pursued, though never found?
" Man's thirst of happiness declares it is,
" (For nature never gravitates to nought);
" That thirst unquench'd declares it is not here.
" My Lucia, thy Clarissa, call to thought;
" Why cordial friendship rivetted so deep,
" As hearts to pierce at first, at parting rend,
" If friend, and friendship, vanish in an hour?
" Is not this torment in the mask of joy?
" Why by reflection marr'd the joys of sense?
" Why past, and future, preying on our hearts, 620
" And putting all our present joys to death?
" Why labours reason? instinct were as well;
" Instinct far better; what can choose, can err:
" O how infallible the thoughtless brute!
" 'Twere well his Holiness were half as sure.
" Reason with inclination, why at war?

" Why sense of guilt? why conscience up in arms?"
Conscience of guilt, is prophecy of pain,
And bosom-council to decline the blow.
Reason with inclination ne'er had jarr'd, 630
If nothing future paid forbearance here:
Thus on—these, and a thousand pleas uncall'd,
All promise, some ensure, a second scene;
Which, were it doubtful, would be dearer far
Than all things else most certain; were it false.
What truth on earth so precious as the lie?
This world it gives us, let what will ensue;
This world it gives, in that high cordial, hope:
The future of the present is the soul: 639
How this life groans, when sever'd from the next!
Poor mutilated wretch, that disbelieves!
By dark distrust his being cut in two,
In both parts perishes; life void of joy,
Sad prelude of eternity in pain!

Couldst thou persuade me, the next life could fail
Our ardent wishes; how should I pour out
My bleeding heart in anguish, now, as deep!
Oh! with what thoughts, thy hope, and my despair,
Abhor'd annihilation! blasts the soul, 649
And wide extends the bounds of human woe!
Could I believe Lorenzo's system true,
In this black channel would my ravings run.
" Grief from the future borrow'd peace, ere while.
" The future vanish'd! and the present pain'd!
" Strange import of unprecedented ill!
" Fall, how profound! Like Lucifer's, the fall!
" Unequal fate! his fall, without his guilt!
" From where fond hope built her pavilion high,
" The gods among, hurl'd headlong, hurl'd at once
" To night! To nothing, darker still than night! 660
" If 'twas a dream, why wake me, my worst foe,
" Lorenzo! boastful of the name of friend!
" O for delusion! O for error still! [plant
" Could vengeance strike much stronger than to
" A thinking being in a world like this,
" Not over-rich before, now beggar'd quite;
" More curst than at the fall?—The sun goes out

" The thorns shoot up! What thorns in every
" thought!
" Why sense of better? It imbitters worse.
" Why sense? why life? If but to sigh, then " sink 670
" To what I was! twice nothing! and much woe!
" Woe, from heaven's bounties! woe from what " was wont
" To flatter most, high intellectual powers.
" Thought, virtue, knowledge! blessings, by thy " scheme,
" All poison'd into pains. First, knowledge, once
" My soul's ambition, now her greatest dread.
" To know myself, true wisdom?—No, to shun
" That shocking science, parent of despair!
" Avert thy mirror: if I see, I die.
" Know my Creator? Climb his blest abode 680
" By painful speculation, pierce the veil,
" Dive in his nature, read his attributes,
" And gaze in admiration—on a foe,
" Obtruding life, with-holding happiness!
" From the full rivers that surround his throne,
" Not letting fall one drop of joy on man;
" Man gasping for one drop, that he might cease
" To curse his birth, nor envy reptiles more!
" Ye fable clouds! ye darkest shades of night! 689
" Hide him, for ever hide him, from my thought,
" Once all my comfort; source, and soul of joy!
" Now leagu'd with furies, and with * thee, a" gainst me.
" Know his atchievements? Study his renown?
" Contemplate this amazing universe,
" Dropt from his hand, with miracles replete!
" For what? 'Mid miracles of nobler name,
" To find one miracle of *miser*y?
" To find the being, which alone can know
" And praise his works, a blemish on his praise?
" Through nature's ample range, in thought to " stroll. 700
" And star tat man, the single mourner there,
" Breathing high hope! chain'd down to pangs,
" and death?
" Knowing is suffering: and shall virtue share
" The sigh of knowledge?—Virtue shares the sigh.
" By straining up the sleep of excellent,
" By battles fought, and, from temptation, won,
" What gain she, but the pang of seeing worth,
" Angelic worth, soon shuffled in the dark
" With every vice, and swept to brutal dust?
" Merit is madness; virtue is a crime; 710
" A crime to reason, if it costs us pain
" Unpaid: what pain, amidst a thousand more,
" To think the most abandon'd, after days
" Of triumph o'er their betters, find in death
" As soft a pillow, nor make fouler clay!
" Duty! religion!—These, our duty done,
" Imply reward. Religion is mistake.
" Duty!—There's none, but to repel the cheat.
" Ye cheats! away! ye daughters of my pride!
" Who feign yourselves the favourites of the skies:
" Ye towering hopes! abortive energies! 720
" That toss and struggle in my lying breast,
" To scale the skies, and build presumptions there,

* Lorenzo.

"As I were heir of an eternity.
 "Vain, vain ambitions! trouble me no more.
 "Why travel far in quest of sure defeat?
 "As bounded as my being be my wish.
 "All is inverted; wisdom is a fool.
 "Sense, take the rein; blind passion, drive us on;
 "And ignorance, befriend us on our way; 730
 "Ye new, but truest patrons of our peace!
 "Yes; give the pulse full empire; live the brute,
 "Since as the brute we die. The sum of man,
 "Of godlike man! to revel, and to rot.
 "But not on equal terms with other brutes:
 "Their revels a more poignant relish yield,
 "And safer too; they never poisons choose.
 "Instinct than reason makes more wholesome meals,
 "And sends all-marring murmur far away.
 "For sensual life they best philosophise; 740
 "Theirs that serene the sages fought in vain:
 "'Tis man alone expostulates with heaven;
 "His all the power and all the cause to mourn.
 "Shall human eyes alone dissolve in tears?
 "And bleed, in anguish, none but human hearts?
 "The wide-stretch'd realm of intellectual woe,
 "Surpassing sensual far, is all our own.
 "In life so fatally distinguish'd, why
 "Cast in one lot, confounded, lump'd, in death?
 "Ere yet in being, was mankind in guilt? 750
 "Why thunder'd this peculiar clause against us,
 "All-mortal and all-wretched?—Have the skies
 "Reasons of state their subjects may not scan,
 "Nor humbly reason when they sorely sigh?
 "All-mortal and all-wretched!—'Tis too much;
 "Unparallel'd in nature; 'tis too much
 "On being unrequested at thy hands,
 "Omnipotent! for I see nought but power.
 "And why see that? Why thought? To toil,
 "and eat, 759
 "Then make our bed in darkness, needs no thought.
 "What superfluities are reasoning souls!
 "O give eternity! or thought destroy.
 "But without thought our curse were half unfelt;
 "Its blunted edge would spare the throbbing
 "heart;
 "And therefore 'tis bestow'd, I thank thee, reason!
 "For aiding life's too small calamities,
 "And giving being to the dread of death.
 "Such are thy bounties!—Was it then too much
 "For me, to trespass on the brutal rights?
 "Too much for heaven to make one emmet more?
 "Too much for chaos to permit my mass 771
 "A longer stay with essences unwrought,
 "Unfashion'd, untormented into man?
 "Wretched preferment to this round of pains!
 "Wretched capacity of frenzy, thought!
 "Wretched capacity of dying life!
 "Life, thought, worth, wisdom, All (O foul revolt)
 "Once friends to peace, gone over to the foe.
 "Death, then, has chang'd his nature too: O
 "death! 779
 "Come to my bosom, thou best gift of heaven!
 "Best friend of man! since man is man no more!
 "Why in this thorny wilderness so long,
 "Since there's no promis'd land's ambrosial bower,
 "To pay me with its honey for my stings?
 "If needful to the selfish schemes of heaven!

"To sting us fore, why mocht our misery?
 "Why this so sumptuous insult o'er our heads?
 "Why this illustrious canopy display'd?
 "Why so magnificently lodg'd despair?
 "At stated periods, sure returning, roll 790
 "These glorious orbs, that mortals may compute
 "Their length of labours, and of pains; nor lose
 "Their misery's full measure?—Smiles with
 "flowers,
 "And fruits, promiscuous, ever-teeming earth,
 "That man may languish in luxurious scenes,
 "And in an Eden mourn his wither'd joys?
 "Claim earth and skies man's admiration, due
 "For such delights! Blest animals! too wise
 "To wonder; and too happy to complain! 799
 "Our doom decreed demands a mournful scene;
 "Why not a dungeon dark for the condemn'd?
 "Why not the dragon's subterranean den,
 "For man to howl in? Why not his abode
 "Of the same dismal colour with his fate?
 "A Thebes, a Babylon, at vast expence
 "Of time, toil, treasure, art, for owls and adders,
 "As congruous, as, for man, this lofty dome,
 "Which prompts proud thought, and kindles high
 "desire;
 "If, from her humble chamber in the dust,
 "While proud thought swells, and high desire in-
 "flames, 810
 "The poor worm calls us for her inmates there;
 "And, round us, death's inexorable hand
 "Draws the dark curtain close; undrawn no
 "more.
 "Undrawn no more!—Behind the cloud of death,
 "Once, I beheld the sun; a sun which gilt
 "That fable cloud, and turn'd it all to gold:
 "How the grave's alter'd! Fathomless, as hell!
 "A real hell to those who dreamt of heaven.
 "Annihilation! How it yawns before me!
 "Next moment I may drop from thought, from sense,
 "The privilege of angels, and of worms, 821
 "An outcast from existence! and this spirit,
 "This all-pervading, this all-conscious soul,
 "This particle of energy divine,
 "Which travels nature, flies from star to star,
 "And visits gods, and emulates their powers,
 "For ever is extinguish'd. Horror! death!
 "Death of that death I fearless once survey'd!—
 "When horror universal shall descend,
 "And heaven's dark concave urn all human race,
 "On that enormous, unrefunding tomb, 831
 "How just this verse! this monumental sigh!"

Beneath the lumber of demolish'd worlds,
 Deep in the rubbish of the general wreck,
 Swept ignominious to the common mass
 Of matter, never dignify'd with life,
 Here lie proud rationals; The sons of heaven!
 The lords of earth! The property of worms!
 Beings of yesterday! and not to-morrow!
 Who liv'd in terror, and in pangs expir'd! 840
 All gone to rot in chaos; or to make
 Their happy transit into blocks or brutes,
 Nor longer fully their Creator's name.

Lorenzo! hear, pause, ponder, and pronounce.
 Just is this history? If such is man,

Mankind's historian, though divine, might weep
And dares Lorenzo smile!—I know thee proud;
For once let pride befriend thee; pride looks pale
At such a scene, and sighs for something more.
Amid thy boasts, presumptions, and displays, 850
And art though then a shadow? Less than shade?

A nothing? Less than nothing? To have been,
And not to be, is lower than unborn.
Art thou ambitious? Why then make the worm
Thine equal? Runs thy taste of pleasure high?
Why patronize sure death of every joy?
Charm riches? Why choose beggary in the grave,
Of every hope a bankrupt! and for ever?
Ambition, pleasure, avarice, persuade thee 859
To make that world of glory, rapture, wealth,
They * lately prov'd the soul's supreme desire.

What art thou made of? Rather, how unmade?
Great nature's master appetite destroy'd!
Is endless life and happiness despis'd?
Or both wish'd, here, where neither can be found?
Such man's perverse, eternal war with heaven!
Dar'st thou persist? And is there nought on earth,
But a long train of transitory forms,
Rising and breaking millions in an hour?
Bubbles of a fantastic deity, blown up 870
In sport, and then in cruelty destroy'd?
Oh! for what crime, unmerciful Lorenzo!
Destroys thy scheme the whole of human race?
Kind is fell Lucifer compar'd to thee:
O! spare this waste of being half divine;
And vindicate th' economy of heaven.

Heaven is all love; all joy in giving joy:
It never had created, but to bless:
And shall it, then, strike off the list of life,
A being blest, or worthy so to be? 880
Heaven starts at an annihilating God.

Is that all nature starts at, thy desire?
Art such a clod to wish thyself all clay?
What is that dreadful wish?—The dying groan
Of nature, murder'd by the blackest guilt.
What deadly poison has thy nature drunk;
To nature undebauch'd no shock so great;
Nature's first wish is endless happiness;
Annihilation is an after-thought,
A monstrous wish, unborn till virtue dies. 890
And, oh! what depth of horror lies enclos'd!
For non-existence no man ever wish'd,
But, first, he wish'd the Deity destroyed.

If so; what words are dark enough to draw
Thy picture true? The darkest are too fair.
Beneath what baleful planet, in what hour
Of desperation, by what fury's aid,
In what infernal posture of the soul,
All hell invited, and all hell in joy
At such a birth, a birth so near of kin, 900
Did thy foul fancy whelp so black a scheme
Of hopes abortive, faculties half-blown,
And deities begun, reduc'd to dust?

There's nought (thou say'st) but one eternal flux
Of feeble essences, tumultuous driven
Through time's rough billows into night's abyss.

* In Night VI.

Say, in this rapid tide of human ruin,
Is there no rock, on which man's tossing thought
Can rest from terror, dare his fate survey,
And boldly think it something to be born? 910
Amid such hourly wrecks of being fair,
Is there no central, all-sustaining base,
All-realising, all-connecting power,
Which, as it call'd forth all things, can recall,
And force destruction to refund her spoil?
Command the grave restore her taken prey?
Bids death's dark vale its human harvest yield,
And earth, and ocean, pay their debt of man,
True to the grand deposit trusted there?
Is there no potentate, whose outstretch'd arm, 920
When ripening time calls forth th' appointed hour,
Pluck'd from foul devastation's famish'd maw,
Binds present, past, and future, to his throne?
His throne, how glorious, thus divinely grac'd,
By germinating beings clustering round!
A garland worthy the divinity!
A throne, by heaven's omnipotence in smiles,
Built (like a pharos towering in the waves)
Amidst immense effusions of his love!
An ocean of communicated bliss! 930

An all-prolific, all-preserving god!
This were a god indeed.—And such is man,
As here presum'd: he rises from his fall.
Think'st thou Omnipotence a naked root,
Each blossom fair of Deity destroy'd?
Nothing is dead; nay, nothing sleeps; each soul,
That ever animated human clay,
New wakes; is on the wing: and where, O where,
Will the swarm settle?—When the trumpet's call,
As sounding brass collects us round heaven's throne,
Conglob'd, we bask in everlasting day, 941
(Paternal splendour!) and adhere for ever.
Had not the soul this outlet to the skies,
In this vast vessel of the universe,
How should we gasp, as in an empty void!
How in the pangs of famish'd hope expire!

How bright my prospect shines; how gloomy,
thine!

A trembling world! and a devouring God!
Earth, but the shambles of Omnipotence!
Heaven's face all stain'd with causeless massacres
Of countless millions, born to feel the pang 951
Of being lost. Lorenzo! can it be?
This bids us shudder at the thoughts of life.
Who would be born to such a phantom world,
Where nought substantial but our misery
Where joy (if joy) but heightens our distress,
So soon to perish, and revive no more?
The greater such a joy, the more it pains.
A world, so far from great (and yet how great
It shines to thee!) there's nothing real in it; 960
Being, a shadow; consciousness, a dream;
A dream, how dreadful! Universal blank
Before it, and behind! Poor man, a spark
From non-existence struck by wrath divine,
Glittering a moment, nor that moment sure,
'Midst upper, nether, and surrounding night,
His sad, sure, sudden, and eternal tomb!

Lorenzo! dost thou feel these arguments?
Or is there nought but vengeance can be felt?
How hast thou dar'd the Deity dethrone? 970

How dar'd indict him of a world like this?

If such the world, creation was a crime;

For what is crime but cause of misery?

Retract, blasphemer! and unriddle this,

Of endless arguments above, below,

Without us, and within, the short result—

"If man's immortal, there's a God in heaven."

But wherefore such redundancy? such waste
Of argument? One sets my soul at rest! 979

One obvious, and at hand, and, oh!—at heart.

So just the skies, Philander's life so pain'd,

His heart so pure; that, or succeeding scenes

Have palms to give, or ne'er had he been born.

"What an old tale is this!" Lorenzo cries.—

I grant this argument is old; but truth

No years impair; and had not this been true,

Thou never hadst despis'd it for its age.

Truth is immortal as thy soul; and fable

As fleeting as thy joys: be wise, nor make

Heaven's highest blessing, vengeance; O be wise!

Nor make a curse of immortality. 991

Say, know'st thou what it is, or what thou art?

Know'st thou th' importance of a soul immortal?

Behold this midnight glory: worlds on worlds!

Amazing pomp! redouble this amaze;

Ten thousand add; add twice ten thousand more;

Then weigh the whole; one soul outweighs them
all;

And calls th' astonishing magnificence

Of unintelligent creation poor.

For this, believe not me; no man believe; 1000
Trust not in words, but deeds; and deeds no less

Than those of the Supreme; nor his, a few;

Consult them all; consulted, all proclaim

Thy soul's importance: tremble at thyself;

For whom Omnipotence has wak'd so long:

Has wak'd, and work'd, for ages; from the birth
Of nature to this unbelieving hour.

In this small province of his vast domain

(All nature bow, while I pronounce his name!)

What has God done, and not for this sole end, 1010

To rescue souls from death! The soul's high price

Is writ in all the conduct of the skies.

The soul's high price is the creation's key.

Unlocks its mysteries, and naked lays

The genuine cause of every deed divine:

That is the chain of ages, which maintains

Their obvious correspondence, and unites

Most distant periods in one blest design:

That is the mighty hinge, on which have turn'd

All revolutions, whether we regard 1020

The natural, civil, or religious, world;

The former two but servants to the third:

To that their duty done, they both expire,

Their mass new-cast, forgot their deeds renown'd:

And angels ask, "Where once they shone so fair?"

To lift us from this abject, to sublime;

This flux, to permanent; this dark, to day;

This foul, to pure; this turbid, to serene;

This mean, to mighty!—for this glorious end

Th' Almighty, rising, his long Sabbath broke!

The world was made; was ruin'd; was restor'd;

Laws from the skies were publish'd; were re-

peal'd; 1032

On earth kings, kingdoms, rose; kings, kingdoms, fell;

Fam'd sages lighted up the pagan world;

Prophets from Sion darted a keen glance

Through distant age; saints travell'd; martyrs bled;

By wonders sacred nature stood control'd;

The living were translated; dead were rais'd;

Angels, and more than angels, came from heaven;

And, oh! for this, descended lower still: 1040

Guilt was hell's gloom; astonish'd at his guest,

For one short moment Lucifer ador'd:

Lorenzo! and wilt thou do less?—For this,

That hallow'd page, fools scoff at, was inspir'd,

Of all these truths thrice venerable code!

Deists! perform your quarantine; and then

Fall prostrate, ere you touch it, lest you die.

Nor less intensely bent infernal powers

To mar, than those of light, this end to gain.

O what a scene is here!—Lorenzo! wake! 1050

Rise to the thought; exert, expand thy soul

To take the vast idea: it denies

All else the name of great. Two warring worlds!

Not Europe against Afric; warring worlds!

Of more than mortal! mounted on the wing!

On ardent wings of energy and zeal,

High-hovering o'er this little brand of strife!

This sublunary ball—But strife, for what?

In their own cause conflicting? No; in thine,

In man's. His single interest blows the flame; 1060

His the sole stake; his fate the trumpet sounds,

Which kindles war immortal. How it burns!

Tumultuous swarms of deities in arms!

Force, force opposing, till the waves run high,

And tempest nature's universal sphere.

Such opposites eternal, steadfast, stern,

Such foes implacable are good, and ill;

Yet man, vain man, would meditate peace between them.

Think not this fiction, "There was war in
"heaven," 1069

From heaven's high crystal mountain, where it hung, [bow,

Th' Almighty's out-stretch'd arm took down his

And shot his indignation at the deep:

Re-thunder'd hell, and darted all her fires.

And seems the stake of little moment still?

And slumbers man, who singly caus'd the storm?

He sleeps—And art thou shock'd at mysteries?

The greatest, thou. How dreadful to reflect,

What ardour, care, and counsel mortals cause

In breasts divine! how little in their own!

Where'er I turn, how new proofs pour upon me! 1080

How happily this wondrous view supports

My former argument! How strongly strikes

Immortal life's full demonstration, here!

Why this exertion? Why this strange regard

From heaven's Omnipotent indulg'd to man?—

Because, in man, the glorious dreadful power,

Extremely to be pain'd, or blest for ever.

Duration gives importance; swells the price.

An angel, if a creature of a day,

What would he be? A trifle of no weight; 1090

Or stand, or fall; no matter which; he's gone.
Because immortal, therefore is indulg'd
 This strange regard of deities to dust.
 Hence heaven looks down on earth with all her eyes:

Hence, the soul's mighty moment in her sight:
 Hence, every soul has partisans above,
 And every thought a critic in the skies:
 Hence, clay, vile clay! has angels for its guard,
 And every guard a passion for his charge:
 Hence, from all age, the cabinet divine 1100
 Has held high counsel o'er the fate of man.

Nor have the clouds those gracious counsels hid;
 Angels undrew the curtain of the throne,
 And Providence came forth to meet mankind:
 In various modes of emphasis and awe,
 He spoke his will, and trembling nature heard;
 He spoke it loud, in thunder and in storm.

Witness, thou Sinai! whose cloud-cover'd height,
 And shaken basis, own'd the present God;
 Witness, ye billows! whose returning tide, 1110
 Breaking the chain that fasten'd it in air,
 Swept Egypt and her menaces, to hell:

Witness, ye flames! th' Assyrian tyrant blew
 To sevenfold rage, as impotent, as strong:
 And thou, earth! witness, whose expanding jaws
 Clos'd o'er presumption's sacrilegious sons:

Has not each element, in turn, subscrib'd
 The soul's high price, and sworn it to the wife?
 Has not flame, ocean, ether, earthquake, strove
 To strike this truth through adamant man? 1120
 If not all adamant, Lorenzo! hear;

All is delusion; nature is wrapt up,
 In tenfold night, from reason's keenest eye;
 There's no consistence, meaning, plan, or end,
 In all beneath the sun, in all above,

(As far as man can penetrate), or heaven
 Is an immense, inestimable prize;

Or all is nothing, or that prize is all—
 And shall each toy be still a match for heaven,
 And full equivalent for groans below? 1130

Who would not give a trifle to prevent
 What he would give a thousand worlds to cure?

Lorenzo! thou hast seen (if thine to see)
 All nature, and her God (by nature's course,
 And nature's course controul'd) declare for me;
 The skies above proclaim, "immortal man!"
 And, "man immortal!" all below resounds.

The world's a system of theology,
 Read by the greatest strangers to the schools;
 If bonest, learned: and sages o'er a plough. 1140

Is not Lorenzo! then impos'd on thee
 This hard alternative; or, to renounce
 Thy reason, or thy sense; or, to believe?

What then is thy unbelief? 'Tis an exploit;
 A strenuous enterprise: to gain it, man
 Must burst through every bar of common sense,
 Of common shame, magnanimously wrong;
 And what rewards the sturdy combatant?

His prize, repentance; infamy, his crown. 1149

But wherefore, infamy?—For want of faith,
 Down the steep precipice of wrong he slides;
 There's nothing to support him in the right.

* Korab, &c.

Faith in the future wanting is at least
 In embryo, every weakness, every guilt;
 And strong temptation ripens it to birth.
 If this life's gain invites him to the deed,
 Why not his country sold, his father slain?
 'Tis virtue to pursue our good supreme;
 And his supreme, his only good is here.

Ambition, avarice, by the wise disdain'd, 1160
 Is perfect wisdom, while mankind are fools,
 And think a turf, or tomb-stone, covers all:
 These find employment, and provide for sense
 A richer pasture, and a larger range;
 And sense by right divine ascends the throne,
 When virtue's prize and prospect are no more;
Virtue no more we think the will of heaven.
 Would heaven quite beggar virtue, if belov'd?

"Has virtue charms?"—I grant her heavenly
 fair;

But if unportion'd, all will interest wed; 1170
 Though that our admiration, this our choice.

The virtues grow on immortality;
 That root destroy'd, they wither and expire.
 A deity believ'd, will nought avail;
 Rewards and punishments make God ador'd;
 And hopes and fears give conscience all her power.

As in the dying parent dies the child,
Virtue with immortality, expires.

Who tells me he denies his soul immortal,
 Whate'er his boast, has told me, He's a knave. 1180

His duty 'tis, to love himself alone;
 Nor care though mankind perish, if he smiles.
 Who thinks ere long the man shall wholly die,
 Is dead already; nought but brute survives.

And are there such?—Such candidates there are

For more than death; for utter loss of being,
 Being, the basis of the Deity!

Ask you the cause?—The cause they will not tell:
 Nor need they: O the forceries of sense!

They work this transformation on the soul, 1190
 Dismount her, like the serpent at the fall,

Dismount her from her native wing, (which soar'd
 Ere-while ethereal heights), and throw her down,
 To lick the dust, and crawl in such a thought.

Is it in words to paint you? O ye fall'n!
 Fall'n from the wings of reason, and of hope!

Erect in stature, prone in appetite!
 Patrons of pleasure, posting into pain!

Lovers of argument, averse to sense!
 Boasters of liberty, fast bound in chains! 1200

Lords of the wide creation, and the shame!
 More senseless than th' irrationals you scorn!

More base than those you rule! Than those you pity,

Far more undone! O ye most infamous
 Of beings, from superior dignity!

Deepest in woe from means of boundless bliss!
 Ye curst by blessings infinite! because

Most highly favour'd, most profoundly lost!
 Ye motly mass of contradiction strong! 1209

And are you, too, convinc'd, your souls fly off
 In exhalation soft, and die in air,

From the full flood of evidence against you?
 In the coarse drudgeries and sinks of sense,

Your souls have quite worn out the make of heaven,

By vice new-cast, and creatures of your own:
But though you can deform, you can't destroy;
To curse, not uncreate, is all your power.

Lorenzo! this black brotherhood renounce;
Renounce St. Evremont, and read St. Paul.
Ere, rapt by miracle, by reason wing'd, 1220
His mounting mind made long abode in heaven.
This is freethinking, unconfin'd to parts.
To send the soul, on curious travel bent,
Through all the provinces of human thought;
To dart her flight through the whole sphere of man;

Of this vast universe to make the tour;
In each recess of space and time, at home;
Familiar with their wonders; diving deep;
And, like a prince of boundless interests there,
Still most ambitious of the most remote; 1230
To look on truth unbroken, and entire;
Truth in the system, the full orb; where truths
By truths enlighten'd, and sustain'd, afford
An arch-like, strong foundation, to support
Th' incumbent weight of absolute, complete
Conviction; here, the more we press, we stand
More firm; who most examine, must believe,
Parts, like half-sentences, confound; the whole
Conveys the sense, and God is understood;
Who not in fragments writes to human race: 1240
Read his whole volume, sceptic! then reply.
This, this, is thinking free, a thought that grasps
Beyond a grain, and looks beyond an hour.

Turn up thine eyes, survey this midnight scene;
What are earth's kingdoms, to yon boundless orbs,
Of human souls, one day, the destin'd range?
And what yon boundless orbs, to godlike man?
Those numerous worlds that throng the firmament,
And ask more space in heaven, can roll at large
In man's capacious thought, and still leave room
For ampler orbs, for new creations, there. 1251
Can such a soul contract itself, to gripe
A point of no dimension, of no weight?
It can; it does: the world is such a point:
And, of that point, how small a part enslaves!

How small a part—of nothing, shall I say?
Why not?—Friends, our chief treasure! how they drop!

Lucia, Narcissa fair, Philander gone!
The grave, like fabled Cerberus, has op'd
A triple mouth; and, in an awful voice, 1260
Loud calls my soul, and utters all I sing.
How the world falls to pieces round about us,
And leaves us in a ruin of our joy!
What says this transportation of my friends?
It bids me love the place where now they dwell,
And scorn this wretched spot they leave so poor.
Eternity's vast ocean lies before thee;
There, there; Lorenzo! thy Clarissa fails.
Give thy mind sea-room; keep it wide of earth,
That rock of souls immortal; cut thy cord; 1270
Weigh anchor; spread thy sails; call every wind;
Eye thy great pole-star; make the land of life,

Two kinds of life has double-natur'd man,
And two of death; the last far more severe.
Life animal is nurtur'd by the sun;
Thrives on his bounties, triumphs in his beams.
Life rational subsists on higher food,

Triumphant in his beams, who made the day.
When we leave that sun, and are left by this,
(The fate of all who die in stubborn guilt) 1280
'Tis utter darkness; strictly double death.
We sink by no judicial stroke of heaven,
But nature's course; as sure as plumbets fall.
Since God, or man, must alter, ere they meet,
(Since light and darkness blend not in one sphere)
'Tis manifest, Lorenzo! who must change.

If, then, that double death should prove thy lot,
Blame not the bowels of the Deity;
Man shall be blest, as far as man permits.
Not man alone, all *rational*s, heaven arms 1290
With an illustrious, but tremendous, power
To counter-act its own most gracious ends;
And this, of strict necessity, not choice;
That power deny'd men, angels, were no more
But passive engines, void of praise or blame.
A nature rational implies the power
Of being blest, or wretched, as we please;
Else idle reason would have nought to do;
And he that would be barr'd capacity
Of pain, courts incapacity of bliss. 1300
Heaven wills our happiness, allows our doom;
Invites us ardently, but not compels;
Heaven but persuades, almighty man decrees;
Man is the maker of immortal fates.
Man falls by man, if finally he falls:
And fall he must, who learns from death alone,
The dreadful secret—That he lives for ever.

Why this to thee?—Thee yet, perhaps, in doubt,
Of second life? But wherefore doubtful still?
Eternal life is nature's ardent wish: 1310
What ardently we wish, we soon believe:
Thy tardy faith declares that wish destroy'd:
What has destroy'd it?—Shall I tell thee what?
When fear'd the future, 'tis no longer wish'd;
And, when unwish'd, we strive to disbelieve.
"Thus infidelity our guilt betrays."
Nor that the sole detection! Blush Lorenzo!
Blush for hypocrisy, if not for guilt.
The future fear'd?—An infidel, and fear?
Fear what? A dream? A fable?—How thy dread,
Unwilling evidence, and therefore strong, 1321
Affords my cause an undesign'd support!
How disbelief affirms what it denies!
"It unawares, asserts immortal life."

Surprising! infidelity turns out
A creed, and a confession of our sins:
Apostates, thus, are orthodox divines.
Lorenzo! with Lorenzo clash no more;
Nor longer a transparent vizor wear.
Think'st thou, religion only has her mask?
Our infidels are Satan's hypocrites, 1331
Pretend the worst, and, at the bottom, fail.
When visited by thought (thought will intrude),
Like him they serve, they tremble, and believe.
Is their hypocrisy so foul as this;
So fatal to the welfare of the world?
What detestation, what contempt, their due!
And, if unpaid, be thank'd for their escape
That Christian candour they strive hard to scorn:
If not for that asylum, they might find 1340
A hell on earth; nor 'scape a worse below.

With insolence, and impotence of thought,
 Instead of racking fancy to refute,
 Reform thy manners, and the truth enjoy.—
 But shall I dare confess the dire result?
 Can thy proud reason brook so black a brand?
 From purer manners, to sublimer faith,
 Is nature's unavoidable ascent;
 An honest deist, where the gospel shines,
 Matur'd to nobler, in the Christian ends. 1350
 When that blest change arrives, e'en cast aside
 This song superfluous; life immortal strikes
 Conviction, in a flood of light divine.
 A Christian dwells, like * Uriel, in the sun;
 Meridian evidence puts doubt to flight;
 And ardent hope anticipates the skies.
 Of that bright sun, Lorenzo! scale the sphere;
 'Tis easy! it invites thee; it descends
 From heaven to woo, and waft thee whence it came:

Read and revere the sacred page; a page 1360
 Where triumphs immortality; a page
 Which not the whole creation could produce;
 Which not the conflagration shall destroy,
 'Tis printed in the mind of gods for ever,
 In nature's ruins not one letter lost.

In proud disdain of what ev'n gods adore,
 Dost smile?—Pour wretch! thy guardian angel weeps.

Angels and men assent to what I sing;
 Wits smile, and thank me for my midnight dream.
 How vicious hearts fume frenzy to the brain!
 Parts push us on to pride, and pride to shame;
 Pert infidelity is wit's cockade, 1372
 To grace the brazen brow that braves the skies,
 By loss of being, dreadfully secure.
 Lorenzo! if thy doctrine wins the day,
 And drives my dreams, defeated, from the field;
 If this is all, if earth a final scene,
 Take heed; stand fast; be sure to be a knave.
 A knave in grain! ne'er deviate to the right:
 Should'st thou be good—how infinite thy loss!
 Guilt only makes annihilation gain. 1381
 Blest scheme! which life deprives of comfort, death
 Of hope; and which vice only recommends.
 If so, where, infidels! your bait thrown out
 To catch weak converts? where your lofty boast
 Of zeal for virtue, and of love to man?
 Annihilation! I confess in these.

What can reclaim you? Dare I hope profound
 Philosophers the converts of a song?
 Yet know, its † title flatters you, not me; 1390
 Yours be the praise to make my title good;
 Mine to bless heaven, and triumph in your praise.
 But since so pestilential your disease,
 Though sovereign is the medicine I prescribe,
 As yet, I'll neither triumph, nor despair:
 But hope ere long my midnight dream will wake
 Your hearts, and teach your wisdom—to be wise:
 For why should souls immortal, made for bliss,
 E'er wish (and wish in vain!) that souls could die!
 What ne'er can die, oh! grant to live; and crown
 The wish, and aim, and labour of the skies; 1401

* Milton.

† The Infidel Reclaimed.

Increase, and enter on the joys of heaven:
 Thus shall my title pass a sacred seal,
 Receive an imprimatur from above,
 While angels shout—an Infidel Reclaim'd!
 To close, Lorenzo! spite of all my pains,
 Still seems it strange, that thou should'st live for ever?

Is it less strange, that thou should'st live at all?
 This is a miracle; and that no more.
 Who gave beginning, can exclude an end. 1410
 Deny thou art: Then doubt if thou shalt be.
 A miracle with miracles enclos'd,
 Is man: and starts his faith at what is strange?
 What less than wonders from the wonderful?
 What less than miracles from God can flow?
 Admit a God—that mystery supreme!
 That cause uncaus'd! all other wonders cease;
 Nothing is marvellous for him to do:
 Deny him—all is mystery besides;
 Millions of mysteries! each darker far, 1420
 Than that thy wisdom would unwisely shun.
 If weak thy faith, why choose the harder side?
 We nothing know, but what is marvellous;
 Yet what is marvellous, we can't believe.
 So weak our reason, and so great our God,
 What most surprises in the sacred page,
 Or full as strange, or stranger, must be true.
 Faith is not reason's labour, but repose.

To faith and virtue, why so backward, man?
 From hence:—The present strongly strikes us all;
 The future faintly; can we then be men? 1431
 If men, Lorenzo! the reverse is right.
 Reason is man's peculiar: Sense the brute's.
 The present is the scanty realm of sense;
 The future, reason's empire unconfin'd:
 On that expending all her godlike power,
 She plans, provides, expatiates, triumphs, there;
 There builds her blessing! There expects her praise;
 And nothing asks of fortune, or of man.
 And what is reason? Be she thus defin'd; 1440
 Reason is upright stature in the soul.
 Oh! be a man; and strive to be a god.
 "For what? (thou say'st) To damp the joys of "life?"

No; to give heart and substance to thy joys.
 That tyrant, hope; mark how she domineers;
 She bids us quit realities for dreams;
 Safety and peace for hazard and alarm;
 That tyrant o'er the tyrants of the soul,
 She bids ambition quit its taken prize.
 Spurn the luxuriant branch on which it sits. 1450
 Though bearing crowns, to spring at distant game;
 And plunge in toils and dangers—for repose.
 If hope precarious, and of things, when gain'd,
 Of little moment, and as little stay,
 Can sweeten toils and dangers into joys;
 What then, that hope, which nothing can defeat,
 Our leave unask'd? Rich hope of boundless bliss!
 Bliss, past man's power to paint it; time's to close!
 This hope is earth's most estimable prize:
 This is man's portion, while no more than man;
 Hope, of all passions, most befriends us here; 1461
 Passions of prouder name befriend us less.
 Joy has her tears; and transport has her death;
 Hope, like a cordial, innocent, though strong,

Man's heart at once inspires and serenes;
Nor makes him pay his wisdom for his joys;
'Tis all our present state can safely bear,
Health to the frame! and vigour to the mind!
A joy attemper'd! a chastis'd delight!
Like the fair summer evening, mild and sweet!
'Tis man's full cup; his paradise below! 1471

A blest hereafter then, or hop'd, or gain'd,
Is all; our whole of happiness: full proof,
I chose no trivial or inglorious theme.
And know, ye foes to song! (well-meaning men,
Though quite forgotten * half your Bible's praise!
Important truths, in spite of verse, may please:
Grave minds you praise; nor can you praise too much:
If there is weight in an eternity,
Let the grave listen;—and be graver still.

NIGHT VIII.

VIRTUE'S APOLOGY;

OR, THE MAN OF THE WORLD ANSWERED.

In which are considered the Love of this Life; the Ambition and Pleasure, with the Wit and Wisdom of the World.

AND has all nature then espous'd my part?
Have I brib'd heaven and earth to plead against thee?

And is thy soul immortal?—What remains?
All, all, Lorenzo!—Make immortal blest.
Unblest immortals!—What can shock us more?
And yet Lorenzo still affects the world;
There flows his treasure; thence his title draws,
Man of the world (for such wouldst thou be call'd)
And art thou proud of that inglorious style?
Proud of reproach? for a reproach it was,
In ancient days; and Christian—in an age,
When men were men, and not ashamed of heaven—
Fir'd their ambition, as it crown'd their joy.
Sprinkled with dew from the Castalian font,
Fain would I re-baptize thee, and confer
A purer spirit, and a nobler name.

Thy fond attachments fatal and inflam'd,
Point out my path, and dictate to my song:
To thee the world bow fair! How strongly strikes
Ambition! and gay pleasure stronger still!
Thy triple bane! the triple bolt that lays
Thy virtue dead! Be these my triple theme;
Nor shall thy wit or wisdom be forgot.

Common the theme; not so the song; if she
My song invokes, Urania deigns to smile.
The charm that chains us to the world, her foe,
If she dissolves, the man of earth at once
Starts from his trance, and sighs for other scenes;
Scenes where these sparks of night, these stars shall shine

Unnumber'd suns (for all things as they are
The blest behold;) and in one glory pour
Their blended blaze on man's astonish'd sight;
A blaze—the least illustrious object there.

Lorenzo! since eternal is at hand,
To swallow time's ambitions; as the vast

* The poetical parts of it.

Leviathan, the bubbles vain, that ride
High on the foaming billow; what avail
High titles, high descent, attainments high,
If unattain'd our bighest? O Lorenzo!
What lofty thoughts, these elements above,
What towering hopes, what fallies from the sun,
What grand surveys of destiny divine,
And pompous presage of unfathom'd fate,
Should roll in bosoms, where a spirit burns,
Bound for eternity! In bosoms read
By him, who foibles in archangels sees!
On human hearts he bends a jealous eye,
And marks, and in heaven's register inrolls,
The rise and progress of each option there;
Sacred to doomsday! That the page unfolds,
And spreads us to the gaze of gods and men.

And what an option, O Lorenzo, thine?
This world! and this, unrivall'd by the skies!
A world, where lust of pleasure, grandeur, gold,
Three demons that divide its realms between them,
With strokes alternate buffet to and fro
Man's restless heart, their sport, their flying ball;
Till with the giddy circle sick, and tir'd,
It pants for peace, and drops into despair.
Such is the world Lorenzo sets above
That glorious promise angels were esteem'd
Too mean to bring; a promise, their ador'd
Descended to communicate, and press,
By counsel, miracle, life, death, on man.
Such is the world Lorenzo's wisdom woos,
And on its thorny pillow seeks repose;
A pillow which, like opiates ill-prepar'd,
Intoxicates, but not composes; fills
The visionary mind with gay chimeras,
All the wild trash of sleep, without the rest;
What unfeign'd travel, and what dreams of joy!

How frail men, things! how momentary both!
Fantastic chase of shadows hunting shades!
The gay, the busy, equal, though unlike;
Equal in wisdom, differently wise! [wastes,
Through flowery meadows, and through dreary
One bustling, and one dancing into death.
There's not a day, but to the man of thought
Betrays some secret, that throws new reproach
On life, and makes him sick of seeing more.
The scenes of business tell us—"What are men?"
The scenes of pleasure—"What is all beside?"
There, others we despise; and here, ourselves.
Amid disgust eternal, dwells delight?
'Tis approbation strikes the string of joy.

What wondrous prize has kindled this career,
Stuns with the din, and chokes us with the dust,
On life's gay stage, one inch above the grave?
The proud run up and down in quest of eyes;
The sensual, in pursuit of something worse;
The grave, of gold; the politic, of power,
And all, of other butterflies, as vain!
As eddies draw things frivolous and light,
How is man's heart by vanity drawn in;
On the swift circle of returning toys,
Whirl'd, straw-like, round and round, and then ingulf'd;

Where gay delusion darkens to despair!

"This is a beaten track."—Is this a track
Should not be beaten? never beat enough,

Till enough learn'd the truths it would inspire.
 Shall truth be silent, because folly frowns?
 Turn the world's history; what find we there
 But fortune's sports, or nature's cruel claims,
 Or woman's artifice, or man's revenge,
 And endless inhumanities on man?
 Fame's trumpet seldom sounds, but like the knell
 It brings bad tidings: how it hourly blows
 Man's misadventures round the listening world!
 Man is the tale of narrative old time;
 Sad tale; which high as paradise begins;
 As if the toil of travel to delude,
 From stage to stage, in his eternal round,
 The days, his daughters, as they spin our hours
 On fortune's wheel, where accident unthought
 Oft in a moment snaps life's strongest thread,
 Each in her turn some tragic story tells,
 With now-and-then, a wretched farce between,
 And fills his chronicle with human woes. [us;
 Time's daughters, true as those of men, deceive
 Not one, but puts some cheat on all mankind:
 While in their father's bosom, not yet ours,
 They flatter our fond hopes; and promise much
 Of amiable; but hold him not o'er wife, [year,
 Who dares to trust them; and laugh round the
 At still-confiding, still-confounded man,
 Confiding, though confounded; hoping on,
 Untaught by trial, unconvinc'd by proof,
 And ever-looking for the never-seen.
 Life to the last, like harden'd felons, lies;
 Nor owns itself a cheat, till it expires.
 Its little joy goes out by one and one,
 And leave poor man at length in perfect night;
 Night darker than what now involves the pole.
 O thou, who dost permit these ills to fall
 For gracious ends, and would'st that man should mourn!
 O thou, whose hands this goodly fabric fram'd,
 Who know'st it best, and would'st that man should know!
 What is this sublunary world? A vapour;
 A vapour all it holds; itself a vapour;
 From the damp bed of chaos, by thy beam
 Exhal'd, ordain'd to swim its destin'd hour
 In ambient air, then melt, and disappear.
Earth's days are number'd, nor remote her doom;
 As mortal, though less transient than her sons;
 Yet they doat on her, as the world and they
 Were both eternal, solid; thou a dream.
 They doat! on what? Immortal views apart,
 A region of outsidings! a land of shadows!
 A fruitful field of flowery promises!
 A wilderness of joy! perplex'd with doubts,
 And sharp with thorns! a troubled ocean, spread
 With bold adventurers, their all on board!
 No second hope, if here their fortune frowns;
 Frown soon it must. Of various rates they fail,
 Of ensigns various; all alike in this,
 All restless, anxious; tost with hopes and fears,
 In calmest skies; obnoxious all to storm;
 And stormy the most general blast of life:
 All bound for happiness; yet few provide
 The chart of knowledge, pointing where it lies;
 Or virtue's helm, to shape the course design'd:
 All, more or less, capricious fate lament,

Now lifted by the tide, and now resorb'd,
 And farther from their wishes than before:
 All, more or less, against each other dash,
 To mutual hurt, by gusts of passion driven,
 And suffering more from folly, than from fate.
 Ocean! thou dreadful and tumultuous home
 Of dangers, at eternal war with man!
Death's capital, where most he domineers,
 With all his chosen terrors frowning round,
 (Though lately feasted high at * Albion's cost)
 Wide-opening, and loud-roaring still for more!
 Too faithful mirror! how dost thou reflect
 The melancholy face of human life!
 The strong resemblance tempts me farther still:
 And, haply, Britain may be deeper struck
 By moral truth, in such a mirror seen,
 Which nature holds for ever at her eye.
 Self-flatter'd, unexperienc'd, high in hope,
 When young, with sanguine cheer, and streamers
 gay,
 We cut our cable, launch into the world,
 And fondly dream each wind and star our friend;
 All, in some darling enterprise embark'd:
 But where is he can fathom its extent?
 Amid a multitude of artless hands,
Ruin's sure perquisite! her lawful prize!
 Some steer aright; but the black blast blows hard,
 And puffs them wide of hope: with hearts of proof,
 Full against wind and tide, some win their way;
 And when strong effort has deserv'd the port,
 And tugg'd it into view, 'tis won! 'tis lost!
 Though strong their oar, still stronger is their fate:
 They strike; and while they triumph, they expire.
 In stress of weather, most: some sink outright;
 O'er them, and o'er their names, the billows close;
 To-morrow knows not they were ever born.
Others a short memorial leave behind,
 Like a flag floating, when the bark's engulf'd;
 It floats a moment, and is seen no more:
 One Cæsar lives; a thousand are forgot.
 How few, beneath auspicious planets born,
 (Darlings of providence! fond fate's elect!)
 With swelling sails make good the promis'd port,
 With all their wishes freighted! yet e'en these,
 Freight with all their wishes, soon complain;
 Free from misfortune, not from nature free,
 They still are men; and when is man secure?
 As fatal time, as storm! the rush of years
 Beats down their strength; their numberless escapes
 In ruin end: and, now, their proud success
 But plants new terrors on the victor's brow:
 What pain to quit the world, just made their own.
 Their nest so deeply drown'd, and built so high!
 Too low they build, who build beneath the stars.
 Woe then apart (if woe apart can be
 From mortal man), and fortune at our nod,
 The gay! rich! great! triumphant! and august!
 What are they?—The most happy (strange to say!)
 Convince me most of human misery;
 What are they? Smiling wretches of to-morrow!

* Admiral Balchen, &c.

More wretched, then, than e'er their slave can be;
 Their treacherous blessings, at the day of need,
 Like other faithless friends, unmask, and sting:
Then, what provoking indigence in wealth!
 What aggravated impotence in power!
 High titles, then, what insult of their pain!
 If that sole anchor, equal to the waves,
Immortal hope! defies not the rude storm,
 Takes comfort from their foaming billows' rage,
 And makes a welcome harbour of the tomb.

Is this a sketch of what thy soul admires?
 "But here (thou say'st) the miseries of life
 "Are huddled in a group. A more distinct
 "Survey, perhaps, might bring thee better news."
 Look on life's stages: they speak plainer still;
 The plainer they, the deeper wilt thou sigh.
 Look on thy lovely boy; in him behold
 The best that can befall the best on earth;
 The boy has virtue by his mother's side:
 Yes, on Florello look: a father's heart
 Is tender, though the man's is made of stone;
 The truth, through such a medium seen, may make Impression deep, and fondness prove thy friend.

Florello lately cast on this rude coast
 A helpless infant; now a heedless child;
 To poor Clarissa's throes, thy care succeeds;
 Care full of love, and yet severe as hate!
 O'er thy soul's joy how oft thy fondness frowns!
 Needful austerities his will restrain;
 As thorns fence-in the tender plant from harm.
 As yet, his reason cannot go alone;
 But asks a sterner nurse to lead it on.
 His little heart is often terrify'd;
 The blush of morning, in his cheek, turns pale;
 Its pearly dew-drop trembles in his eye;
 His harmless eye! and drowns an angel there.
 Ah! what avails his innocence? The task
 Enjoin'd must discipline his early powers;
 He learns to sigh, ere he is known to sin;
 Guiltless, and sad! a wretch before the fall!
 How cruel this! more cruel to forbear.
 Our nature such, with necessary pains,
 We purchase prospects of precarious peace:
 Though not a father, this might steal a sigh.
 Suppose him disciplin'd aright (if not,
 'Twill sink our poor account to poorer still);
 Ripe from the tutor, proud of liberty,
 He leaps enclosure, bounds into the world!
 The world is taken, after ten years toil,
 Like ancient Troy; and all its joys his own.
 Alas! the world's a tutor more severe;
 Its lessons hard, and ill deserve his pains;
 Unteaching all his virtuous nature taught,
 Or books (fair virtue's advocates!) inspir'd.

For who receives him into public life?
Men of the world, the terræ filial breed,
 Welcome the modest stranger to their sphere,
 (Which glitter'd long, at distance, in his sight)
 And, in their hospitable arms, enclose:
 Men, who think nought so strong of the romance,
 So rank knight-errant, as a real friend:
 Men, that act up to reason's golden rule,
 All weakness of affection quite subdued:
 Men, that would blush at being thought sincere,
 And feign, for glory, the few faults they want;

That love a lie, where truth would pay as well
 As if, to them, vice shone her own reward.

Lorenzo! canst thou bear a shocking sight?
Such, for Florello's sake, 'twill now appear:
 See, the steel'd files of season'd veterans,
 Train'd to the world, in burnish'd falsehood bright;
 Deep in the fatal stratagems of peace;
 All soft sensation, in the throng, rubb'd off;
 All their keen purpose, in politeness, sheath'd;
 His friends eternal—during interest;
 His foes implacable—when worth their while;
 At war with every welfare, but their own;
 As wise as Lucifer; and half as good;
 And by whom none, but Lucifer, can gain—
 Naked, through these (so common fate ordains),
 Naked of heart, his cruel course he runs,
 Stung out of all, most amiable in life,
 Prompt truth, and open thought, and smiles un-

feign'd;
 Affection, as his species, wide diffus'd;
 Noble presumptions to mankind's renown;
 Ingenious trust, and confidence of love.

These claims to joy (if mortals joy might claim)
 Will cost him many a sigh; till time, and pains,
 From the slow mistress of this school, experience,
 And her assistant, pausing, pale, distrust,
 Purchase a dear-bought clue to lead his youth
 Through serpentine obliquities of life,
 And the dark labyrinth of human hearts.
 And happy! if the clue shall come so cheap;
 For, while we learn to fence with public guilt,
 Full oft we feel its foul contagion too,
 If less than heavenly virtue is our guard.
 Thus, a strange kind of curs'd necessity
 Brings down the sterling temper of his soul,
 By base alloy, to bear the current stamp,
Below call'd wisdom; sinks him into safety;
 And brands him into credit with the world;
 Where specious titles dignify disgrace,
 And nature's injuries are arts of life;
 Where brighter reason prompts to bolder crimes;
 And heavenly talents make infernal hearts;
 That unfurmountable extreme of guilt!

Poor Machiavel! who labour'd hard his plan,
 Forgot, that genius need not go to school;
 Forgot, that man, without a tutor wise,
 His plan had practis'd, long before 't was writ.
 The world's all title-page; there's no contents;
 The world's all face? the man who shows his heart,

 Is hooted for his nudities, and scorn'd.
 A man I knew, who liv'd upon a smile;
 And well it fed him; he look'd plump and fair;
 While rankest venom foam'd through every vein.
 Lorenzo! what I tell thee, take not ill!
 Living, he fawn'd on every fool alive;
 And, dying, curs'd the friend on whom he liv'd.
 To such proficients thou art half a faint.
 In foreign realms (for thou hast travell'd far)
 How curious to contemplate two state-rooks,
 Studious their nests to feather in a trice,
 With all the necromantics of their art,
 Playing the game of faces on each other,
 Making court sweet-meats of their latent gall,
 In foolish hope, to steal each other's trust;

Both cheating, both exulting, both deceiv'd;
And, sometimes, both (let earth rejoice) undone!
Their parts we doubt not; but be that their shame;
Shall men of talents, fit to rule mankind,
Stoop to mean wiles, that would disgrace a fool;
And lose the thanks of those few friends they serve?
For who can thank the man he cannot see?

Why so much cover! It defeats itself.
Ye, that know all things! know ye not men's hearts,

Are therefore known, because they are conceal'd?
For why conceal'd?—The cause they need not tell.
I give him joy, that's awkward at a lie;
Whose feeble nature truth keeps still in awe;
His incapacity is his renown.

'Tis great, 'tis manly, to disdain disguise;
It shows our spirit, or it proves our strength.
Thou say'st, 'Tis needful: it is therefore right?
Howe'er, I grant it some small sign of grace,
To strain at an excuse: and wouldst thou then Escape that cruel need? Thou may'st, with ease;
Think no post needful that demands a knave.

When late our civil helm was shifting hands,
So Pulteney thought: think better if you can.

But this, how rare! the public path of life
Is dirty:—yet, allow that dirt is due,
It makes the noble mind more noble still:
The world's no neuter; it will wound, or save;
Or virtue quench, or indignation fire.
You say, The world, well-known will make a man:
The world, well-known, will give our hearts to heaven,

Or make us demons, long before we die.

To show how fair the world, thy mistress, shines,
Take either part, sure ills attend the choice;
Sure, though not equal, detriment ensues.

Not virtue's self is deify'd on earth;
Virtue has her relapses, conflicts, foes;
Foes, that ne'er fail to make her feel their hate.
Virtue has her peculiar set of pains.

True friends to virtue, last, and least, complain;
But if they sigh, can others hope to smile?
If wisdom has her miseries to mourn,
How can poor folly lead a happy life?
And if both suffer, what has earth to boast,
Where he most happy, who the least laments!
Where much, much patience, the most envy'd state,
And some forgiveness, needs the best of friends?
For friend, or happy life, who looks not higher,
Of neither shall he find the shadow here.

The world's sworn advocate, without a fee
Lorenzo smartly, with a smile replies;

"Thus far thy song is right; and all most own.

"Virtue has her peculiar set of pains.—

"And joys peculiar who to vice denies?

"If vice it is, with nature to comply:

"If pride, and sense, are so predominant,

"To check, not overcome them makes a saint,

"Can nature in a plainer voice proclaim

"Pleasure, and glory, the chief good of man?"

Can pride and sensuality rejoice?

From purity of thought, all pleasure springs;

And, from an humble spirit, all our peace.

Ambition, pleasure! let us talk of these:

Of these, the porch, and academy, talk'd;

Of these, each following age had much to say!
Yet, unexhausted, still, the needful theme.
Who talks of these, to mankind all at once
He talks: for were the saint from either free?
Are these thy refuge?—No: these rush upon thee;
Thy vitals seize, and vulture-like, devour:
I'll try, if I can pluck thee from thy rock,
Prometheus! from this barren ball of earth;
If reason can unchain thee, thou art free.

And, first, thy Caucasus, ambition, calls;
Mountain of torments! eminence of woes!
Of courted woes! and courted through mistake!
'Tis not ambition charms thee; 'tis a cheat
Will make thee start, as H—— at his Moor.
Dost grasp at greatness? first, know what it is:
Think'st thou thy greatness in distinction lies?
Not in the feather, wave it e'er so high,
By fortune stuck, to mark us from the throng,
Is glory lodg'd; 'tis lodg'd in the reverse;
In that which joins, in that which equals, all,
The monarch and his slave;—"A deathless soul,
"Unbounded prospect, and immortal kin,
"A Father God, and brothers in the skies;"
Elder, indeed, in time; but less remote
In excellence, perhaps, than thought by man;
Why greater what can fall, than what can rise?

If still delirious, now, Lorenzo! go;
And with thy full blown brothers of the world,
Throw scorn around thee; cast it on thy slaves;
Thy slaves, and equals: how scorn cast on them
Rebounds on thee! if man is mean, as man,
Art thou a god? If fortune makes him so,
Beware the consequence: a maxim that,
Which draws a monstrous picture of mankind,
Where, in the drapery, the man is lost;
Externals fluttering, and the soul forgot.
Thy greatest glory, when dispos'd to boast,
Boast that aloud, in which thy servants share.

We wisely strip the steed we mean to buy:
Judge we, in their caparisons, of men?
It nought avails thee, where, but what, thou art;
All the distinctions of this little life
Are quite cutaneous, foreign to the man,
When, through death's streights, earth's subtle serpents creep,

Which wriggle into wealth, or climb renown.
As crooked Satan the forbidden tree,
They leave their party-colour'd robe behind,
All that now glitters, while they rear aloft
Their brazen crests, and hiss at us below.
Of fortune's fucus strip them, yet alive;
Strip them of body, too; nay, closer still,
Away with all, but moral, in their minds;
And let, what then remains, impose their name,
Pronounce them weak, or worthy; great, or mean.
How mean that snuff of glory fortune lights,
And death puts out! Dost thou demand a test,
A test, at once, infallible, and short,
Of real greatness? That man greatly lives,
Whate'er his fate, or fame, who greatly dies;
High-flush'd with hope, where heroes shall despair:
If this a true criterion, many courts,
Illustrious, might afford but few grandees.

Th' Almighty, from his throne, on earth surveys

Nought greater, than an honest, humble heart;
 An humble heart, his residence: pronounc'd
His second seat; and rival to the skies.
 The private path, the secret acts of men,
 If noble, far the noblest of our lives!
 How far above Lorenzo's glory sits
 Th' illustrious master of a name unknown;
 Whose worth unrivall'd, and unwitness'd, loves
 Life's sacred shades, where gods converse with men;

And peace, beyond the world's conceptions, smiles!
 As thou (now dark), before we part, shalt see.

But thy great soul this skulking glory scorns,
 Lorenzo's sick, but when Lorenzo's seen;
 And, when he shrugs at public business, lies.
 Deny'd the public eye, the public voice,
 As if he liv'd on others' breath, he dies.
 Fain would he make the world his pedestal;
 Mankind the gazers, the sole figure, he.
 Knows he, that mankind praise against their will,
 And mix as much detraction as they can?
 Knows he, that faithless fame her whisper has,
 As well as trumpet? That his vanity
 Is so much tickled from not hearing all?
 Knows this all-knower, that from itch of praise,
 Or, from an itch more sordid, when he shines,
 Taking his country by five hundred ears,
 Senates at once admire him, and despise,
 With modest laughter lining loud applause,
 Which makes the smile more mortal to his fame?
 His fame, which (like the mighty Caesar), crown'd
 With laurels, in full senate, greatly falls,
 By seeming friends, that honour, and destroy.
 We rise in glory, as we sink in pride:
 Where boasting ends, there dignity begins:
 And yet, mistaken beyond all mistake,
 The blind Lorenzo's proud—of being proud;
 And dreams himself ascending in his fall.

An eminence, though fancy'd, turns the brain:
 All vice wants bellesbore; but of all vice,
Pride loudest calls, and for the largest bowl;
 Because, unlike all other vice, it flies,
 In fact, the point, in fancy most pursued.
 Who court applause, oblige the world in this;
 They gratify man's passion to refuse.
 Superior honour, when assum'd, is lost;
 Ev'n good men turn banditti, and rejoice,
 Like Kouli Kan, in plunder of the proud.

Though somewhat disconcerted, steady still
 To the world's cause, with half a face of joy,
 Lorenzo cries—"Be, then, ambition cast;
 "Ambition's dearer far stands unimpeach'd,
 "Gay pleasure: proud ambition is her slave;
 "For her, he soars at great, and hazards ill;
 "For her he fights, and bleeds, or overcomes;
 "And paves his way, with crowns, to reach her
 "smile: [Lorenzo!]

"Who can resist her charms?"—Or, should? Lo-
 What mortal shall resist, where angels yield?
Pleasure's the mistress of ethereal powers;
 For her contend the rival gods above;
Pleasure's the mistress of the world below;
 And well it was for man, that pleasure charms;
 How would all stagnate, but for pleasure's ray!
 How would the frozen stream of action cease!

VOL. X.

What is the pulse of this so busy world?
 The love of pleasure: that, through every vein,
 Throws motion, warmth; and shuts out death from life.

Though various are the tempers of mankind,
Pleasure's gay family hold all in chains:
 Some most affect the black; and some, the fair;
 Some honest pleasure court; and some obscene.
Pleasures obscene are various, as the throng
 Of passions, that can ert in human hearts;
 Mistake their objects, or transgress their bounds.
 Think you there's but one whoredom? Whore-dom all,

But when our reason licenses delight
 Dost doubt, Lorenzo? Thou shalt doubt no more
 Thy father chides thy gallantries; yet hugs
 An ugly, common harlot, in the dark;
 A rank adulterer with others' gold!
 And that hag, vengeance, in a corner charms,
Hatred her brothel has, as well as love,
 Where horrid epicure's debauch in blood.
 Whate'er the motive, pleasure is the mark:
 For her, the black assassin draws his sword;
 For her, dark statesmen trim their midnight lamp,
 To which no single sacrifice may fall;
 For her the saint abstains; the miser starves;
 The Stoic proud, for pleasure, pleasure scorn'd;
 For her, affliction's daughters grief indulge,
 And find, or hope, a luxury in tears;
 For her, guilt, shame, toil, danger, we defy;
 And with an aim voluptuous, rush on death.
 Thus universal her despotic power!

And as her empire wide, her praise is just.
 Patron of pleasure! doater on delight!
 I am thy rival; pleasure I profess;
Pleasure the purpose of my gloomy song.
Pleasure is nought but virtue's gayer name;
 I wrong her still, I rate her worth too low;
 Virtue the root, and pleasure is the flower;
 And honest Epicurus' foes were fools.

But this sounds harsh, and gives the wise offence;
 If o'erstrain'd wisdom still retains the name.
 How knits austerity her cloudy brow,
 And blames, as bold, and hazardous, the praise
 Of pleasure, to mankind, unprais'd, too dear!
 Ye modern Stoics! hear my soft reply;
 Their senses men will trust: we can't impose;
 Or, if we could, is imposition right?
 Own honey-sweet; but owning add this sting;
 "When mixt with poison, it is deadly too."
 Truth never was indebted to a lie.
 Is nought but virtue to be prais'd as good?
 Why then is health prefer'd before disease?
 What nature loves is good, without our leave.
 And where no future drawback cries, "Beware;"
Pleasure, though not from virtue, should prevail.
 'Tis balm to life, and gratitude to heaven;
 How cold our thanks for bounties unenjoy'd!
 The love of pleasure is man's eldest born,
 Born in his cradle, living to his tomb;
Wisdom, her younger sister, though more grave,
 Was meant to minister, and not to mar,
 Imperial pleasure, queen of human hearts.
 Lorenzo! thou her majesty's renown'd,
 Though uncoist counsel, learned in the world!

H

Who think'tt thyself a Murray, with disdain
May'st look on me. Yet, my Demosthenes!
Canst thou plead pleasure's cause as well as I?
Know'st thou her nature, purpose, parentage?
Attend my song, and thou shalt know them all;
And know thyself; and know thyself to be
(Strange truth!) the most abstemious man alive.
Tell not Calista; she will laugh thee dead;
Or send thee to her hermitage with L——.
Absurd presumption! Thou who never knew'st
A serious thought! shalt thou dare dream of joy?
No man e'er found a happy life by chance;
Or yawn'd it into being with a wish;
Or with the shout of grove'ling appetite
E'er smelt it out, and grubb'd it from the dirt.
An art it is, and must be learnt; and learnt
With unremitting effort, or be lost;
And leaves us perfect blockheads in our blifs.
The clouds may drop down titles and estates;
Wealth may seek us; but wisdom must be sought;
Sought before all; but (how unlike all else
We seek on earth!) 'tis never sought in vain.

First, pleasure's birth, rise, strength, and grandeur, see.

Brought forth by wisdom, nurs'd by discipline,
By patience taught, by perseverance crown'd,
She rears her head majestic; round her throne,
Erected in the bosom of the just,
Each virtue lifted forms her manly guard.
For what are virtues? (Formidable name!)
What, but the fountain, or defence of joy?
Why then commanded? Need mankind commands,
At once to merit, and to make their blifs?—
Great Legislator! scarce so great as kind!
If men are rational, and love delight,
Thy gracious law but flatters human choice;
In the transgression lies the penalty;
And they the most indulge, who most obey.

Of pleasure next the final cause explore;
Its mighty purpose, its important end.
Not to turn human brutal, but to build
Divine on human, pleasure came from heaven.
In aid to reason was the goddess sent;
To call up all its strength by such a charm.
Pleasure first succours virtue; in return
Virtue gives pleasure an eternal reign.
What but the pleasure of food, friendship, faith,
Supports life natural, civil, and divine?
'Tis from the pleasure of repast we live;
'Tis from the pleasure of applause we please;
'Tis from the pleasure of belief we pray
(All prayer would cease, if unbelov'd the prize):
It serves ourselves, our species, and our God;
And to serve more, is past the sphere of man.
Glide then for ever, pleasure's sacred stream!
Through Eden, as Euphrates ran, it runs,
And fosters every growth of happy life;
Makes a new Eden where it flows;—but such
As must be lost, Lorenzo! by thy fall.

"What mean I by thy fall?"—Thou'lt shortly see,
While pleasure's nature is at large display'd;
Already sung her origin, and ends.
Those glorious ends, by kind, or by degree,
When pleasure violates, 'tis then a vice,
And vengeance too; it hastens into pain.

From due refreshment, life, health, reason, joy;
From wild excess, pain, grief, distraction, death;
Heaven's justice this proclaims, and that her love.
What greater evil can I wish my foe,
Than his full draught of pleasure, from a cask
Unbroach'd by just authority, unguag'd
By temperance, by reason unrefin'd?
A thousand demons lurk within the lee.
Heaven, others, and ourselves! uninjur'd these.
Drink deep; the deeper, then the more divine:
Angels are angels, from indulgence there;
'Tis unrepenting pleasure makes a god.

Dost think thyself a god from other joys?
A victim rather! shortly sure to bleed.
The wrong must mourn: can heaven's appointments fail?

Can man outwit Omnipotence? Strike out
A self-wrought happiness unmeant by him
Who made us, and the world we would enjoy?
Who forms an instrument, ordains from whence
Its dissonance or harmony shall rise.
Heaven bade the soul this mortal frame inspire:
Bade virtue's ray divine inspire the soul
With unprecious flows of vital joy;
And without breathing, man as well might hope
For life, as without piety, for peace.

"Is virtue then and piety the same?"
No; piety is more; 'tis virtue's source;
Mother of every worth, as that of joy.
Men of the world this doctrine ill digest;
They smile at piety; yet boast aloud
Good will to men; nor know they strive to part
What nature joins; and thus confute themselves.
With piety begins all good on earth;
'Tis the first-born of rationality.

Conscience, her first law broken, wounded lies;
Enfeebled, lifeless, impotent to good;
A feign'd affection bounds her utmost power.
Some we can't love, but for the Almighty's sake;
A foe to God was ne'er true friend to man;
Some sinister intent taints all he does;
And, in his kindest actions, he's unkind.

On piety, humanity is built;
And, on humanity, much happiness;
And yet still more on piety itself.
A soul in commerce with her God, is heaven;
Feels not the tumults and the shocks of life;
The whirls of passion, and the strokes of heart:
A Deity believ'd is joy begun;
A Deity ador'd is joy advanc'd;
A Deity belov'd is joy matur'd.
Each branch of piety delight inspires;
Faith builds a bridge from this world to the next,
O'er death's dark gulf, and all its horror hides;
Praise, the sweet exhalation of our joy,
That joy exalts, and makes it sweeter still;
Prayer ardent opens heaven, lets down a stream
Of glory on the consecrated hour
Of man, in audience with the Deity.

Who worships the Great God, that instant joins
The first in heaven, and sets his foot on hell.

Lorenzo! when wast thou at church before?
Thou think'st the service long: but is it just?
Though just, unwelcome; thou hadst rather tread
Unhallow'd ground; the muse, to win thine ear,

Must take an air less solemn. She complies.
Good conscience! at the sound the world retires;
 Verse disaffects it, and Lorenzo smiles;
 Yet has she her seraglio full of charms;
 And such as age shall heighten, not impair.
 Art thou dejected? Is thy mind o'ercast?
 Amid her fair ones, thou the fairest choose,
 To chase thy gloom—"Go, fix some weighty

"truth;

"Chain down some passion; do some generous good;
 "Teach ignorance to see, or grief to smile;
 "Correct thy friend; befriend thy greatest foe;
 "Or with warm heart and confidence divine,
 "Spring up, and lay strong hold on him who made
 "thee."

Thy gloom is scatter'd, sprightly spirits flow;
 Though wither'd is thy vine, and harp unstrung.
 Dost call the bowl, the viol, and the dance,
 Loud mirth, mad laughter? wretched comforters!
 Physicians! more than half of thy disease.

Laughter, though never censur'd yet as sin,
 (Pardon a thought that only seems severe)
 Is half immortal: is it much indulg'd?
 By venting spleen, or dissipating thought,
 It shows a scorner, or it makes a fool;
 And sips, as hurting others, or ourselves.
 'Tis pride, or emptiness, applies the straw,
 That tickles little minds to mirth effuse;
 Of grief approaching, the portentous sign!
 The house of laughter makes a house of woe.
 A man triumphant is a monstrous sight;
 A man dejected is a sight as mean.

What cause for triumph, where such ills abound?
 What for dejection, where presides a Power,
 Who call'd us into being to be blest?
 So grieve, as conscious grief may rise to joy;
 So joy, as conscious joy to grief may fall.
 Most true, a wise man never will be sad;
 But neither will sonorous bubbling mirth,
 A shallow stream of happiness betray:

Too happy to be sportive, he's serene. [pence]

Yet wouldst thou laugh (but at thy own ex-
 This counsel strange should I presume to give—
 "Retire, and read thy Bible, to be gay."

There truths abound of sovereign aid to peace;
 Ah! do not prize them less, because inspir'd,
 As thou and thine are apt and proud to do.
 If not inspir'd, that pregnant page had stood,
Time's treasure? and the wonder of the wise!
 Thou think'st, perhaps, thy soul alone at stake;
 Alas!—Should men mistake thee for a fool;
 What man of taste for genius, wisdom, truth,
 Though tender of thy fame, could interpose?
 Believe me, sense here acts a double part,
 And the true critic is a Christian too.

But these, thou think'st, are gloomy paths to joy.—
 True joy in sunshine ne'er was found at first;
 They, first, themselves offend, who greatly please;
 And travel only gives us sound repose.
 Heaven sells all pleasure; effort is the price;
 The joys of conquest are the joys of man;
 And glory the victorious laurel spreads
 O'er pleasure's pure, perpetual, placid stream.

There is a time, when toil must be preferr'd,
 Or joy, by mis-tim'd fondness, is undone.

A man of pleasure is a man of pains.

Thou wilt not take the trouble to be blest.

False joys, indeed, are born from want of thought:

From thoughts full bent, and energy the true;

And that demands a mind in equal poise,

Remote from gloomy grief, and glaring joy.

Much joy not only speaks small happiness,

But happiness that shortly must expire.

Can joy, unbottom'd in reflection, stand?

And, in a tempest can reflection live?

Can joy, like thine, secure itself an hour?

Can joy, like thine, meet accident unshock'd?

Or ope the door to honest poverty?

Or talk with threatening death, and not turn pale?

In such a world, and such a nature, these

Are needful fundamentals of delight:

These fundamentals give delight indeed;

Delight, pure, delicate, and durable;

Delight, unshaken, masculine, divine;

A constant, and a sound, but serious joy.

Is joy the daughter of severity?

It is:—yet far my doctrine from severe.

"Rejoice for ever!" It becomes a man;

Exalts, and sets him nearer to the gods.

"Rejoice for ever!" Nature cries, "Rejoice;"

And drinks to man in her necteraous cup,

Mixt up of delicacies for every sense;

To the great Founder of the bounteous feast,

Drinks glory, gratitude, eternal praise;

And he that will not pledge her, is a churl.

Ill firmly to support, good fully taste,

Is the whole science of felicity:

Yet sparing pledge: her bowl is not the best

Mankind can boast.—"A rational repast,

"Exertion; vigilance, a mind in arms,

"A military discipline of thought,

"To foil temptation in the doubtful field,

"And ever-waking ardour for the right."

'Tis these first give, then guard, a cheerful heart;

Nought that is right think little, well aware

What reason bids God bids; by his command

How aggrandis'd the smallest thing we do!

Thus nothing is insipid to the wise;

To thee insipid all, but what is mad;

Joys season'd high, and tasting strong of guilt.

"Mad! (thou reply'st, with indignation fir'd)

"Of ancient sages proud to tread the steps,

"I follow nature."—Follow nature still;

But look! it be thine own. Is conscience then

No part of nature? Is she not supreme?

Thou regicide! O raise her from the dead!

Then follow nature, and resemble God.

When, spite of conscience, pleasure is pursu'd;

Man's nature is unnaturally pleas'd;

And what's unnatural is painful too

At intervals, and must disgust ev'n thee!

The fact thou know'st, but not perhaps the cause.

Virtue's foundations with the world's were laid;

Heaven mix'd her with our make, and twisted close

Her sacred interests with the strings of life.

Who breaks her awful mandate, shocks himself,

His better self; and is it greater pain

Our soul should murmur, or our dust repine?

And one in their eternal war must bleed.

If one must suffer, which should least be spar'd;

H ij

The pains of mind surpass the pains of sense :
 Ask then the gout what torment is in guilt.
 The joys of sense to mental joys are mean :
 Sense on the present only feeds ; the soul
 On past and future foragers for joy.
 'Tis hers by retrospect through time to range,
 And forward time's great sequel to survey.
 Could human courts take vengeance on the mind,
 Axes might rust, and racks and gibbets fall :
 Guard then thy mind, and leave the rest to fate.

Lorenzo ! wilt thou never be a man ?
 The man is dead who for the body lives,
 Lur'd, by the beating of his pulse, to list
 With every lust that wars against his peace,
 And sets him quite at variance with himself.
 Thyself first know, then love : a self there is
 Of virtue fond, that kindles at her charms.
 A self there is, as fond of every vice,
 While every virtue wounds it to the heart :
Humility degrades it, justice robs,
 Blest bounty beggars it, fair truth betrays,
 And godlike magnanimity destroys.
 This self, when rival to the former, scorn ;
 When not in competition, kindly treat,
 Defend it, feed it : — But, when virtue bids,
 Toss it, or to the fowls, or to the flames.
 And why ? 'Tis love of pleasure bids thee bleed ;
 Comply, or own self-love extinct or blind.

For what is vice ? Self-love in a mistake ;
 A poor blind merchant buying joys too dear.
 And virtue, what ? 'Tis self-love in her wits,
 Quite skilful in the market of delight.
 Self-love's good sense is love of that dread Power,
 From whom herself, and all she can enjoy.
 Other self-love is but disguis'd self-hate ;
 More mortal than the malice of our foes ;
 A self-hate now scarce felt, then felt full sore
 When being curs'd ; extinction, loud implor'd ;
 And every thing prefer'd to what we are.

Yet this self-love Lorenzo makes his choice ;
 And, in this choice triumphant, boasts of joy.
 How is his want of happiness betray'd
 By disaffection to the present hour !
 Imagination wanders far afield :
 The future pleases : why ? The present pains —
 " But that's a secret." Yes, which all men know,
 And know from thee, discover'd unawares.
 Thy ceaseless agitation restless roll
 From cheat to cheat, impatient of a pause ;
 What is it ? 'Tis the cradle of the soul,
 From instinct sent, to rock her in disease,
 Which her physician, reason, will not cure.
 A poor expedient ! yet thy best ; and while
 It mitigates thy pain, it owns it too.

Such are Lorenzo's wretched remedies !
 The weak have remedies, the wise have joys.
 Superior wisdom is superior bliss.
 And what sure mark distinguishes the wise ?
 Consistent wisdom ever wills the same ;
 Thy fickle wish is ever on the wing.
 Sick of herself is folly's character,
 As wisdom's is, a modest self-applause.
 A change of evils is thy good supreme ;
 Nor but in motion canst thou find thy rest.
 Man's greatest strength is shown in standing still.

The first sure symptom of a mind in health
 Is rest of heart, and pleasure felt at home.
 False pleasure from abroad her joys imports ;
 Rich from within, and self-sustain'd, the true.
 The true is fix'd, and solid as a rock ;
 Slippery the false, and tossing as the wave.
 This, a wild wanderer on earth, like Cain ;
 That, like the fabled, self-enamour'd boy,
 Home-contemplation her supreme delight ;
 She dreads an interruption from without,
 Smit with her own condition ; and the more
 Intense she gazes, fix'd it charms the more.

No man is happy, till he thinks on earth
 There breathes not a more happy than himself ;
 Then envy dies, and love o'erflows on all ;
 And love o'erflowing makes an angel here.
 Such angels, all entitled to repose
 On him who governs fate : though tempest frowns,
 Though nature shakes, how soft to lean on heaven ?
 To lean on him on whom archangels lean !
 With inward eyes, and silent as the grave,
 They stand collecting every beam of thought,
 Till their hearts kindle with divine delight ;
 For all their thoughts, like angels seen of old
 In Israel's dream, come from and go to heaven :
 Hence are they studious of sequester'd scenes,
 While noise and dissipation comfort thee.

Were all men happy, revelings would cease,
 That opiate for inquietude within.
 Lorenzo ! never man was truly blest,
 But it compos'd, and gave him such a cast,
 As folly might mistake for want of joy.
 A cast unlike the triumph of the proud ;
 A modest aspect, and a smile at heart.
 O for a joy from thy Philander's spring !
 A spring perennial rising in the breast,
 And permanent as pure ! no turbid stream
 Of rapturous exultation, swelling high,
 Which like land-floods impetuous pour a while,
 Then sink at once, and leave us in the mire.
 What does the man who transient joy prefers ?
 What, but prefer the bubbles to the stream ?

Vain are all sudden sallies of delight ;
 Convulsions of a weak distemper'd joy.
 Joy's a fix'd state, a tenure, not a start.
 Bliss there is none, but unprecarious bliss :
 That is the gem : sell all, and purchase that.
 Why go a-begging to contingencies,
 Not gain'd with ease, nor safely lov'd, if gain'd ?
 At good fortuitous draw back and pause ;
 Suspect it ; what thou canst ensure, enjoy ;
 And nought but what thou giv'st thyself is sure.
 Reason perpetuates joy that reason gives,
 And makes it as immortal as herself :
 To mortals nought immortal but their worth.

Worth, conscious worth, should absolutely reign,
 And other joys ask leave for their approach,
 Nor, unexamined, ever leave obtain.
 Thou art all anarchy ; a mob of joys
 Wage war, and perish in intestine broils ;
 Not the least promise of internal peace !
 No bosom-comfort, or unborrow'd bliss !
 Thy thoughts are vagabonds ; all outward-bound,
 Mid sands, and rocks, and storms, to cruise for pleasure ;

If gain'd, dear bought; and better mis'd than gain'd.

Much pain must expiate what much pain procur'd.

Fancy, and sense, from an infected shore

Thy cargo bring, and pestilence the prize.

Then, such thy thirst (insatiable thirst!

By fond indulgence but inflam'd the more!)

Fancy still cruises when poor sense is tir'd.

Imagination is the Paphian shop,

Where feeble happiness, like Vulcan, lame,

Bids foul ideas, in their dark recess,

And hot as hell (which kindled the black fires,)

With wanton art those fatal arrows form

Which murder all thy time, health, wealth, and fame.

Wouldst thou receive them, other thoughts there

On angel-wing, descending from above,

Which these, with art divine, would counter-work,

And form celestial armour for thy peace.

In this is seen imagination's guilt;

But who can count her follies? She betrays thee,

To think in grandeur there is something great.

For works of curious art, and ancient fame,

Thy genius hungers, elegantly pain'd;

And foreign climes must cater for thy taste.

Hence what disaster!—Though the price was paid,

That persecuting priest, the Turk of Rome,

Whose foot (ye gods!) though cloven, must be kiss'd,

Detain'd thy dinner on the Latian shore;

(Such is the fate of honest Protestants!)

And poor magnificence is starv'd to death.

Hence just resentment, indignation, ire!—

Be pacify'd, if outward things are great;

'Tis magnanimity great things to scorn;

Pompous expences, and parades august,

And courts, that insalubrious soil to peace.

True happiness ne'er enter'd at an eye;

True happiness resides in things unseen.

No smiles of fortune ever blest the bad,

Nor can her frowns rob innocence of joys;

That jewel wanting, triple crowns are poor:

So tell his Holiness, and be reveng'd.

Pleasure, we both agree, is man's chief good;

Or only contest, what deserves the name.

Give pleasure's name to nought, but what has pass'd

Th' authentic seal of reason, which, like Yorke,

Demurs on what it passes, and defies

The tooth of time; when past, a pleasure still;

Dearer on trial, lovelier for its age,

And doubly to be priz'd, as it promotes

Our future, while it forms our present, joy.

Some joys the future overcast; and some

Throw all their beams that way, and gild the tomb.

Some joys endear eternity; some give

Abhor'd annihilation dreadful charms.

Are rival joys contending for thy choice?

Consult thy whole existence, and be safe;

That oracle will put all doubt to flight.

Short is the lesson, though my lecture long,

Be good—and let heaven answer for the rest.

Yet, with a sigh o'er all mankind, I grant

In this our day of proof, our land of hope,

The good man has his clouds that intervene;

Clouds that obscure his sublunary day,

But never conquer: ev'n the best must own

Patience and resignation are the pillars

Of human peace on earth. The pillars these;

But those of Seth not more remote from thee,

Till this heroic lesson thou hast learnt,

To frown at pleasure, and to smile in pain.

Fir'd at the prospect of unclouded bliss,

Heaven in reversion, like the sun, as yet

Beneath th' horizon, cheers us in this world;

It sheds, on souls susceptible of light,

The glorious dawn of our eternal day.

"This (says Lorenzo) is a fair harangue:

"But can harangues blow back strong nature's stream,

"Or stem the tide heaven pushes through our veins,

"Which sweeps away man's impotent resolves,

"And lays his labour level with the world?"

Themselves men make their comment on mankind,

And think nought is, but what they find at home:

Thus weakness to chimera turns the truth.

Nothing romantic has the muse prescrib'd.

* Above, Lorenzo saw the man of earth,

The mortal man, and wretched was the sight.

To balance that, to comfort, and exalt,

Now see the man immortal: him I mean

Who lives as such; whose heart, full bent on heaven,

Leans all that way, his bias to the stars.

The world's dark shades, in contrast set, shall raise

His lustre more, though bright, without a foil:

Observe his awful portrait, and admire;

Nor stop at wonder; imitate, and live.

Some angel guide my pencil, while I draw

What nothing less than angel can exceed:

A man on earth devoted to the skies;

Like ships in seas, while in, above the world,

With aspect mild, and elevated eye,

Behold him seated on a mount serene,

Above the fogs of sense, and passion's storm;

All the black cares and tumults of this life,

Like harmless thunders breaking at his feet,

Excite his pity, not impair his peace.

Earth's genuine sons, the scepter'd and the slave,

A mingled mob! a wandering herd! he sees

Bewilder'd in the vale; in all unlike!

His full reverse in all! what higher praise?

What stronger demonstration of the right?

The present all their care, the future bis.

When public welfare calls, or private want,

They give to fame, his bounty he conceals.

Their virtues varnish nature, bis exalt.

Mankind's esteem they court, and be his own,

Theirs, the wild chase of false felicities,

His, the compos'd possession of the true.

Alike throughout is bis consistent peace,

All of one colour, and an even thread;

While party-colour'd shreds of happiness,

With hideous gaps between, patch up for them

A madman's robe; each puff of fortune blows

The tatters by, and shews their nakedness.

He sees with other eyes than theirs: where they

* In a former Night.

H ij

Behold a sun, he spies a Deity;
 What makes them only smile, makes him adore.
 Where they see mountains, he but atoms sees;
 An empire in his balance weighs a grain.
They things terrestrial worship as divine;
His hopes immortal blow them by as dust,
 That dims his sight, and shortens his survey,
 Which longs in infinite to lose all bound.
 Titles and honours (if they prove his fate)
He lays aside to find his dignity;
 No dignity they find in aught besides.
They triumph in externals, (which conceal Man's real glory) proud of an eclipse.
 Himself too much he prizes to be proud,
 And nothing thinks so great in man as man.
 Too dear he holds his interest, to neglect
 Another's welfare, or his right invade;
Their interest, like a lion, lives on prey.
They kindle at the shadow of a wrong;
 Wrong he sustains with temper, looks on heaven,
 Nor stoops to think his injurer his foe;
 Nought, but what wounds his virtue wounds his peace.

A cover'd heart their character defends;
 A cover'd heart denies him half his praise.
 With nakedness his innocence agrees;
 While their broad foliage testifies their fall.
Their no joys end, where his full feast begins;
His joys create, theirs murder, future bliss.
 To triumph in existence, his alone;
 And his alone, triumphantly to think
 His true existence is not yet begun.
 His glorious course was, yesterday, complete;
 Death, then, was welcome; yet life still is sweet.

But nothing charms Lorenzo, like the firm,
 Undaunted breast—And whose is that high praise?

They yield to pleasure, though they danger brave,
 And show no fortitude, but in the field;
 If there they show it, 'tis for glory shown;
 Nor will that cordial always man their hearts.
 A cordial his sustains, that cannot fail;
 By pleasure unsubdued, unbroke by pain,
He shares in that Omnipotence he trusts.
 All-bearing, all-attempting, till he falls;
 And when he falls, writes VICI on his shield.
 From magnanimity, all fear above;
 From nobler recompense, above applause;
 Which owes to man's short out-look all its charms.

Backward to credit what he never felt,
 Lorenzo cries,—“Where shines this miracle?
 “From what root rises this immortal man?”
 A root that grows not in Lorenzo's ground;
 The root disiect, nor wonder at the flower.

He follows nature (not like thee) and shows us

An uninvited system of a man.
 His appetite wears reason's golden chain,
 And finds, in due restraint, its luxury.
 His passion like an eagle well reclaim'd,
 Is taught to fly at nought, but infinite.
 Patient his hope, un-anxious is his care,
 His caution fearless, and his grief, (if grief
 The gods ordain) a stranger to despair.
 And why?—Because, affection, more than meet,

His wisdom leaves not disengag'd from heaven.
 Those secondary goods that smile on earth,
 He, loving in proportion, loves in peace.
 They most the world enjoy, who least admire.
 His understanding 'scapes the common cloud
 Of fumes, arising from a boiling breast.
 His head is clear, because his heart is cool,
 By worldly competitions uninflam'd.
 The moderate movements of his soul admit
 Distinct ideas, and matur'd debate,
 An eye impartial, and an even scale;
 Whence judgment sound, and unrepenting choice.
 Thus, in a double sense, the good are wise;
 On its own dunghill, wiser than the world.
 What, then, the world? It must be doubly weak;
 Strange truth! as soon would they believe their Creed.

Yet thus it is; nor otherwise can be;
 So far from aught romantic, what I sing.
 Bliss has no being, virtue has no strength,
 But from the prospect of immortal life. [same]
 Who think earth all, or (what weighs just the
 Who care no farther, must prize what it yields;
 Fond of its fancies, proud of its parades.
 Who thinks earth nothing, can't its charms admire;
He can't a foe, though most malignant, hate,
 Because that hate would prove his greater foe.
 'Tis hard for them (yet who so loudly boast
 Good-will to men?) to love their dearest friend;
 For may not he invade their good supreme,
 Where the least jealousy turns love to gall!
 All shines to them, that for a season shines.
 Each act, each thought, he questions, “What its weight,

“Its colour what, a thousand ages hence?”
 And what it there appears, he deems it now.
 Hence, pure are the recesses of his soul.
 The godlike man has nothing to conceal.
 His virtue, constitutionally deep,
 Has habit's firmness, and affection's flame;
 Angels, ally'd, descend to feed the fire;
 And death, which others slays, makes him a god.
 And now, Lorenzo! bigot of this world!
 Wont to disdain poor bigots caught by heaven!
 Stand by thy scorn, and be reduc'd to nought:
 For what art thou!—Thou boaster! while thy glare,

Thy gaudy grandeur, and mere worldly worth,
 Like a broad mist, at distance, strikes us most;
 And like a mist, is nothing when at hand;
 His merit, like a mountain, on approach,
 Swells more, and rises nearer to the skies,
 By promise now, and by possession soon,
 (Too soon, too much, it cannot be) his own.

From this thy just annihilation rise,
 Lorenzo! rise to something, by reply.
 The world, thy client, listens, and expects;
 And longs to crown thee with immortal praise.
 Canst thou be silent? No; for wit is thine;
 And wit talks most, when least she has to say,
 And reason interrupts not her career.
 She'll say—That mists above the mountains rise;
 And, with a thousand pleasantries, amuse;
 She'll sparkle, puzzle, flutter, raise a dust,
 And fly conviction, in the dust she rais'd.

Wit, how delicious to man's dainty taste?
 'Tis precious, as the vehicle of sense;
 But, as its substitute, a dire disease.
 Pernicious, talent! flatter'd by the world,
 By the blind world, which thinks the talent rare.
 Wisdom is rare, Lorenzo! wit abounds;
Passion can give it; sometimes wine inspires
 The lucky flash; and madness rarely fails.
 Whatever cause the spirit strongly stirs,
 Confers the bays, and rivals thy renown.
 For thy renown, 't were well, was this the worst;
Chance often hits it; and, to pique the more,
 See dullness, blundering on vivacities,
 Shakes her sage head at the calamity,
 Which has expos'd, and let her down to thee.
 But wisdom, awful wisdom! which inspects,
 Discerns, compares, weighs, separates, infers,
 Seizes the right, and holds it to the last;
 How rare! in senates, synods, sought in vain;
 Or, if there found, 'tis sacred to the few;
 While a lewd prostitute to multitudes,
 Frequent, as fatal, wit: in civil life,
Wit makes an enterpriser; sense a man.
Wit hates authority; commotion loves,
 And thinks herself the lightning of the storm.
 In states, 'tis dangerous; in religion, death:
 Shall wit turn Christian, when the dull believes?
Sense is our helmet, wit is but the plume;
 The plume exposes, 'tis our helmet saves.
Sense is the diamond, weighty, solid, sound;
 When cut by wit, it casts a brighter beam;
 Yet, wit apart, it is a diamond still.
Wit, widow'd of good sense, is worse than nought;
 It hoists more sail to run against a rock.
 Thus, a half-Chesterfield is quite a fool;
 Whom dull fools scorn, and bless their want of wit.

How ruinous the rock I warn thee shun,
 Where Syrens sit, to sing thee to thy fate!
 A joy, in which our reason bears no part,
 Is but a sorrow tickling, ere it stings.
 Let not the cooings of the world allure thee;
 Which of her lovers ever found her true?
 Happy! of this bad world who little know?—
 And yet, we much must know her, to be safe.
 To know the world, not love her, is thy point;
 She gives but little, nor that little long.
 There is, I grant, a triumph of the pulse;
 A dance of spirits, a mere froth of joy,
 Our thoughtless agitation's idle child,
 That mantles high, that sparkles and expires,
 Leaving the soul more vapid than before.
 An animal ovation! such as holds
 No commerce with our reason, but subsists
 On juices, through the well-ton'd tubes, well
 strain'd;
 A nice machine! scarce ever tun'd aright;
 And when it jars—thy syrens sing no more,
 Thy dance is done; the demi-god is thrown (Short apotheosis!) beneath the man,
 In coward gloom immers'd, or fell despair.

Art thou yet dull enough despair to dread,
 And startle at destruction? If thou art,
 Accept a buckler, take it to the field;
 (A field of battle is this mortal life!)
 When danger threatens, lay it on thy heart;

A single sentence proof against the world;
 "Soul, body, fortune! Every good pertain
 To one of these; but prize not all alike;
 The goods of fortune to the body's health,
 Body to soul, and soul submit to God."
 Wouldst thou build lasting happiness? Do this;
 Th' inverted pyramid can never stand.
 Is this truth doubtful? it outshines the sun;
 Nay the sun shines not, but to show us this,
 The single lesson of mankind on earth.
 And yet—yet, what? No news! mankind is mad;
 Such mighty numbers list against the right,
 (And what can't numbers, when bewich'd achieve!)
 They talk themselves to something like belief,
 That all earth's joys are theirs: As Athens' fool
 Grinn'd from the port, on every sail his own.
 They grin; but wherefore? and how long the laugh!
 Half ignorance, their mirth; and half, a lie;
 To cheat the world, and cheat themselves, they smile.
 Hard either task! The most abandon'd own,
 That others, if abandon'd, are undone:
 Then for themselves, the moment reason wakes,
 (And Providence denies it long repose)
 O how laborious is their gaiety!
 They scarce can swallow their ebullient spleen,
 Scarce muster patience to support the farce,
 And pump sad laughter till the curtain falls.
 Scarce, did I say? Some cannot fit it out;
 Oft their own daring hands the curtain draw,
 And show us what their joy, by their despair.
 The clotted hair! gor'd breast! blaspheming
 eye!
 Its impious fury still alive in death!
 Shut, shut the shocking scene.—But heaven denies
 A cover to such guilt; and so should man.
 Look round, Lorenzo! see the reeking blade,
 Th' invenom'd phial, and the fatal ball;
 The strangling cord and suffocating stream;
 The loathsome rottenness, and foul decays
 From raging riot (flower suicides!)
 And pride in these, more execrable still!
 How horrid all to thought!—But horrors, these,
 That vouch the truth; and aid my feeble song.
 From vice, sense, fancy, no man can be blest:
 Bliss is too great, to lodge within an hour:
 When an immortal being aims at bliss,
 Duration is essential to the name.
 O for a joy from reason! Joy from that,
 Which makes man man; and, exercis'd aright,
 Will make him more: A bounteous joy! that gives,
 And promises; that weaves with art divine,
 The richest prospect into present peace:
 A joy ambitious! Joy in common held
 With thrones ethereal, and their greater far;
 A joy high-privileg'd from chance, time, death!
 A joy, which death shall double, judgment crown!
 Crown'd higher, and still higher, at each stage,
 Through blest eternity's long day: yet still,
 Not more remote from sorrow, than from him,
 Whose lavish hand, whose love stupendous, pours
 So much of Deity on guilty dust,

Where, O my Lucia! may I meet thee there,
 Where not thy presence can improve my bliss!
 Affects not this the sages of the world?
 Can nought affect them, but what fools them too?
 Eternity depending on an hour,
 Makes serious thought man's wisdom, joy, and praise.
 Nor need you blush (though sometimes your designs
 May shun the light) at your designs on heaven:
 Sole point! where ever-bashful is your blame.
 Are you not wise?—You know you are: Yet hear
 One truth, amid your numerous schemes, mislaid,
 Or overlook'd, or thrown aside, if seen;
 "Our schemes to plan by this world, or the next,
 "Is the sole difference between wise and fool."
 All worthy men will weigh you in this scale;
 What wonder, then, if they pronounce you light?
 Is their esteem alone not worth your care?
 Accept my simple scheme of common sense: [own.
 Thus, save your fame, and make two worlds your
 The world replies not;—but the world persists;
 And puts the cause off to the longest day,
 Planning evasions for the day of doom.
 So far, at that re-hearing, from redress,
 They then turn witnesses against themselves:
 Hear that, Lorenzo! nor be wise to-morrow,
 Haste, Haste! A man, by nature, is in haste;
 For who shall answer for another hour?
 'Tis highly prudent, to make one sure friend;
 And that thou canst not do, this side the skies.
 Ye sons of earth! (nor willing to be more!)
 Since verse you think from priestcraft somewhat
 free,
 Thus, in an age so gay, the muse plain truths (Truths, which, at church, you might have heard in prose)
 Has ventur'd into light; well-pleas'd the verse
 Should be forgot, if you the truths retain;
 And crown her with your welfare, not your praise.
 But praise she need not fear: I see my fate;
 And headlong leap, like Curtius, down the gulf.
 Since many an ample volume, mighty to me,
 Must die; and die unwept; O thou minute,
 Devoted page! go forth among thy foes;
 Go nobly proud of martyrdom for truth,
 And die a double death: mankind, incens'd,
 Denies thee long to live: nor shalt thou rest
 When thou art dead; in Stygian shades arraign'd
 By Lucifer, as traitor to his throne;
 And bold blasphemer of his friend—the world;
 The world, whose legions cost him slender pay,
 And volunteers around his banner swarm;
 Prudent, as Prussia, in her zeal for Gaul!
 "Are all, then, fools?" Lorenzo cries.—Yes, all,
 But such as hold this doctrine (new to thee);
 "The mother of true wisdom is the will;"
 The noblest intellect, a fool without it.
 World-wisdom much has done, and more may do,
 In arts and sciences, in wars and peace;
 But art and science, like thy wealth, will leave thee,
 And make thee twice a beggar at thy death.
 This is the most indulgence can afford;—
 "Thy wisdom all can do, but—make thee wise."
 Nor think this censure is severe on thee:
 Satan, thy master, I dare call a dunce.

NIGHT IX.

THE CONSOLATION.

Containing, among other things,

- I. A Moral Survey of the Nocturnal Heavens.
- II. A Night-Address to the Deity.

HUMBLY INSCRIBED TO HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE,

One of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State.

"—Fatis contraria fata rependens."—VIRG.

As when a traveller, a long day past
 In painful search of what he cannot find,
 At night's approach, content with the next cot,
 There ruminates a while his labour lost;
 Then cheers his heart with what his fate affords,
 And chaunts his sonnet to deceive the time,
 Till the due season calls him to repose:
 Thus I, long-travell'd in the ways of men,
 And dancing with the rest, the giddy maze,
 Where disappointment smiles at hope's career;
 Warn'd by the languor of life's evening ray,
 At length have hous'd me in an humble shed;
 Where future wandering banish'd from my thought,
 And waiting patient the sweet hour of rest,
 I chase the moments with a serious song.
 Song sooths our pains; and age has pains to sooth.
 When age, care, crime, and friends embrac'd at heart, [shade,
 Torn from my bleeding breast, and death's dark
 Which hovers o'er me, quench'd th' ethereal fire;
 Canst thou, O night! indulge one labour more?
 One labour more indulge! then sleep, my strain!
 Till haply wak'd by Raphael's golden lyre,
 Where night, death, age, care, crime, and sorrow,
 cease;
 To bear a part in everlasting lays;
 Though far, far higher set in aim I trust,
 Symphonious to this humble prelude here.
 Has not the muse asserted pleasures pure,
 Like those above; exploding other joys?
 Weigh what was urg'd, Lorenzo! fairly weigh;
 And tell me, hast thou cause to triumph still?
 I think thou wilt forbear a boast so bold.
 But if beneath the favour of mistake,
 Thy smile's sincere; not more sincere can be
 Lorenzo's smile, than my compassion for him.
 The sick in body call for aid; the sick
 In mind are covetous of more disease;
 And when at worst, they dream themselves quite well.
 To know ourselves diseas'd, is half our cure.
 When nature's blush by custom is wip'd off,
 And conscience, deaden'd by repeated strokes,
 Has into manners naturalis'd our crimes;
 The curse of curses is, our curse to love;
 To triumph in the blackness of our guilt
 (As Indians glory in the deepest jet),
 And throw aside our senses with our peace.
 But grant no guilt, no shame, no least alloy;
 Grant joy and glory quite unfully'd shone;
 Yet still it ill deserves Lorenzo's heart.

No joy, no glory, glitters in thy sight,
But through the thin partition of an hour,
I see its fables wove by destiny;
And that in sorrow bury'd; this in shame;
While howling furies ring the doleful knell;
And conscience, now so soft thou scarce canst hear
Her whisper, echoes her eternal peal.

Where the prime actors of the last year's scene;
Their port so proud, their buskin, and their plume?
How many sleep, who kept the world awake
With lustre, and with noise! has death proclaim'd
A truce, and hung his fated lance on high?
'Tis brandish'd still; nor shall the present year
Be more tenacious of her human leaf,
Or spread of feeble life a thinner fall.

But needless monuments to wake the thought;
Life's gayest scenes speak man's mortality;
Though in a style more florid, full as plain,
As mausoleums, pyramids, and tombs.

What are our noblest ornaments, but deaths
Turn'd flatterers of life, in paint or marble,
The well-stain'd canvas, or the featur'd stone?
Our fathers' grace, or rather haunt, the scene.
Joy peoples her pavilion from the dead.

"Profest diversions!—cannot these escape?"—
Far from it: these presents us with a shroud;
And talk of death, like garlands o'er a grave.
As some bold plunderers, for bury'd wealth,
We ransack tombs for pastime; from the dust
Call up the sleeping hero; bid him tread
The scene for our amusement: how like gods
We sit; and wrapt in immortality,
Shed generous tears on wretches born to die;
Their fate deploring, to forget our own!

What all the pomps and triumphs of our lives,
But legacies in blossom? Our lean soil,
Luxuriant grown, and rank in vanities,
From friends interr'd beneath; a rich manure!
Like other worms, we banquet on the dead;
Like other worms, shall we crawl on, nor know
Our present frailties, or approaching fate?

Lorenzo! such the glories of the world!
What is the world itself? *T*hy world—a grave.
Where is the dust that has not been alive?
The spade, the plough, disturb our ancestors;
From human mould we reap our daily bread.
The globe around earth's hollow surface shakes,
And is the cieling of her sleeping sons.
O'er devastation we blind revels keep;
Whole bury'd towns support the dancer's heel.
The moist of human frame the sun exhales;
Winds scatter through the mighty void the dry;
Earth repossesses part of what she gave,
And the freed spirit mounts on wings of fire;
Each element partakes our scatter'd spoils;
As nature wide our ruins spread: man's death
Inhabits all things, but the thought of man.

Nor man alone; his breathing bust expires,
His tomb is mortal; empires die: where now,
The Roman, Greek? They stalk, an empty name!
Yet few regard them in this useful light;
Though half our learning is their epitaph.
When down thy vale, unlock'd by midnight thought,
That loves to wander in thy sunless realms,
O death! I stretch my view; what visions rise!

What triumphs! toils imperial! arts divine!
In wither'd laurels glide before my sight!
What lengths of far-fam'd ages, billow'd high
With human agitation, roll along
In unsubstantial images of air!
The melancholy ghosts of dead renown,
Whispering faint echoes of the world's applause,
With penitential aspect as they pass,
All point at earth, and hiss at human pride,
The wisdom of the wise, and prancings of the great.

But, O Lorenzo! far the rest above,
Of ghastly nature, and enormous size,
One form assaults my sight, and chills my blood,
And shakes my frame. Of one departed world
I see the mighty shadow: oozy wreath
And dismal sea-weed crown her; o'er her urn
Reclin'd, she weeps her desolated realms,
And bloated sons; and, weeping, prophesies
Another's dissolution soon in flames.
But like Cassandra prophesies in vain;
In vain to many; not I trust to thee.

For know'st thou not, or art thou loth to know,
The great decree, the counsel of the skies?
Deluge and conflagration, dreadful powers!
Prime ministers of vengeance! chain'd in caves
Distinct, apart the giant furies roar;
Apart; or such their horrid rage for ruin,
In mutual conflict would they rise, and wage
Eternal war, till one was quite devour'd.
But not for this, ordain'd their boundless rage;
When heaven's inferior instruments of wrath,
War, famine, pestilence, are found too weak
To scourge a world for her enormous crimes,
These are let loose alternate: down they rush,
Swift and tempestuous, from th' eternal throne,
With irresistible commission arm'd,
The world, in vain corrected, to destroy,
And ease creation of the shocking scene.

Seest thou, Lorenzo! what depends on man?
The fate of nature; as for man her birth.
Earth's actors change earth's transitory scenes,
And make creation groan with human guilt.
How must it groan, in a new deluge whelm'd,
But not of waters! at the destin'd hour,
By the loud trumpet summon'd to the charge,
See all the formidable sons of fire,
Eruptions, earthquakes, comets, lightnings, play
Their various engines; all at once disgorge
Their blazing magazines; and take by storm
This poor terrestrial citadel of man.

Amazing period! when each mountain-height
Out-burns Vesuvius; rocks eternal pour
Their melted mafs, as rivers once they pour'd;
Stars rush; and final ruin fiercely drives
Her ploughshare o'er creation!—while aloft,
More than astonishment! if more can be!
Far other firmament than e'er was seen,
Than e'er was thought by man! far other stars!
Stars animate, that govern these of fire;
Far other sun!—A sun, O how unlike
The Babe at Beth'lem! how unlike the man
That groan'd on Calvary!—Yet be it is; [pomp!
That Man of Sorrows! O how chang'd! what
In grandeur terr'd, all heaven descends!
And gods ambitious, triumph in his train,

A swift archangel, with his golden wing,
As blots and clouds, that darken and disgrace
The scene divine, sweeps stars and suns aside,
And now all dross remov'd, heaven's own pure day,
Full on the confines of our ether flames.
While (dreadful contrast!) far, how far beneath!
Hell bursting, belches forth her blazing seas,
And storms sulphureous; her voracious jaws
Expanding wide, and roaring for her prey.

Lorenzo! welcome to this scene; the last
In nature's course; the first in wisdom's thought.
This strikes, if aught can strike thee; this awakes
The most supine; this snatches man from death.
Rouse, rouse, Lorenzo, then, and follow me,
Where truth, the most momentous man can hear,
Loud calls my soul, and ardour wings her flight.
I find my inspiration in my theme;
The grandeur of my subject is my muse.

At midnight, when mankind is wrapt in peace,
And worldly fancy feeds on golden dreams;
To give more dread to man's most dreadful hour,
At midnight, 'tis presum'd, this pomp will burst
From tenfold darkness; sudden as the spark
From smitten steel; from nitrous grain the blaze.
Man, starting from his couch, shall sleep no more!
The day is broke, which never more shall close!
Above, around, beneath, amazement all!
Terror and glory join'd in their extremes!
Our God in grandeur, and our world on fire!
All nature struggling in the pangs of death!
Dost thou not hear her? Dost thou not deplore
Her strong convulsions, and her final groan?
Where are we now? Ah me! the ground is gone
On which we stood; Lorenzo! while thou may'st,
Provide more firm support, or sink for ever!
Where? how? from whence? Vain hope! it is too late!

Where, where for shelter shall the guilty fly,
Where consternation turns the good man pale?

Great day! for which all other days were made;
For which earth rose from chaos, man from earth;
And an eternity, the date of gods,
Descended on poor earth-created man!
Great day of dread, decision, and despair!
At thought of thee, each sublunary wish
Lets go its eager grasp, and drops the world;
And catches at each reed of hope in heaven.
As thought of thee!—and art thou absent then?
Lorenzo! no; 'tis here; it is begun;—
Already is begun the grand assize,
In thee, in all; deputed conscience scales
The dread tribunal, and forestalls our doom;
Forestalls; and, by forestalling, proves it sure.
Why on himself should man void judgment pass?
Is idle nature laughing at her sons?
Who conscience sent, her sentence will support.
And God above assert that God in man.
Thrice happy they! that enter now the court
Heaven opens in their bosoms: but, how rare,
Ah me! that magnanimity, how rare!
What hero, like the man who stands himself;
Who dares to meet his naked heart alone;
Who hears intrepid, the full charge it brings,
Resolv'd to silence future murmurs there?
The coward flies; and flying, is undone.

(Art thou a coward? No :) The coward flies; Thinks, but thinks slightly; asks, but fears to know;

Asks, "What is truth?" with Pilate; and retires;
Dissolves the court, and mingles with the throng;
Asylum sad! from reason, hope, and heaven!

Shall all but man, look out with ardent eye,
For that great day, which was ordain'd for man?
O day of consummation! mark supreme
(If men are wise) of human thought! nor least,
Or in the sight of angels, or their King!

Angels, whose radiant circles, height o'er height,
Order o'er order, rising, blaze o'er blaze,
As in a theatre, surround this scene,
Intent on man, and anxious for his fate.

Angels look out for thee; for thee, their Lord,
To vindicate his glory; and for thee,
Creation universal calls aloud,
To disinvolve the moral world, and give
To nature's renovation brighter charms.

Shall man alone, whose fate, whose final fate,
Hangs on that hour, exclude it from his thought?
I think of nothing else; I see! I feel it!

All nature, like an earthquake, trembling round!

All deities, like summer's swarms, on wing!

All basking in the full meridian blaze!

I see the Judge enthron'd! the flaming guard!

The volume open'd! open'd every heart!

A sun-beam pointing out each secret thought

No patron! intercessor none! now past

The sweet, the clement, mediatorial hour!

For guilt no plea! to pain, no pause! no bound!

Inexorable all! and all, extreme!

Nor man alone; the foe of God and man,
From his dark den, blaspheming, drags his chain,
And rears his brazen front, with thunder scar'd:
Receives his sentence, and begins his hell.

All vengeance past, now, seems abundant grace:
Like meteors in a stormy sky, how roll

His baleful eyes; he curses whom he dreads;

And deems it the first moment of his fall.

'Tis present to my thought!—and yet where is it?

Angels can't tell me; angels cannot guess

The period; from created beings lock'd

In darkness. But the process, and the place,

Are less obscure; for these may man inquire.

Say, thou great close of human hopes and fears!

Great key of hearts! great finisher of fates!

Great end! and great beginning! say, Where art thou?

Art thou in time, or in eternity?

Nor in eternity, nor time, I find thee.

These, as two monarchs, on their borders meet,

(Monarchs of all elaps'd, or unarriv'd!)

As in debate, how best their powers ally'd,

May swell the grandeur, or discharge the wrath,

Of him, whom both their monarchies obey.

Time, this fast fabric for him built (and doom'd

With him to fall) now bursting o'er his head;

His lamp, the sun, extinguish'd; from beneath

The frown of hideous darkness, calls his sons

From their long slumber; from earth's heaving womb,

To second birth! contemporary throng!

Rous'd at one call, upstart from one bed,
 Prest in one crowd, appall'd with one amaze,
 He turns them o'er, Eternity! to thee.

Then (as a king depos'd disdains to live)
 He falls on his own scythe; nor falls alone;
 His greatest foe falls with him; time, and he
 Who murder'd all time's offspring, death, expire.

Time was! Eternity now reigns alone!
 Awful eternity! offended queen!
 And her resentment to mankind, how just!
 With kind intent, soliciting access,
 How often has she knock'd at human hearts!
 Rich to repay their hospitality,
 How often call'd! and with the voice of God!
 Yet bore repulse, excluded as a cheat!
 A dream! while foulest foes found welcome there!
 A dream, a cheat, now, all things, but her smile.

For, lo! her twice ten thousand gates thrown wide,
 As thrice from Indus to the frozen pole,
 With banners streaming as the comet's blaze,
 And clarions, louder than the deep in storms,
 Sonorous as immortal breath can blow,
 Pour forth their myriads, potentates, and powers,
 Of light, of darkness; in a middle field,
 Wide, as creation! populous, as wide!
 A neutral region! there to mark th' event
 Of that great drama, whose preceding scenes
 Detain'd them close spectators, through a length
 Of ages, ripening to this grand result;
 Ages, as yet unnumber'd, but by God;
 Who now pronouncing sentence, vindicates
 The rights of virtue, and his own renown.

Eternity, the various sentence past,
 Assigns the sever'd throng distinct abodes,
 Sulphureous, or ambrosial: What ensues?
 The deed predominant! the deed of deeds!
 Which makes a hell of hell, a heaven of heaven,
 The goddess, with determin'd aspect, turns
 Her adamant key's enormous size
 Through destiny's inextricable wards,
 Deep driving every bolt, on both their fates.
 Then, from the crystal battlements of heaven,
 Down, down, she hurls it through the dark pro-
 found,

Ten thousand thousand fathom; there to rust,
 And ne'er unlock her resolution more. [glooms,
 The deep resounds; and hell, through all her
 Returns, in groans, the melancholy roar.

O how unlike the chorus of the skies!
 O how unlike those shoats of joy, that shake
 The whole etereal! How the concave rings!
 Nor strange! when deities their voice exalt;
 And louder far, than when creation rose,
 To see creation's godlike aim, and end,
 So well accomplish'd! so divinely clos'd!
 To see the mighty dramatist's last act
 (As meet) in glory rising o'er the rest.
 No fancy'd god, a god indeed, descends,
 To solve all knots; to strike the moral home;
 To throw full day on darkest scenes of time;
 To clear, commend, exalt, and crown the whole.
 Hence, in one peal of loud, eternal praise,
 The charm'd spectators thunder their applause!
 And the vast void beyond, applause resounds.

What then am I?—

Amidst applauding worlds,
 And worlds celestial, is their found on earth,
 A peevish, dissonant, rebellious string,
 Which jars on the grand chorus, and complains?
Censure on thee, Lorenzo! I suspend,
 And turn it on myself; how greatly due!
 All, all is right; by God ordain'd or done;
 And who, but God, resum'd the friends he gave?
 And have I been complaining, then, so long?
Complaining of his favours, pain, and death?
 Who, without pain's advice, would e'er be good?
 Who, without death, but would be good in vain?
 Pain is to save from pain; all punishment,
 To make for peace; and death to save from death;
 And second death, to guard immortal life;
 To rouse the careless, the presumptuous awe,
 And turn the tide of souls another way;
 By the same tenderness divine ordain'd,
 That planted Eden, and high-bloom'd for man,
 A fairer Eden, endless, in the skies.

Heaven gives us friends to bless the present scene;
 Resumes them, to prepare us for the next.
 All evils natural are moral goods;
 All discipline, indulgence, on the whole.
 None are unhappy: all have cause to smile,
 But such as to themselves that cause deny.
 Our faults are at the bottom of our pains;
 Error, in acts, or judgment, is the source
 Of endless sighs: We sin, or we mistake;
 And nature tax, when false opinion stings.
 Let impious grief be banish'd, joy indulg'd;
 But chiefly then, when grief puts in her claim,
 Joy from the joyous, frequently betrays,
 Oft lives in vanity, and dies in woe.
 Joy, amidst ills, corroborates, exalts;
 'Tis joy and conquest; joy, and virtue too.
 A noble fortitude in ills, delights
 Heaven, earth, ourselves; 'tis duty, glory, peace.
Affliction is the good man's shining scene;
Prosperity conceals his brightest ray;
 As night to stars, rose lustre gives to man.
 Heroes in battle, pilots in the storm,
 And virtue in calamities, admire.
 The crown of manhood is a winter-joy;
 An evergreen, that stands the northern blast,
 And blossoms in the rigour of our fate.

'Tis a prime part of happiness, to know
 How much unhappiness must prove our lot;
 A part which few possess! I'll pay life's tax,
 Without one rebel murmur, from this hour,
 Nor think it misery to be a man;
 Who thinks it is, shall never be a god.
 Some ills we wish for, when we wish to live.

What spoke proud passion?—"With my being lost?"

Presumptuous! blasphemous! absurd! and false!
 The triumph of my soul is—I that I am;
 And therefore that I may be—what? Lorenzo!
 Look inward, and look deep; and deeper still;
 Unfathomably deep our treasure runs
 In golden veins, through all eternity!
 Ages, and ages, and succeeding still

* Referring to the First Night.

New ages, where the phantom of an hour,
Which courts, each night, dull slumber, for repair,
Shall wake, and wonder, and exult, and praise.
And fly through infinite, and all unlock;
And (if deserv'd) by heaven's redundant love,
Made half adorable itself, adore;
And find, in adoration, endless joy!
Where thou, not master of a moment here,
Frail as the flower, and fleeting as the gale,
May'st boast a whole eternity, enrich'd
With all a kind Omnipotence can pour.
Since Adam fell, no mortal, uninspir'd,
Has ever yet conceiv'd, or ever shall,
How kind is God, how great (if good) is man.
No man too largely from heaven's love can hope,
If what is hop'd he labours to secure.

Ills?—there are none:—All-gracious! none from thee;

From man full many! numerous is the race
Of blackest ill, and those immortal too,
Begot by madness on fair liberty;
Heaven's daughter, hell-debauch'd! her hand alone
Unlocks destruction to the sons of men,
First barr'd by thine: high-wall'd with adamant,
Guarded with terrors reaching to this world,
And cover'd with the thunders of thy law;
Whose threats are mercies, whose injunctions, guides,
Assisting, not restraining, reason's choice;
Whose sanctions, unavoidable results
From nature's course, indulgently reveal'd;
If unreveal'd, more dangerous, nor less sure.
Thus, an indulgent father warns his sons,
"Do this; fly that"—nor always tells the cause;
Pleas'd to reward, as duty to his will,
A conduct needful to their own repose.
Great God of wonders! (if, thy love survey'd, Aught else the name of wonderful retains)
What rocks are these, on which to build our trust!
Thy ways admit no blemish; none I find;
Or this alone—"That none is to be found."
Not one, to soften censure's hardy crime;
Not one, to palliate peevish grief's complaint,
Who like a demon, murmuring from the dust,
Dares into judgment call her Judge.—Supreme!
For all I bless thee; most, for the severe;
* Her death—my own at hand—the fiery gulf,
That flaming bound of wrath omnipotent!
It thunders;—but it thunders to preserve;
It strengthens what it strikes; its wholesome dread
Averts the dreaded pain; its hideous groans
Join heaven's sweet hallelujahs in thy praise,
Great source of good alone! How kind in all!
In vengeance kind! pain, death, gehenna, save.

Thus, in thy world material, mighty mind!
Not that alone which solaces, and shines,
The rough and gloomy, challenges our praise.
The winter is as needful as the spring;
The thunder, as the sun; a stagnate mass
Of vapours breeds a pestilential air:
Nor more propitious the Favonian breeze
To nature's health, than purifying storms;
The dread volcano ministers to good.
Its smother'd flames might undermine the world.

* Lucia.

Loud Ætnas fulminate in love to man;
Comets good omens are, when duly scann'd;
And in their use, eclipses learn to shine.

Man is responsible for ills receiv'd;
Those we call wretched are a chosen band,
Compell'd to refuge in the right, for peace.
Amid my list of blessings infinite,
Stand this the foremost. "That my heart has bled."
'Tis heaven's last effort of good-will to man;
When pain can't bless, heaven quits us in despair.
Who fails to grieve, when just occasion calls,
Or grieves too much, deserves not to be blest;
Inhuman, or effeminate, his heart;
Reason absolves the grief, which reason ends.
May heaven ne'er trust my friend with happiness,
Till it has taught him how to bear it well,
By previous pain; and made it safe to smile!
Such smiles are mine, and such may they remain;
Nor hazard their extinctions, from excess.
My change of heart a change of style demands;
The consolation cancels the complaint,
And makes a convert of my guilty song.
And when o'er-labour'd, and inclin'd to breathe,
A panting traveller some rising ground,
Some small ascent, has gain'd, he turns him round,
And measures with his eye the various vales,
The fields, woods, meads, and rivers, he has past;
And, satiate of his journey, thinks of home,
Endear'd by distance, nor affects more toil;
Thus I, though small, indeed, is that ascent
The muse has gain'd, review the paths she trod;
Various, extensive, beaten but by view;
And, conscious of her prudence in repose,
Pause; and with pleasure meditate an end,
Though still remote; so fruitful is my theme,
Through many a field of moral, and divine,
The muse has stray'd; and much of sorrow seen
In human ways; and much of false and vain;
Which none who travel this bad road, can miss.
O'er friends deceas'd full heartily she wept;
Of love divine the wonders she display'd;
Prov'd man immortal; show'd the source of joy;
The grand tribunal rais'd; assign'd the bounds
Of human grief: in few, to close the whole,
The moral muse has shadow'd out a sketch,
Though not in form, nor with a Raphael-stroke,
Of most our weakness needs believe, or do,
In this our land of travel and of hope,
For peace on earth, or prospect of the skies. [debt
What then remains? Much! much! a mighty
To be discharg'd: these thoughts, O night! are thine;

From thee they came, like lovers secret sighs,
While others slept. So Cynthia (poets feign)
In shadows veil'd, soft sliding from her sphere,
Her shepherd cheer'd; of her enamour'd less,
Than I of thee.—And art thou still unsung,
Beneath whose brow, and by whose aid, I sing?
Immortal silence! where shall I begin?
Where end? Or how steal music from the spheres,
To sooth their goddess?

O majestic night!
Nature's great ancestor! day's elder-born!
And fated to survive the transient sun!
By mortals, and immortals, seen with awe!

A starry crown thy raven brow adorns,
 An azure zone thy waist; clouds, in heaven's loom
 Wrought through varieties of shape and shade,
 In ample folds of drapery divine, [out,
 Thy flowing mantle form; and heaven through-
 Voluminously pour thy pompous train.
 Thy gloomy graudeurs (nature's most august,
 Inspiring aspect!) claim a grateful verse;
 And, like a sable curtain starr'd with gold,
 Drawn o'er my labours past, shall close the scene.

And what, O man! so worthy to be sung?
 What more prepares us for the songs of heaven?
Creation, of archangels is the theme!
 What, to be sung, so needful? What so well
 Celestial joys prepare us to sustain!
 The soul of man, his face design'd to see
Who gave these wonders to be seen by man,
 Has here a previous scene of objects great,
 On which to dwell; to stretch to that expanse
 Of thought, to rise to that exalted height
 Of admiration, to contract that awe,
 And give her whole capacities that strength,
 Which best may qualify for final joy.

The more our spirits are enlarg'd on earth,
 The deeper draught shall they receive of heaven.

Heaven's King! whose face unveil'd consum-
 mates bliss;

Redundant bliss! which fills that mighty void,
 The whole creation leaves in human hearts!
 Thou, who didst touch the lip of Jesse's son,
 Rapt in sweet contemplation of these fires,
 And set his harp in concert with the spheres;
 While of thy works material the supreme
 I dare attempt, assist my daring song,
 Loose me from earth's enclosure, from the sun's
Contracted circle set my heart at large;
 Eliminate my spirit, give it range
 Through provinces of thought yet unexplor'd;
 Teach me, by this stupendous scaffolding,
 Creation's golden steps, to climb to thee.
 Teach me with art great nature to controul,
 And spread a lustre o'er the shades of night.
 Feel I thy kind assent? and shall the sun
 Be seen at midnight, rising in my song?

Lorenzo! come, and warm thee: thou whose heart,

Whose little heart is moor'd within a nook
 Of this obscure terrestrial, anchor weigh.
 Another ocean calls, a nobler port;
 I am thy pilot, I thy prosperous gale.
 Gainful thy voyage through yon azure main;
 Main, without tempest, pirate, rock, or shore;
 And whence thou may'st import eternal wealth;
 And leave to beggar'd minds the pearl and gold,
 Thy travels dost thou boast o'er foreign realms?
 Thou stranger to the world! thy tour begin:
 Thy tour through nature's universal orb.
Nature delineates her whole chart at large,
 On soaring souls, that sail among the spheres;
 And man how purblind, if unknown the whole!
 Who circles spacious earth, then travels here,
 Shall own he never was from home before!
 Come, my * Prometheus, from thy pointed rock

* Night VIII.

Of false ambition if unchain'd, we'll mount;
 We'll innocently steal celestial fire,
 And kindle our devotion at the stars;
 A theft that shall not chain but set thee free.

Above our atmosphere's intestine wars,
 Rain's fountain head, the magazine of hail;
 Above the northern nests of feather'd snows,
 The brew of thunders, and the flaming forge
 That forms the crooked lightning; above the caves

Where infant tempests wait their growing wings,
 And tune their tender voices to that roar,
 Which soon, perhaps, shall shake a guilty world;
 Above misconstrued omens of the sky,
 Far-travell'd comets calculated blaze;
 Elance thy thought, and think of more than man.
 Thy soul, till now contracted, wither'd, shrunk,
 Blighted by blasts of earth's unwholesome air,
 Will blossom here; spread all her faculties
 To these bright ardours; every power unfold,
 And rise into sublimities of thought.

Stars teach as well as shine. At nature's birth,
 Thus their commission ran—"Be kind to man."
 Where art thou, poor benighted traveller!
 The stars will light thee; though the moon should fail.

Where art thou more benighted! more astray!
 In ways immortal? The stars call thee back;
 And, if obey'd their counsel, set thee right.

This prospect vast, what is it?—Weigh'd aright
 'Tis nature's system of divinity,
 And every student of the night inspires.
 'Tis elder scripture, writ by God's own hand:
 Scripture authentic! uncorrupt by man.
 Lorenzo! with my radius (the rich gift
 Of thought nocturnal!) I'll point out to thee
 Its various lessons; some that may surprise
 An unadept in mysteries of night;
 Little, perhaps, expected in her school,
 Nor thought to grow on planet, or on star.
 Bulls, lions, scorpions, monsters here we reign;
 Ourselves more monstrous, not to see what here
 Exists indeed;—a lecture to mankind.

What read we here?—Th' existence of a God?
 Yes; and of other beings, man above;
 Natives of ether! Sons of higher climes!
 And, what may move Lorenzo's wonder more,
 Eternity is written in the skies.
 And whose eternity?—Lorenzo! thine;
 Mankind's eternity. Nor faith alone,
 Virtue grows here; here springs the sovereign cure
 Of almost every vice; but chiefly thine;
Wrath, pride, ambition, and impure desire.

Lorenzo! thou canst wake at midnight too,
 Though not on morals bent: Ambition, pleasure &
 Those tyrants I for thee so lately fought,
 Afford their harass'd slaves but slender rest.
 Thou to whom midnight is immoral noon,
 And the sun's noon-tide blaze, prime dawn of day;
 Not by thy climate, but capricious crime,
 Commencing one of our Antipodes!
 In thy nocturnal rove, one moment halt,
 'Twixt stage and stage, of riot, and cabal;

* Night VIII.

And lift thine eye, (if bold an eye to lift,
If bold to meet the face of injur'd heaven)
To yonder stars: For other ends they shine,
'Than to light revellers from shame to shame,
And thus be made accomplices in guilt.

Why from yon arch, that infinite of space,
With infinite of lucid orbs replete,
Which set the living firmament on fire,
At the first glance, in such an overwhelm
Of wonderful on man's astonish'd sight,
Rushes Omnipotence?—To curb our pride;
Our reason rouse, and lead it to that power,
Whose love lets down these silver chains of light;
To draw up man's ambition to himself,
And bind our chaste affections to his throne.
Thus the three virtues, least alive on earth,
And welcom'd on heaven's coast with most applause,

An umble, pure, and heavenly-minded heart,
Are here inspir'd:—And canst thou gaze too long?

Nor stands thy wrath, depriv'd of its reproof,
Or unupbraided by this radiant choir.

The planets of each system represent
Kind neighbours; mutual amity prevails;
Sweet interchange of rays, receiv'd, return'd;
Enlightening and enlighten'd! All, at once
Attracting, and attracted! Patriot-like,
None sins against the welfare of the whole;
But their reciprocal, unselfish aid,
Affords an emblem of millennial love.

Nothing in nature, much less conscious being,
Was e'er created solely for itself:

Thus man his sovereign duty learns in this Material picture of benevolence.

And know, of all our supercilious race,
Thou most inflammable! Thou wasp of men!
Man's angry heart, inspected, would be found
As rightly set, as are the starry spheres;
'Tis nature's structure, broke by stubborn will,
Breeds all that uncelestial discord there.
Wilt thou not feel the bias nature gave?
Canst thou descend from converse with the skies
And seize thy brother's throat?—For what—a clod,

An inch of earth? The planet's cry, "Forbear,"
They chase our double darkness; nature's gloom,
And (kinder still!) our intellectual night.

And see, day's amiable sister sends
Her invitation in the softest rays
Of mitigated lustre; courts thy sight,
Which suffers from her tyrant brother's blaze.
Night grants thee the full freedom of the skies,
Nor rudely reprimands thy lifted eye;
With gain and joy she bribes thee to be wise.
Night opes the noblest scenes, and sheds an awe,
Which gives those venerable scenes full weight,
And deep reception in th' intender'd heart;
While light peeps through the darkness like a spy;
And darkness shows its grandeur by the light.
Nor is the profit greater than the joy,
If human hearts at glorious objects glow,
And admiration can inspire delight.

What speak I more than I this moment feel;
With pleasing stupor first the soul is struck
(Stupor ordained to make her truly wise!)

Then into transport starting from her trance,
With love and admiration, how she glows!
This gorgeous apparatus! This display!
This ostentation of creative power!
This theatre!—what eye can take it in?
By what divine enchantment was it rais'd,
For minds of the first magnitude to launch
In endless speculation, and adore?
One sun by day, by night ten thousand shine:
And light us deep into the Deity;
How boundless in magnificence and might!
O what a confluence of ethereal fires,
Form urns unnumbered, down the steep of heaven,
Streams to a point, and centres in my sight!
Nor tarries there; I feel it at my heart.
My heart at once it humbles and exalts;
Lays it in dust, and calls it to the skies.
Who sees it unexalted? or unaw'd?
Who sees it, and can stop at what is seen?
Material offspring of Omnipotence!
Inanimate, all-animating birth!
Work worthy him who made it! worthy praise!
All praise! praise more than human! nor deny'd Thy praise divine!—But though man drown'd in sleep,

Withholds his homage, not alone I wake;
Bright legions swarm unseen, and sing unheard
By mortal ear, the glorious Architect,
In this his universal temple hung
With lustres, with innumerable lights,
That shed religion on the soul; at once
The temple and the preacher! O how loud
It calls devotion! genuine growth of night!

Devotion! daughter of astronomy!
An undevout astronomer is mad.
True; all things speak a God; but in the small,
Men trace out him; in great, he seizes man;
Seizes, and elevates, and wraps, and fills
With new inquiries, 'mid associates new.
Tell me, ye stars! ye planets! tell me, all
Ye starr'd, and planeted, inhabitants! What is it?
What are these sons of wonder? Say, proud arch,
(Within whose azure palaces they dwell)
Built with divine ambition! in disdain
Of limit built! built in the taste of heaven!
Vast concave! ample dome! wast thou design'd?
A meet apartment for the Deity?—
Not so; that thought alone thy state impairs,
Thy lofty sinks, and shallows thy profound,
And straightens thy diffusive; dwarfs the whole,
And makes an universe an orrery.

But when I drop mine eye, and look on man,
Thy right regain'd, thy grandeur is restor'd,
O Nature! wide flies off the expanding round.
As when whole magazines at once are fir'd,
The smitten air is hollow'd by the blow;
The vast dislosion dissipates the clouds;
Shock'd ether's billows dash the distant skies;
Thus (but far more) th' expanding round flies off,
And leaves a mighty void, a spacious womb,
Might teem with new creation; re-inflam'd
Thy luminaries triumph, and assume Divinity themselves. Nor was it strange,
Matter high-wrought to such surprising pomp,
Such godlike glory, stole the style of gods,

From ages dark, obtuse, and steep'd in sense;
 For, sure to sense they truly are divine;
 And half absolv'd idolatry from guilt;
 Nay, turn'd it into virtue. Such it was
 In those, who put forth all they had of man
 Unlost, to lift their thought, nor mounted higher;
 But, weak of wings, on planets perch'd; and thought
 What was their highest, must be their ador'd.

But they how weak, who could no higher mount?
 And are there, then, Lorenzo! Those, to whom
 Unseen, and unexistent, are the same?
 And if incomprehensible is join'd,
 Who dare pronounce it madness, to believe?
 Why has the mighty Builder thrown aside
 All measure in his work; stretch'd out his line
 So far, and spread amazement o'er the whole?
 Then (as he took delight in wide extremes),
 Deep in the bosom of his universe,
 Dropt down that reasoning mite, that insect, man,
 To crawl and gaze, and wonder at the scene?—
 That man might ne'er presume to plead amazement

For disbelief of wonders in himself.
 Shall God be less miraculous, than what
 His hand has form'd? Shall mysteries descend
 From un-mysterious? Things more elevate,
 Be more familiar? Uncreated lie
 More obvious than created, to the grasp
 Of human thought? The more of wonderful
 Is heard in him, the more we should assent.
 Could we conceive him, God he could not be;
 Or he not God, or we could not be men.
 A God alone can comprehend a God;
Man's distance how immense! On such a theme,
 Know this, Lorenzo! (seem it ne'er so strange)
 Nothing can satisfy but what confounds;
 Nothing but what astonishes is true.
 The scene thou seest, attests the truth I sing,
 And every star sheds light upon thy creed.
 These stars, this furniture, this coast of heaven,
 If but reported, thou hadst ne'er believ'd;
 But thine eye tells thee the romance is true.
 The grand of nature is th' Almighty's oath,
 In reason's court, to silence unbelief.

How my mind, opening at this scene, imbibes
 The moral emanations of the skies,
 While nought, perhaps, Lorenzo less admires!
 Has the Great Sovereign sent ten thousand worlds
 To tell us, he resides above them all,
 In glory's unapproachable recess?
 And dare earth's bold inhabitants deny
 The sumptuous, the magnificent embassy
 A moment's audience? Turn we, nor will hear
 From whom they come, or what they would impart

For man's emolument; sole cause that stoops
 Their grandeur to man's eye? Lorenzo! rouse;
 Let thought, awaken'd, take the lightning's wing,
 And glance from east to west, from pole to pole.
 Who sees, but is confounded, or convinc'd?
 Renounces reason, or a God adores?
 Mankind was sent into the world to see:
 Sight gives the science needful to their peace;
 That obvious science asks small learning's aid,
 Wouldst thou on metaphysic pinions soar?

Or wound thy patience amid logic thorns?
 Or travel history's enormous round?
 Nature no such hard task enjoins: She gave
 A make to man directive of his thought;
 A make set upright, pointing to the stars,
 As who shall say, "Read thy chief lesson there."
 Too late to read this manuscript of heaven,
 When like a parchment scroll, shrunk up by flames,
 It folds Lorenzo's lesson from his sight.

Lesson how various! Not the God alone,
 I see his ministers; I see, diffus'd
 In radiant orders, essences sublime,
 Of various offices, of various plume,
 In heavenly liveries, distinctly clad,
 Azure, green, purple, pearl, or downy gold,
 Or all commix'd; they stand, with wings out-
 spread,

Listening to catch the master's least command,
 And fly through nature, ere the moment ends;
 Numbers innumerable!—Well conceiv'd
 By Pagan, and by Christian! O'er each sphere
 Presides an angel, to direct its course,
 And feed, or fan, its flames; or to discharge
 Other high trusts unknown. For who can see
 Such pomp of matter, and imagine, mind,
 For which alone inanimate was made,
 More sparingly dispens'd? That nobler son,
 Far liker the great fire!—'Tis thus the skies
 Inform us of superiors numberless,
 As much, in excellence, above mankind,
 As above earth, in magnitude, the spheres.
 These, as a cloud of witnesses, hang o'er us;
 In a throng'd theatre are all our deeds;
 Perhaps, a thousand demigods descend
 On every beam we see, to walk with men,
 Awful reflection! Strong restraint from ill!

Yet, here, our virtue finds still stronger aid
 From these ethereal glories sense surveys.
 Something, like magic, strikes from this blue vault;
 With just attention is it view'd? We feel
 A sudden succour, unimplor'd, unthought;
 Nature herself does half the work of man.
 Seas, rivers, mountains, forests, deserts, rocks,
 The promontory's height, the depth profound
 Of subterranean, excavated grotts,
 Black brow'd, and vaulted high, and yawning wide
 From nature's structure, or the scoop of time;
 If ample of dimension, vast of size,
 Ev'n these an aggrandizing impulse give;
 Of solemn thought enthusiastic heights
 Ev'n these infuse.—But what of vast in these?
 Nothing;—or we must own the skies forgot.
 Much less in art!—Vain art! Thou pigmy power!
 How dost thou swell and strut, with human pride,
 To show thy littleness! What childish toys,
 Thy watery columns squirted to the clouds!
 Thy bason'd rivers, and imprison'd seas!
 Thy mountains moulded into forms of men!
 Thy hundred-gated capitals! or those
 Where three days travel left us much to ride;
 Gazing on miracles by mortals wrought,
 Arches triumphal, theatres immense,
 Or nodding girdens pendent in mid-air!
 Or temples proud to meet their gods half-way!
 Yet these effect us in no common kind,

What then the force of such superior scenes?
 Enter a temple, it will strike an awe:
 What awe from this the Deity has built?
 A good man seen, though silent, counsel gives;
 The touch'd spectator wishes to be wise:
 In a bright mirror his own hands have made,
Here we see something like the face of God.
 Seems it not then enough, to say, Lorenzo!
 To man abandon'd, "Hast thou seen the skies?"

And yet, so thwarted nature's kind design
 By daring man, he makes her sacred awe
 (That guard from ill) his shelter, his temptation
 To more than common guilt, and quite inverts
 Celestial art's intent. The trembling stars
 See crimes gigantic, stalking through the gloom
 With front erect, that hide their head by day,
 And making night still darker by their deeds.
 Slumbering in covert, till the shades descend,
Rapine and murder, link'd, now prowl for prey.
 The miser earths his treasure; and the thief,
 Watching the mole, half-beggars him ere morn.
 Now plots, and foul conspiracies, awake;
 And, muffling up their horrors from the moon,
 Havock and devastation they prepare,
 And kingdoms tottering in the field of blood.
 Now sons of riot in mid-revel rage.
 What shall I do!—Suppress it? or proclaim?—
 Why sleeps the thunder? Now, Lorenzo! now,
 His best friend's couch the rank adulterer
 Ascends secure; and laughs at gods and men.
 Preposterous madmen, void of fear or shame,
 Lay their crimes bare to these chaste eyes of heaven;
 Yet shrink, and shudder, at a mortal's sight.
 Were moon, and stars, for villains only made?
 To guide, yet screen them, with tenebrious light?
 No; they were made to fashion the sublime
 Of human hearts, and wiser make the wife.

Those ends were answer'd once; when mortals liv'd
 Of stronger wing, of aquiline ascent
 In theory sublime. O how unlike.
 Those vermin of the night, this moment sung,
 Who crawl on earth, and on her venom feed!
 Those ancient fages, human stars! They met
 Their brothers of the skies, at midnight hour;
 Their counsel ask'd; and, what they ask'd obey'd.
 The Stagirite, and Plato, he who drank
 The poison'd bowl, and he of Tuscum,
 With him of Corduba (immortal names!)
 In these unbounded, and Elysian, walks,
 An area fit for gods and godlike men, [paths
 They took their nightly round, through radiant
 By seraphs trod; instructed, chiefly, thus,
 To tread in their bright footsteps here below;
 To walk in worth still brighter than the skies.
 There they contracted their contempt of earth;
 Of hopes eternal kindled, there, the fire;
 There, as in near approach, they glow'd and grew
 (Great visitants!) more intimate with God,
 More worth to men, more joyous to themselves.
 Through various virtues, they, with ardour, ran
 The zodiac of their learn'd, illustrious lives.

In Christian hearts, O for a Pagan zeal!
 A needful, but apprehensive prayer! as much

Our ardour less, as greater is our light.
 How monstrous this in morals! Scarce more strange
 Would this phenomenon in nature strike,
 A sun, that froze her, or a star, that warm'd.
 What taught these heroes of the moral world?
 To these thou giv'st thy praise, give credit too.
 These doctors ne'er were pension'd to deceive thee;
 And Pagan tutors are thy taste.—They taught,
 That, narrow views betray to misery:
 That, wise it is to comprehend the whole:
 That, virtue, rose from nature, ponder'd well,
 The single base of virtue built to heaven:
 That God, and nature, our attention claim:
 That, nature is the glass reflecting God,
 As, by the sea, reflected is the sun,
 Too glorious to be gaz'd on in his sphere:
 That, mind immortal loves immortal aims:
 That, boundless mind affects a boundless space:
 That vast surveys, and the sublime of things,
 The soul assimilate, and make her great:
 That, therefore, heaven her glories, as a fund
 Of inspiration, thus spreads out to man,
 Such are their doctrines; such the night inspir'd.

And what more true? What truth of greater weight?

The soul of man was made to walk the skies;
 Delightful outlet of her prison here!
 There, disincumber'd from her chains, the ties
 Of toys terrestrial, she can rove at large,
 There, freely can respire, dilate, extend,
 In full proportion let loose all her powers;
 And, undeluded, grasp at something great.
 Nor, as a stranger, does she wander there;
 But, wonderful herself, through wonder strays;
 Contemplating their grandeur, finds her own;
 Dives deep in their economy divine,
 Sits high in judgment on their various laws,
 And, like a master, judges not amiss.
 Hence greatly pleas'd, and justly proud, the soul
 Grows conscious of her birth celestial; breathes
 More life, more vigour, in her native air;
 And feels herself at home amongst the stars;
 And, feeling, emulates our country's praise.

What call we, then, the firmament, Lorenzo!
 As earth the body, since, the skies sustain
 The soul with food, that gives immortal life,
 Call it, the noble pasture of the mind;
 Which there expatiates, strengthens, and exults,
 And riots through the luxuries of thought.
 Call it, the garden of the Deity,
 Blossom'd with stars, redundant in the growth
 Of fruit ambrosial; moral fruit to man.
 Call it, the breast-plate of the true high-priest,
 Ardent with gems oracular, that give,
 In points of highest moment, right response;
 And ill neglected, if we prize our peace.

Thus, have we found a true astrology;
 Thus have we found a new, and noble sense,
 In which alone stars govern human fates.
 O that the stars (as some have feign'd) let fall
 Bloodshed, and havock, on embattled realms,
 And rescued monarchs from so black a guilt!
 Bourbon! this wish how generous in a foe!
 Wouldst thou be great, wouldst thou become a god,
 And stick thy deathless name among the stars,

For mighty conquests on a needle's point?
 Instead of forging chains for foreigners,
Baffle thy tutor: Grandeur all thy aim?
 As yet thou know'st not what it is: how great,
 How glorious, then, appears the mind of man,
 When in it all the stars, and planets, roll!
 And what it seems, it is: Great objects make Great minds, enlarging as their views enlarge;
Those still more godlike, as these more divine.

And more divine than these, thou canst not see.
 Dazzled, o'er-power'd, with the delicious draught
 Of miscellaneous splendors, how I reel
 From thought to thought, inebriate, without end!
 An Eden, this! a Paradise unlost!
 I meet the Deity in every view,
 And tremble at my nakedness before him!
 O that I could but reach the tree of life!
 For here it grows, unguarded from our taste;
 No flaming sword denies our entrance here;
 Would man but gather, he might live for ever.

Lorenzo! much of moral hast thou seen.
 Of curious arts art thou more fond? Then mark
 The mathematic glories of the skies,
 Its number, weight, and measure, all ordain'd.
 Lorenzo's boasted builders, chance and fate,
 Are left to finish his aerial towers;
Wisdom and choice, their well-known characters
Here deep impress; and claim it for their own.
 Though splendid all, no splendor void of use;
Use rivals beauty; art contends with power;
 No wanton waste, amid effuse expence;
 The great economist adjusting all
 To prudent pomp, magnificently wise.
 How rich the prospect! and for ever new!
 And newest to the man that views it most;
 For newer still infinite succeeds.
 Then, these aerial racers, O how swift!
 How the shaft loiters from the strongest string!
Spirit alone can distance the career.
 Orb above orb ascending without end!
 Circle in circle, without end, enclos'd!
 Wheel, within wheel; Ezekiel! like to thine!
 Like thine, it seems a vision or a dream;
 Though seen, we labour to believe it true!
 What involution! what extent! what swarms
 Of worlds, that laugh at earth! immensely great!
 Immensely distant from each other's spheres!
 What, then, the wondrous space through which they roll?

At once it quite ingulfs all human thought;
 'Tis comprehension's absolute defeat.

Nor think thou see'st a wild disorder here;
 Through this illustrious chaos to the sight,
 Arrangement neat, and chastest order, reign.
 The path prescrib'd, inviolably kept,
 Upbraids the lawless sallies of mankind.
 Worlds, ever thwarting, never interfere;
 What knots are ty'd! How soon are they dissolv'd
 And set the seeming marry'd planets free!
 They rove for ever, without error rove;
 Confusion unconfus'd! nor less admire
 This tumult untumultuous; all on wing!
 In motion, all! yet what profound repose!
 What fervid action, yet no noise! as aw'd
 To silence, by the presence of their Lord;

VOL. X.

Or hush'd by his command, in love to man,
 And bid let fall soft beams on human rest,
 Restless themselves. On yon cerulean plain,
 In exultation to their God and thine,
 They dance, they sing eternal jubilee,
 Eternal celebration of his praise,
 But, since their song arrives not at our ear,
 Their dance perplex'd exhibits to the sight
 Fair hieroglyphic of his peerless power.
 Mark, how the labyrinthian turns they take,
 The circles intricate, and mystic maze,
 Weave the grand cypher of Omnipotence:
 To gods, how great! how legible to man!

Leaves so much wonder greater wonder still?
 Where are the pillars that support the skies?
 What more than Atlantean shoulder props
 Th' incumbent load? what magic, what strange art,
 In fluid air these ponderous orbs sustains?
 Who would not think them hung in golden chains?—

And so they are; in the high will of heaven,
 Which fixes all; makes adamant of air,
 Or air of adamant; makes all of nought,
 Or nought of all; if such the dread decree.

Imagine from their deep foundations torn
 The most gigantic sons of earth, the broad
 And towering Alps, all tost into the sea;
 And, light as down, or volatile as air,
 Their bulks enormous, dancing on the waves,
 In time, and measure, exquisite; while all
 The winds, in emulation of the spheres,
 Tune their sonorous instruments aloft;
 The concert swell, and animate the ball.
 Would this appear amazing? What, then, worlds
 In a far thinner element sustain'd,
 And acting the same part, with greater skill,
 More rapid movement, and for noblest ends?

More obvious ends to pass, are not these stars
 The seats majestic, proud imperial thrones,
 On which angelic delegates of heaven,
 At certain periods, as the sovereign nods,
 Discharge high trusts of vengeance, or of love;
 To clothe, in outward grandeur, grand design,
 And acts most solemn still more solemnize?
 Ye citizens of air! what ardent thanks,
 What full effusion of the grateful heart,
 Is due from man indulg'd in such a sight!
 A sight so noble! and a sight so kind!
 It drops new truths at every new survey!
 Feels not Lorenzo something stir within,
 That sweeps away all period? As these spheres
 Measure duration, they no less inspire
 The godlike hope of ages without end. [take
 The boundless space, through which these rovers
 Their restless roam, suggests the sifter thought
 Of boundless time. Thus, by kind nature's skill,
 To man unlabour'd, that important guest,
 Eternity, finds entrance at the sight:
 And an eternity, for man ordain'd,
 Or these his destin'd midnight counsellors,
 The stars, had never whisper'd it to man.
 Nature informs, but ne'er insults her sons.
 Could she then kindle the most ardent wish
 To disappoint it!—That is blasphemy.
 Thus, of thy creed a second article;

Momentous, as the existence of a God,
Is found (as I conceive) where rarely fought;
And thou may'st read thy soul immortal, here.

Here, then, Lorenzo! on these glories dwell;
Nor want the gilt-illuminated roof.
That calls the wretched gay to dark delights.
Assemblies?—This is one divinely bright;
Here, unendanger'd in health, wealth, or fame,
Range through the fairest, and the sultan scorn.
He, wise as thou, no crescent holds so fair,
As that, which on his turban awes a world;
And thinks the moon is proud to copy him.
Look on her, and gain more than worlds can give,
A mind superior to the charms of power.

Thou muffled in delusions of this life!
Can yonder moon turn ocean in his bed,
From side to side, in constant ebb and flow,
And purify from stench his watery realms?
And fails her moral influence? wants she power
To turn Lorenzo's stubborn tide of thought
From stagnating on earth's infected shore,
And purge from nuisance his corrupted heart?
Fails her attraction when it draws to heaven?
Nay, and to what thou valuest more, earth's joy!
Minds elevate, and panting for unseen,
And defecate from sense, alone obtain
Full relish of existence un-deflower'd,
The life of life, the zest of worldly blis:
All else on earth amounts—to what? To this:
“Bad to be suffer'd; blessings to be left:”
Earth's richest inventory boasts no more.

Of higher scenes be, then, the call obey'd.
O let me gaze!—of gazing there is no end.
O let me think!—Thought too is wilder'd here;
In mid-way flight imagination tires;
Yet soon re-prunes her wing to soar anew,
Her point unable to forbear, or gain;
So great the pleasure, so profound the plan!
A banquet, this, where men and angels meet,
Eat the same manna, mingle earth and heaven.
How distant some of these nocturnal suns!
So distant (says the sage), 'twere not absurd
To doubt, if beams, set out at nature's birth,
Are yet arriv'd at this so foreign world;
Though nothing half so rapid as their flight.
An eye of awe and wonder let me roll,
And roll for ever: who can satiate sight
In such a scene? in such an ocean wide
Of deep astonishment? where depth, height, breadth,

Are lost in their extremes; and where to count
The thick-fown glories in this field of fire,
Perhaps a seraph's computation fails.
Now, go, ambition! boast thy boundless might
In conquest o'er the tenth-part of a grain.

And yet Lorenzo calls for miracles,
To give his tottering faith a solid base.
Why call for less than is already thine?
Thou art no novice in theology;
What is a miracle?—'Tis a reproach,
'Tis an implicit satire on mankind;
And while it satisfies, it condemns too.
To common sense, great nature's course proclaims
A Deity; when mankind falls asleep,
A miracle is sent, as an alarm;

To wake the world, and prove him o'er again,
By recent argument, but not more strong.
Say, which imports more plentitude of power,
Or nature's laws to fix, or to repeal?
To make a sun, or stop his mid career?
To countermand his orders, and send back
The flaming courier to the frightened east,
Warm'd, and astonish'd, at his evening ray?
Or bid the moon, as with her journey tir'd,
In Ajalon's soft flowery vale repose?
Great things are these; still greater to create.
From Adam's bower look down through the whole train

Of miracles;—resistless is their power?
They do not, can not, more amaze the mind,
Than this, call'd unmiraculous survey,
If duly weigh'd, if rationally seen,
If seen with human eyes. The brute, indeed,
Sees nought but spangles here; the fool no more.
Say'st thou, “The course of nature governs all?”
The course of nature is the art of God.
The miracles thou call'st for, this attest;
For say, could nature nature's course controul?
But, miracles apart, whose sees him not,
Nature's controller, author, guide, and end!
Who turns his eye on nature's midnight face,
But must inquire—“What hand behind the scene,
“What arm Almighty, put these wheeling globes
“In motion, and wound up the vast machine?
“Who rounded in his palm these spacious orbs?
“Who bow'd them flaming through the dark pro“found,

“Numerous as glittering gems of morning dew,
“Or sparks from populous cities in a blaze,
“And set the bosom of old night on fire?
“Peopled her desert, and made horror smile?”
Or, if the military style delights thee, [man]
(For stars have fought their battles leagu'd with “Who marshals this bright host? enrolls their “names?

“Appoints their post, their marches, and returns
“Punctual at stated periods? who disbands
“These veteran troops, their final duty done,
“If e'er disbanded?”—He, whose potent word,
Like the loud trumpet, levy'd first their powers
In night's inglorious empire, where they slept
In beds of darkness: arm'd them with fierce flames,

Arrang'd, and disciplin'd, and cloth'd in gold;
And call'd them out of chaos to the field,
Where now they war with vice and unbelief.
O let us join this army! joining these,
Will give us hearts intrepid, at that hour,
When brighter flames shall cut a darker night;
When these strong demonstrations of a God
Shall hide their heads, or tumble from their spheres,
And one eternal curtain cover all!

Struck at that thought, as new awak'd, I lift
A more enlighten'd eye, and read the stars
To man still more propitious; and their aid
(Though guiltless of idolatry) implore;
Nor longer rob them of their noblest name.
O yedivers of my time! Ye bright
Accountants of my days, and mouths, and years,
In your fair kalendar distinctly mark'd!

Since that authentic, radiant register, [him;
Though man inspects it not, stands good against Since you, and years, roll on, though man stands still;

Teach me my days to number, and apply
My trembling heart to wisdom; now beyond
All shadow of excuse for fooling on.
Age smooths our path to prudence; sweeps aside
The snares keen appetite, and passion spread
To catch stray souls; and woe to that gray head,
Whose folly would undo what age has done!
Aid then, aid, all ye stars!—Much rather, thou,
Great Artist! Thou, whose finger set aright
This exquisite machine, with all its wheels,
Though intervolv'd, exact; and pointing out
Life's rapid and irrevocable flight,
With such an index fair as none can miss,
Who lifts an eye, nor sleeps till it is clos'd.
Open mine eye, dread Deity! to read
The tacit doctrine of thy works; to see
Things as they are, unalter'd through the glass
Of worldly wishes. Time, eternity!
(Tis these, mis-measur'd, ruin all mankind)
Set them before me; let me lay them both
In equal scale, and learn their various weight.
Let time appear a moment, as it is;
And let eternity's full orb, at once,
Turn on my soul, and strike it into heaven.
When shall I see far more than charms me now?
Gaze on creation's model in thy breast
Unveil'd, nor wonder at the transcript more?
When this vile foreign dust, which smothers all
That travel earth's deep vale, shall I shake off?
When shall my soul her incarnation quit,
And re-adopted to thy blest embrace,
Obtain her apotheosis in thee?

Dost think, Lorenzo, this is wandering wide?
No, 'tis directly striking at the mark;
To wake thy dead devotion was my point;
And how I bless night's consecrating shades,
Which to a temple turn an universe;
Fill us with great ideas, full of heaven,
And antidote the pestilential earth!
In every storm, that either frowns, or falls,
What an asylum has the soul in prayer!
And what a fane is this, in which to pray!
And what a God must dwell in such a fane!
O what a genius must inform the skies!
And is Lorenzo's salamander heart
Cold, and untouch'd, amid these sacred fires?
O ye nocturnal sparks! ye glowing embers,
On heaven's broad hearth! who burn, or burn
no more,

Who blaze, or die, as Great Jehovah's breath
Or blows you, or forbears: assist my song;
Pour your whole influence; exercise this heart,
So long possess'd; and bring him back to man.
And is Lorenzo a demurer still?
Pride in thy parts provokes thee to contest
Truths, which, contested, put thy parts to shame.
Nor shame they more Lorenzo's head than heart,
A faithless heart, how despicably small!
Too straight, ought great, or generous, to receive!
Fill'd with an atom: fill'd, and foul'd with self!
And self-mistaken! self, that lasts an hour!

Instincts and passions, of the nobler kind,
Lie suffocated there; or they alone,
Reason apart, would wake high hope; and open,
To ravish'd thought, that intellectual sphere,
Where order, wisdom, goodness, providence,
Their endless miracles of love display,
And promise all the truly great desire.
The mind that would be happy, must be great;
Great, in its wishes; great in its surveys.
Extended views a narrow mind extend;
Push out its corrugate, expansive make,
Which, ere long, more than planets shall embrace.
A man of compass makes a man of worth;
Divine contemplate, and become divine.

As man was made for glory, and for bliss,
All littleness is in approach to woe;
Open thy bosom, set thy wishes wide,
And let in manhood; let in happiness;
Admit the boundless theatre of thought
From nothing, up to God; which makes a man.
Take God from nature, nothing great is left;
Man's mind is in a pit, and nothing sees;—
Man's heart is in a jakes, and loves the mire.
Emerge from thy profound; erect thine eye;
See thy distress! how close thou art besieg'd!
Besieg'd by nature, the proud sceptic's foe!
Enclos'd by these innumerable worlds,
Sparkling conviction on the darkest mind,
As in a golden net of providence.
How art thou caught, sure captive of belief!
From this thy blest captivity, what art,
What blasphemy to reason sets thee free!
This scene is heaven's indulgent violence:
Canst thou bear up against this tide of glory?
What is earth bosom'd in these ambient orbs,
But faith in God impos'd, and press'd on man?
Dar'st thou still litigate thy desperate cause,
Spite of these numerous, awful, witnesses,
And doubt the deposition of the skies?
O how laborious is thy way to ruin!

Laborious! 'tis impracticable quite;
To sink beyond a doubt, in this debate,
With all his weight of wisdom and of will,
And crime flagitious, I defy a fool.
Some with they did; but no man disbelieves.
God is a Spirit; Spirit cannot strike
These gross, material organs; God by man
As much is seen, as man a God can see,
In these astonishing exploits of power.
What order, beauty, motion, distance, size;
Conception of design, how exquisite!
How complicate, in their divine police!
Apt means! great ends! consent to general good!
Each attribute of these material gods,
So long (and that with specious pleas) ador'd,
A separate conquest gains o'er rebel thought;
And leads in triumph the whole mind of man.

Lorenzo! this may seem barangue to thee;
Such all is apt to seem, that thwarts our will.
And dost thou, then, demand a simple proof
Of this great master moral of the skies,
Unskill'd, or disinclin'd, to read it there?
Since 'tis the basis, and all drops without it,
Take it, in one compact, unbroken chain.
Such proof insists on an attentive ear;

"I will not make one amid a mob of thoughts,
And, for thy notice, struggle with the world.
Retire;—the world shut out;—thy thoughts call home;—

Imagination's airy wing repress;—
Lock up thy senses;—let no passion stir;—
Wake all to reason;—let her reign alone;
Then, in thy soul's deep silence, and the depth
Of nature's silence, midnight, thus inquire,
As I have done; and shall inquire no more.
In nature's channel, thus the questions run.

"What am I? and from whence?—I nothing
know,

"But that I am; and, since I am, conclude
"Something eternal: had there e'er been nought,
"Nought still had been: eternal there must be.—
"But what eternal?—Why not human race?
"And Adam's ancestor's without an end?—
"That's hard to be conceiv'd; since every link
"Of that long-chain'd succession is so frail;
"Can every part depend, and not the whole?
"Yet grant it true; new difficulties rise;
"I'm still quite out at sea; nor see the shore.
"Whence earth, and these bright orbs?—Eternal
"too?

"Grant matter was eternal; still these orbs
"Would want some other father;—much design
"Is seen in all their motions, all their makes;
"Design implies intelligence, and art;
"That can't be from themselves—or man; that art
"Man scarce can comprehend, could man bestow?
"And nothing greater yet allow'd than man.—
"Who, motion, foreign to the smallest grain,
"Shot through vast masses of enormous weight?
"Who bid brute matter's restive lump assume
"Such various forms, and gave it wings to fly?
"Has matter innate motion? then each atom,
"Asserting its indisputable right
"To dance, would form an universe of dust:
"Has matter none? Then whence these glorious
"forms

"And boundless flights, from shapeless, and repos'd?
"Has matter more than motion? has it thought,
"Judgment, and genius? is it deeply learn'd
"In mathematics? Has it fram'd such laws,
"Which but to guess, a Newton made immortal?—
"If so, how each sage atom laughs at me,
"Who think a clod inferior to a man!
"If art, to form; and counsel to conduct;
"And that with greater far, than human skill;
"Resides not in each block;—a Godhead reigns.—
"Grant, then, invisible, eternal, mind;
"That granted, all is solv'd—But, granting that,
"Draw I not o'er me a still darker cloud?
"Grant I not that which I can ne'er conceive?
"A being without origin, or end!—
"Hail, human liberty! There is no God—
"Yet, why? on either scheme that knot subsists;
"Subsist it must, in God, or human race;
"If in the last, how many knots beside,
"Indissoluble all?—Why choose it there,
"Where, chosen, still subsist ten thousand more?
"Reject it, where, that chosen, all the rest
"Dispers'd leave reason's whole horizon clear;
"This is not reason's dictate; reason says,

"Close with the side where one grain turns the scale;
"What vast preponderance is here! can reason
"With louder voice exclaim---Believe a God?
"And reason heard, is the sole mark of man.
"What things impossible must man think true,
"On any other system! and how strange
"To disbelieve, through mere credulity!"
If, in this chain, Lorenzo finds no flaw,
Let it for ever bind him to belief.
And where the link, in which a flaw he finds?
And, if a God there is, that God how great!
How great that power, whose providential care
Through these bright orbs, dark centres darts a ray!

Of nature universal threads the whole!
And hangs creation, like a precious gem,
Though little, on the footstool of his throne!
That little gem, how large! a weight let fall
From a fixt star, in ages can it reach
This distant earth? Say, then, Lorenzo! where,
Where, ends this mighty building? Where, begin
The suburbs of creation? Where, the wall
Whose battlements look o'er into the vale
Of non-existence? Nothing's strange abode!
Say, at what point of space Jehovah dropp'd
His slacken'd line, and laid his balance by;
Weigh'd worlds, and measur'd infinite, no more!
Where rears his terminating pillar high
Its extra-mundane head? and says, to gods,
In characters illustrious as the sun,
"I stand, the plan's proud period; I pronounce
"The work accomplish'd; the creation clos'd;
"Shout, all ye gods! nor shout ye gods alone;
"Of all that lives, or, if devoid of life,
"That rests, or rolls, ye heights, and depths re-
sound!
"Resound! resound! ye depths, and heights, re-
sound!"

Hard are those questions;—Answer harder still.
Is this the sole exploit, the single birth,
The solitary son of power divine?
Or has th' Almighty Father, with a breath,
Impregnated the womb of distant space?
Has he not bid, in various provinces,
Brother-creations the dark bowels burst
Of night primeval; barren, now, no more?
And be the central sun, transpiercing all
Those giant generations, which disport,
And dance, as motes, in his meridian ray;
That ray withdrawn, benighted, or absorb'd
In that abyss of horror, whence they sprung;
While chaos triumphs, repossess'd of all
Rival creation ravish'd from his throne?
Chaos! of nature both the womb and grave!
Think'st thou my scheme, Lorenzo, spreads too wide?

Is this e. extravagant?—No; this is just;
Just in conjecture, though 't were false in fact.
If 'tis an error, 'tis an error sprung
From noble root, high thought of the Most High.
But wherefore error? who can prove it such?—
He that can set Omnipotence a bound.
Can man conceive beyond what God can do?
Nothing but quite impossible is hard.
He summons into being with like ease,

A whole creation, and a single grain.
Speaks he the word? a thousand worlds are born!
A thousand worlds? there's space for millions
more;

And in what space can his great fiat fail?
Condemn me not, cold critic! but indulge
The warm imagination: why condemn?
Why not indulge such thoughts, as swell our hearts
With fuller admiration of that power, [swell?
Who gives our hearts with such high thoughts to
Why not indulge in his augmented praise?
Darts not his glory a still brighter ray,
The less is left to chaos, and the realms
Of hideous night, where fancy strays aghast;
And, though most talkative, makes no report?

Still seems my thought enormous? Think again;
Experience self shall aid thy lame belief.
Glasses (that revelation to the sight!)
Have they not led us in the deep disclose
Of fine spun nature, exquisitely small,
And, though demonstrated, still ill-conceiv'd?
If then, on the reverse, the mind would mount
In magnitude; what mind can mount too far,
To keep the balance, and creation poise?
Defect alone can err on such a theme;
What is too great, if we the cause survey?
Stupendous Architect! thou, thou art all!
My soul flies up and down in thoughts of thee,
And finds herself but at the centre still!
I Am, thy name! existence, all thine own!
Creation's nothing; flatter'd much, if styl'd
"The thin, the fleeting atmosphere of God."

O for the voice—of what? of whom?—What voice

Can answer to my wants, in such ascent,
As dares to deem one universe too small?
Tell me, Lorenzo! (for now fancy glows, Fir'd in the vortex of Almighty power)
Is not this home creation, in the map
Of universal nature, as a speck,
Like fair Britannia in our little ball;
Exceeding fair and glorious for its size,
But, elsewhere, far outmeasur'd, far outshone?
In fancy (for the fact beyond us lies)
Canst thou not figure it, an isle, almost Too small for notice, in the vast of being;
Sever'd by mighty seas of unbuilt space
From other realms; from ample continents
Of higher life, where nobler natives dwell;
Less northern, less remote from deity,
Glowing beneath the line of the Supreme;
Where souls in excellence make haste, put forth,
Luxuriant growths; nor the late autumn wait
Of human worth, but ripen soon to gods?

Yet why drown fancy in such depths as these?
Return, presumptuous rover! and confess
The bounds of man; nor blame them, as too small.
Enjoy we not full scope in what is seen?
Full ample the dominions of the sun!
Full glorious to behold! how far, how wide,
The matchless monarch, from his flaming throne,
Lavish of lustre, throws his beams about him,
Farther and faster than a thought could fly,
And seeds his planets with eternal fires!
This Heliopolis, by greater far,

Than the proud tyrant of the Nile was built;
And he alone, who built it, can destroy.
Beyond this city, why strays human thought?
One wonderful, enough for man to know!
One infinite! enough for man to range!
One firmament, enough for man to read!
O what voluminous instruction here!
What page of wisdom is deny'd him? None;
If learning his chief lesson makes him wise.
Nor is instruction here our only gain;
There dwells a noble patbos in the skies,
Which warms our passions, proselytes our hearts,
How eloquently shines the glowing pole!
With what authority it gives its charge,
Remonstrating great truths in style sublime,
Though silent, loud! heard earth around; above
The planets heard; and not unheard in hell;
Hell has her wonder, though too proud to praise.
Is earth, then, more infernal? has she those,
Who neither praise (Lorenzo) nor admire?

Lorenzo's admiration, pre-engag'd,
Ne'er ask'd the moon one question; never held
Least correspondence with a single star;
Ne'er rear'd an altar to the queen of heaven
Walking in brightness; or her train ador'd.
Their sublunary rivals long have since
Engross'd his whole devotion; stars malign,
Which made the fond astronomer run mad;
Darken his intellect, corrupt his heart;
Cause him to sacrifice his fame and peace
To momentary madness, call'd delight.
Idolater, more gross than ever kiss'd
The lifted hand to Luna, or pour'd out
The blood to Jove!—O thou, to whom belongs
All sacrifice! O thou great Jove unfeign'd;
Divine Instructor! Thy first volume, this,
For man's perusal; all in capitals!
In moon, and stars (heaven's golden alphabet!)
Emblaz'd to seize the sight; who runs, may read;
Who reads, can understand. 'Tis unconfin'd,
To Christian land, or Jewry; fairly writ,
In language universal, to mankind:
A language, lofty to the learn'd: yet plain
To those that feed the flock, or guide the plough,
Or, from his husk, strike out the bounding grain.
A language, worthy the great mind, that speaks:
Preface, and comment, to the sacred page!
Which oft refers its reader to the skies,
As pre-supposing his first lesson there,
And scripture self a fragment, that unread.
Stupendous book of wisdom, to the wise;
Stupendous book! and open'd, night! by thee.

By thee much open'd, I confess, O night!
Yet more I wish; but how shall I prevail?
Say, gentle night! whose modest, maiden beams
Give us a new creation, and present
The world's great picture soften'd to the sight;
Nay, kinder far, far more indulgent still,
Say, thou, whose mild dominion's silver key
Unlocks our hemisphere, and sets to view
Worlds beyond number; worlds conceal'd by day
Behind the proud, and envious star of noon!
Canst thou not draw a deeper scene?—And show
The mighty Potentate, to whom belong
These rich regalia pompously display'd

To kindle that high hope? Like him of Uz,
 I gaze around; I search on every side—
 O for a glimpse of him my soul adores!
 As the chas'd hart, amid the desert waste, [her,
 Pants for the living stream; for him who made
 So pants the thirsty soul, amid the blank
 Of sublunary joys. Say, goddess! where?
 Where blazes his bright court? Where burns his throne? [round
 Thou know'st; for thou art near him; by thee,
 His grand pavilion, sacred fame reports
 The sable curtain drawn. If not, can none
 Of thy fair daughter-train, so swift of wing,
 Who travel far, discover where he dwells?
 A star his dwelling pointed out below.
 Ye Pleiades! Arcturus! Mazaroth!
 And thou, Orion! of still keener eye!
 Say ye, who guide the wilder'd in the waves,
 And bring them out of tempest into port!
 On which hand must I bend my course to find him?
 These courtiers keep the secret of their king;
 I wake whole nights, in vain, to steal it from them.
 I wake; and, waking, climb night's radiant scale,
 From sphere to sphere; the steps by nature set
 For man's ascent; at once to tempt and aid;
 To tempt his eye, and aid his towering thought;
 Till it arrives at the great God of all.
 In ardent contemplation's rapid car,
 From earth, as from my barrier, I set out.
 How swift I mount! diminish'd earth recedes;
 I pass the moon; and, from her farther side,
 Pierce heaven's blue curtain; strike into remote;
 Where, with his lifted tube, the subtle sage
 His artificial, airy journey takes,
 And to celestial lengthens human sight,
 I pause at every planet on my road,
 And ask for him who gives their orbs to roll,
 Their foreheads fair to shine. From Saturn's ring,
 In which, of earths an army might be lost,
 With the bold comet, take my bolder flight,
 Amid those sovereign glories of the skies,
 Of independent, native lustre, proud;
 The souls of systems! and the lords of life, [now?
 Through their wide empires!—What behold I
 A wilderness of wonder burning round;
 Where larger suns inhabit bigger spheres;
 Perhaps the villas of descending gods.
 Nor halt I here; my toil is but begun;
 'Tis but the threshold of the Deity;
 Or, far beneath it, I am groveling still.
 Nor is it strange; I built on a mistake;
 The grandeur on his works, whence folly sought
 For aid, to reason sets his glory higher; [him)
 Who built thus high for worms (mere worms to O where, Lorenzo! must the builder dwell?
 Pause, then; and, for a moment, here respire—
 If human thought can keep its station here.
 Where am I!—Where is earth?—Nay, where art
 thou,
 O sun?—Is the sun turn'd recluse?—And are
 His boasted expeditions short to mine?—
 To mine, how short! On nature's Alps I stand,
 And see a thousand firmaments beneath!
 A thousand systems: as a thousand grains!

So much a stranger, and so late arriv'd,
 How can man's curious spirit not inquire,
 What are the natives of this world sublime,
 Of this so foreign, un-terrestrial sphere,
 Where mortal, untranslated, never stray'd?
 "O ye, as distant from my little home,
 "As swiftest sun-beams in an age can fly!
 "Far from my native element I roam,
 "In quest of new, and wonderful, to man.
 "What province this, of his immense domain,
 "Whom all obeys? or mortals here, or gods?
 "Ye borderers on the coasts of bliss! what are "you?
 "A colony from heaven? Or, only rais'd,
 "By frequent visit from heaven's neighbouring
 "realms,
 "To secondary gods, and half divine?—
 "Whate'er your nature, this is past dispute,
 "Far other life you live, far other tongue
 "You talk, far other thought, perhaps, you think,
 "Than man. How various are the works of God,
 "But say, what thought? is reason here inthron'd!
 "And absolute? or sense in arms against her?
 "Have you two lights? or need you no reveal'd?
 "Enjoy your happy realms their golden age?
 "And had your Eden an abstemious Eve?
 "Our Eve's fair daughters prove their pedigree,
 "And ask their Adams—"Who would not be
 "wife?"
 "Or, if your mother fell, are you redeem'd?
 "And if redeem'd—is your Redeemer scorn'd?
 "Is this your final residence? if not,
 "Change you your scene, translated? or by death?
 "And if by death; what death?—Know you dis-
 "ease?"
 "Or horrid war?—With war, this fatal hour,
 "Europa groans (so call we a small field,
 "Where kings run mad) In our world, death
 "deputes
 "Intemperance to do the work of age;
 "And hanging up the quiver nature gave him,
 "As slow of execution, for dispatch
 "Sends forth imperial butchers; bids them slay
 "Their sheep (the silly sheep they sheec'd before),
 "And toss him twice ten thousand at a meal.
 "Sit all your executioners on thrones?
 "With you, can rage for plunder make a god?
 "And bloodshed wash out every other stain?—
 "But you, perhaps, can't bleed: from matter
 "gross
 "Your spirits clean, are delicately clad
 "In fine-spun ether, privileg'd to soar,
 "Unloaded, uninfected; how unlike
 "The lot of man! How few of human race
 "By their own mad unmurder'd! How we wage
 "Self-war eternal! Is your painful day
 "Of hardy conflict o'er? Or, are you still "Raw candidates at school? And have you those "Who disaffect reversions, as with us?
 "But what are we? You never heard of man;
 "Or earth, the bedlam of the universe!
 "Where reason (un-diseas'd with you) runs mad,
 "And nurses folly's children as her own;
 "Fond of the foulest. In the sacred mount
 "Of boliness, where reason is pronounc'd

" Infallible; and thunders, like a god;
 " Ev'n there, by saints, the demons are outdone;
 " What these think wrong, our saints refine to " right;
 " And kindly teach dull hell her own black arts;
 " Satan, instructed, o'er their morals smiles.—
 " But this, how strange to you, who know not
 " man!

" Has the least rumour of our race arriv'd?
 " Call'd here Elijah in his flaming car?
 " Past by you the good Enoch, on his road
 " To those fair fields, whence Lucifer was hurl'd;
 " Who brush'd, perhaps, your sphere in his de-
 " scent,
 " Stain'd your pure crystal ether, or let fall
 " A short eclipse from his portentous shade?
 " O! that the fiend had lodg'd on some broad orb
 " Athwart his way; nor reach'd his present home,
 " Then blacken'd earth with footsteps foul'd in
 " hell,

" Nor wash'd in ocean, as from Rome he past
 " To Britain's isle; too, too, conspicuous there?"
 But this is all digression; where is he,
 That o'er heaven's battlements the felon hurl'd
 To groans, and chains, and darkness? Where is he,
 Who sees creation's summit in a vale?
 He, whom, while man is man, he can't but seek;
 And if he finds, commences more than man?
 O for a telescope his throne to reach!
 Tell me, ye learn'd on earth! or blest above!
 Ye searching, ye Newtonian angels! tell,
 Where, your great Master's orb? His planets, where?

Those conscious satellites, those morning-stars,
 First-born of Deity! from central love,
 By veneration most profound, thrown off;
 By sweet attraction, no less strongly drawn;
Aw'd, and yet raptur'd; raptur'd, yet serene;
 Past thought illustrious, but with borrow'd beams;
 In still approaching circles, still remote,
 Revolving round the sun's eternal fire?
 Or sent, in lines direct, on embassies
 To nations—in what latitude?—Beyond
 Terrestrial thought's horizon!—And on what
 High errands sent?—Here human effort ends;
 And leaves me still a stranger to his throne.

Full well it might! I quite mistook my road.
 Born in an age more curious than devout;
 More fond to fix the place of heaven, or hell,
 Than studious this to shun, or that secure.
 'Tis not the curious, but the pious path,
 That leads me to my point: Lorenzo! know,
 Without or star, or angel, for their guide,
 Who worship God, shall find him. Humble love,
 And not proud reason, keeps the door of heaven;
 Love finds admission, where proud science fails.
 Man's science is the culture of his heart;
 And not to lose his plummet in the depths
 Of nature, or the more profound of God.
 Either to know, is an attempt that sets
 The wisest on a level with the fool.
 To fathom nature (ill-attempted here!)
 Past doubt is deep philosophy above;
 Higher degrees in bliss archangels take,
 As deeper learn'd; the deepest, learning still,

For, what a thunder of Omnipotence
 (So might I dare to speak) is seen in all!
 In man! in earth! in more amazing skies!
 Teaching this lesson, pride is loth to learn—
 " Not deeply to discern, not much to know,
 " Mankind was born to wonder, and adore."
 And is there cause for higher wonder still,
 Than that which struck us from our past surveys?
 Yes; and for deeper adoration too.
 From my late airy travel unconfin'd,
 Have I learn'd nothing?—Yes, Lorenzo! This;
 Each of these stars is a religious house;
 I saw their altars smoke, their incense rise;
 And heard hossannas ring through every sphere,
 A seminary fraught with future gods.
 Nature all o'er is consecrated ground,
 Teeming with growths immortal and divine.
 The Great Proprietor's all-bounteous hand
 Leaves nothing waste; but sows these fiery fields
 With seeds of reason, which to virtues rise
 Beneath his genial ray; and, if escap'd
 The pestilential blasts of stubborn will,
 When grown mature, are gather'd for the skies.
 And is devotion thought too much on earth,
 When beings, so superior, homage best,
 And triumph in prostration to the throne?

But wherefore more of planets, or of stars?
 Ethereal journeys, and, discover'd there,
 Ten thousand worlds, ten thousand ways devout,
 All nature sending incense to the throne,
 Except the bold Lorenzos of our sphere?
 Opening the solemn sources of my soul,
 Since I have pour'd, like feign'd Eridanus,
 My flowing numbers o'er the flaming skies,
 Nor see, of fancy, or of fact, what more
 Invites the muse—Here turn we, and review
 Our past nocturnal landscape wide:—Then say,
 Say, then, Lorenzo! with what burst of heart,
 The whole, at once, revolving in his thought,
 Must man exclaim, adoring, and aghast?
 " O what a root! O what a branch, is here!
 " O what a father! What a family! [tions,
 " Worlds! systems! and creations!—And crea-
 " In one agglomerated cluster, hung, [hangs;
 " * Great Vine! On thee, on thee the cluster
 " The filial cluster! infinitely spread
 " In glowing globes, with various being fraught;
 " And drinks (nectareous draught!) immortal
 " life.

" Or, shall I say (for who can say enough?)
 " A constellation of ten thousand gems,
 " And, O! of what dimension! of what weight!
 " Set in one signet, flames on the right hand
 " Of Majesty Divine! The blazing seal,
 " That deeply stamps, on all created mind,
 " Indelible, his sovereign attributes,
 " Omnipotence, and love! That, passing bound:
 " And this, surpassing that. Nor stop we here,
 " For want of power in God, but thought in man.
 " Ev'n this acknowledg'd, leaves us still in debt:
 " If greater aught, that greater all is thine,
 " Dread fire!—Accept this miniature of thee;
 " And pardon an attempt from mortal thought,

* John xv. i.

"In which archangels might have fail'd, un-
"blam'd."

How such ideas of th' Almighty's power,
And such ideas of th' Almighty's plan,
(Ideas not absurd) distend the thought
Of feeble mortals! Nor of them alone!
The fulness of the Deity breaks forth
In inconceivables to men, and gods.
Think, then, O think; nor ever drop the thought;
How low must man descend, when gods adore!
Have I not, then, accomplish'd my proud boast?
Did I not tell thee, "We would mount, Lo-
"renzo!"

"And kindle our devotion at the stars?"
And have I fail'd? And did I flatter thee?
And art all adamant? And dost console
All urg'd, with one irrefragable smile?
Lorenzo! mirth how miserable here!
Swear by the stars, by him who made them, swear,
'Thy heart, henceforth, shall be as pure as they:
Then thou, like them, shalt shine; like them, shalt rise

From low to lofty; from obscure to bright;
By due gradation, nature's sacred law.
The stars, from whence?—Ask Chaos—He can tell.
These bright temptations to idolatry,
From darkness, and confusion, took their birth;
Sons of Deformity: from fluid dregs
Tartarean first they rose to masses rude,
And then to spheres opaque, then dimly shone,
Then brighten'd, then blaz'd out in perfect day.
Nature delights in progress; in advance
From worse to better; but, when minds ascend,
Progress in part depends upon themselves.
Heaven aids exertion; greater makes the great;
The voluntary little lessens more.
O be a man: and thou shalt be a god!
And half self-made:—Ambition how divine!

O thou, ambitious of disgrace alone!
Still undevout? unkindled?—Though high taught,
School'd by the skies, and pupil of the stars,
Rank coward to the fashionable world!
Art thou asham'd to bend thy knee to heaven?
Curst fume of pride, exhal'd from deepest hell!
Pride in religion is man's highest praise.
Bent on destruction! and in love with death!
Not all these luminaries, quench'd at once,
Were half so sad as one benighted mind,
Which gropes for happiness, and meets despair.
How, like a widow in her weeds, the night,
Amid her glimmering tapers, silent sits!
How sorrowful, how desolate, she weeps
Perpetual dews, and saddens nature's scene!
A scene more sad sin makes the darken'd soul,
All comfort kills, nor leaves one spark alive.

Though blind of heart, still open is thine eye:
Why such magnificence in all thou seest?
Of matter's grandeur, know one end is this,
To tell the rational, who gazes on it—
"Though that immensely great, still greater be,
"Whose breast, capacious, can embrace, and lodge,
"Unburden'd, nature's universal scheme;
"Can grasp creation with a single thought;
"Creation grasp, and not exclude its fire."—
To tell him farther—"It behoves him much

"To guard th' important, yet depending, fate
"Of being, brighter than a thousand suns:
"One single ray of thought outshines them all."—
And if man hears obedient, soon he'll soar
Superior heights, and on his purple wing,
His purple wing bedropt with eyes of gold,
Rising, where thought is now deny'd to rise,
Look down triumphant on these dazzling spheres.
Why then persist?—No mortal ever liv'd
But, dying, he pronounc'd (when words are true)
The whole that charms thee absolutely vain,
Vain, and far worse!—Think thou with dying
men;

O condescend to think as angels think!
O tolerate a chance for happiness!
Our nature such, ill choice ensues ill fate;
And hell had been, though there had been no God.
Dost thou not know, my new astronomer!
Earth, turning from the sun, brings night to man?
Man, turning from his God, brings endless night;
Where thou canst read no morals, find no friend,
Amend no manners, and expect no peace.
How deep the darkness! and the groan how loud!
And far, how far, from lambent are the flames!—
Such is Lorenzo's purchase! such his praise!
The proud, the politic, Lorenzo's praise!
Though in his ear, and levell'd at his heart,
I've half read o'er the volume of the skies.

For think not thou hast heard all this from me;
My song but echoes what great Nature speaks.
What has she spoken? Thus the goddess spoke,
Thus speaks for ever:—"Place at nature's head
"A sovereign, which o'er all things rolls his eye,
"Extends his wing, promulgates his commands,
"But, above all, diffuses endless good;
"To whom, for sure redress, the wrong may fly;
"The vile for mercy, and the pain'd for peace;
"By whom the various tenants of these spheres,
"Diversify'd in fortunes, place, and powers,
"Rais'd in enjoyment, as in worth they rise,
"Arrive at length (if worthy such approach)
"At that blest fountain-head from which they stream;

"Where conflict past redoubles present joy,
"And present joy looks forward on increase,
"And that on more; no period! every step
"A double boon! a promise, and a bliss."
How easy fits this scheme on human hearts!
It suits their make; it soothes their vast desires;
Passion is pleas'd, and reason asks no more;
'Tis rational! 'tis great:—But what is thine?
It darkens, shocks, excruciates, and confounds!
Leaves us quite naked both of help and hope,
Sinking from bad to worse; few years the sport
Of fortune; then the morsel of despair.

Say then, Lorenzo! (for thou know'st it well)
What vice?—Mere want of compals in our thought.
Religion, what?—The proof of common sense.
How art thou hooted where the least prevails!
Is it my fault, if these truths call thee fool?
And thou shalt never be miscalld by me.
Can neither shame nor terror stand thy friend?
And art thou still an insect in the mire?
How, like thy guardian angel, have I shewn; [all Snatch'd thee from earth; escorted thee through

Th' ethereal armies; walk'd thee, like a God,
Through splendours of first magnitude, arrang'd
On either hand; clouds thrown beneath thy feet;
Close-cruis'd on the bright paradise of God;
And almost introduc'd thee to the throne!
And art thou still carousing for delight,
Rank poison; first fermenting to mere froth,
And then subsiding into final gall?
To beings of sublime, immortal make,
How shocking is all joy, whose end is sure!
Such joy more shocking still the more it charms!
And dost thou choose what ends ere well begun,
And infamous as short? And dost thou choose
(Thou, to whose palate glory is so sweet)
To wade into perdition, through contempt,
Not of poor bigots only, but thy own?
For I have peep'd into thy cover'd heart,
And seen it blush beneath a boastful brow;
For, by strong guilt's most violent assault,
Conscience is but disabled, not destroy'd.

O thou most awful being, and most vain!
Thy will how frail! how glorious is thy power!
Though dread eternity has sown her seeds
Of bliss and woe in thy despotic breast,
Though heaven and hell depend upon thy choice,
A butterfly comes cross, and both are fled.
Is this the picture of a rational?
This horrid image, shall it be most just?
Lorenzo! No; it cannot,—shall not be,
If there is force in reason, or in sounds
Chanted beneath the glimpses of the moon,
A magic, at this planetary hour,
When slumber locks the general lip, and dreams
Through senseless mazes hunt souls uninspir'd.
Attend—The sacred mysteries begin—
My solemn night-born adjuration hear;
Hear, and I'll raise thy spirit from the dust;
While the stars gaze on this enchantment new,
Enchantment, not infernal, but divine!

“By silence, death's peculiar attribute;
“By darkness, guilt's inevitable doom;
“By darkness, and by silence, sisters dread!
“That draw the curtain round night's ebon throne,
“And raise ideas solemn as the scene!
“By night, and all of awful night presents
“To thought or sense (of awful much to both “The goddess brings!) By these her trembling fires,
“Like Vesta's, ever-burning, and like hers
“Sacred to thoughts immaculate and pure!
“By these bright orators, that prove, and praise,
“And press thee to revere the Deity;
“Perhaps too aid thee, when rever'd a while,
“To reach his throne; as stages of the soul,
“Through which at different periods she shall pass,
“Refining gradual for her final height,
“And purging off some dross at every sphere!
“By this dark pall thrown o'er the silent world,
“By the world's kings, and kingdoms, most re-
nown'd,
“From short ambition's zenith set for ever;
“Sad presage to vain boasters now in bloom!
“By the long list of swift mortality,
“From Adam downward to this evening knell,
“Which midnight waves in fancy's startled eye,

“And shock her with an hundred centuries, “Round death's black banner throng'd in human thought!
“By thousands now resigning their last breath,
“And calling thee---wert thou so wise to hear!
“By tombs o'er tombs arising; human earth
“Ejected, to make room for---human earth;
“The monarch's terror, and the sexton's trade,
“By pompous obsequies that shun the day,
“The torch funereal, and the nodding plume,
“Which makes poor man's humiliation proud;
“Boast of our ruin! triumph of our dust!
“By the damp vault that weeps o'er royal bones,
“And the pale lamp that shows the ghastly dead
“More ghastly, through the thick incumbent gloom!
“By visits (if there are) from darker scenes,
“The gliding spectre! and the groaning grave!
“By groans, and graves, and miseries that groan
“For the grave's shelter! by desponding men,
“Senseless to pains of death, from pangs of guilt!
“By guilt's last audit! by yon moon in blood,
“The rocking firmament, the falling stars,
“And thunder's last discharge, great nature's knell!
“By second chaos and eternal night”---
Be wise---Nor let Philander blame my charm,
But own not ill discharg'd my double debt,
Love to the living, duty to the dead.

For know I'm but executor; be left
This moral legacy; I make it o'er
By his command; Philander hear in me,
And heaven in both. If deaf to these, O! hear
Florello's tender voice; his weal depends
On thy resolve; it trembles at thy choice;
For his sake—love thyself: example strikes
All human hearts; a bad example more;
More still a father's; that ensures his ruin.
As parent of his being, wouldst thou prove
The unnatural parent of his miseries,
And make him curse the being which thou gavest?
Is this the blessing of so fond a father;
If careless of Lorenzo! spare, Oh! spare
Florello's father, and Philander's friend!
Florello's father ruin'd, ruins him;
And from Philander's friend the world expects
A conduct, no dishonour to the dead.
Let passion do what nobler motive should;
Let love and emulation rise in aid
To reason, and persuade thee to be---blest.

This seems not a request to be deny'd;
Yet (such the infatuation of mankind!)
'Tis the most hopeless man can make to man.
Shall I then rise in argument and warmth,
And urge Philander's posthumous advice
From topics yet unbroach'd?---
But Oh! I faint! My spirits fail!--Nor strange
So long on wing, and in no middle clime!
To which my great Creator's glory call'd;
And calls---but now in vain. Sleep's dewy wand
Has strok'd my drooping lips, and promises
My long arrears of rest; the downy god
(Wont to return with our returning peace)
Will pay ere long, and bless me with repose, [cot,
Haste, haste, sweet stranger! from the peasant's
The ship-boy's hammock, or the soldier's straw,

Whence sorrow never chas'd thee; with thee bring,
 Not hideous visions, as of late, but draughts
 Delicious of well-tasted cordial rest,
 Man's rich restorative, his balmy bath,
 That supple, lubricates, and keeps in play
 The various movements of this nice machine,
 Which asks such frequent periods of repair.
 When tir'd with vain rotations of the day,
Sleep winds us up for the succeeding dawn;
 Fresh we spin on, till sickness clogs our wheels,
 Or death quite breaks the spring, and motion ends.
 When will it end with me?

—“Thou only know'st,
 “Thou, whose broad eye the future and the past
 “Joins to the present; making one of three
 “To moral thought! Thou know'st, and thou “alone, [known!
 “All-knowing!—all-unknown!—and yet well-
 “Near, though remote! and though unfathom'd, “felt!
 “And though invisible, for ever seen!
 “And seen in all! the great and the minute:
 “Each globe above, with its gigantic race,
 “Each flower, each leaf, with its small people
 “swarm'd,
 “(Those puny vouchers of Omnipotence!)
 “To the first thought, that asks, “From whence?”
 “declare [o'er
 “Their common source. Thou fountain, running
 “In rivers of communicated joy!
 “Who gav'st us speech for far, far humbler themes!
 “Say, by what name shall I presume to call “Him I see burning in these countless suns,
 “As Moses in the bush? Illustrious mind!
 “The whole creation less, far less to thee,
 “Than that to the creation's ample round.
 “How shall I name thee?—How my labouring soul
 “Heaves underneath the thought, too big for birth!
 “Great system of perfections! mighty cause
 “Of causes mighty! cause uncaus'd! sole root
 “Of nature, that luxuriant growth of God!
 “First Father of effects! that progeny
 “Of endless series; where the golden chain's
 “Last link admits a period, who can tell?
 “Father of all that is or heard, or hears!
 “Father of all that is or seen, or sees!
 “Father of all that is, or shall arise!
 “Father of this immeasurable mass
 “Of matter multiform; or dense, or rare;
 “Opaque, or lucid; rapid, or at rest;
 “Minute, or passing bound! in each extreme
 “Of like amaze and mystery to man.
 “Father of these bright millions of the night!
 “Of which the least full godhead had proclaim'd,
 “And thrown the gazer on his knee—or say,
 “Is appellation higher still, thy choice?
 “Father of matter's temporary lord!
 “Father of spirits! nobler offspring! sparks
 “Of high paternal glory; rich endow'd
 “With various measures, and with various modes
 “Of instinct, reason, intuition; beams
 “More pale, or bright from day divine, to break
 “The darker matter organiz'd (the ware
 “Of all created spirit); beams, that rise
 “Each over other in superior light,

“Till the last ripens into lustre strong
 “Of next approach to godhead. Father fond

* Prov. chap. viii.

What words are these---And did they come from heaven?

And were they spoke to man? to guilty man?
 What are all mysteries to love like this?
 The songs of angels, all the melodies
 Of choral gods, are wasted in the sound;
 Heal and exhilarate the broken heart;
 Though plung'd before in horrors dark as night;
 Rich prelibation of consummate joy!
 Nor wait we dissolution to be blest.

This final effort of the moral muse,
 How justly * titted? not for me alone:
 For all that read; what spirit of support,
 What heights of consolation, crown my song!
 Then, farewell night! of darkness, now, no
 more!

Joy breaks; shines; triumphs; 'tis eternal day,
 Shall that which rises out of nought complain
 Of a few evils, paid with endless joys?
 My soul! henceforth, in sweetest union join
 The two supports of human happiness,
 Which some, erroneous, think can never meet;
 True taste of life, and constant thought of death!
 The thought of death, sole victor of its dread!
 Hope be thy joy; and probity thy skill;
 Thy patron he, whose diadem has dropp'd
 Yon gems of heaven; Eternity thy prize:
 And leave the racers of the world their own,
 Their feather, and their froth, for endless toils:
 They part with all for that which is not bread;
 They mortify, they starve on wealth, fame, power;
 And laugh to scorn the fools that aim at more.
 How must a spirit, late escap'd from earth,
 Suppose Philander's, Lucia's, or Narcissa's,
 The truth of things new-blazing in its eye,
 Look back, astonish'd, on the ways of men,
 Whose lives whole drift is to forget their graves!
 And when our present privilege is past,
 To scourge us with due sense of its abuse,
 The same astonishment will seize us all.
 What then must pain us, would preserve us now.
 Lorenzo! 'tis not yet too late; Lorenzo!
 Seize wisdom ere 'tis torment to be wise;
 That is, seize wisdom ere she seizes thee.
 For what, my small philosopher! is hell?
 'Tis nothing but full knowledge of the truth,
 When truth resisteth long, is sworn our foe:
 And calls Eternity to do her right.

Thus, darkness aiding intellectual light,
 And sacred silence whispering truths divine,
 And truths divine converting pain to peace,
 My song the midnight raven has outwing'd,
 And shot, ambitious of unbounded scenes,
 Beyond the flaming limits of the world,
 Her gloomy flight. But what avails the flight
 Of fancy, when our hearts remain below?
 Virtue abounds in flatterers and foes;
 'Tis pride to praise her; penance to perform.
 To more than words, to more than worth of tongue,

Lorenzo! rise, at this auspicious hour;
 An hour, when heaven's most intimate with man;
 When, like a falling star, the ray divine

* The Consolation.

Glides swift into the bosom of the just;
And just are all, determin'd to reclaim;
Which sets that title high within thy reach.
Awake, then: thy Philander calls: awake!
Thou, who shalt wake, when the creation sleeps;

When, like a taper, all these suns expire;
When time, like him of Gaza in his wrath,
Plucking the pillars that support the world,
In nature's ample ruins lies entomb'd;
And midnight, universal midnight! reigns.

RESIGNATION.

IN TWO PARTS.

"My soul shall be satisfied even as if it were with marrow and fatness: when my mouth praiseth thee with joyful lips."

PSALM lxxiii. 6.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THIS was not intended for the public, there were many and strong reasons against it; and are so still; but some extracts of it, from the few copies which were given away, being got into the printed papers, it was thought necessary to publish something, lest a copy still more imperfect than this should fall into the press: and it is hoped, that this unwelcome occasion of publication may be some excuse for it.

As for the following stanzas, God Almighty's infinite power, and marvellous goodness to man, is dwelt on, as the most just and cogent reason for our cheerful and absolute resignation to his will; nor are any of those topics declined, which have a just tendency to promote that supreme virtue: such as the vanity of this life, the value of the next, the approach of death, &c.

PART I.

THE days how few, how short the years
Of man's too rapid race,
Each leaving, as it swiftly flies,
A shorter in its place!

They who the longest lease enjoy,
Have told us with a sigh,
That to be born seems little more,
Than to begin to die.

Numbers there are who feel this truth
With fears alarm'd; and yet,
In life's delusions lull'd asleep,
This weighty truth forget:

And am not I to these akin?
Age slumbers o'er the quill;
Its honour blots, whate'er it writes;
And am I writing still?

Conscious of nature in decline,
And languor in my thoughts;
To soften censure, and abate
Its rigour on my faults;

Permit me, Madam! ere to you
The promis'd verse I pay,
To touch on felt infirmity,
Sad sister of decay.

One world deceas'd, another born,
Like Noah they behold,
O'er whose white hairs, and furrow'd brows,
Too many suns have roll'd:

Happy the patriarch! he rejoic'd
His second world to see:
My second world, though gay the scene,
Can boast no charms for me.

To me this brilliant age appears
With desolation spread;
Near all with whom I liv'd, and smil'd,
Whilst life was life, are dead;

And with them dy'd my joys; the grave
Has broken nature's laws;
And clos'd, against this feeble frame,
Its partial cruel jaws;

Cruel to spare! condemn'd to life!
A cloud impairs my sight;
My weak hand disobey's my will,
And trembles as I write.

What shall I write? Thalia, tell;
Say, long abandon'd muse!
What field of fancy shall I range?
What subject shall I choose?

A choice of moment high inspire,
And rescue me from shame,

For doating on thy charms so late,
By grandeur in my theme.
Beyond the themes which most admire,
Which dazzle, or amaze,
Beyond renown'd exploits of war,
Bright charms, or empire's blaze,
Are themes, which, in a world of woe,
Can best appease our pain;
And, in an age of gaudy guilt,
Gay folly's flood restrain;
Amidst the storms of life support
A calm unshaken mind;
And with unfading laurels crown
The brow of the resign'd.
O Resignation! yet unsung,
Untouch'd by former strains;
Though claiming every muse's smile,
And every poet's pains,
Beneath life's evening, solemn shade,
I dedicate my page
To thee, thou safest guard of youth!
Thou sole support of age!
All other duties crescents are
Of virtue faintly bright,
The glorious consummation, thou!
Which fills her orb with light:
How rarely fill'd! the love divine
In evils to discern,
This the first lesson which we want,
The latest which we learn;
A melancholy truth! for know,
Could our proud hearts resign,
The distance greatly would decrease
'Twixt human and divine.
But though full noble is my theme,
Full urgent is my call
To soften sorrow, and forbid
The bursting tear to fall;
The task I tread; dare I to leave
Of humble prose the shore,
And put to sea? a dangerous sea?
What throngs have sunk before!
How proud the poet's billow swells!
The God! the God! his boast:
A boast how vain! what wrecks abound!
Dead bards stench every coast.
What then am I? Shall I presume,
On such a moulted wing,
Above the general wreck to rise,
And in my winter, sing;
When nightingales, when sweetest bards
Confine their charming song,
To summer's animating heats,
Content to warble young?
Yet write I must; a lady sue,
How shameful her request!

* Mrs. M—

My brain in labour for dull rhyme!
Her's teeming with the best!
But you a stranger will excuse,
Nor scorn his feeble strain;
To you a stranger, but through fate,
No stranger to your pain.
The ghost of grief deceas'd ascends,
His old wound bleeds anew;
His sorrows are recall'd to life
By those he sees in you;
Too well he knows the twisting strings
Of ardent hearts combin'd,
When rent asunder, how they bleed,
How hard to be resign'd:
Those tears you pour, his eyes have shed;
The pang you feel, he felt;
Thus nature, loud as virtue, bids
His heart at yours to melt.
But what can heart, or head, suggest?
What sad experience say?
Through truths austere, to peace we work
Our rugged, gloomy way:
What are we? Whence? For what? and Whither?
Who know not, needs must mourn;
But thought, bright daughter of the skies!
Can tears to triumph turn.
Thought is our armour, 'tis the mind's
Impenetrable shield,
When, sent by fate, we meet our foes,
In fore affliction's field;
It plucks the frightful mask from ills,
Forbids pale fear to hide,
Beneath that dark disguise, a friend,
Which turns affection's tide.
Affection frail! train'd up by sense,
From reason's channel strays:
And whilst it blindly points at peace,
Our peace to pain betrays.
Thought winds its fond, erroneous stream
From daily-dying flowers,
To nourish rich immortal blooms,
In amaranthine bowers;
Whence throngs, in extasy, look down
On what once shock'd their sight;
And thank the terrors of the past
For ages of delight.
All withers here; who most possess
Are losers by their gain,
Stung by full proof, that, bad at best,
Life's idle all is vain:
Vain, in its course, life's murmuring stream;
Did not its course offend,
But murmur cease; life, then, would seem
Still vainer, from its end.
How wretched! who, through cruel fate,
Have nothing to lament!
With the poor alms this world affords
Deplorably content!

Had not the Greek his world mistook,
His wish had been most wise;
To be content with but one world,
Like him we should despise.

Of earth's revenue would you state
A full account, and fair?
We hope; and hope; and hope; then cast
The total up—

Despair.

Since vain all here, all future, vast,
Embrace the lot assign'd;
Heaven wounds to heal; its frowns are friends;
Its stroke severe, most kind.

But in laps'd nature, rooted deep,
Blind error domineers;
And on fools errands, in the dark,
Sends out our hopes and fears;

Bids us for ever pains deplore,
Our pleasures overprize;
These oft persuade us to be weak;
Those urge us to be wise.

From virtue's rugged path to right
By pleasure are we brought
To flowery fields of wrong, and there
Pain chides us for our fault:

Yet whilst it chides, it speaks of peace,
If folly is withstood;
And says, time pays an easy price,
For our eternal good.

In earth's dark cot, and in an hour,
And in delusion great,
What an economist is man
To spend his whole estate,

And beggar an eternity!
For which as he was born,
More worlds than one against it weigh'd,
As feathers he should scorn,

Say not, your loss in triumph leads Religion's feeble strife;
Joys future amply reimburse
Joys bankrupts of this life.

But not deferr'd your joy so long,
It bears an early date;
Affliction's ready pay in hand,
Befriends our present state;

What are the tears, which trickle down
Her melancholy face,
Like liquid pearl? Like pearls of price,
They purchase lasting peace.

Grief softens hearts, and curbs the will,
Impetuous passion tames,
And keeps insatiate, keen desire
From launching in extremes.

Through time's dark womb, our judgment right,
If our dim eye was thrown,
Clear should we see, the will divine
Has but forestall'd our own;

At variance with our future wish,
Self-fever'd we complain;
If so, the wounded, not the wound,
Must answer for the pain:

The day shall come, and swift of wing
Though you may think it slow,
When, in the list of fortune's smiles,
You'll enter frowns of woe.

For mark the path of Providence;
This course it has pursued
"Pain is the parent, woe the womb,
"Of sound important good:"

Our hearts are fasten'd to this world
By strong and endless ties:
And every sorrow cuts a string,
And urges us to rise:

'Twill sound severe—Yet rest assur'd
I'm studious of your peace;
Though I should dare to give you joy—
Yes, joy of his decease:

An hour shall come (you question this)
An hour, when you shall bless,
Beyond the brightest beams of life,
Dark days of your distress.

Hear then without surprise a truth,
A daughter-truth to this,
Swift turns of fortune often tie
A bleeding heart to bliss:

Esteem you this a paradox?
My sacred motto read;
A glorious truth! divinely sung
By one, whose heart had bled;

To Resignation swift he flew,
In her a friend he found,
A friend, which blest him with a smile
When gasping with his wound.

On earth nought precious is obtain'd
But what is painful too;
By travel, and to travel born,
Our Sabbaths are but few:

To real joy we work our way,
Encountering many a shock,
Ere found what truly charms; as found
A Venus in the block.

In some disaster, some severe
Appointment for our sins,
That mother blessing (not so call'd),
True happiness, begins.

No martyr e'er defy'd the flames,
By stings of life unvest;
First rose some quarrel with this world,
Then passion for the next.

You see, then, pangs are parent pangs,
The pangs of happy birth;
Pangs, by which only can be born
True happiness on earth.

The peopled earth look all around,
Or through time's records run;

And say, what is a man unstruck?
It is a man undone.

This moment, am I deeply stung—
My bold pretence is try'd;
When vain man boasts, Heaven puts to proof
The vauntings of his pride;

Now need I, Madam! your support.—
How exquisite the smart;
How critically tim'd the * news
Which strikes me to the heart!

The pangs of which I spoke, I feel:
If worth like thine, is born,
O long-belov'd! I bless the blow,
And triumph, whilst I mourn.

Nor mourn I long; by grief subdued
By reason's empire shown;
Deep anguish comes by Heaven's decree,
Continues by our own;

And when continued past its point,
Indulg'd in length of time,
Grief is disgrace, and, what was fate,
Corrupts into a crime:

And shall I, criminally mean,
Myself and subject wrong?
No; my example shall support
The subject of my song.

Madam! I grant your loss is great;
Nor little is your gain;
Let that be weigh'd; when weigh'd aright,
It richly pays your pain;

When Heaven would kindly set us free,
And earth's enchantment end;
It takes the most effectual means,
And robs us of a friend.

But such a friend! and sigh no more?
'Tis prudent; but severe:
Heaven aid my weakness, and I drop,
All sorrow—with this tear.

Perhaps your settled grief to sooth,
I should not vainly strive,
But with soft balm your pain assuage,
Had he been still alive;

Whose frequent aid brought kind relief,
In my distress of thought,
Ting'd with his beams my cloudy page
And beautify'd a fault:

To touch our passions, secret springs
Was his peculiar care;
And deep his happy genius div'd
In bosoms of the fair;

Nature, which favours to the few,
All art beyond, imparts,
To him presented at his birth,
The key of human hearts.

* Whilst the Author was writing this, he received the news of Mr. Samuel Richardson's death, who was then printing the former part of the Poem.

But not to me by him bequeath'd
His gentle, smooth address;
His tender hand to touch the wound
In throbbing of distress;

Howe'er, proceed I must, unblest'd
With Esculapian art;
Know, love sometimes, mistaken love!
Plays disaffection's part:

Nor lands, nor seas, nor suns, nor stars,
Can soul from soul divide
They correspond from distant worlds,
Though transports are deny'd:

Are you not, then, unkindly kind?
Is not your love severe?
O! stop that crystal source of woe;
Nor wound him with a tear.

As those above from human bliss
Receive increase of joy;
May not a stroke from human woe,
In part, their peace destroy?

He lives in those he left;—to what?
Your, now, paternal care,
Clear from its cloud your brighten'd eye,
It will discern him there;

In features, not of form alone,
But those, I trust, of mind;
Auspicious to the public weal,
And to their fate resign'd.

Think on the tempests he sustain'd;
Revolve his battles won;
And let those prophecy your joy
From such a father's son:

Is consolation what you seek?
Fare, then, his martial fire;
And animate to flame the sparks
Bequeath'd him by his fire:

As nothing great is born in haste,
Wife nature's time allow;
His father's laurels may descend,
And flourish on his brow.

Nor, Madam! be surpris'd to hear
That laurels may be due
Not more to heroes of the field,
(Proud boasters!) than to you:

Tender as is the female frame,
Like that brave man you mourn,
You are a soldier, and to fight
Superior battles born;

Beneath a banner nobler far
Than ever was unfurl'd
In fields of blood; a banner bright!
High wav'd o'er all the world.

It, like a streaming meteor, casts
An universal light;
Sheds day, sheds more, eternal day
On nations whelm'd in night.

Beneath that banner, what exploit
Can mount our glory higher,

Than to sustain the dreadful blow,
When those we love expire?

Go forth a moral Amazon;
Arm'd with undaunted thought;
The battle won, though costing dear
You'll think it cheaply bought:

The passive hero, who sits down
Unactive, and can smile
Beneath affliction's galling load,
Out-acts a Cæsar's toil:

The billows stain'd by slaughter'd foes
Inferior praise afford;
Reason's a bloodless conqueror,
More glorious than the sword.

Nor can the thunders of huzzas
From shouting nations, cause
Such sweet delight, as from your hear
Soft whispers of applause:

The dear deceas'd so fam'd in arms,
With what delight he'll view
His triumphs on the main outdone,
Thus conquer'd, twice, by you,

Share his delight; take heed to shun
Of bosoms most diseas'd
That odd distemper, an absurd
Reluctance to be pleas'd:

Some seem in love with sorrow's charms,
And that foul fiend embrace:

This temper let me justly brand,
And stamp it with disgrace:

Sorrow! of horrid parentage!
Thou second-born of hell!
Against heaven's endless mercies pour'd
How dar'st thou to rebel?

From black and noxious vapours bred
And nurs'd by want of thought,
And to the door of frenzy's self
By perseverance brought,

Thy most inglorious, coward tears
From brutal eyes have ran;
Smiles, incommunicable smiles!
Are radiant marks of man;

They cast a sudden glory round
Th' illumin'd human face;
And light in fons of honest joy
Some beams of Moses' face:

Is Resignation's lesson hard?
Examine, we shall find
That duty gives up little more
Than anguish of the mind;

Resign; and all the load of life
That moment you remove,
Its heavy tax, ten thousand cares
Devolve on one above;

Who bids us lay our burden down
On his Almighty hand,
Softens our duty to relief,
To blessing a command.

For joy what cause? how every sense
Is courted from above
The year around, with presents rich,
The growth of endless love?

But most o'erlook the blessings pour'd,
Forget the wonders done,
And terminate, wrapp'd up in sense,
Their prospect at the sun;

From that, their final point of view,
From that their radiant goal,
On travel infinite of thought,
Sets out the nobler soul,

Broke loose from time's tenacious ties,
And earth's involving gloom,
To range at last its vast domain,
And talk with worlds to come:

They let unmark'd, and unemploy'd,
Life's idle moments run;
And, doing nothing for themselves,
Imagine nothing done;

Fatal mistake! their fate goes on,
Their dread account proceeds,
And their not-doing is set down
Amongst their darkest deeds;

Though man sits still, and takes his ease;
God is at work on man;
No means, no moment unemploy'd,
To bless him, if he can.

But man consents not, boldly bent
To fashion his own fate;
Man, a mere bungler in the trade,
Repents his crime too late;

Hence loud laments: let me thy cause,
Indulgent Father! plead;
Of all the wretches we deplore,
Not one by thee was made.

What is thy whole creation fair?
Of love divine the child;
Love brought it forth; and from its birth,
Has o'er it fondly smil'd:

Now, and through periods distant far,
Long ere the world began,
Heaven is, and has in travel been,
Its birth the good of man;

Man holds in constant service bound
The blustering winds and seas;
Nor suns disdain to travel hard
Their master, man, to please:

To final good the worst events
Through secret channels run;
Finish for man their destin'd course
As 'twas for man begun.

One point (observ'd, perhaps, by few)
Has often smote, and smites
My mind, as demonstration strong;
That heaven in man delights:

What's known to man of things unseen,
Of future worlds, or fates?

So much, nor more, than what to man's Sublime affairs relates;

Weat's Revelation then? a list,
An inventory just
Of that poor insect's goods, so late
Call'd out of night and dust.

What various motives to rejoice!
To render joy sincere,
Has this no weight? our joy is felt
Beyond this narrow sphere:

Would we in heaven new heaven create,
And double its delight?
A smiling world, when heaven looks down,
How pleasing in its sight!

Angels stoop forward from their thrones
To hear its joyful lays;
As incense sweet enjoy, and join,
Its aromatic praise:

Have we no cause to fear the stroke
Of heaven's avenging rod?
When we presume to counteract
A sympathetic God?

If we resign, our patience makes
His rod an armless wand;
If not, it darts a serpent's sting,
Like that in Moses' hand;

Like that, it swallows up what'er
Earth's vain magicians bring,
Whose baffled arts would boast below
Of joys a rival spring.

Consummate love! the list how large
Of blessings from thy hand!
To banish sorrow, and be blest,
Is thy supreme command.

Are such commands but ill obey'd?
Of bliss, shall we complain?

The man, who dares to be a wretch;
Deserves still greater pain,

Joy is our duty, glory, health;
The sunshine of the soul;
Our best encomium on the power
Who sweetly plans the whole:

Joy is our Eden still possess'd:
Be gone, ignoble grief!

'Tis joy makes gods, and men exalts,
Their nature, our relief;

Relief, for man to that must stoop;
And his due distance know;

Transport's the language of the skies,
Content the style below.

Content is joy, and joy in pain
Is joy and virtue too;

Thus, whilst good present we possess
More precious we pursue:

Of joy the more we have in hand,
The more have we to come;

Joy, like our money, interest bears,
Which daily swells the sum.

Vol. X.

" But how to smile; to stem the tide

" Of nature in our veins;

" Is it not hard to weep in joy?

" What then to smile in pains?"

Victorious joy! which breaks the clouds,
And struggles through a storm;
Proclaims the mind as great, as good;
And bids it doubly charm:

If doubly charming in our sex,

A sex, by nature, bold;

What then in yours? 'tis diamond there;

Triumphant o'er our gold.

And should not this complaint repress?

And check the rising sigh?

Yet farther opiate to your pain

I labour to supply.

Since spirits greatly damp'd distort

Ideas of delight,

Look through the medium of a friend,

To set your notions right:

As tears the sight, grief dims the soul;

Its object dark appears;

True friendship, like a rising sun,

The soul's horizon clears.

A friend's an optic to the mind

With sorrow clouded o'er;

And gives it strength of sight to see

Redress unseen before.

Reason is somewhat rough in man;

Extremely smooth and fair,

When she, to grace her manly strength,

Assumes a female air:

A * friend you have, and I the same,

Whose prudent, soft address

Will bring to life those healing thoughts

Which dy'd in your distress;

That friend, the spirit of my theme

Extracting for your ease,

Will leave to me the dreg, in thoughts

Too common; such as these;

Let those lament, to whom full bowls

Of sparkling joys are given;

That triple bane inebriates life,

Imbitters death, and hazards heaven:

Woe to the soul at perfect ease!

'Tis brewing perfect pains;

Lull'd reason sleeps, the pulse is king;

Despotic body reigns:

Have you + ne'er pity'd joys gay scenes,

And deem'd their glory dark?

Alas! poor envy! she's stone-blind,

And quite mistakes her mark:

Her mark lies hid in sorrow's shades,

But sorrow well subdued;

* Mrs. Montague.

K

And in proud fortune's frown defy'd
By meek, unborrow'd good.

By Resignation; all in that
A double friend may find,
A wing to heaven, and, while on earth,
The pillow of mankind:

On pillows void of down, for rest
Our restless hopes we place,
When hopes of heaven lie warm at heart,
Our hearts repose in peace:

The peace, which Resignation yields,
Who feel alone can guess;
'Tis disbeliev'd by murmuring minds,
They must conclude it less:

The loss, or gain, of that alone
Have we to hope, or fear;
That fate controls, and can invert
The seasons of the year:

O! the dark days, the year around,
Of an impatient mind?
Through clouds, and storms, a summer breaks,
To shine on the resign'd:

While man by that of every grace,
And virtue, is possess'd;
Foul vice her pandæmonium builds
In the rebellious breast;

By Resignation we defeat
The worst that can annoy;
And suffer, with far more repose,
Than worldlings can enjoy.

From small experience this I speak;
O! grant to those I love
Experience fuller far, ye Powers
Who form our fates above!

My love where due, if not to those
Who, leaving grandeur, came
To shine on age in mean recess,
And light me to my theme!

A theme themselves! A theme, how rare!
The charms which they display,
To triumph over captive heads,
Are set in bright array:

With his own arms proud man's o'ercome,
His boasted laurels die;
Learning and genius, wiser grown,
To female bosoms fly.

This revolution, fix'd by fate,
In fable was foretold;
The dark prediction puzzled wits,
Nor could the learn'd unfold:

But as those * ladies works I read,
They darted such a ray,
The latent sense burst out at once,
And shone in open day:

So burst, full ripe, distended fruits,
When strongly strikes the sun;

* Mrs. Montague. Mrs. Carter.

And from the purple grape unpress'd
Spontaneous nectars run.

Pallas ('tis said), when Jove grew dull,
Forsook his drowsy brain;
And sprightly leap'd into the throne
Of wisdom's brighter reign;

Her helmet took; that is, shot rays
Of formidable wit;
And lance—or genius most acute,
Which lines immortal writ;

And gorgon shield—or power to fright
Man's folly, dreadful shone,
And many a blockhead (easy change!)
Turn'd instantly to stone.

Our authors male, as then did Jove,
Now scratch a damag'd head,
And call for what once quarter'd there,
But find the goddesses fled.

The fruit of knowledge, golden fruit!
That once forbidden tree,
Hedg'd-in by surly man, is now
To Britain's daughters free:

In Eve (we know) of fruit so fair
The noble thirst began;
And they, like her, have caus'd a fall,
A fall of fame in man:

And since of genius in our sex,
O Addison! with thee
The sun is set; how I rejoice
This sister lamp to see!

It sheds, like Cynthia, silver beams
On man's nocturnal state;
His lessen'd light, and languid powers,
I show, whilst I relate.

PART II.

BUT what in either sex, beyond
All parts, our glory crowns!
"In ruffling seasons to be calm,
"And smile, when fortune frowns."

Heaven's choice is safer than our own;
Of ages past inquire,
What the most formidable fate?
"To have our own desire."

If, in your wrath, the worst of foes
You wish extremely ill,
Expose him to the thunder's stroke,
Or that of his own will.

What numbers, rushing down the steep
Of inclination strong,
Have perish'd in their ardent wish!
Wish ardent, ever wrong!

'Tis Resignation's full reverse,
Most wrong, as it implies
Error most fatal in our choice,
Detachment from the skies.

By closing with the skies, we make
Omnipotence our own;

That done, how formidable ill's
Whole army is o'erthrown?
No longer impotent and frail,
Ourselves above we rise;
We scarce believe ourselves below!
We trespass on the skies!

The Lord, the soul, and source of all,
Whilst man enjoys his ease,
Is executing human will,
In earth, and air, and seas;

Beyond us, what can angels boast?
Archangels what require?
Whate'er below, above, is done,
Is done as—we desire.

What glory this for man so mean,
Whose life is but a span?
This is meridian majesty!
This the sublime of man!

Beyond the boast of Pagan song
My sacred subject shines!
And for a foil the lustre takes
Of Rome's exalted lines.

"All that the sun surveys subdued,
"But Cato's mighty mind."
How grand! most true; yet far beneath
The soul of the resign'd:

To more than kingdoms, more than worlds,
To passion that gives law;
Its matchless empire could have kept
Great Cato's pride in awe;

That fatal pride, whose cruel point
Transfix'd his noble breast;
Far nobler! if his fate sustain'd
Had left to heaven the rest;

Then he the palm had borne away,
At distance Cæsar thrown;
Put him off cheaply with the world,
And made the skies his own.

What cannot Resignation do?
It wonders can perform;
That powerful charm, "Thy will be done,"
Can lay the loudest storm.

Come, Resignation! then from fields,
Where mounted on the wing,
A wing of flame, blest martyr's souls
Ascended to their King:

Who is it calls thee? one whose need
Transcends the common size;
Who stands in front against a foe
To which none equal rise:

In front he stands, the briak he treads
Of an eternal state;
How dreadful his appointed post!
How strongly arm'd by fate:

His threatening foe! what shadows deep
O'erwhelm his gloomy brow!

His dart tremendous!—at fourscore
My sole asylum thou!

Haste then, O Resignation! haste,
'Tis thine to reconcile
My foe and me; at thy approach,
My foe begins to smile:

O! for that summit of my wish,
Whilst here I draw my breath,
That promise of eternal life,
A glorious smile in death:

What fight, heaven's azure arch beneath,
Hast most of heaven to boast?
The man resign'd; at once serene,
And giving up the ghost.

At death's arrival they shall smile,
Who not in life o'er gay,
Serious and frequent thought send out
To meet him on his way:

My gay coevals! (such there are)
If happiness is dear;
Approaching death's alarming day
Discreetly let us fear:

The fear of death is truly wise,
Till wisdom can rise higher;
And, arm'd with pious fortitude,
Death dreaded once, desire:

Grand climacteric vanities
The vainest will despise;
Shock'd when beneath the snow of age,
Man immaturely dies:

But am not I myself the man?
No need abroad to roam
In quest of faults to be chastis'd;
What cause to blush at home?

In life's decline, when men relapse
Into the sports of youth,
The second child out-fools the first,
And tempts the lash of truth;

Shall a mere truant from the grave
With rival boys engage?
His trembling voice attempt to sing,
And ape the poet's rage?

Here, Madam! let me visit one,
My fault who partly shares,
And tell myself, by telling him,
What more becomes our years;

And if your breast with prudent zeal
For Resignation glows,
You will not disapprove a just
Resentment at its foes.

In youth, Voltaire! our foibles plead
For some indulgence due;
When heads are white, their thoughts and aims
Should change their colour too:

How are you cheated by your wit!
Old age is bound to pay,
By nature's law, a mind discreet,
For joys it takes away;

K ij

A mighty change is wrought by years,
Reversing human lot;
In age 'tis honour to lie hid,
'Tis praise to be forgot;

The wise, as flowers, which spread at noon,
And all their charms expose,
When evening damps, and shades descend,
Their evolutions close.

What though your muse has nobly soar'd,
Is that our true sublime?
Ours, hoary friend! is to prefer
Eternity to time:

Why close a life so justly fam'd
With such bold trash as * this?
This for renown? yes such as makes
Obscurity a bliss:

Your trash with mine at open war
Is † obstinately bent,
Like wits below, to sow your tares
Of gloom and discontent:

With so much sunshine at command,
Why light with darkness mix?
Why dash with pain our pleasure? why
Your Helicon with Styx?

Your works in our divided minds
Repugnant passions raise,
Confound us with a double stroke,
We shudder whilst we praise;

A curious web, as finely wrought
As genius can inspire,
From a black bag of poison spun,
With horror we admire.

Mean as it is, if this is read
With a disdainful air,
I can't forgive so great a foe
To my dear friend Voltaire:

Early I knew him, early prais'd,
And long to praise him late;
His genius greatly I admire,
Nor would deplore his fate;

A fate how much to be deplor'd!
At which our nature starts;
Forbear to fall on your own sword,
To perish by your parts;

"But grant your name"—to feed on air,
Were then immortals born?
Nothing is great, of which more great,
More glorious is the scorn.

Can fame your carcase from the worm
Which gnaws us in the grave,
Or soul from that which never dies,
Applauding Europe save?

But fame you lose; good sense alone
Your idol, praise can claim;
When wild wit murders happiness,
It puts to death our fame!

Candido.

† Second part.

Nor boast your genius, talents bright,
Ev'n dunces will despise,
If in your western beams is miss'd
A genius for the skies;

Your taste too fails; what most excels
True taste must relish most!
And what, to rival palms above,
Can proudest laurels boast?

Sound heads salvation's * helmet seek,
Resplendent are its rays,
Let that suffice; it needs no plume
Of sublunary praise.

May this enable couch'd Voltaire
To see that—"All is right,"
His eye, by flash of wit struck blind,
Restoring to its sight;

If so, all's well: who much have err'd,
That much have been forgiven;
I speak with joy, with joy he'll hear,
"Voltaires are now in heaven."

Nay, such philanthropy divine,
So boundless in degree,
Its marvellous of love extends (Stoop most profound!) to me:

Let others cruel stars arraign,
Or dwell on their distress;
But let my page, for mercies pour'd,
A grateful heart express:

Walking, the present God was seen,
Of old, in Eden fair;
The God as present, by plain steps
Of providential care,

I behold passing through my life;
His awful voice I hear;
And, conscious of my nakedness,
Would hide myself for fear:

But where the trees, or where the clouds,
Can cover from his sight?
Naked the centre to that eye,
To which the sun is night.

As yonder glittering lamps on high
Through night illumin'd roll;
May thoughts of him, by whom they shine,
Chase darkness from my soul.

My soul which reads his hand as clear
In my minute affairs,
As in his ample manuscript
Of sun, and moon, and stars;

And knows him not more bent aright
To wield that vast machine,
Than to correct one erring thought
In my small world within;

A world that shall survive the fall
Of all his wonders here;

* Ephes. vi. 17.

† Which his romance ridicules.

Survive, when suns ten thousand drop,
And leave a darken'd sphere.
Yon matter gross, how bright it shines!
For time how great his care!
Sure spirit and eternity
Far richer glories share;
Let those our hearts impress, on those
Our contemplation dwell;
On those my thoughts how justly thrown,
By what I now shall tell:
When backward with attentive mind
Life's labyrinth I trace,
I find him far myself beyond
Propitious to my peace:
Through all the crooked paths I trod
My folly he pursued;
My heart astray to quick return
Importunately woo'd.
Due resignation home to press
On my capricious will,
How many rescues did I meet,
Beneath the mask of ill!
How many foes in ambush laid
Beneath my soul's desire!
The deepest penitents are made
By what we most admire.
Have I not sometimes (real good
So little mortals know!)
Mounting the summit of my wish,
Profoundly plung'd in woe?
I rarely plann'd, but cause I found
My plan's defeat to bless:
Oft I lamented an event,
It turn'd to my success.
By sharpen'd appetite to give
To good intense delight,
Through dark and deep perplexities
He led me to the right.
And is not this the gloomy path,
Which you are treading now?
The path most gloomy leads to light,
When our proud passions bow:
When labouring under fancy'd ill,
My spirits to sustain,
He kindly cur'd with sovereign draughts
Of unimagined pain.
Pain'd sense from fancy'd tyranny
Alone can set us free;
A thousand miseries we feel,
Till sunk in misery.
Cloy'd with a glut of all we wish,
Our wish we relish less;
Success, a sort of suicide,
Is ruin'd by success:
Sometimes he led me near to death,
And, pointing to the grave,
Bid terror whisper kind advice;
And taught the tomb to save;

To raise my thoughts beyond where worlds
Aspangles o'er us shine,
One day he gave, and bid the next
My soul's delight resign.
We to ourselves, but through the means
Of mirrors, are unknown;
In this my fate can you descry
No features of your own?
And if you can, let that excuse
These self recording lines;
A record, modesty forbids,
Or to small bound confines:
In grief why deep ingulf'd? You see
You suffer nothing rare;
Uncommon grief for common fate!
That wisdom cannot bear.
When streams flow backward to their source,
And humbled flames descend,
And mountains wing'd shall fly aloft,
Then human sorrows end.
But human prudence too must cease,
When sorrows domineer,
When fortitude has lost its fire,
And freezes into fear:
The pang most poignant of my life
Now heightens my delight;
I see a fair creation rise
From chaos, and old night.
From what seem'd horror, and despair,
The richest harvest rose;
And gave me in the nod divine
An absolute repose.
Of all the plunders of mankind,
More gross, or frequent, none,
Than in their grief and joy misplac'd,
Eternally are shown.
But whither points all this parade?
It says, that near you lies
A book, perhaps, yet unperus'd,
Which you should greatly prize:
Of self-perusal, science rare!
Few know the mighty gain;
Learn'd prelates, self-unread, may read
Their Bibles o'er in vain:
Self-knowledge, which from heaven itself
(So sages tell us) came,
What is it but a daughter fair
Of my maternal theme?
Unletter'd, and untravell'd men
An oracle might find,
Would they consult their own contents,
The Delphos of the mind.
Enter your bosom; there you'll meet
A revelation new,
A revelation personal;
Which none can read but you.
There will you clearly read reveal'd
In your enlighten'd thought,
K. ii.

By mercies manifold, through life,
To fresh remembrance brought,
A mighty Being! and in him
A complicated friend,
A father, brother, spouse; no dread
Of death, divorce, or end:
Who such a matchless friend embrace,
And lodge him in their heart,
Full well, from agonies exempt,
With other friends may part:
As when o'erloaded branches bear
Large clusters big with wine,
We scarce regret one falling leaf
From the luxuriant vine.
My short advice to you may sound
Obscure or somewhat odd,
Though 'tis the best that man can give,—
"Ev'n be content with God."
Through love he gave you the deceas'd,
Through greater took him hence;
This reason fully could evince,
Though murmur'd at by sense.
This friend, far past the kindest kind,
Is past the greatest great;
His greatness let me touch in points
Not foreign to your state.
His eye, this instant, reads your heart;
A truth less obvious hear;
This instant its most secret thoughts
Are sounding in his ear:
Dispute you this? O! stand in awe,
And cease your sorrow; know,
That tears now trickling down, he saw
Ten thousand years ago.
And twice ten thousand hence, if you
Your temper reconcile
To reason's bound, will he behold
Your prudence with a smile.
A smile, which through eternity
Diffuses so bright rays,
The dimmest deifies e'en guilt,
If guilt at last obeys.
Your guilt (for guilt it is to mourn,
When such a sovereign reigns)
Your guilt diminish; peace pursue;
How glorious peace in pains!
Here, then, your sorrows cease; if not,
Think how unhappy they,
Who guilt increase by streaming tears,
Which guilt should wash away;
Of tears that gush profuse restrain;
Whence burst those dismal sighs?
They from the throbbing breast of one
(Strange truth!) most happy rise.
Not angels (hear it, and exult!)
Enjoy a larger share
Than is indulg'd to you, and yours,
Of God's impartial care.

Anxious for each, as if on each
His care for all was thrown;
For all his care as absolute,
As all had been but one.
And is he then so near! so kind!—
How little then and great,
That riddle, man! O! let me gaze
At wonders in his fate.
His fate, who yesterday did crawl
A worm from darkness deep,
And shall, with brother worms, beneath
A turf, to-morrow sleep.
How mean!—And yet, if well obey'd
His mighty Master's call,
The whole creation for mean man
Is deem'd a boon too small:
Too small the whole creation deem'd
For emmets in the dust!
Account amazing! yet most true;
My song is bold, yet just.
Man born for infinite, in whom
Nor period can destroy
The power, in exquisite extremes,
To suffer, or enjoy.
Give him earth's empire (if no more)
He's beggar'd and undone!
Imprison'd in unbounded space!
Benighted by the sun!
For what the sun's meridian blaze
To the most feeble ray
Which glimmers from the distant dawn
Of uncreated day?
'Tis not the poet's rapture feign'd
Swells here the vain to please;
The mind most sober kindles most
At truths sublime as these;
They warm e'en me.—I dare not say,
Divine ambition strove
Not to bless only, but confound,
Nay, fright us with its love.
And yet so frightful what, or kind,
As that the rending rock,
The darken'd sun, and rising dead,
So formidable spoke?
And are we darker than that sun?
Than rocks more hard and blind?
We are;—if not to such a God
In agonies resign'd.
Yes, e'en in agonies forbear
To doubt Almighty love;
Whate'er endears eternity,
Is mercy from above;
What most embitters time, that most
Eternity endears,
And thus, by plunging in distress,
Exalts us to the spheres.
Joy's fountain head! where bliss o'er bliss,
O'er wonders wonders rise,

And an Omnipotence prepares
 Its banquet for the wife.
 Ambrosial banquet! rich in wines
 Nectareous to the soul!
 What transports sparkle from the stream,
 As angels fill the bowl!
 Fountain profuse of every bliss!
 Good-will immense prevails;
 Man's line can't fathom its profound;
 An angel's plummet fails.
 Thy love and might, by what they know,
 Who judge, nor dream of more;
 They ask a drop, how deep the sea!
 One sand, how wide the shore?
 Of thy exuberant good-will,
 Offended Deity!
 The thousandth part who comprehends,
 A deity is he.
 How yonder ample azure field
 With radiant worlds is sown!
 How tubes astonish us with those
 More deep in ether thrown!
 And those beyond of brighter worlds
 Why not a million more?—
 In lieu of answer, let us all
 Fall prostrate, and adore.
 Since thou art infinite in power,
 Nor thy indulgence less;
 Since man, quite impotent and blind,
 Oft drops into distress;
 Say, what is Resignation? 'Tis
 Man's weakness understood;
 And wisdom grasping, with an hand
 Far stronger, every good.
 Let rash repiners stand appall'd,
 In thee who dare not trust;
 Whose abject souls, like demons dark,
 Are murmuring in the dust;
 For man to murmur, or repine
 At what by thee is done,
 No less absurd, than to complain
 Of darkness in the sun.
 Who would not, with an heart at ease,
 Bright eye, unclouded brow,
 Wisdom and goodness at the helm,
 The roughest ocean plough?
 What, though I'm swallow'd in the deep?
 Though mountains o'er me roar?
 Jehovah reigns! as Jonah safe,
 I'm landed, and adore:
 Thy will is welcome, let it wear
 Its most tremendous form;
 Roar, waves; rage, winds! I know, that thou
 Canst save me by a storm.
 From thee immortal spirits born,
 To thee, their fountain, flow.
 If wise; as curl'd around to theirs
 Meandering streams below:

Nor less compell'd by reason's call,
 To thee our souls aspire,
 Than to thy skies, by nature's law,
 High mounts material fire;
 To thee aspiring they exult,
 I feel my spirits rise,
 I feel myself thy son, and pant
 For patrimonial skies;
 Since ardent thirst of future good,
 And generous sense of past,
 To thee man's prudence strongly ties,
 And binds affection fast;
 Since great thy love, and great our want,
 And men the wisest blind,
 And bliss our aim; pronounce us all
 Distracted, or resign'd;
 Resign'd through duty, interest, shame;
 Deep shame! dare I complain,
 When (wondrous truth!) in heaven itself
 Joy ow'd its birth to pain?
 And pain for me! for me was drain'd
 Gall's overflowing bowl;
 And shall one drop to murmur bold
 Provoke my guilty soul?
 If pardon'd this, what cause, what crime
 Can indignation raise?
 The sun was lighted up to shine,
 And man was born to praise;
 And when to praise the man shall cease,
 Or sun to strike the view;
 A cloud dishonours both; but man's
 The blacker of the two:
 For oh! Ingratitude how black!
 With most profound amaze
 At love, which man belov'd o'erlooks,
 Astonish'd angels gaze.
 Praise cheers, and warms, like generous wine;
 Praise, more divine than prayer;
 Prayer points our ready path to heaven;
 Praise is already there.
 Let plausible Resignation rise,
 And banish all complaint;
 All virtues thronging into one,
 It finishes the saint;
 Makes the man bless'd, as man can be;
 Life's labours renders light;
 Darts beams through fate's incumbent gloom,
 And lights our sun by night;
 'Tis nature's brightest ornament,
 The richest gift of grace,
 Rival of angels, and supreme
 Proprietor of peace;
 Nay, peace beyond, no small degree
 Of rapture 't will impart;
 Know, Madam! when your heart's in heaven,
 "All heaven is in your heart."
 But who to heaven their hearts can raise?
 Deny'd divine support,

All virtue dies; support divine
The wise with ardour court:
When prayer partakes the seraph's fire,
'Tis mounted on his wing,
Bursts through heaven's crystal gates, and gains
Sure audience of its king:

The labouring soul from sore distress
That blest expedient frees;
I see you far advanc'd in peace;
I see you on your knees:

How on that posture has the beam
Divine for ever shone!
An humble heart, God's other seat!
The rival of his throne:

And stoops Omnipotence so low!
And condescends to dwell,
Eternity's inhabitant,
Well pleas'd, in such a cell?

Such honour how shall we repay?
How treat a guest divine?
The sacrifice supreme be slain!
Let self-will die: Resign.

Thus far, at large, on our disease;
Now let the cause be shown,
Whence rises, and will ever rise,
The dismal human groan:

What our sole fountain of distress?
Strong passion for this scene;
That trifles make important, things
Of mighty moment mean:

When earth's dark maxims poison shed
On our polluted souls,
Our hearts and interests fly as far
Asunder, as the poles;

Like princes in a cottage nurs'd,
Unknown their royal race,
With abject aims, and sordid joys,
Our grandeur we disgrace;

O! for an Archimedes new,
Of moral powers possess'd,
The world to move, and quite expel
That traitor from the breast.

No small advantage may be reap'd
From thought whence we descend;
From weighing well, and prizing weigh'd
Our origin, and end:

From far above the glorious sun
To this dim scene we came;
And may if wise, for ever bask,
In great Jehovah's beam:

Let that bright beam on reason rous'd
In awful lustre rise,
Earth's giant-ills are dwarf'd at once,
And all disquiet dies.

Earth's glories too their splendour lose,
Those phantoms charm no more;

* Isaiah lvii. 15.

Empire's a feather for a fool,
And Indian mines are poor;

Then levell'd quite, whilst yet alive,
The monarch and his slave;
Not wait enlighten'd minds to learn
That lesson from the grave:

A George the Third would then be low
As Lewis in renown,
Could he not boast of glory more
Than sparkles from a crown.

When human glory rises high
As human glory can;
When, though the king is truly great,
Still greater is the man;

The man is dead, where virtue fails;
And though the monarch proud
In grandeur shines, his gorgeous robe
Is but a gaudy shroud.

Wisdom! where art thou? None on earth,
Though grasping wealth, fame, power,
But what, O death! through thy approach,
Is wiser every hour;

Approach how swift, how unconfin'd!
Worms feast on viands rare,
These little epicures have kings
To grace their bill of fare:

From kings what Resignation due
To that Almighty will,
Which thrones bestows, and, when they fail,
Can throne them higher still?

Who truly great? The good and brave,
The masters of a mind
The will divine to do resolv'd,
To suffer it resign'd.

Madam! if that may give it weight,
The trifle you receive
Is dated from a solemn scene,
The border of the grave;

Where strongly strikes the trembling soul
Eternity's dread power,
As bursting on it through the thin
Partition of an hour;

Hear this, Voltaire! but this from me,
Runs hazard of your frown;
However, spare it; ere you die
Such thoughts will be your own.

In mercy to yourself forbear
My notions to chastise,
Lest unawares the gay Voltaire
Should blame Voltaire the wise:

Fame's trumpet rattling in your ear,
Now, makes us disagree;
When a far louder trumpet sounds,
Voltaire will close with me:

How shocking is that modesty,
Which keeps some honest men;
From urging what their hearts suggest,
When brav'd by folly's pen

Assaulting truths, of which in all
Is sown the sacred seed !
Our constitution's orthodox,
And closes with our creed :

What then are they, whose proud conceits
Superior wisdom boast ?
Wretches, who fight their own belief,
And labour to be lost !

Though vice, by no superior joys
Her heroes keeps in pay ;
Through pure-disinterested love
Of ruin they obey !

Strict their devotion to the wrong,
Though tempted by no prize ;
Hard their commandments, and their creed
A magazine of lies

From fancy's forge : gay fancy smiles
At reason plain, and cool ;
Fancy, whose curious trade it is
To make the finest fool.

Voltaire ! long life's the greatest curse
That mortal's can receive,
When they imagine the chief end
Of living is to live ;

Quite thoughtless of their day of death,
That birth-day of their sorrow !
Knowing, it may be distant far,
Nor crush them till—to-morrow.

These are cold, northern thoughts, conceiv'd
Beneath an humble cot ;
Not mine, your genius, or your state,
No * castle is my lot :

But soon, quite level shall we lie ;
And, what pride most bemoans,
Our parts, in rank so distant now,
As level as our bones ;

Hear you that sound ? Alarming sound ?
Prepare to meet your fate !
One, who writes Finis to our works,
Is knocking at the gate ;

Far other works will soon be weigh'd ;
Far other judges sit ;
Far other crowns be lost or won,
Than fire ambitious wit :

Their wit far brightest will be prov'd,
Who sunk it in good sense ;
And veneration most profound
Of dread Omnipotence.

'Tis that alone unlocks the gate
Of blest eternity ;
O ! may'st thou never, never lose
That more than † golden key !

Whate'er may seem too rough excuse,
Your good I have at heart :
Since from my soul I wish you well ;
As yet we must not part :

* Letter to Lord Lyttelton.

† Alluding to Prussia.

Shall you, and I, in love with life,
Life's future schemes contrive,
The world in wonder not unjust,
That we are still alive ?

What have we left ? How mean in man
A shadow's shade to crave !
When life, so vain ! is vainer still,
'Tis time to take your leave :

Happier, than happiest life, is death,
Who falling in the field
Of conflict with his rebel will,
Writes Vici, on his shield ;

So falling man, immortal heir
Of an eternal prize ;
Undaunted at the gloomy grave,
Descends into the skies.

O ! how disorder'd our machine,
When contradictions mix !
When nature strikes no less than twelve,
And folly points at six !

To mend the moments of your heart,
How great is my delight
Gently to wind your morals up,
And set your hand aright !

That hand which spread your wisdom wide
To poison distant lands :
Repent, recant ; the tainted age
Your antidote demands.

To Satan dreadfully resign'd,
Whole herds rush down the steep
Of folly, by lewd wits possess'd,
And perish in the deep.

Men's praise your vanity puffs up ;
'Tis well, pursue it still ;
But let it be of men deceas'd,
And you'll resign the will.

And how superior they to those
At whose applause you aim ;
How very far superior they
In number and in name !

POSTSCRIPT.

Thus have I written, when to write
No mortal should presume ;
Or only write, what none can blame,
Hic jacet—for his tomb.

The public frowns, and censures loud
My puerile employ ;
Though just the censure, if you smile,
The scandal I enjoy ;

But sing no more—no more I sing
Or reassume the lyre,
Unless vouchsaf'd an humble part
Where Raphael leads the choir.

What myriads swell the concert loud !
Their golden harps resound
High as the footstool of the throne,
And deep as hell profound ;

Hell (horrid contrast!) chord and song
Of raptur'd angels drowns
In self-will's peal of blasphemies,
And hideous burst of groans;

But drowns them not to me; I hear
Harmonious thunders roll
(In language low of men to speak)
From echoing pole to pole!

Whilst this grand chorus shakes the skies---
"Above, beneath the sun,
"Through boundless age, by men, by gods,
"Jehovah's will be done."

'Tis done in heaven; whence headlong hurl'd
Self-will with Satan fell;
And must from earth be banish'd too,
Or earth's another hell.

Madam! self-will inflicts your pains;
Self-will's the deadly foe
Which deepens all the dismal shades,
And points the shafts of woe.

Your debt to nature fully paid,
Now virtue claims her due:
But virtue's cause I need not plead,
'Tis safe; I write to you.

You know that virtue's basis lies
In ever judging right,
And wiping error's clouds away,
Which dim the mental sight.

Why mourn the dead? you wrong the grave,
From storm that safe resort;
We are still tossing out at sea,
Our admiral in port.

Was death deny'd, this world a scene
How dismal and forlorn!
To death we owe that 'tis to man
A blessing to be born;

When every other blessing fails,
Or sapp'd by slow decay,
Or, storm'd by sudden blasts of fate,
Is swiftly whirl'd away;

How happy! that no storm or time
Of death can rob the just!
None pluck from their unaching heads
Soft pillows in the dust!

Well pleas'd to bear heaven's darkest frown,
Your utmost power employ;
'Tis noble chemistry to turn
Necessity to joy.

Whate'er the colour of my fate,
My fate shall be my choice:
Determin'd am I, whilst I breathe,
To praise and to rejoice.

What ample cause! triumphant hope!
O rich eternity!
I start not at a world in flames,
Charm'd with one glimpse of thee.

And thou! its great inhabitant!
How glorious dost thou shine!
And dart through sorrow, danger, death,
A beam of joy divine!

The void of joy (with some concern
The truth severe I tell)
Is an impenitent in guilt,
A fool or infidel.

Weigh this, ye pupils of Voltaire!
From joyless murmur free;
Or let us know which character
Shall crown you of the three.

Resign, resign; this lesson none
Too deeply can instil;
A crown has been resign'd by more
Than have resign'd the will.

Though will resign'd the meanest makes
Superior in renown,
And richer in celestial eyes
Than he who wears a crown.

Hence, in the bosom cold of age,
It kindled a strange aim
To shine in song, and bid me boast
The grandeur of my theme.

But oh! how far presumption falls
Its lofty theme below!
Our thoughts in life's December freeze,
And numbers cease to flow.

First! greatest! best! grant what I wrote
For others ne'er may rise
To brand the writer; thou alone
Canst make our wisdom wise.

And how unwise! how deep in guilt!
How infamous the fault!
"A teacher thron'd in pomp of words,
"Indeed beneath the taught!"

Means most infallible to make
The world an infidel;
And, with instructions most divine,
To pave a path to hell.

O! for a clean and ardent heart,
O! for a soul on fire,
Thy praise, begun on earth, to sound
Where angels string the lyre.

How cold is man! to him how hard (Hard what most easy seems)
"To set a just esteem on that
"Which yet he---most esteems."

What shall we say, when boundless bliss
Is offer'd to mankind,
And to that offer when a race
Of rationals is blind?

Of human nature ne'er too high
Are our ideas wrought;
Of human merit ne'er too low
Depress'd the daring thought.

ON THE LATE QUEEN'S DEATH,
AND HIS MAJESTY'S ACCESSION TO THE THRONE.

INSCRIBED TO JOSEPH ADDISON, ESQ.

SECRETARY TO THEIR EXCELLENCIES THE LORDS JUSTICES.

"— Gaudia Curis."—Hor.

MDCCLXIV.

SIR, I have long, and with impatience, fought
To ease the fullness of my grateful thought,
My fame at once and duty to pursue,
And please the public, by respect to you.

Though you, long since beyond Britannia known,
Have spread your country's glory with your own,
To me you never did more lovely shine,
Than when so late the kindled wrath divine
Quench'd our ambition in great Anna's fate,
And darken'd all the pomp of human state.
Though you are rich in fame, and fame decay,
Though rais'd in life, and greatness fade away,
Your lustre brightens; virtue cuts the gloom
With purer rays, and sparkles near a tomb.

Know, Sir, the great esteem and honour due,
I chose that moment to profess to you,
When sadness reign'd, when fortune, so severe,
Had warm'd our bosoms to be most sincere.
And when no motives could have force to raise
A serious value, and provoke my praise,
But such as rise above, and far transcend
Whatever glories with this world shall end,
Then shining forth, when deepest shades shall blot
The sun's bright orb, and Cato be forgot.
I sing—but ah! my theme I need not tell,
See every eye with conscious sorrow swell:
Who now to verse would raise his humble voice,
Can only show his duty, not his choice.
How great the weight of grief our hearts sustain!
We languish, and to speak is to complain.

Let us look back (for who too oft can view
That most illustrious scene, for ever new!)
See all the seasons shine on Anna's throne,
And pay a constant tribute not their own.
Her summer's heats nor fruits alone bestow,
They reap the harvest, and subdue the foe;
And when black storms confess the distant sun,
Her winters wear the wreaths her summers won.
Revolving pleasures in their turns appear,
And triumphs are the product of the year.
To crown the whole, great joys in greater cease,
And glorious victory is lost in peace.

Whence this profusion on our favour'd isle?
Did partial fortune on our virtue smile?
Or did the sceptre, in great Anna's hand,
Stretch forth this rich indulgence o'er our land?

Ungrateful Britain! quit thy groundless claim,
Thy queen and thy good fortune are the same.

Hear, with alarms our trumpets fill the sky;
'Tis Anna reigns! the Gallic squadrons fly.
We spread our canvases to the southern shore;
'Tis Anna reigns! the south resigns her store.
Her virtue smooths the tumult of the main,
And swells the field with mountains of the slain.
Argyll and Churchill but the glory share,
While millions lie subdu'd by Anna's prayer.

How great her zeal! how fervent her desire!
How did her soul in holy warmth expire!
Constant devotion did her time divide,
Nor set returns of pleasure or of pride,
Not want of rest, or the sun's parting ray,
But finish'd duty, limited the day.
How sweet succeeding sleep! what lovely themes
Smil'd in her thoughts, and soften'd all her dreams!
Her royal couch descending angels spread,
And join'd their wings a shelter o'er her head.

Though Europe's wealth and glory claim'd a part,
Religion's cause reign'd mistress of her heart:
She saw, and griev'd to see, the mean estate
Of those who round the hallow'd altar wait;
She shed her bounty piously profuse,
And thought it more her own in sacred use.

Thus on his furrow see the tiller stand,
And fill with genial seed his lavish hand;
He trusts the kindness of the fruitful plain,
And providently scatters all his grain.

What strikes my sight? does proud Augusta rise
New to behold, and awfully surprise!
Her lofty brow more numerous turrets crown,
And sacred domes on palaces look down:
A noble pride of piety is shown,
And temples cast a lustre on the throne.
How would this work another's glory raise!
But Anna's greatness robs her of the praise.
Drown'd in a brighter blaze it disappears.
Who dry'd the widows and the orphans tears?
Who stoop'd from high to succour the distress'd,
And reconcile the wounded heart to rest?
Great in her goodness, well could we perceive,
Whoever fought, it was a queen that gave.
Misfortune lost her name; her guiltless frown
But made another debtor to the crown;

And each unfriendly stroke from fate we bore,
Became our title to the regal store.

Thus injur'd trees adopt a foreign shoot,
And their wounds blossom with a fairer fruit.

Ye numbers, who on your misfortunes thriv'd,
When first the dreadful blast of fame arriv'd,
Say what a shock, what agonies you felt,
How did your souls with tender anguish melt!
That grief which living Anna's love suppress'd,
Shook like a tempest every grateful breast.
A second fate our sinking fortunes try'd!
A second time our tender parents dy'd!

Heroes returning from the field we crown,
And deify the haughty victor's frown.
His splendid wealth too rashly we admire,
Catch the disease, and burn with equal fire:
Wisely to spend is the great art of gain;
And one relief'd transcends a million slain.
When time shall ask where once Ramillia lay,
Or Danube flow'd that swept whole troops away,
One drop of water, that refresh'd the dry,
Shall rise a fountain of eternal joy.

But ah! to that unknown and distant date;
Is virtue's great reward push'd off by fate;
Here random shafts in every breast are found,
Virtue and merit but provoke the wound.
August in native worth and regal state,
Anna fate arbitress of Europe's fate;
To distant realms did every accent fly,
And nations watch'd each moment of her eye.
Silent, nor longer awful to be seen,
How small a spot contains the mighty queen!
No throng of suppliant princes mark the place,
Where Britain's greatness is compos'd in peace:
The broken earth is scarce discern'd to rise,
And a stone tells us where the monarch lies.

Thus end maturest honours of the crown!
This is the last conclusion of renown!

So when with idle skill the wanton boy [joy,
Breathes through his tube; he sees, with eager
The trembling bubble, in its rising small;
And by degrees expands the glittering ball.
But when, to full perfection blown, it flies
High in the air, and shines in various dyes,
The little monarch, with a falling tear,
Sees his world burst at once, and disappear.
'Tis not in sorrow to reverse our doom,
No groans unlock th' inexorable tomb!
Why then this fond indulgence of our woe!
What fruit can rise, or what advantage flow!
Yes, this advantage; from our deep distress
We learn how much in George the gods can bless.

Had a less glorious princess left the throne,
But half the hero had at first been shown:
An Anna falling all the king employs,
To vindicate from guilt our rising joys:
Our joys arise and innocently shine,
Auspicious monarch! what a praise is thine!

Welcome, great stranger, to Britannia's throne!
Nor let thy country think thee all her own.
Of thy delay how oft did we complain!
Our hopes reach'd out, and met thee on the main.
With prayer we smooth the billows for thy fleet;
With ardent wishes fill thy swelling sheet;
And when thy foot took place on Albion's shore,
We bending bless'd the gods, and ask'd no more.
What hand but thine should conquer and com-
pose,

Join those whom interest joins, and chase our foes?
Repel the daring youth's presumptuous aim,
And by his rival's greatness give him fame?
Now in some foreign court he may sit down,
And quit without a blush the British crown.
Secure his honour, though he lose his store,
And take a lucky moment to be poor.

Nor think, great Sir, now first, at this late hour,
In Britain's favour, you exert your power;
To us, far back in time, I joy to trace
The numerous tokens of your princely grace.
Whether you chose to thunder on the Rhine,
Inspire grave councils, or in courts to shine;
In the more scenes your genius was display'd,
The greater debt was on Britannia laid:
They all conspir'd this mighty man to raise,
And your new subjects proudly share the praise.

All share; but may not we have leave to boast
That we contemplate, and enjoy it most?
This ancient nurse of arts, indulg'd by fate
On gentle Isis' bank, a calm retreat,
For many rolling ages justly fam'd,
Has through the world her loyalty proclaim'd;
And often pour'd (too well the truth is known!)
Her blood and treasure to support the throne!
For England's church her latest accents strain'd;
And freedom with her dying hand retain'd,
No wonder then her various ranks agree
In all the fervencies of zeal for thee.

What though thy birth a distant kingdom boast,
And seas divide thee from the British coast?
The crown's impatient to enclose thy head:
Why stay thy feet? the cloth of gold is spread.
Our strict obedience through the world shall tell
That king's a Briton, who can govern well!

THE INSTALMENT.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR ROBERT WALPOLE.

KNIGHT OF THE MOST NOBLE ORDER OF THE GARTER.

"Quæsitam Meritis." HOR.

MDCCLXXVI.

WITH invocations some their breasts inflame;
I need no muse, a Walpole is my theme.

Ye mighty dead, ye garter'd sons of praise!
Our morning stars! our boast in former days!

Which hovering o'er, your purple wings display,
Lur'd by the pomp of this distinguish'd day,
Stoop, and attend: by one, the knee be bound;
One, throw the mantle's crimson folds around;
By that, the sword on his proud thigh be plac'd;
This, clasp the diamond-girdle round his waist;
His breast, with rays, let just Godolphin spread,
Wife Burleigh plant the plumage on his head,
And Edward own, since first he fix'd the race,
None prest fair glory with a swifter pace.

When fate would call some mighty genius forth
To wake a drooping age to godlike worth,
Or aid some favourite king's illustrious toil,
It bids his blood with generous ardour boil;
His blood, from virtue's celebrated source,
Pour'd down the steep of time, a lengthen'd course;
That men prepar'd may just attention pay,
Warn'd by the dawn to mark the glorious day,
When all the scatter'd merits of his line
Collected to a point, intensely shine.

See, Britain, see thy Walpole shine from far,
His azure ribbon, and his radiant star;
A star that, with auspicious beams, shall guide
Thy vessel safe, through fortune's roughest tide.

If peace still smiles, by this shall commerce steer
A finish'd course, in triumph round the sphere;
And, gathering tribute from each distant shore,
In Britain's lap the world's abundance pour.

If war's ordain'd, this star shall dart its beams
Through that black cloud which rising from the Thames,

With thunder, form'd of Brunswick's wrath, is sent
To claim the seas, and awe the continent.
This shall direct it, where the bolt to throw,
A star for us, a comet to the foe.

At this the muse shall kindle, and aspire:
My breast, O Walpole, glows with grateful fire.
The streams of royal bounty, turn'd by thee,
Refresh the dry domains of poetry.
My fortune shows, when arts are Walpole's care,
What slender worth forbids us to despair:
Be this thy partial smile from censure free;
'Twas meant for merit, though it fell on me.

Since Brunswick's smile has authoris'd my muse,
Chaste be her conduct, and sublime her views.
False praises are the whoredoms of the pen,
Which prostitute fair fame to worthless men:
This profanation of celestial fire
Makes fools despise, what wise men should admire.
Let those I praise to distant times be known,
Not by their author's merit, but their own.
If others think the task is hard, to weed
From verse rank flattery's vivacious seed,
And rooted deep; one means must set them free
Patron! and patriot! let them sing of thee.

While vulgar trees ignobler honours wear,
Nor those retain, when winter chills the year;
The generous Orange, favourite of the sun, [run;
With vigorous charms can through the seasons
Defies the storm with her tenacious green;
And flowers and fruits in rival pomp are seen:
Where blossoms fall, still fairer blossoms spring;
And midst their sweets the feather'd poets sing.

On Walpole, thus, may pleas'd Britannia view
At once her ornament and profit too;

The fruit of service, and the bloom of fame,
Matur'd, and gilded by the royal beam.
He, when the nipping blasts of envy rise,
Its guilt can pity, and its rage despise;
Lest fall no honours, but securely great
Unfaded holds the colour of his fate:
No winter knows, though rifling factions press;
By wisdom deeply rooted in success;
One glory shed, a brighter is display'd *;
And the charm'd muses shelter in his shade.

O how I long, enkindled by the theme,
In deep eternity to launch thy name!
Thy name in view, no rights of verse I plead,
But what chaste truth indites, old time shall read.

"Behold! a man of ancient faith and blood,
Which, soon, beat high for arts, and public
good;

"Whose glory great, but natural appears,
The genuine growth of services and years;
No sudden exhalation drawn on high,
And fondly gilt by partial majesty:
One bearing greatest toils with greatest ease,
One born to serve us, and yet born to please:
Whom, while our rights in equal scales he lays,
The prince may trust, and yet the people praise,
His genius ardent, yet his judgment clear,
His tongue is flowing, and his heart sincere,
His council guides, his temper cheers our isle,
And, smiling, gives three kingdoms cause to smile."

Joy then to Britain, blest with such a son,
To Walpole joy, by whom the prize is won;
Who nobly-conscious meets the smiles of fate.
True greatness lies in daring to be great.
Let dastard souls, or affectation, run
To shades, nor wear bright honours fairly won;
Such men prefer, misled by false applause,
The pride of modesty to virtue's cause.
Honours, which make the face of virtue fair,
'Tis great to merit, and 'tis wise to wear;
'Tis holding up the prize to public view,
Confirms grown virtue, and inflames the new;
Hightens the lustre of our age and clime,
And sheds rich seeds of worth for future time.

Proud chiefs alone, in fields of slaughter fam'd,
Of old, this azure bloom of glory claim'd,
As when stern Ajax pour'd a purple flood,
The violet rose, fair daughter of his blood.
Now rival wisdom dares the wreath divide,
And both Minervas rise in equal pride;
Proclaiming loud, a monarch fills the throne,
Who shines illustrious not in wars alone.

Let fame look lovely in Britannia's eyes;
They coldly court desert, who fame despise.
For what's ambition, but fair virtue's sail?
And what applause, but her propitious gale?
When swell'd with that, she fleets before the wind

To glorious aims, as to the port design'd:
When chain'd, without it, to the labouring oar,
She toils! she pants! nor gains the flying shore,
From her sublime pursuits, or turn'd aside
By blasts of envy, or by fortune's tide:

* Knight of the Bath, and then of the Garter.

For one that has succeeded ten are lost,
Of equal talents, ere they make the coast.
Then let renown to worth divine incite,
With all her beams, but throw those beams
aright.
Then merit droops, and genius downward tends,
When godlike glory, like our land, descends.
Custom the garter long confin'd to few,
And gave to birth, exalted virtue's due:
Walpole has thrown the proud enclosure down;
And high desert embraces fair renown.
Though rival'd, let the peerage smiling see
(Smiling, in justice to their own degree),
This proud reward by majesty bestow'd
On worth like that whence first the peerage flow'd.
From frowns of fate Britannia's bliss to guard,
Let subjects merit, and let kings reward.

Gods are most gods by giving to excel,
And kings most like them, by rewarding well.
Though strong the twanging nerve, and drawn aright.
Short is the winged arrow's upward flight;
But if an eagle it transfix on high,
Lodg'd in the wound, it soars into the sky.
Thus while I sing thee with unequal lays,
And wound perhaps that worth I mean to praise;
Yet I transcend myself, I rise in fame,
Not lifted by my genius, but my theme.
No more: for in this dread suspense of fate,
Now kingdoms fluctuate, and in dark debate
Weigh peace and war, now Europe's eyes are bent
On mighty Brunswick, for the great event,
Brunswick of kings the terror or defence!
Who dares detain thee at a world's expence?

EPISTLES.

To the Right Honourable
GEORGE LORD LANSDOWNE. 1712.

“ —Parnassia laurus
“ Parva sub ingenti matris se subjecit umbra.”
VIRG.

WHEN Rome, my lord, in her full glory shone,
And great Augustus rul'd the globe alone,
While suppliant kings in all their pomp and state,
Swarm'd in his courts, and throng'd his palace
gate;

Horace did oft' the mighty man detain,
And sooth'd his breast with no ignoble strain;
Now soar'd aloft, now struck an humbler string;
And taught the Roman genius how to sing.

Pardon, if I his freedom dare pursue,
Who know no want of Cæsar, finding you;
The muse's friend is pleas'd the muse should press
Through circling crowds, and labour for access,
That partial to his darling he may prove,
And shining throngs for her approach remove,
To all the world industrious to proclaim
His love of arts, and boast the glorious flame.

Long has the western world reclin'd her head,
Pour'd forth her sorrow, and bewail'd her dead;
Fell discord through her borders fiercely rang'd,
And shook her nations, and her monarchs chang'd;
By land and sea its utmost rage employ'd;
Nor heaven repair'd so fast as men destroy'd.

In vain kind summers plenteous fields bestow'd,
In vain the vintage liberally flow'd;
Alarms from loaden boards all pleasures chas'd,
And robb'd the rich Burgudian grape of taste;
The smiles of nature could no blessing bring,
The fruitful autumn, or the flowery spring;
Time was distinguish'd by the sword and spear,
Not by the various aspects of the year;

The trumpet's sound proclaim'd a milder sky,
And bloodshed told us when the sun was nigh.

But now (so soon is Britain's blessings seen,
When such as you are near her glorious queen!)
Now peace, though long repuls'd, arrives at last,
And bids us smile on all our labours past;
Bids every nation cease her wonted moan,
And every monarch call his crown his own:
To valour gentler virtues now succeed;
No longer is the great man born to bleed;
Renown'd in councils, brave Argyll shall tell,
Wisdom and prowess in one breast may dwell:
Through milder tracts he soars to deathless fame,
And without trembling we resound his name.

No more the rising harvest whets the sword,
No longer waves uncertain of its lord;
Who cast the seed, the golden sheaf shall claim,
Nor chance of battle change the master's name.
Each stream unstain'd with blood more smoothly flows;

The brighter sun a fuller day bestows;
All nature seems to wear a cheerful face,
And thank great Anna for returning peace.

The patient thus, when on his bed of pain,
No longer he invokes the gods in vain,
But rises to new life; in every field
He finds Elysium, rivers nectar yield;
Nothing so cheap and vulgar but can please,
And borrow beauties from his late disease.

Nor is it peace alone, but such a peace,
As more than bids the rage of battle cease,
Death may determine war, and rest succeed,
Cause nought survives on which our rage may feed;

In faithful friends we lose our glorious foes,
And strifes of love exalt our sweet repose.
See graceful Bolingbroke your friend advance,
Nor miss his Lansdowne in the court of France;

So well receiv'd, so welcome, so at home,
 (Bless'd change of fate) in Bourbon's stately dome;
 The monarch pleas'd, descending from his throne,
 Will not that Anna call him all her own;
 He claims a part, and looking round to find Something might speak the fulness of his mind,
 A diamond shines, which oft had touch'd him near,
 Renew'd his grief, and robb'd him of a tear;
 Now first with joy beheld, well plac'd on one,
 Who makes him less regret his darling son;
 So dear is Anna's minister, so great
 Your glorious friend in his own private state.

To make our nations longer two, in vain
 Does nature interpose the raging main:
 The Gallic shore to distant Britain grows,
 For Lewis Thames, the Seine for Anna flows:
 From conflicts pass'd each other's worth we find,
 And thence in stricter friendship now are join'd;
 Each wound receiv'd, now pleads the cause of love,
 And former injuries endearments prove.
 What Briton but must prize th' illustrious sword,
 That cause of fear to Churchill could afford?
 Who sworn to Bourbon's sceptre, but must frame
 Vast thoughts of him, that could brave Tallard tame?

Thus generous hatred in affection ends, [friends
 And war, which rais'd the foes, completes the
 A thousand happy consequences flow
 (The dazzling prospect makes my bosom glow);
 Commerce shall lift her swelling sails, and roll
 Her wealthy fleets secure from pole to pole;
 The British merchant, who with care and pain
 For many moons sees only skies and main;
 When now in view of his lov'd native shore,
 The perils of the dreadful ocean o'er,
 Cause to regret his wealth no more shall find,
 Nor curse the mercy of the sea and wind;
 By hardest fate condemn'd to serve a foe,
 And give him strength to strike a deeper blow.
 Sweet Philomela providently flies
 To distant woods and streams, for such supplies,
 To feed her young, and make them try the wing,
 And with their tender notes attempt to sing:
 Meanwhile, the fowler spreads his secret snare,
 And renders vain the tuneful mother's care.
 Britannia's bold adventurer of late,
 The foaming ocean plow'd with equal fate.

Goodness is greatness in its utmost height,
 And power a curse, if not a friend to right:
 To conquer is to make dissention cease,
 That man may serve the King of kings in peace.
 Religion now shall all her rays dispense,
 And shine abroad in perfect excellence;
 Else we may dread some greater curse at hand,
 To scourge a thoughtless and ungrateful land:
 Now war is weary, and retir'd to rest;
 The meagre famine, and the spotted pest,
 Deputed in her stead, may blast the day,
 And sweep the relics of the sword away.

When peaceful Numa fill'd the Roman throne,
 Jove in the fulness of his glory shone;
 Wise Solomon, a stranger to the sword,
 Was born to raise a temple to the Lord.
 Anne too shall build, and every sacred pile
 Speak peace eternal to Britannia's isle.

Those mighty souls, whom military care
 Diverted from their only great affair,
 Shall bend their full united force, to bless
 Th' Almighty Author of their late success.
 And what is all the world subdued to this?
 The grave sets bounds to sublunary bliss;
 But there are conquests to great Anna known,
 Above the splendour of an earthly throne;
 Conquests! whose triumph is too great, within
 The scanty bounds of matter to begin;
 Too glorious to shine forth, till it has run
 Beyond this darkness of the stars and sun,
 And shall whole ages past be still, still but begun.

Heroic shades! whom war has swept away,
 Look down, and smile on this auspicious day:
 Now boast your deaths; to those your glory tell,
 Who or at Agincourt or Cressy fell;
 Then deep into eternity retire,
 Of greater things than peace or war inquire;
 Fully content, and unconcern'd, to know
 What farther passes in the world below.

The bravest of mankind shall now have leave
 To die but once, nor piece-meal seek the grave:
 On gain or pleasure bent, we shall not meet
 Sad melancholy numbers in each street
 (Owners of bones dispers'd on Flandria's plain,
 Or wasting in the bottom of the main);
 To turn us back from joy, in tender fear,
 Lest it an insult of their woes appear,
 And make us grudge ourselves that wealth, their blood
 Perhaps preserv'd, who starve, or beg for food.
 Devotion shall run pure, and disengage
 From that strange fate of mixing peace with rage.
 On heaven without a sin we now may call,
 And guiltless to our Maker prostrate fall;
 Be Christians while we pray, nor in one breath
 Ask mercy for ourselves, for others death.

But O! I view with transport arts restor'd,
 Which double use to Britain shall afford;
 Secure her glory purchas'd in the field,
 And yet for future peace sweet motives yield:
 While we contemplate on the painted wall,
 The pressing Briton, and the flying Gaul,
 In such bright images, such living grace,
 As leave the great Raphael but the second place;
 Our cheeks shall glow, our heaving bosoms rise,
 And martial ardors sparkle in our eyes;
 Much we shall triumph in our battles past,
 And yet consent those battles prove our last;
 Lest, while in arms for brighter fame we strive,
 We lose the means to keep that fame alive.

In silent groves the birds delight to sing,
 Or near the margin of a secret spring:
 Now all is calm, sweet music shall improve,
 Nor kindle rage, but be the nurse of love.

But what's the warbling voice, the trembling string,
 Or breathing canvass, when the muses sing?
 The muse, my Lord, your care above the rest,
 With rising joy dilates my partial breast;
 The thunder of the battle ceas'd to roar,
 Ere Greece her godlike poets taught to soar;
 Rome's dreadful foe, great Hannibal, was dead,
 And all her warlike neighbours round her bled;

For Janus shut, her Iō Pæans rung,
Before an Ovid or a Virgil sung.

A thousand various forms the muse may wear
(A thousand various forms become the fair);
But shines in none with more majestic mien,
Than when in state she draws the purple scene;
Calls forth her monarchs, bids her heroes rage,
And mourning beauty melt the crowded stage;
Charms back past ages, gives to Britain's use
The noblest virtues time did e'er produce;
Leaves fam'd historians' boasted art behind;
They keep the soul alone, and that's confin'd,
Sought out with pains, and but by proxy speaks:
The hero's presence deep impression makes;
The scenes his soul and body reunite,
Furnish a voice, produce him to the sight;
Make our contemporary him that stood
High in renown, perhaps before the flood;
Make Nestor to this age advice afford,
And Hector for our service draw his sword.

More glory to an author what can bring,
Whence nobler service to his country spring,
Than from those labours, which, in man's despatch,
Possess him with a passion for the right?
With honest magic make the knave inclin'd
To pay devotion to the virtuous mind;
Through all her toils and dangers bid him rove,
And with her wants and anguish fall in love?

Who hears the godlike Montezuma groan,
And does not wish the glorious pain his own?
Lend but your understanding, and their skill
Can domineer at pleasure o'er your will:
Nor is the short-liv'd conquest quickly past;
Shame, if not choice, will hold the convert fast.

How often have I seen the generous bowl
With pleasing force unlock a secret soul,
And steal a truth, which every sober hour
(The prose of life) had kept within her power?
The grape victorious often has prevail'd,
When gold and beauty, racks and tortures, fail'd:
Yet when the spirit's tumult was allay'd,
She mourn'd, perhaps, the sentiment betray'd;
But mourn'd too late, nor longer could deny,
And on her own confession charge the lie.

Thus they, whom neither the prevailing love
Of goodness here, or mercy from above,
Or fear of future pains, or human laws
Could render advocates in virtue's cause,
Caught by the scene, have unawares resign'd
Their wonted disposition of the mind:
By slow degrees prevails the pleasing tale,
As circling glasses on our senses steal;
Till thoroughly by the muses' banquet warm'd,
The passions tossing, all the soul alarm'd,
They turn more zealots flush'd with glorious rage,
Rise in their seats, and scarce forbear the stage,
Assistance to wrong'd innocence to bring,
Or turn the poignard on some tyrant king.
How can they cool to villains? how subside
To dregs of vice, from such a godlike pride?
To spoiling orphans how to-day return,
Who wept last night to see Monimia mourn?
In this gay school of virtue, whom so fit
To govern, and control the world of wit,

As Talbot, Lansdowne's friend, has Britain known?
Him polish'd Italy has call'd her own;
He in the lap of elegance was bred,
And trac'd the muses to their fountain head:
But much we hope, he will enjoy at home
What's nearer ancient than the modern Rome.
Nor fear I mention of the court of France,
When I the British genius would advance;
There too has Shrewsbury improv'd his taste;
Yet still we dare invite him to our feast:
For Corneille's sake I shall my thoughts suppress
Of Oronoko, and presume him less:
What though we wrong him? Isabella's woe
Waters those bays that shall for ever grow.

Our foes confess, nor we the praise refuse,
The drama glories in the British muse.
The French are delicate, and nicely lead
Of close intrigue the labyrinthian thread;
Our genius more affects the grand, than fine,
Our strength can make the great plain action

shine:
They raise a great curiosity indeed,
From his dark maze to see the hero freed;
We rouse th' affections, and that hero show
Gasping beneath some formidable blow:
They sigh; we weep; the Gallic doubt and care
We heighten into terror and despair;
Strike home, the strongest passions boldly touch,
Nor fear our audience should be pleas'd too much.
What's great in nature we can greatly draw,
Nor thank for beauties the dramatic law.
The fate of Cæsar is a tale too plain
The fickle Gallic taste to entertain;
Their art would have perplex'd, and interwove
The golden arras with gay flowers of love:
We know heaven made him a far greater man
Than any Cæsar, in a human plan,
And such we draw him, nor are too refin'd,
To stand affected with what heaven design'd.
To claim attention, and the heart invade,
Shakspeare but wrote the play th' Almighty made.
Our neighbour's stage art too bare-fac'd betrays,
'Tis great Corneille at every scene we praise;
On nature's surer aid Britannia calls,
None think of Shakspeare till the curtain falls;
Then with a sigh returns our audience home,
From Venice, Egypt, Persia, Greece, or Rome.

France yields not to the glory of our lines,
But manly conduct of our strong designs;
That oft they think more justly we must own,
Nor ancient Greece a truer sense has shown:
Greece though but justly, they think justly too;
We sometimes err by striving more to do.
So well are Racine's meanest persons taught,
But change a sentiment you make a fault;
Nor dare we charge them with a want of flame:
When we boast more, we own ourselves to blame.

And yet in Shakspeare something still I find,
That makes me less esteem all humankind;
He made one nature, and another sound,
Both in his page with master-strokes abound;
His witches, fairies, and enchanted isle,
Bid us no longer at our nurses smile;
Of lost historians we almost complain,
Nor think it the creation of his brain,

Who lives, when his Othello's in a trance?
 With his great Talbot * too he conquer'd France.
 Long may we hope great Talbot's blood will run

In great descendants, Shakspeare was but one;
 And him, my lord, permit me not to name,
 But in kind silence spare his rival's shame:—
 Yet I in vain that author would suppress,
 What can't be greater, cannot be made less:
 Each reader will defeat my fruitless aim,
 And to himself great Agamemnon name.

Should Shakspeare rise unblest'd with Talbot's
 smile,

Ev'n Shakspeare's self would curse this barren isle:
 But if that reigning star propitious shine,
 And kindly mix his gentle rays with thine;
 Ev'n I, by far the meanest of your age,
 Shall not repent my passion for the stage.

Thus did the Will-almighty disallow,
 No human force could pluck the golden bough,
 Which left the tree with ease at Jove's command,

And spar'd the labour of the weakest hand.

Auspicious fate! that gives me leave to write
 To you, the muses glory and delight;
 Who know to read, nor false encomiums raise,
 And mortify an author with your praise:
 Praise wounds a noble mind, when 'tis not due,
 But censure's self will please, my lord, from you;
 Faults are our pride and gain, when you descend
 To point them out, and teach us how to mend.
 What though the great man set his coffers wide,
 That cannot gratify the poet's pride;
 Whose inspiration, if 'tis truly good,
 Is best rewarded, when best understood.
 The muses write for glory not for gold,
 'Tis far beneath their nature to be sold;
 The greatest gain is scorn'd, but as it serves
 To speak a sense of what the muse deserves;
 The muse, which from her Lansdowne fears no wrong,

Best judge, as well as subject of her song.
 Should this great theme allure me farther still,
 And I presume to use your patience ill,
 The world would plead my cause, and none but you
 Will take disgust at what I now pursue:
 Since what is mean my muse can't raise, I'll choose
 A theme that's able to exalt my muse. [name,

For who, not void of thought, can Granville
 Without a spark of his immortal flame?
 Whether we seek the patriot, or the friend,
 Let Bolingbroke, let Anna recommend;
 Whether we choose to love or to admire,
 You melt the tender, and th' ambitious fire.

Such native graces without thought abound,
 And such familiar glories spread around,
 As more incline the stander-by to raise
 His value for himself, than you to praise.
 Thus you befriend the most heroic way,
 Bless all, on none an obligation lay;
 So turn'd by nature's hand for all that's well,
 'Tis scarce a virtue when you most excel.

* An ancestor of the Duke of Shrewsbury, who conquered France, drawn by Shakspeare.

Though sweet your presence, graceful is your mein,

You to be happy want not to be seen;
 Though priz'd in public you can smile alone,
 Nor court an approbation but your own:
 In throngs, not conscious of those eyes that gaze
 In wonder fix'd, though resolute to please;
 You, were all blind, would still deserve ap-
 plause;

The world's your glory's witness, not its cause;
 That lies beyond the limits of the day,
 Angels behold it, and their God obey.

You take delight in others excellence;
 A gift which nature rarely does dispense:
 Of all that breathe 'tis you, perhaps, alone
 Would be well pleas'd to see yourself outdone.
 You wish not those, who show your name respect,
 So little worth, as might excuse neglect;
 Nor are in pain lest merit you should know;
 Nor shun the well-deserver as a foe;
 A troublesome acquaintance, that will claim
 To be well us'd, or dye your cheek with shame.

You wish your country's good; that told so
 well

Your powers are known, th' event I need not tell.
 When Nestor spoke, none ask'd if he prevail'd;
 That god of sweet persuasion never fail'd:
 And such great fame had Hector's valour wrought
 Who meant he conquer'd, only said he fought.

When you, my lord, to sylvan scenes retreat,
 No crowds around for pleasure, or for state,
 You are not cast upon a stranger land,
 And wander pensive o'er the barren strand;
 Now are you by receiv'd example taught,
 In toys to shun the discipline of thought;
 But unconfin'd by bounds of time and place,
 You choose companions from all human race;
 Converse with those the deluge swept away,
 Or those whose midnight is Britannia's day.

Books not so much in form, as give consent
 To those ideas your own thoughts present;
 Your only gain from turning volumes o'er,
 Is finding cause to like yourself the more:
 In Grecian sages you are only taught
 With more respect to value your own thought:
 Great Tully grew immortal, while he drew
 Those precepts we behold alive in you:
 Your life is so adjusted to their schools,
 It makes that history they meant for rules.
 What joy, what pleasing transport, must arise
 Within your breast, and lift you to the skies,
 When in each learned page that you unfold,
 You find some part of your own conduct told!

So pleas'd, and so surpris'd, Æneas stood,
 And such triumphant raptures fir'd his blood,
 When far from Trojan shores the hero spy'd
 His story shining forth in all its pride;
 Admir'd himself, and saw his actions stand
 The praise and wonder of a foreign land.

He knows not half his being, who's confin'd
 In converse, and reflection on mankind:
 Your soul, which understands her charter well,
 Disdains imprison'd by those skies to dwell;
 Ranges eternity without the leave
 Of death, nor waits the passage of the grave.

When pains eternal, and eternal bliss, [miss
When these high cares your weary thoughts dis-
In heavenly numbers you your soul unbend,
And for your ease to deathless fame descend.
Ye kings! would ye true greatness understand,
Read Seneca grown rich in Granville's hand*.

Behold the glories of your life complete!
Still at a flow, and permanently great;
New moments shed new pleasures as they fly,
And yet your greatest is, that you must die.

Thus Anna saw, and rais'd you to the seat
Of honour, and confess'd her servant great;
Confess'd not made him such; for faithful fame
Her trumpet swell'd long since with Granville's
name;

Though you in modesty the title wear,
Your name shall be the title of your heir;
Farther than ermine make his glory known,
And cast in shades the favour of a throne.
From thrones the beam of high distinction springs;
The soul's distinction from the King of kings,
Lo! one great day calls forth ten mighty peers!
Produce ten Granville's in five thousand years;
Anna, be thou content to fix the fate
Of various kingdoms, and controul the great;
But O! to bid thy Granville brighter shine!
To him that great prerogative resign,
Who the sun's height can raise at pleasure higher,
His lamp illumine, set his flames on fire.

Yet still one bliss, one glory, I forbear,
A darling friend whom near your heart you wear;
That lovely youth, my lord, whom you must blame,

That I grow thus familiar with your name.

He's friendly, open, in his conduct nice,
Nor serve these virtues to atone for vice:
Vice he has none, or such as none wish less,
But friends indeed, good-nature in excess.
You cannot boast the merit of a choice,
In making him your own, 'twas nature's voice,
Which call'd too loud by man to be withstood,
Pleading a type far nearer than of blood;
Similitude of manners, such a mind,
As makes you less the wonder of mankind.
Such ease his common converse recommends,
As he ne'er felt a passion but his friend's.
Yet fix'd his principles, beyond the force
Of all beneath the sun, to bend his course †.

Thus the tall cedar, beautiful and fair,
Flatters the motions of the wanton air;
Salutes each passing breeze with head inclin'd;
The pliant branches dance in every wind;
But fix'd the stem her upright state maintains,
And all the fury of the north disdains.

How are you blest in such a matchless friend!
Alas! with me the joys of friendship end;
O Harrison! I must, I will complain;
Tears sooth the soul's distress, though shed in vain;
Didst thou return, and bless thy native shore
With welcome peace, and is my friend no more?—
Thy task was early done, and I must own
Death kind to thee, but ah! to thee alone.

* See his Lordship's Tragedy, intituled "Heroic Love."

† His Lordship's nephew, who took orders;

But 'tis in me a vanity to mourn,
The sorrows of the great thy tomb adorn;
Stafford and Bolingbroke the loss perceive,
They grieve, and make thee envy'd in the grave:

With aching heart, and a foreboding mind,
I night to day in painful journey join'd,
When first inform'd of his approaching fate;
But reach'd the partner of my soul too late:
'Twas past, his cheek was cold, that tuneful
tongue,

Which Isis charm'd with his melodious song,
Now languish'd, wanted strength to speak his pain,
Scarce rais'd a feeble groan, and sunk again:
Each art of life, in which he bore a part,
Shot like an arrow through my bleeding heart.
To what serv'd all his promis'd wealth and power,
But more to load that most unhappy hour?

Yet still prevail'd the greatness of his mind;
That, not in health, or life itself confin'd,
Felt through his mortal pangs Britannia's peace,
Mounted to joy, and smil'd in death's embrace.

His spirit now just ready to resign,
No longer now his own, no longer mine,
He grasps my hand, his swimming eye-balls roll,
My hand he grasps, and enters in my soul;
Then with a groan—support me, O! beware
Of holding worth, however great, too dear*!

Pardon, my lord, the privilege of grief,
That in untimely freedom seeks relief;
To better fate your love I recommend,
O may you never lose so dear a friend!
May nothing interrupt your happy hours;
Enjoy the blessings peace on Europe showers:
Nor yet disdain those blessings to adorn;
To make the muse immortal you was born.
Sing; and in latest time, when story's dark,
This period your surviving fame shall mark;
Save from the gulf of years this glorious age,
And thus illustrate their historian's page.

The crown of Spain in doubtful balance hung,
And Anna Britain sway'd, when Granville sung:
That noted year Europa sheath'd her sword,
When this great man was first saluted lord.

TWO EPISTLES TO MR. POPE;

CONCERNING THE AUTHORS OF THE AGE. 1730.

EPISTLE I.

WHILST you at Twickenham plan the future
wood,
Or turn the volumes of the wise and good,
Our senate meets; at parties, parties bawl,
And pamphlets stun the streets, and load the stall;
So rushing tides bring things obscene to light,
Foul wrecks emerge, and dead dogs swim in sight;
The civil torrent foams, the tumult reigns,
And Codrus' prose works up, and Lico's strains.
Lo! what from cellars rise, what rush from high,
Where speculation roosted near the sky;
Letters, essays, sock, buskin, satire, song,
And all the garret thunders on the throng!

* The author here bewails that most ingenious gentleman, Mr. William Harrison, Fellow of New-College, Oxon.

O Pope! I burst; nor can, nor will refrain;
I'll write; let others in their turn complain:
Truce, truce, ye Vandals! my tormented ear
Lest dreads a pillory than a pamphleteer;
I've beard myself to death; and, plagu'd each hour,
Shan't I return the vengeance in my power?
For who can write the true absurd like me?—
Thy pardon, Codrus! who I mean but thee?

Pope! if like mine or Codrus' were thy style,
The blood of vipers had not stain'd thy file;
Merit less solid, less despite had bred;
They had not bit, and then they had not bled.
Fame is a public mistress none enjoys,
But more or less his rival's peace destroys;
With fame, in just proportion, envy grows;
The man that makes a character, makes foes:
Slight, peevish insects round a genius rise,
As a bright day awakes the world of flies;
With hearty malice, but with feeble wing,
(To show they live) they flutter, and they sting:
But as by depredations wasps proclaim
The fairest fruit, so these the fairest fame.

Shall we not censure all the motley train,
Whether with ale irriguous, or champaign?
Whether they tread the vale of prose, or climb,
And whet their appetites on cliffs of rhyme;
The college sloven, or embroider'd spark;
The purple prelate, or the parish clerk;
The quiet Quidnunc, or demanding Prig;
The plaintiff Tory, or defendant Whig;
Rich, poor, male, female, young, old, gay, or sad;
Whether extremely witty, or quite mad;
Profoundly dull, or shallowly polite;
Men that read well, or men that only write;
Whether peers, porters, taylors, tune the reeds,
And measuring words to measuring shapes succeeds;
For bankrupts write, when ruin'd shops are shut,
As maggots crawl from out a perish'd nut.
His hammer this, and that his trowel quits,
And wanting sense for tradesmen, serve for wits.
By thriving men subsists each other trade;
Of every broken craft a writer's made:
Thus his material, paper, takes its birth
From tatter'd rags of all the stuff on earth.

Hail, fruitful isle! to thee alone belong
Millions of wits, and brokers in old song;
Thee well a land of liberty we name,
Where all are free to scandal and to shame;
Thy sons, by print, may set their hearts at ease,
And be mankind's contempt, when'er they please;

Like trodden filth, their vile and abject sense
Is unperceiv'd, but when it gives offence:
This heavy prose our injur'd reason tires;
Their verse immortal kindles loose desires:
Our age they puzzle, and corrupt our prime,
Our sport and pity, punishment and crime.

What glorious motives urge our authors on,
Thus to undo, and thus to be undone!
One loses his estate, and down he sits;
To show (in vain!) he still retains his wits:
Another marries, and his dear proves keen;
He writes as an Hypnotic for the spleen:
Some write, confin'd by physic; some by debt;
Some, for 'tis Sunday; some because 'tis wet;

Through private pique some do the public right,
And love their king and country out of spight:
Another writes because his father writ,
And proves himself a bastard by his wit.

Has Lico learning, humour, thought profound?
Neither: why write then? He wants twenty pound:

His belly, not his brains, this impulse give;
He'll grow immortal; for he cannot live:
He rubs his awful front, and takes his ream,
With no provision made, but of his theme;
Perhaps a title has his fancy smit,
Or a quaint motto, which he thinks has wit:
He writes, in inspiration puts his trust,
Though wrong his thoughts, the gods will make them just;

Genius directly from the gods descends,
And who by labour would distrust his friends?
Thus having reason'd with consummate skill,
In immortality he dips his quill:
And since blank paper is deny'd the press,
He mingles the whole alphabet by guess:
In various sets, which various words compose,
Of which, he hopes, mankind the meaning knows.
So sounds spontaneous from the Sibyl broke,
Dark to herself the wonders which she spoke;
The priests found out the meaning, if they could;
And nations star'd at what none understood.

Clodio dress'd, danc'd, drank, visited, (the whole

And great concern of an immortal soul!)
Oft have I said, "Awake! exist! and strive
"For birth! nor think to loiter is to live!"
As oft I overheard the demon say,
Who daily met the loiterer in his way,
"I'll meet thee, youth, at White's:" the youth replies.

"I'll meet thee there," and falls his sacrifice;
His fortune squander'd, leaves his virtue bare
To every bribe, and blind to every snare:
Clodio for bread his indolence must quit,
Or turn a soldier, or commence a wit,
Such heroes have we! all, but life, they stake;
How must Spain tremble, and the German shake;
Such writers have we! all, but sense, they print,
Ev'n George's praise is dated from the mint.
In arms contemptible, in arts profane,
Such swords, such pens, disgrace a monarch's reign.
Reform your lives before you thus aspire,
And steal (for you can't steal) celestial fire.

O! the just contrast! O! the beauteous strife!
'Twixt their cool writings, and Pindaric life:
They write with phlegm, but then they live
with fire;

They cheat the lender, and their works the buyer.

I reverence misfortune, not deride;
I pity poverty, but laugh at pride:
For who so sad, but must some mirth confess
At gay Castruchio's miscellaneous dress?
Though there's but one of the dull works he wrote;
There's ten editions of his old lac'd coat.

These nature's commoners, who want a home,
Claim the wide world for their majestic dome;
They make a private study of the street;
And, looking full on every man they meet,

Run soufe against his chaps; who stands amaz'd
To find they did not see, but only gaz'd.
How must these bards be rapt into the skies?
You need not read, you feel their ecstasies.

Will they persist? 'Tis madness; Lintot, run,
See them confin'd—"O, that's already done."
Most, as by leaves, by the works they print,
Have took, for life, possession of the mint.
If you mistake, and pity these poor men,
Est ulubris, they cry, and write again.

Such wits their nuisance manfully expose,
And then pronounce just judges learning's foes;
O frail conclusion; the reverse is true;
If foes to learning, they'd be friends to you:
'Treat them, ye judges! with an honest scorn,
And weed the cockle from the generous corn:
'There's true good-nature in your disrespect;
In justice to the good, the bad neglect:
For immortality, if hardships plead,
It is not theirs who write, but ours who read.

But, O! what wisdom can convince a fool,
But that 'tis dullness to conceive him dull?
'Tis sad experience takes the censor's part,
Conviction, not from reason, but from smart.

A virgin-author, recent from the press,
The sheets yet wet, applauds his great success;
Surveys them, reads them, takes their charms to bed,

Those in his hand, and glory in his head:
'Tis joy too great; a fever of delight!
His heart bears thick, nor close his eyes all night:
But, rising the next morn to clasp his fame,
He finds that, without sleeping, he could dream:
So sparks, they say, take goddesses to bed,
And find next day the devil in their stead.

In vain advertisements the town o'erspread;
They're epitaphs, and say the work is dead.
Who press for fame, but small recruits will raise;
'Tis volunteers alone can give the bays.

A famous author visits a great man,
Of his immortal work displays the plan,
And says, "Sir, I'm your friend; all fears dismiss;
"Your glory, and my own, shall live by this;
"Your power is fixt, your fame through time
"convey'd;

"And Britain Europe's queen—if I am paid."
A statesman has his answer in a trice;
"Sir, such a genius is beyond all price;
"What man can pay for this?"—Away he turns:
His work is folded, and his bosom burns:
His patron he will patronise no more;
But rushes like a tempest out of door.

Lost is the patriot, and extinct his name!
Out comes the piece, another, and the same;
For A, his magic pen evokes an O,
And turns the tide of Europe on the foe:
He rams his quill with scandal and with scoff;
But 'tis so very foul, it won't go off:
Dreadful his thunders, while unprinted, roar;
But when once publish'd, they are heard no more.
Thus distant bugbears fright, but nearer draw,
The block's a block, and turns to mirth your awe.

Can those oblige, whose heads and hearts are such?

No; every party's tainted by their touch.

Infected persons fly each public place;
And none, or enemies alone, embrace:
To the foul fiend their every passion's sold:
They love and hate, extempore, for gold:
What image of their fury can we form?
Dullness and rage, a puddle in a storm.
Rest they in peace? If you are pleas'd to buy,
To swell your sails, like Lapland winds, they fly:
Write they with rage? The tempest quickly flags;
And state-Ulysses tames them with his bags;
Let him be what he will, Turk, Pagan, Jew:
For Christian ministers of state are few.

Behind the curtain lurks the fountain head,
That pours his politics through pipes of lead;
Which far and near ejaculate, and spout
O'er tea and coffee, poison to the rout:
But when they have bespatter'd all they may,
The statesman throws his filthy squirts away!

With golden forceps, these another takes,
And state elixirs of the vipers makes.

The richest statesman wants wherewith to pay
A servile sycophant, if well they weigh
How much it costs the wretch to be so base;
Nor can the greatest powers enough disgrace,
Enough chastise, such prostitute applause,
If well they weigh how much it stains their cause.

But are our writers ever in the wrong?
Does virtue ne'er seduce the venal tongue?
Yes; if well brib'd, for virtue's self they fight;
Still in the wrong, though champions for the right:
Whoe'er their crimes for interest only quit,
Sin on in virtue, and good deeds commit.

Nought but inconstancy Britannia meets,
And broken faith in their abandon'd sheets;
From the same hand how various is the page!
What civil war their brother pamphlets wage!
Tracts battle tracts, self-contradictions glare;
Say, is this lunacy?—I wish it were.
If such our writers, startled at the sight,
Felons may bless their stars they cannot write!

How justly Proteus' transmigrations fit
The monstrous changes of a modern wit!
Now such a gentle stream of eloquence
As seldom rises to the verge of sense;
Now by mad rage transform'd into a flame,
Which yet fit engines, well apply'd, can tame;
Now, on immodest trash, the swine obscene
Invites the town to sup at Drury-lane;
A dreadful lion, now he roars at power,
Which sends him to his brothers at the Tower;
He's now a serpent, and his double tongue
Salutes, nay licks, the feet of those he stung;
What knot can bind him, his evasion such?

One knot he well deserves, which might do much.
The flood, flame, swine, the lion, and the snake,
Those fivefold monsters, modern authors make:
The snake reigns most; snakes, Pliny says, are bred,

When the brain's perish'd in a human head.
Ye groveling, trodden, whipt, stript, turncoat things,
Made up of venom, volumes, stains, and stings!
Thrown from the tree of knowledge, like you,
curst

To scribble in the dust, was Snake the first.

What if the figure should in fact prove true?
It did in Elkenah*, why not in you?
Poor Elkenah, all other changes past,
For bread in Smithfield dragons hilt at last,
Spit streams of fire to make the butchers gape,
And found his manners suited to his shape:
Such is the fate of talents misapply'd;
So liv'd your prototype; and so he dy'd.

Th' abandon'd manners of our writing train
May tempt mankind to think religion vain;
But in their fate, their habit, and their mien,
That gods there are is eminently seen:
Heaven stands absolv'd by vengeance on their pen,
And marks the murderers of fame from men:
Through meagre jaws they draw their venal breath,
As gaily as their brothers in Macbeth:
Their feet through faithless leather meet the dirt,
And oftner chang'd their principles than shirt.
The transient vestments of these frugal men,
Hastens to paper for our mirth again:
Too soon (O merry-melancholy fate!)
They beg in rhyme, and warble through a grate:
The man lampoon'd forgets it at the sight; [spite;
The friend through pity gives, the foe through
And, though full conscious of his injur'd purse,
Lintot relents, nor Curll can wish them worse.
So fare the men, who writers dare commence
Without their patent, probity and sense.

From these, their politics our quidnuncs seek,
And Saturday's the learning of the week:
These labouring wits, like paviors, mend our ways,
With heavy, huge, repeated, flat essays; [dull;
Ram their coarse nonsense down, though ne'er so
And hem at every thump upon your skull:
These staunch-bred writing hounds begin the cry,
And honest folly echoes to the lie.
O how I laugh, when I a blockhead see,
Thanking a villain for his probity!
Who stretches out a most respectful ear,
With snares for woodcocks in his holy leer:
It tickles through my soul to hear the cock's
Sincere encomium on his friend the fox,
Sole patron of his liberties and rights!
While graceless Reynard listens—till he bites.

As when the trumpet sounds, th' o'erloaded state
Discharges all her poor and profligate;
Crimes of all kinds dishonour'd weapons wield,
And prisons pour their filth into the field;
Thus nature's refuse, and the dregs of men,
Compose the black militia of the pen.

EPISTLE II.

FROM OXFORD.

ALL write at London; shall the rage abate
Here, where it most should shine, the muses' seat?
Where mortal, or immortal, as they please,
The learn'd may choose eternity or ease?
Has not a † royal patron wisely strove
To woo the muse in her Athenian grove?
Added new strings to her harmonious shell,
And given new tongues to those who spoke so well?

* Settle, the city poet.† King George I.

Let these instruct with truth's illustrious ray,
Awake the world, and scare our owls away.

Meanwhile, O friend! indulge me, if I give
Some needful precepts how to write and live;
Serious should be an author's final views;
Who write for pure amusement, ne'er amuse.

An author! 'Tis a venerable name!
How few deserve it, and what numbers claim!
Unblest with sense above their peers refin'd,
Who shall stand up dictators to mankind?
Nay, who dare shine, if not in virtue's cause,
The sole proprietor of just applause?

Ye restless men, who pant for letter'd praise,
With whom would you consult to gain the bays?—
With those great authors whose fam'd works you read?

'Tis well: go then, consult the laurell'd shade,
What answer will the laurell'd shade return?
Hear it, and tremble! he commands you burn
The noblest works his envy'd genius writ,
That boast of nought more excellent than wit.
If this be true, as 'tis a truth most dread,
Woe to the page which has not that to plead!
Fontaine and Chaucer, dying, wish'd unwrote
The sprightliest efforts of their wanton thought:
Sidney and Waller, brightest sons of fame,
Condemn the charm of ages to the flame:
And in one point is all true wisdom cast,
To think that early we must think at last.

Immortal wits, ev'n dead, break nature's laws,
Injurious still to virtue's sacred cause;
And their guilt growing, as their bodies rot,
(Revers'd ambition!) pant to be forgot.

Thus ends your courted fame: does lucre then,
The sacred thirst of gold, betray your pen?
In prose 'tis blameable, in verse 'tis worse,
Provokes the muse, extorts Apollo's curse;
His sacred influence never should be sold;
'Tis arrant simony to sing for gold:
'Tis immortality should fire your mind;
Scorn a less paymaster than all mankind.

If bribes ye seek, know this, ye writing tribe!
Who writes for virtue has the largest bribe:
All 's on the party of the virtuous man;
The good will surely serve him, if they can;
The bad, when interest or ambition guide,
And 'tis at once their interest and their pride:
But should both fail to take him to their care,
He boasts a greater friend, and both may spare.

Letters to man uncommon light dispense;
And what is virtue, but superior sense?
In parts and learning ye who place your pride,
Your faults are crimes, your crimes are double-dy'd.
What is a scandal of the first renown,
But letter'd knaves, and atheists in a gown?

'Tis harder far to please than give offence;
The least misconduct damns the brightest sense;
Each shallow pate, that cannot read your name,
Can read your life, and will be proud to blame.
Flagitious manners make impressions deep
On those that o'er a page of Milton sleep:
Nor in their dulness think to save your shame,
True, these are fools; but wise men say the same.

Wits are a despicable race of men,
If they confine their talents to the pen;

When the man shocks us, while the writer shines,
Our scorn in life, our envy in his lines.
Yet, proud of parts, with prudence some dispense,
And play the fool, because they're men of sense.
What instances bleed recent in each thought,
Of men to ruin by their genius brought!
Against their wills what numbers ruin shun,
Purely through want of wit to be undone?
Nature has shown, by making it so rare,
That wit's a jewel which we need not wear.
Of plain sound sense life's current coin is made;
With that we drive the most substantial trade.

Prudence protects and guides us, wit betrays;
A splendid source of ill ten thousand ways;
A certain snare to miseries immense;
A gay prerogative from common sense;
Unless strong judgment that wild thing can tame,
And break to paths of virtue and of fame.

But grant your judgment equal to the best,
Sense fills your head, and genius fires your breast;
Yet still forbear: your wit (consider well)
'Tis great to show, but greater to conceal;
As it is great to seize the golden prize
Of place or power; but greater to despise.

If still you languish for an author's name,
Think private merit less than public fame,
And fancy not to write is not to live;
Deserve, and take, the great prerogative.

But ponder what it is; how dear 't will cost,
To write one page which you may justly boast.

Sense may be good, yet not deserve the press;
Who write, an awful character profess;
The world as pupil of their wisdom claim,
And for their stipend an immortal fame:
Nothing but what is solid or refin'd,
Should dare ask public audience of mankind.

Severely weigh your learning and your wit:
Keep down your pride by what is nobly writ:
No writer, fam'd in your own way, pass o'er;
Much trust example, but reflection more:
More had the ancients writ, they more had taught;

Which shows some work is left for modern thought.

This weigh'd perfection know; and, know
Toil, burn for that; but do not aim at more;
Above, beneath it, the just limits fix;
And zealously prefer four lines to six.

Write, and re-write, blot out, and write again,
And for its swiftness ne'er applaud your pen.
Leave to the jockeys that Newmarket praise,
Slow runs the Pegasus that wins the bays.

Much time for immortality to pay,

Is just and wise; for less is thrown away.

Time only can mature the labouring brain;

Time is the father, and the midwife pain:

The same good sense that makes a man excel,

Still makes him doubt he ne'er has written well.

Downright impossibilities they seek;

What man can be immortal in a week?

Excuse no fault; though beautiful, 't will harm;

One fault shocks more than twenty beauties charm.

Our age demands correctness; Addison

And you this commendable hurt have done.

Now writers find, as once Achilles found,

The whole is mortal, if a part's unsound.

He that strikes out, and strikes not out the best,
Pours lustre in, and dignifies the rest:
Give e'er so little, if what's right be there,
We praise for what you burn, and what you spare:
The part you burn, smells sweet before the shrine,
And is an incense to the part divine.

Nor frequent write, though you can do it well;
Men may too oft, though not too much, excel.
A few good works gain fame; more sink their
price;

Mankind are fickle, and hate paying twice:
They granted you writ well, what can they more,
Unless you let them praise for giving o'er?

Do boldly what you do; and let your page
Smile, if it smiles, and if it rages, rage.

So faintly Lucius censures and commends.

That Lucius has no foes, except his friends.

Let satire less engage you than applause;

It shows a generous mind to wink at flaws:

Is genius yours? Be yours a glorious end,

Be your king's, country's, truth's religion's friend;

The public glory by your own beget;

Run nations, run posterity, in debt.

And since the fam'd alone make others live,

First have that glory you presume to give.

If satire charms, strike faults, but spare the man;

'Tis dull to be as witty as you can.

Satire recoils whenever charg'd too high;

Round your own fame the fatal splinters fly.

As the soft plume gives swiftness to the dart,

Good-breeding sends the satire to the heart.

Painters and surgeons may the structure scan;

Genius and morals be with you the man:

Defaults in those alone should give offence!

Who strikes the person, pleads his innocence.

My narrow-minded satire can't extend

To Codrus' form; I'm not so much his friend:

Himself should publish that (the world agree)

Before his works, or in the pillory.

Let him be black, fair, tall, short, thin, or fat,

Dirty or clean, I find no theme in that.

Is that call'd humour? It has this pretence.

'Tis neither virtue, breeding, wit, or sense.

Unless you boast the genius of a Swift,

Beware of humour, the dull rogue's last shift.

Can others write like you? Your task give o'er,

'Tis printing what was publish'd long before.

If nought peculiar through your labours run,

They're duplicates, and twenty are but one.

Think frequently, think close, read nature, turn

Mens manners o'er, and half your volumes burn;

To nurse with quick reflection be your strife,

Thoughts born from present objects, warm from life;

When most unsought, such inspirations rise,

Slighted by fools, and cherish'd by the wise;

Expect peculiar fame from these alone;

These make an author, these are all your own.

Life, like their Bibles, coolly men turn o'er;

Hence unexperienc'd children of threescore.

True, all men think of course, as all men dream;

And if they slightly think, 'tis much the same.

Letters admit not of a half renown;

They give you nothing, or they give a crozon.

No work e'er gain'd true fame, or ever can,
But what did honour to the name of man.

Weighty the subject, cogent the discourse,
Clear be the style, the very sound of force:

Easy the conduct, simple the design,
Striking the moral, and the soul divine:

Let nature art, and judgment wit, exceed;
O'er learning reason reign; o'er that, your Creed;

Thus virtue's seeds, at once, and laurel's grow;
Do thus, and rise a Pope, or a Despreau:

And when your genius exquisitely shines,
Live up to the full lustre of your lines:

Parts but expose those men who virtue quit;
A fallen angel is a fallen wit;

And they plead Lucifer's detested cause,
Who for bare talents challenge our applause.

Would you restore just honours to the pen?
From able writers rise to worthy men.

"Who's this with nonsense, nonsense would restrain?"

"Who's this (they cry) so vainly schools the vain?"

"Who damns our trash, with so much trash replete?"

"As, three ells round, huge Cheyne rails at meat?"
Shall I with Bavius then my voice exalt,

And challenge all mankind to find one fault?
With huge examens overwhelm my page,

And darken reason with dogmatic rage?
As if, one tedious volume writ in rhyme,

In prose a duller could excuse the crime?
Sure, next to writing, the most idle thing

Is gravely to harangue on what we sing.
At that tribunal stands the writing tribe,

Which nothing can intimidate or bribe,
Time is the judge; time has nor friend nor foe;

False fame must wither, and the true will grow.
Arm'd with this truth, all critics I defy;

For if I fall, by my own pen I die;
While snarlers strive with proud but fruitless pain,

To roound immortals, or to slay the slain.
Sore prest with danger, and in awful dread

Of twenty pamphlets levell'd at my head,
Thus have I forg'd a buckler in my brain,

Of recent form, to serve me this campaign;
And safely hope to quit the dreadful field

Delug'd with ink, and sleep behind my shield;
Unless dire Codrus rouses to the fray

In all his might, and damns me—for a day.
As turns a flock of geese, and, on the green,

Poke out their foolish necks in awkward spleen,
(Ridiculous in rage!) to bifs, not bite,

So war their quills, when sons of dullness write.

TO THE

RIGHT HON. SIR ROBERT WALPOLE.

By Mr. Daddington.

AFTERWARDS LORD MELCOMBE.

"—Quæ censet Amiculus, ut si

"Cæcus iter monstrare velit—" HOR.

THOUGH strength of genius, by experience taught,
Gives thee to sound the depths of human thought,

To trace the various workings of the mind,
And rule the secret springs, that rule mankind;
(Rare gift!) yet, Walpole, wilt thou condescend
To listen, if thy unexperienc'd friend

Can aught of use impart, though void of skill,
And win attention by sincere good-will;
For friendship, sometimes, want of parts supplies,
The heart may furnish what the head denies.

As when the rapid Rhone, o'er swelling tides,
To grace old Ocean's court, in triumph rides,
Though rich his source, he drains a thousand springs,

Nor scorns the tribute each small rivulet brings.
So thou shalt, hence, absorb each feeble ray,

Each dawn of meaning, in thy brighter day;
Shalt like, or, where thou canst not like, excuse,

Since no mean interest shall profane the muse,
No malice, wrapt in truth's disguise, offend,

Nor flattery taint the freedom of the friend.
When first a generous mind surveys the great,

And views the crowds that on their fortune wait;
Pleas'd with the show (though little understood)

He only seeks the power, to do the good;
Thinks, till he tries, 'tis godlike to dispose,

And gratitude still springs, where bounty sows;
That every grant sincere affection wins,

And where our wants have end, our love begins:
But those who long the paths of state have trod,

Learn from the clamours of the murmuring crowd,
Which cramm'd, yet craving still, their gates besiege, 'Tis easier far to give, than to oblige.

This of thy conduct seems the nicest part,
The chief perfection of the statesman's art,

To give to fair assent a fairer face,
Or soften a refusal into grace:

But few there are that can be truly kind,
Or know to fix their favours on the mind;

Hence, some, whene'er they would oblige, offend,
And while they make the fortune, lose the friend;

Still give, unthank'd; still squander, not bestow;
For great men want not, what to give, but how.

The race of men that follow courts, 'tis true,
Think all they get, and more than all, their due;

Still ask, but ne'er consult their own deserts,
And measure by their interest, not their parts:

From this mistake so many men we see,
But ill become the thing they wish'd to be;

Hence discontent, and fresh demands arise,
More power, more favour in the great man's eyes;

All feel a want, though none the cause suspects,
But hate their patron, for their own defects;

Such none can please, but who reforms their hearts,
And, when he gives them places, gives them

parts.

As these o'erprize their worth, so sure the great
May sell their favour at too dear a rate;

When merit pines, while clamour is prefer'd,
And long attachment waits among the herd;

When no distinction, where distinction's due,
Marks from the many the superior few;

When strong cabal constrains them to be just,
And makes them give at last—because they must;

What hopes that men of real worth should prize,
What neither friendship gives, nor merit buys?

L. iiij

The man who justly o'er the whole presides,
His well-weigh'd choice with wise affection guides;
Knows when to stop with grace, and when advance,

Nor gives through importunity or chance;
But thinks how little gratitude is ow'd,
When favours are extorted, not bestow'd.

When, safe on shore ourselves, we see the crowd
Surround the great, importunate, and loud;
Through such a tumult, 'tis no easy task
To drive the man of real worth to ask:
Surrounded thus, and giddy with the show,
'Tis hard for great men, rightly to bestow;
From hence so few are skill'd, in either case,
To ask with dignity, or give with grace.

Sometimes the great, seduc'd by love of parts,
Consult our genius, and neglect our hearts;
Pleas'd with the glittering sparks that genius
flings,

'They lift us, towering on their eagle's wings,
Mark out the flights by which themselves begun,
And teach our dazzled eyes to bear the sun;
Till we forget the hand that made us great,
And grow to envy, not to emulate:

To emulate, a generous warmth implies,
'To reach the virtues, that make great men rise;
But envy wears a mean malignant face,
And aims not at their virtues—but their place.

Such to oblige, how vain is the pretence!
When every favour is a fresh offence,
By which superior power is still imply'd,
And, while it helps their fortune, hurts their pride.

Slight is the hate, neglect or hardships breed;
But those who hate from envy, hate indeed.

"Since so perplex'd the choice, whom shall we trust?"

Methinks I hear thee cry—The brave and just;
The man by no mean fears or hopes controul'd,
Who serves thee from affection, not for gold.

We love the honest, and esteem the brave,
Despise the coxcomb, but detest the knave;
No show of parts the truly wise seduce,
To think that knaves can be of real use.

The man, who contradicts the public voice,
And strives to dignify a worthless choice,
Attempts a task that on that choice reflects,
And lends us light to point out new defects.
One worthless man, that gains what he pretends,
Disgusts a thousand unpretending friends:
And since no art can make a counterpass,
Or add the weight of gold to mimic brass,
When princes to bad ore their image join,
'They more debase the stamp, than raise the coin.

Be thine the care, true merit to reward,
And gain the good—nor will that task be hard;
Souls form'd alike so quick by nature blend,
An honest man is more than half thy friend.

Him, no mean views, or haste to rise, shall sweep away,

'Thy choice to folly, or thy trust betray:
Ambition, here, shall at due distance stand;
Nor is wit dangerous in an honest hand:
Besides, if failings at the bottom lie,
We view those failings with a lover's eye;

Though small his genius, let him do his best,
Our wishes and belief supply the rest.

Let others barter servile faith for gold,
His friendship is not to be bought or sold:
Fierce opposition he, unmov'd, shall face,
Modest in favour, daring in disgrace,
To share thy adverse fate alone, pretend;
In power, a servant; out of power, a friend.
Here pour thy favours in an ample flood,
Indulge thy boundless thirst of doing good:
Nor think that good to him alone confin'd;
Such to oblige, is to oblige mankind.

If thus thy mighty master's steps thou trace,
The brave to cherish, and the good to grace;
Long shalt thou stand from rage and faction free,
And teach us long to love the king, through thee:
Or fall a victim dangerous to the foe,
And make him tremble when he strikes the blow;
While honour, gratitude, affection join
To deck thy close, and brighten thy decline;
(Illustrious doom!) the great, when thus displac'd,
With friendship guarded, and with virtue grac'd,
In awful ruin, like Rome's senate, fall,
The prey and worship of the wondering Gaul.

No doubt, to genius some reward is due,
(Excluding that, were satirizing you:)
But yet, believe thy undesigning friend,
When truth and genius for thy choice contend,
Though both have weight when in the balance cast,

Let probity be first, and parts the last.

On these foundations if thou dar'st be great,
And check the growth of folly and deceit;
When party rage shall droop through length of
And calumny be ripen'd into praise, [days,
Then future times shall to thy worth allow
That fame, which envy would call flattery now.

Thus far my zeal, though for the task unfit,
Has pointed out the rocks where others split;
By that inspir'd, though stranger to the nine,
And negligent of any fame—but thine,
I take the friendly, but superfluous part;
You act from nature what I teach from art.

THE OLD MAN'S RELAPSE.

VERSES OCCASIONED BY THE FOREGOING
EPISTLE.

"—Sopitos suscitatur ignes."—VIRG.

FROM man's too curious and impatient sight,
The future, heaven involves in thickest night.
Credit gray hairs: though freedom much we boast,
Some least perform, what they determine most.
What sudden changes our resolves betray?
To-morrow is a satire on to-day,
And shows its weakness. Whom shall men believe,
When constantly themselves, themselves deceive.

Long had I bid my once-lov'd muse adieu;
You warm old age; my passion burns anew.
How sweet your verse! how great your force of mind! [kind!
What power of words! what skill in dark man-
Polite the conduct; generous the design;
And beauty files, and strength sustains each line.

Thus Mars and Venus are once more beset;
Your wit has caught them in its golden net.

But what strikes home with most exalted grace,
Is haughty genius taught to know its place;
And where worth shines, its humbled crest to bend,
With zeal devoted to that godlike end.
When we discern so rich a vein of sense,
'Through the smooth flow of purest eloquence;
'Tis like the limpid streams of Tagus roll'd
O'er boundless wealth, o'er shining beds of gold.

But whence so finish'd, so refin'd a piece?
The tongue denies it to old Rome and Greece;
The genius bids the moderns doubt their claim,
And slowly take possession of the fame.
But I nor know, nor care by whom 'twas writ,
Enough for me that 'tis from human wit,
That sooths my pride: all glory in the pen
Which has done honour to the race of men.

But this have others done; a like applause
An ancient and a * modern Horace draws.
But they to glory by degrees arose,
Meridian lustre you at once disclose.
'Tis continence of mind unknown before,
To write so well, and yet to write no more.
More bright renown can human nature claim,
Than to deserve, and fly immortal fame?

Next to the godlike praise of writing well,
Is on that praise with just delight to dwell.
O for some god my drooping soul to raise!
That I might imitate, as well as praise;
For all commend: ev'n foes your fame confess;
Nor would Augustus' age have priz'd it less;
An age, which had not held its pride so long,
But for the want of so complete a song.

A golden period shall from you commence:
Peace shall be sign'd 'twixt wit and manly sense;
Whether your genius or your rank they view,
The muses find their Halifax in you.
Like him succeed! nor think my zeal is shown
For you; 'tis Britain's interest, not your own;

* Boileau.

For lofty stations are but golden snares,
Which tempt the great to fall in love with cares.

I would proceed, but age has chill'd my vein,
'Twas a short fever, and I'm cool again.
Though life I hate, methinks I could renew
Its tasteless, painful course, to sing of you.
When such the subject, who shall curb his flight?
When such your genius, who shall dare to write?
In pure respect, I give my rhyming o'er,
And to commend you most, commend no more.

Adieu, whoe'er thou art! on death's pale coast
Ere long I'll talk thee o'er with Dryden's ghost;
The bard will smile. A last, a long farewell!
Henceforth I hide me in my dusky cell;
There wait the friendly stroke that sets me free,
And think of immortality and thee—
My strains are number'd by the tuneful nine;
Each maid presents her thanks, and all present thee mine.

VERSES,

*Sent by Lord Melcombe to Dr. Young, not long before his Lordship's Death .

KIND companion of my youth,
Lov'd for genius, worth, and truth!
Take what friendship can impart,
Tribute of a feeling heart;
Take the muse's latest spark,
Ere we drop into the dark.
He who parts and virtue gave,
Bade thee look beyond the grave:
Genius soars, and virtue glides;
Above the love of God presides.
There's a gulf 'twixt us and God;
Let the gloomy path be trod:
Why stand shivering on the shore?
Why not boldly venture o'er?
Where unerring virtue guides,
Let us have the winds and tides:
Safe through seas of doubts and fears,
Rides the bark which virtue steers.

* A poetical epistle from the late Lord Melcombe to the Earl of Bute, with corrections by the author of the Night Thoughts, was published in 4to, 1776.

SEA-PIECE:

CONTAINING,

I. THE BRITISH SAILOR'S EXULTATION.

II. HIS PRAYER BEFORE ENGAGEMENT.

THE DEDICATION.

TO MR. VOLTAIRE.

My muse, a bird of passage, flies
From frozen clime to milder skies;
From chilling blasts she seeks thy cheering beam,
A beam of favour, here deny'd;
Conscious of faults, her blushing pride
Hopes an asylum in so great a name.

* To dive full deep in ancient days,
The warriors' ardent deeds to raise,
And monarch's aggrandize;—the glory thine;
Thine is the drama, how renown'd!
Thine epic's loftier trump to sound;—
But let Arion's sea-strung harp be mine:

* Annals of the Emperor Charles XII. Lewis XIV.

But where's his dolphin? Know'st thou where?
 May that be found in thee, Voltaire!
 Save thou from harm my plunge into the wave:
 How will thy name illustrious raise
 My sinking song! Mere mortal lays
 So patronis'd, are rescued from the grave.

"Tell me," say'st thou, who courts my smile?
 "What stranger?" stray'd from yonder isle!—
 No stranger, Sir! though born in foreign climes;
 On Dorset downs, when Milton's page,
 With sin and death, provok'd thy rage,
 Thy rage provok'd, who sooth'd with gentle rhymes?

Who kindly couch'd thy censure's eye,
 And gave thee clearly to descry
 Sound judgment giving law to fancy strong?
 Who half inclin'd thee to confess,
 Nor could thy modesty do less,
 That Milton's blindness lay not in his song?

But such debates long since are flown;
 For ever set the suns that shone
 On airy pastimes, ere our brows were gray:
 How shortly shall we both forget,
 To thee my patron I my debt,
 And thou to thine for Prussia's golden key.

The present in oblivion cast,
 Full soon shall sleep, as sleeps the past;
 Full soon the wide distinction die between
 The frowns and favours of the great;
 High flush'd success, and pale defeat;
 The Gaelic gaiety, and British spleen.

Ye wing'd, ye rapid moments! stay:
 Oh friend! as deaf as rapid they;
 Life's little drama done, the curtain falls!—
 Dost thou not hear it? I can hear,
 Though nothing strikes the listening ear;
 Time groans his last! Eternal loudly calls!
 Nor calls in vain; the call inspires
 Far other counsels and desires,
 Than once prevail'd; we stand on higher ground;
 What scenes we see!—Exalted aim?
 With ardours new our spirits flame;
 Ambition blest! with more than laurels crown'd.

ODE I.

THE BRITISH SAILOR'S EXULTATION.

In lofty sounds let those delight
 Who brave the foe, but fear the fight;
 And bold in word, of arms decline the stroke:
 'Tis mean to boast; but great to lend
 To foes the counsel of a friend,
 And warn them of the vengeance they provoke.
 From whence arise these loud alarms?
 Why gleams the south with brandish'd arms?
 War, bath'd in blood, from curst ambition springs:
 Ambition! mean, ignoble pride!
 Perhaps their ardours may subside,
 When weigh'd the wonders Britain's sailor sings.
 Hear, and revere.—At Britain's nod,
 From each enchanted grove and wood

Hastes the huge oak, or shadeless forest leaves;
 The mountain pines assume new forms,
 Spread canvas wings, and fly through storms,
 And ride o'er rocks, and dance on foaming waves.
 She nods again: the labouring earth
 Discloses a tremendous birth;
 In smoking rivers runs her molten ore;
 Thence monsters of enormous size,
 And hideous aspect, threatening rise,
 Flame from the deck, from trembling bastions roar.
 These ministers of fate fulfil,
 On empires wide, an island's will,
 When thrones unjust wake vengeance: know, ye
 powers!

In sudden night, and ponderous balls,
 And floods of flame, the tempest falls,
 When brav'd Britannia's awful senate lowers.

In her * grand council she surveys,
 In patriot picture, what may raise,
 Of insolent attempts, a warm disdain;
 From hope's triumphant summit thrown,
 Like darted lightning, swiftly down
 The wealth of Ind, and confidence of Spain.

Britannia sheaths her courage keen,
 And spares her nitrous magazine;
 Her cannon slumber, till the proud aspire,
 And leave all law below them; then they blaze!
 They thunder from resounding seas,
 Touch'd by their injur'd master's soul of fire.

Then furies rise! the battle raves!
 And rends the skies! and warms the waves!
 And calls a tempest from the peaceful deep,
 In spite of nature, spite of Jove,
 While all serene, and hush'd above,
 Tumultuous winds in azure chambers sleep.

A thousand deaths the bursting bomb
 Hurls from her disembowel'd womb;
 Chain'd, glowing globes, in dread alliance join'd,
 Red-wing'd by strong, sulphureous blasts,
 Sweep, in black whirlwinds, men and masts;
 And leave sing'd, naked, blood-drown'd, decks behind.

Dwarf laurels rise in tented fields;
 The wreath immortal ocean yields;
 There war's whole sting is shot, whole fire is spent,
 Whole glory blooms: how pale, how tame,
 How lambent in Bellona's flame;
 How her storms languish on the continent!

From the dread front of ancient war
 Less terror frown'd; her scythed car,
 Her castled elephant, and battering beam,
 Stoop to those engines which deny
 Superior terrors to the sky, [flame.
 And boast their clouds, their thunder, and their

The flame, the thunder, and the cloud,
 The night by day, the sea of blood,
 Hosts whirl'd in air, the yell of sinking throngs,
 The graveless dead, an ocean warm'd,
 A firmament by mortals storm'd,
 To patient Britain's angry brow belongs.

* House of Lords.

Or do I dream? Or do I rave?
Or see I Vulcan's footy cave,
Where Jove's red bolts the giant brothers frame?
Those swarthy gods of toil and beat,
Loud peals on mountain anvils heat,
And panting tempests rouse the roaring flame.

Ye sons of Ætna! hear my call;
Unfinish'd let those baubles fall,
Yon shield of Mars, Minerva's helmet blue:
Your strokes suspend, ye brawny throng!
Charm'd by the magic of my song,
Drop the feign'd thunder, and attempt the true.

Begin: * and first take rapid flight,
Fierce flame, and clouds of thickest night,
And ghastly terror, paler than the dead;
Then borrow from the north his roar,
Mix groans and deaths; one phial pour
Of wrong'd Britannia's wrath; and it is made;
Gaul starts and trembles—at your dreadful trade.

ODE II:

IN WHICH IS

THE SAILOR'S PRAYER BEFORE ENGAGEMENT.

So form'd the bolt, ordain'd to break
Gaul's haughty plan, and Bourbon shake;
If Britain's crimes support not Britain's foes,
And edge their swords: O power divine!
If blest by thee the bold design,
Embattled hosts a single arm o'erthrows.

Ye warlike dead, who fell of old
In Britain's cause, by fame enroll'd
In deathless annal! deathless deeds inspire;
From oozy beds, for Britain's sake,
Awake, illustrious chiefs! awake;
And kindle in your sons paternal fire.

The day commission'd from above,
Our worth to weigh, our hearts to prove,
If war's full stock too feeble to sustain;
Or firm to stand its final blow,
When vital streams of blood shall flow,
And turn to crimson the discolour'd main;

That day's arriv'd, that fatal hour!--
"Hear us, O hear, Almighty Power!
"Our guide in counsel, and our strength in fight!
"Now war's important die is thrown,
"If left the day to man alone,

"How blind is wisdom, and how weak is might!

"Let prostrate hearts, and awful fear,
"And deep remorse, and sighs sincere
"For Britain's guilt the wrath divine appease;
"A wrath, more formidable far
"Than angry nature's wasteful war,
"The whirl of tempests, and the roar of seas.

"From out the deep to thee we cry,
"To thee at nature's helm on high!

* Alluding to Virgil's Description of Thunder.

"Steer thou our conduct, dread Omnipotence!

"To thee for succour we resort;

"Thy favour is our only port;

"Our only rock of safety, thy defence.

"O thou, to whom the lions roar,

"And, not unheard, thy boon implore!

"Thy throne our bursts of cannon loud invoke;

"Thou canst arrest the flying ball;

"Or send it back and bid it fall

"On those from whose proud deck the thunder
"broke.

"Britain in vain extends her care

"To climes * remote, for aids in war;

"Still farther must it stretch to crush the foe;

"There's one alliance, one alone,

"Can crown her arms, or fix her throne;

"And that alliance is not found below.

"Ally Supreme! we turn to thee;

"We learn obedience from the sea;

"With seas and winds, henceforth thy laws fulfil;

"'Tis thine our blood to freeze, or warm;

"To rouse or hush the martial storm;

"And turn the tide of conquest at thy will.

"'Tis thine to beam sublime renown,

"Or quench the glories of a crown;

"'Tis thine to doom, 'tis thine from death to
"free;

"To turn aside his levell'd dart,

"Or pluck it from the bleeding heart:--

"There we cast anchor, we confide in thee.

"Thou, who hast taught the north to roar,

"And streaming † lights nocturnal pour

"Of frightful aspect! when proud foes invade,

"Their blasted pride with dread to seize,

"Bid Britain's flags as meteor's blaze;

"And George depute to thunder in thy stead.

"The right alone is bold and strong;

"Black, hovering clouds appal the wrong

"With dread of vengeance: nature's awful
"fire!

"Less than one moment shouldst thou frown

"Where is puissance and renown?

"Thrones tremble, empires sink, or worlds ex-
"pire.

"Let George the just chastise the vain:

"Thou, who durst curb the rebel main,

"To mount the shore when boiling billows
"rave!

"Bid George repel a bolder tide,

"The boundless swell of Gallic pride;

"And check ambition's overwhelming wave.

"And when (all milder means withstood)

"Ambition, tam'd by loss of blood,

"Regains her reason; then, on angels wings,

"Let peace descend, and shouting greet,

"With peals of joy, Britannia's fleet,

"How richly freighted! It triumphant, brings

"The poise of kingdoms, and the fate of kings."

PREFACE.

A PINDARIC carries a formidable sound; but there is nothing formidable in the true nature of it; of which (with utmost submission) I conceive the critics have hitherto entertained a false idea. Pindar is as natural as Anacreon, though not so familiar. As a fixt star is as much in the bounds of nature, as a flower of the field, though less obvious, and of greater dignity. This is not the received notion of Pindar; I shall therefore soon support at large that hint which is now given.

Trade is a very noble subject in itself; more proper than any for an Englishman; and particularly seasonable at this juncture.

We have more specimens of good writing in every province, than in the sublime; our two famous epic poems excepted. I was willing to make an attempt where I had fewest rivals.

If, on reading this ode, any man has a fuller idea of the real interest, or possible glory of his country, than before; or a stronger impression from it, or a warmer concern for it, I give up to the critic any farther reputation.

We have many copies and translations that pass for originals. This ode I humbly conceive is an original, though it professes imitation. No man can be like Pindar, by imitating any of his particular works; any more than like Raphael, by copying the cartoons. The genius and spirit of such great men must be collected from the whole; and when thus we are possessed of it, we must exert its energy in subjects and designs of our own. Nothing is so unpindarical as following Pindar on the foot. Pindar is an original, and he must be so too, who would be like Pindar in that which is his greatest praise. Nothing so unlike as a close copy, and a noble original.

As for length, Pindar has an unbroken ode of six hundred lines. Nothing is long or short in writing, but relatively to the demand of the subject, and the manner of treating it. A distich may be long, and a folio short. However, I have broken this ode into strains, each of which may be considered as a separate ode if you please. And if the variety and fullness of matter be considered, I am rather apprehensive of danger from brevity in this ode, than from length. But lank writing is what I think ought most to be declined, if for nothing else, for our plenty of it.

The ode is the most spirited kind of poetry, and the Pindaric is the most spirited kind of ode; this I speak at my own very great peril: but truth has an eternal title to our confession, though we are sure to suffer by it.

THE MERCHANT.

ODE I.

ON THE

BRITISH TRADE AND NAVIGATION.

TO HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF CHANDOS.

πλατῖαι πάντοθεν λυγροίσιν ἔντι πρόσθοι
νῆσον ἑκκλῖα πάν-
δε κοσμεῖν.

PIND. Nem. Od. VI.

THE PRELUDE.

The Proposition. An address to the vessel that brought over the King. Who should sing on this occasion. A Pindaric boast.

FAST by the surge my limbs are spread,
The naval oak nods o'er my head;

The winds are loud; the waves tumultuous roll;

Ye winds! indulge your rage no more;

Ye sounding billows! cease to roar;

The God descends; and transports warm my soul.

The waves are hush'd; the winds are spent!—
This kingdom, from the kingdoms rent,
I celebrate in song—Fam'd isle! no less,
By nature's favour, from mankind,
Than by the foaming sea, disjoin'd;
Alone in bliss! an isle, in happiness!

Though fate and time have damp'd my strains,
Though youth no longer fires my veins,
Though flow their streams in this cold climate run;
The royal eye dispels my cares,
Recals the warmth of blooming years,
Returning George supplies the distant sun.

Away, my soul! salute the * Pine,
That glads the heart of Caroline,
Its grand deposit faithful to restore;
Salute the bark that ne'er shall hold
So rich a freight in gems or gold,
And loaded from both Indies would be poor.

My soul! to thee, she spreads her sails;
Their bosoms fill with sacred gales;
With inspiration from the godhead warm;
Now bound for an eternal clime:
O send her down the tide of time,
Snatch'd from oblivion, and secure from storms.

Or teach this flag, like that to soar,
Which gods of old and heroes bore;
Bid her a British constellation rise—
The sea she scorns; and, now, shall bound
On lofty billows of sweet sound,
I am her pilot, and her port the skies!

Dare you to sing, ye tinkling train?
Silence, ye wretched! ye profane!
Who shackle prose, and boast of absent gods;
Who murder thought, and numbers maim,
Who write Pindarics cold and lame,
And labour stiff Anacreontic odes.

Ye lawful sons of genius rise!
Of genuine title to the skies;
Ye founts of learning! and ye mints of fame!
You, who file off the mortal part
Of glowing thought, with Attic art,
And drink pure song from Cam's or Isis' stream.

I glow, I burn! the numbers pure,
High-flavour'd, delicate, mature,
Spontaneous stream from my unlabour'd breast,
As, when full-ripened teems the vine,
The generous bursts of willing wine
Distil nectareous from the grape unpress'd.

STRAIN I.

THE ARGUMENT.

Now the King attended. A prospect of happiness.
Industry. A surprising instance of it in old Rome.
The mischief of sloth. What happiness is. Sloth its greatest enemy. Trade natural to Britain. Trade invoked. Described. What the greatest human excellence. The praise of wealth. Its use, abuse, and end. The variety of nature. The final moral cause of it. The benefit of man's necessities. Britain's naval stores. She makes all nature serviceable to her ends. Of reason. Its excellence. How we should form our estimate of things. Reason's difficult task. Why the first glory hers. Her effects in old Britain.

"OUR monarch comes! nor comes alone!"
What shining forms surround his throne,
O fun! as planets thee!—To my loud strain
See peace, by wisdom led, advance;
The grace, the muse, the season, dance;
And plenty spreads behind her flowing train!

"Our monarch comes! nor comes alone:"
New glories kindle round his throne,
The visions rise! I triumph as I gaze:
By Pindar led, I turn'd of late
The volume dark, the folds of fate;
And, now, am present to the future blaze.

By George and Jove it is decreed,
The mighty months in pomp proceed,
Fair daughters of the sun!—O thou divine,
Blest Industry! a smiling earth
From thee alone derives its birth:
By thee the ploughshare and its master shine.

From thee, mast, cable, anchor, oar,
From thee the cannon and his roar;
On oaks nurs'd, rear'd by thee, wealth empire grows;
O golden fruit! oak well might prove
The sacred tree, the tree of Jove;
All Jove can give, the naval oak bestows.

What cannot industry complete?
When Punic war first flam'd, the great,
Bold, active, ardent, Roman fathers meet:
"Fell all your groves," a flamen cries;
As soon they fall; as soon they rise;
One moon a forest, and the next a fleet.

Is sloth indulgence! 'Tis a toil;
Enervates man, and damns the soil;
Defeats creation, plunges in distress,
Cankers our being, all devours;
A full exertion of our powers!
Thence, and thence only glows our happiness.

The stream may stagnate, yet be clear,
The sun suspend his swift career,
Yet healthy nature feel her wonted force;
Ere man his active springs resign'd,
Can rust in body and in mind,
Yet taste of bliss, of which he chokes the source.

Where, industry! thy daughter fair?
Recal her to her native air; [long
Here, was trade born, here bred, here flourish'd
And ever shall she flourish here:
What though she languish'd? 'twas but fear,
She's sound of heart; her constitution strong.

Wake, sting her up. Trade! lean no more
On thy fix'd anchor, push from shore,
Earth lies before thee, every climate court.
And, see, she's rous'd absolv'd from fears,
Her brow, in cloudless azure, rears,
Spreads all her sail, and opens every port.

See, cherish'd by her sister, Peace,
 She levies gain on every place,
 Religion, habit, custom, tongue, and name!
 Again, she travels with the sun,
 Again, she draws a golden zone [same!
 Round earth and main; bright zone of wealth and

Ten thousand active hands, that hung
 In shameful sloth with nerves unstrung,
 The nations languid load, defy the storms,
 The sheets unfurl, and anchors weigh,
 The long-moor'd vessel wing to sea,
 Worlds, worlds salute, and peopled ocean swarms.

His sons, Po, Ganges, Danube, Nile,
 Their sedgy foreheads lift, and smile;
 Their urns inverted prodigally pour
 Streams charg'd with wealth, and vow to buy
 Britannia for their great ally, [more?
 With climes paid down; what can the gods do

Cold Russia costly furs from far,
 Hot China sends her painted jar,
 France generous wines to crown it, Arab sweet
 With gales of incense swells our sails,
 Nor distant Ind our merchant sails;
 Her richest ore the ballast of our fleet.

Luxuriant isle! What tide that flows,
 Or stream that glides, or wind that blows,
 Or genial sun that shines, or shower that pours,
 But flows, glides, breathes, shines, pours for thee?

How every heart dilates to see
 Each land's each season blending on thy shores!

All these one British harvest make!
 The servant ocean for thy sake
 Both sinks and swells: his arms thy bosom wrap,
 And fondly give in boundless dower,
 To mighty George's growing power,
 The wasted world into thy loaded lap.

Commerce brings riches, riches crown
 Fair virtue with the first renown:
 A large revenue, and a large expence,
 When hearts for others welfare glow,
 And spend as free as gods bestow,
 Gives the full bloom to mortal excellence.

Glow then my breast! abound my store!
 This, and this boldly I implore,
 Their want and apathy let Stoics boast:
 Passions and riches, good or ill,
 As us'd by man, demand our skill;
 All blessings wound us, when discretion's lost.

Wealth, in the virtuous, and the wise,
 'Tis vice and folly to despise:
 Let those in praise of poverty refine,
 Whose heads or hearts pervert its use,
 The narrow-soul'd, or the profuse,
 The truly great find morals in the mine;

Happy the man! who, large of heart,
 Has learnt the rare illustrious art
 Of being rich: stores starve us, or they cloy;
 From gold, if more than chemic skill,
 Extract not what is brighter still:
 'Tis hard to gain, much harder to enjoy.

Plenty's a means, and joy her end:
 Exalted minds their joys extend:
 A Chandos shines when others' joys are done!
 As lofty turrets, by their height,
 When humbler scenes resign their light,
 Retain the rays of the declining sun.

Pregnant with blessings, Britain! swear
 No sordid son of thine shall dare
 Offend the donor of thy wealth and peace;
 Who now his whole creation drains
 To pour into my tumid veins
 That blood of nations! commerce and increase.

How various nature! turgid grain
 Here nodding floats the golden plain; [vines
 There, worms weave silken webs; here, glowing
 Lay forth their purple to the sun,
 Beneath the soil, there harvests run,
 And kings' revenues ripen in the mines.

What's various nature? Art divine
 Man's soul to soften and refine;
 Heaven different growths to different lands im-
 parts,
 That all may stand in need of all,
 And interest draw around the ball,
 A net to catch and join all human hearts.

Thus has the great Creator's pen
 His law supreme, to mortal men,
 In their necessities distinctly writ:
 Ev'n appetites supplies the place
 Of absent virtue, absent grace,
 And human want performs for human wit.

Vast naval ensigns strow'd around
 The wond'ring foreigner confound!
 How stands the deep-aw'd continent aghast!
 As her proud scepter'd sons survey,
 At every port, on every quay,
 Huge mountains rise, of cable, anchor, mast?

'The unwieldy tun! the ponderous bale!—
 Each prints his own clime set to sale
 Sees here, by subjects of a British king:
 How earth's abridg'd! all nations range
 A narrow spot, our throng'd Exchange!
 And send the streams of plenty from their spring.

Nor earth alone, all nature bends
 To aid in Britain's glorious ends:
 Toils she in trade? or bleeds in honest wars?
 Her keel each yielding sea enthrals,
 Each willing wind her canvas calls,
 Her pilot into service lifts the stars.

In size confin'd, and humbly made,
 What though we creep beneath the shade,
 And seem as emmets on this point, the ball?
 Heaven lighted up the human soul,
 Heaven bid its rays transpierce the whole;
 And, giving godlike reason, gave us all.

Thou golden chain 'twixt God and men,
 Blest reason! guide my life and pen;
 All ills, like ghosts, fly trembling at thy light:
 Who thee obeys, reigns o'er all;
 Smiles, though the stars around him fall;
 A God is nought but reason infinite.

The man of reason is a God
Who scorns to stoop to fortune's nod;
Sole agent he beneath the shining sphere,
Others are passive, are impell'd,
Are frighten'd, flatter'd, sunk, or swell'd,
As accident is pleas'd to domineer.

Our hopes and fears are much to blame;
Shall monarchs awe? or crowns inflame?
From gross mistake our tumult springs;
Those men the silly world disarm,
Elude the dart, dissolve the charm,
Who know the slender worth of men and things.

The present object, present day,
Are idle phantoms, and away;
What's lasting only does exist. Know this,
Life, fame, friends, freedom, empire, all,
Peace, commerce, freedom, nobly fall
To launch us on the flood of endless bliss.

How foreign these, thou most in view!
Go, look your whole existence through;
Thence, form your rules: thence fix your estimate,
For so the gods: but as the gains,
How great the toil! 'Twill cost more pains,
To vanquish folly, than reduce a state.

Hence, reason! the first palm is thine,
Old Britain learnt from thee to shine.
By thee, trades swarming throng, gay freedom's smile,
Armies, in war of fatal frown,
Of peace the pride, arts flowing down,
Enrich, exalt, defend, instruct our isle.

STRAIN II.

THE ARGUMENT.

Arts from commerce. Why Britons should pursue it. What wealth includes. An historical digression, which kind is most frequent in Pindar. The wealth and wonderful glory of Tyre. The approach of her ruin. The cause of it. Her crimes through all ranks and orders. Her miserable fall. The neighbouring kings just reflection on it. An awful image of the Divine Power and vengeance. From what Tyre fell, and how deep her calamity.

Commerce gives arts, as well as gain;
By commerce wasted o'er the main,
They barbarous climes enlighten as they run;
Arts, the rich traffic of the soul!
May travel, thus, from pole to pole,
And gild the world with learning's brighter sun.

Commerce gives learning, virtue, gold!
Ply commerce, then, ye Britons bold,
Inur'd to winds and seas! lest gods repent:
The gods that thron'd you in the wave,
And, as the trident's emblem, gave
A triple realm, that awes the continent:

And awes with wealth; for wealth is power:
When Jove descends a golden shower,
'Tis navies, armies, empire, all, in one.—
View, emulate, outshine old Tyre;
In scarlet rob'd, with gems on fire,
Her merchants, princes! every deck, a throne!

She fate an empress! aw'd the flood!
Her stable column Ocean trod;
She call'd the nations, and she call'd the seas,
By both obey'd: the Syrian sings;
The Cyprian's art her viol strings;
Togarmagh's steed along her valley neighs.

The fir of Senir makes her floor,
And Bashan's oak, transform'd, her oar;
High Lebanon her mast; far Dedan warms
Her mantled host; Arabia feeds;
Her sail of purple Egypt spreads;
Arvad sends mariners; the Persian, arms.

The world's last limit bounds her fame;
The golden city was her name!
Those stars on earth, the topaz, onyx, blaze
Beneath her foot: extent of coast,
And rich as Nile's, let others boast;
Here the far nobler harvest of the seas.

O merchant land! as Eden fair!
Antient of empires! Nature's care!
The strength of Ocean! head of plenty's springs!
The pride of isles! In *war*s rever'd!
Mother of crafts! lov'd! courted! fear'd!
Pilot of kingdoms! and support of kings!

Great mart of nations!—But she fell:
Her pamper'd sons revolt! rebel!
Against his favourite isle loud roars the main!
The tempest howls? her sculptur'd dome
Soon, the wolf's refuge; dragon's home!
The land, one altar! a whole people, slain!

The destin'd day puts on her frown;
The sable hour is coming down:
She's on her march from yon Almighty throne:
The sword and storm are in her hand;
She trumpets shrill her dread command:
Dark be the light of earth! the boast, unknown!

For, oh! her sins as red as blood,
As crimson deep, outcry the flood;
The queen of trade is tought! once wise and just,
Now, venal is her council's tongue:
How riot, violence, and wrong,
Turn gold to drofs, her blossom into dust!

To things inglorious, far beneath
Those high-born souls they proudly breathe,
Her sordid noble sinks! her mighty, bow!
Is it for this, the groves around
Return the tabret's sprightly sound?
Is it for this, her great ones tofs the brow?

What burning feuds 'twixt brothers reign!
To nuptials cold, how glows the vein,
Confounding kindred, and misleading right?
The spurious lord it o'er the land!
Bold blasphemy dares make a stand,
Assault the sky, and brandish all her night:

Tyre's artizan, sweet orator,
Her merchant sage, big man of war,
Her judge, her prophet, nay her boary heads,
Whose brows with wisdom should be crown'd,
Her very priests in guilt abound:
Hence, the world's cedar all her honours sheds.

What death of truth! what thirst of gold!
 Chiefs warm in peace, in battle cold!
 What youth unletter'd! base ones lifted high!
 What public boasts! what private views!
 What desert temples! crowded stews!
 What women!—practis'd but to roll an eye!

O! foul of heart, her fairest dames
 Decline the sun's intruding beams,
 To mad the midnight in their gloomy haunts:
 Alas! there is, who sees them there;
 There is, who flatters not the fair,
 When cymbals tinkle, and the virgin chaunts.

He sees, and thunders!—Now, in vain!
 The courser paws, and foams the rein;
 And chariots stream along the printed soil:
 In vain! Her high, presumptuous air
 In gorgeous vestments rich and rare,
 O'er her proud shoulder throws the poor man's toil.

In robes or gems, her costly flair,
 Green, scarlet, azure, shine, in vain!
 In vain! their golden heads her turrets rear;
 In vain! high-flavour'd foreign fruits,
 Sydonian oils, and Lydian lutes,
 Glide o'er her tongue, and melt upon her ear.

In vain! wines flow in various streams,
 With helm and spear each pillar gleams;
 Damascus, vain! unfolds the glossy store;
 The golden wedge from Ophir's coasts,
 From Arab incense vain, she boasts,
 Vain are her gods, and vainly men adore.

Bell falls! the mighty Nebo bends!
 The nations hiss! her glory ends!
 To ships, her confidence! she flies from foes;
 Foes meet her there: the wind, the wave,
 That once aid, strength, and grandeur gave,
 Plunge her in seas, from which her glory rose.

Her ivory deck, embroider'd sail,
 And mast of cedar nought avail,
 Or pilot learn'd! She sinks, nor sinks alone;
 Her gods sink with her! to the sky,
 Which never more shall meet her eye,
 She sends her soul out in one dreadful groan.

What though so vast her naval might,
 In her first dawn'd the British right;
 All flags abas'd her see-dominion greet:
 What though she longer warr'd than Troy?
 At length her foes that isle destroy
 Whose conquest fail'd, as far as fail'd her fleet.

The kings she cloth'd in purple shake
 Their awful brows: "O foul mistake!
 "O fatal pride! (they cry) this, this is she,
 "Who said—with my own art and arm,
 "In the world's wealth I wrap me warm"—
 And swell'd at heart, vain empress of the sea!

"This, this is she, who meanly soar'd:
 "Alas! how low, to be ador'd,
 "And style herself a god!—Through stormy wars
 "This eagle-isle her thunder bore,
 "High-fed her young with human gore;
 "And would have built her nest among the stars.

"But ah, frail man! how impotent
 "To stand heaven's vengeance, or prevent!
 "To turn aside the great Creator's aim!
 "Shall island-kings with him contend,
 "Who makes the poles beneath him bend?
 "And shall drink up the sea herself with flame?

"Earth, ether, empyreum bow,
 "When from the brazen mountain's brow
 "The god of battles takes his mighty bow:
 "Of wrath prepares to pour the flood,
 "Puts on his vesture dipt in blood,
 "And marches out to scourge the world below.

"Ah! wretched isle, once call'd the great!
 "Ah! wretched isle, and wise too late!
 "The vengeance of Jehovah is gone out:
 "Thy luxury, corruption, pride,
 "And freedom lost, the realms deride,
 "Ador'd thee standing, o'er thy ruins shout:

"To scourge with war, or peace bestow,
 "Was thine, O fallen! fallen low!
 "'Twas thine, of jarring thrones to still debates:
 "How art thou fallen, down, down, down!
 "Wide waste, and night, and horror frown,
 "Where empire flam'd in gold, and balanc'd
 "States."

STRAIN III.

THE ARGUMENT.

An inference from this history. Advice to Britain. More proper to her than other nations. How far the stroke of tyranny reaches. What supports our endeavours. The unconsidered benefits of liberty. Britain's obligation to pursue trade. Why above half the globe is sea. Britain's grandeur from her situation. The winds, the seas, the constellations, described. Sir Isaac Newton's praise. Britain compared with other states. The Leviathan described. Britain's site, and ancient title to the seas. Who rivals her. Of Venice. Holland. Some despise trade as mean. Censured for it. Trade's glory. The late Czar. Solomon. A surprising instance of magnificence. The merchant's dignity. Compared with men of letters.

Hence learn, as hearts are foul or pure,
 Our fortunes wither or endure:
 Nations may thrive, or perish by the wave.
 What storms from Jove's unwilling frown,
 A people's crimes solicit down!
 Ocean's the womb of riches, and the grave.

This truth, O Britain! ponder well;
 Virtues should rise, as fortunes swell:
 What is large property?—The sign of good,
 Of worth superior: if 'tis less,
 Another's treasure we possess,
 And charge the gods with favours misbestow'd.

This council suits Britannia's isle, [smile:
 High-flush'd with wealth, and freedom's
 To vassals prison'd in the continent,
 Who starve, at home, on meager toil,
 And suck to death their mother soil,
 'Twere useless caution, and a truth mis-spent.

Fell tyrants strike beyond the bone,
And wound the soul; bow genius down,
Lay virtue waste! for worth or arts, who strain,
To throw them at a monster's foot?
'Tis property supports pursuit:
Freedom gives eloquence; and freedom, gain.

She pours the thought, and forms the style;
She makes the blood and spirits boil;
I feel her now! and rouse, and rise, and rave
In Theban song: O muse! not thine,
Verse is gay freedom's gift divine:
The man that can think greatly, is no slave.

Others may traffic if they please;
Britain, fair daughter of the seas,
Is born for trade; to plough her field, the wave:
And reap the growth of every coast:
A speck of land! but let her boast,
Gods gave the world, when they the waters gave.

Britain! behold the world's wide face;
Nor cover'd half with solid space,
Three parts are fluid; empire of the sea!
And why? for commerce. Ocean streams
For that, through all his various names:
And, if for commerce, ocean flows for thee.

Britain, like some great potentate
Of eastern clime, retires in state,
Shuts out the nations! Would a prince draw nigh?
He passes her strong guards, the waves,
Of servant winds admission craves,
Her empire has no neighbour but the sky.

There are her friends; soft zephyr there,
Keen Eurus, Notus never fair,
Rough Boreas bursting from the pole: all urge,
And urge for her, their various toil;
The Caspian, the broad Baltic boil,
And into life the dead Pacific scourge.

There are her friends, a marshall'd train:
A golden host! and azure plain!
By turns do duty, and by turns retreat:
They may retreat, but not from her;
The star that quits this hemisphere
Must quit the skies, to want a British fleet.

Hyad, for her, leans o'er her urn;
For her, Orion's glories burn,
The Pleiads gleam. For Britons set and rise
The fair-fac'd sons of Mazaroth,
Near the deep chambers of the south,
The raging dog that fires the midnight skies.

These nations Newton made his own;
All intimate with him alone.
His mighty soul did, like a giant, run
To the vast volume's closing star;
Decypher'd every character:
His reason pour'd new light upon the sun.

Let the proud brothers of the land
Smile at our rock and barren strand,
Not such the sea: let Fohé's ancient line
Vast tracts and ample beings vaunt;
The camel low, small elephant—
O, Britain! the leviathan is thine.

VOL. X.

Leviathan! whom nature's strife
Brought forth, her largest piece of life;
He sleeps an isle! his sports the billows warm!
Dreadful leviathan! thy spout
Invades the skies; the stars are out:
He drinks a river, and ejects a storm.

Th' Atlantic surge around our shore
German and Caledonian roar;
Their mighty genii hold us in their lap.
Hear Egbert, Edgar, Ethelred;
"The seas are ours."—The monarch said—
The floods their hands, their hands the nations, clap.

Whence is a rival, then, to rise?
Can he be found beneath the skies?
No, there, they dwell, that can give Britain fear:
The powers of earth, by rival aim
Her grandeur but the more proclaim;
And prove their distance most, as they draw
near.

Proud Venice sits amid the waves;
Her foot ambitious ocean laves:
Art's noblest boast! but O what wondrous odds
'Twixt Venice and Britannia's isle!
'Twixt mortal and immortal toil!
Britannia is a Venice built by gods.

Let Holland triumph o'er her foes,
But not o'er friends by whom she rose;
The child of Britain! And shall she contend?
It were no less than parricide:
What wonders rise from out the tide!
Her high and mighty to the rudder bend.

And are there, then, of lofty brow,
Who think trade mean, and scorn to bow
So far beneath the state of noble birth?
Alas! these chiefs but little know
Commerce how high, themselves how low;
The sons of nobles are the sons of earth.

And what have earth's mean sons to do,
But reap her fruits, and warm pursue
The world's chief good, not glut on other's toil?
High commerce from the gods came down,
With compass, chart, and starry crown,
Their delegate, to make the nations smile

Blush, and behold the Russian bow,
From forty crowns, his mighty brow,
To trade.—To toil he turns his glorious band:
That arm, which swept the bloody field,
See! the huge ax, or hammer, wield;
While sceptres wait, and thrones impatient stand.

O shame to subjects! first renown,
Matchless example to the crown!
Old time is poor: what age boasts such a fight?
Ye drones! adore the man divine—
No; virtue still as mean decline,
Call Russians barbarous, and yourselves polite.

He too of Judah, great, as wise,
With Hiram strove in merchandise:
Monarchs with monarchs struggle for an ear!

M

That merchant * sinking to his grave,
A flood of treasure swells the cave;
The king left much, the merchant bury'd more.

Is merchant an inglorious name?
No; fit for Pindar such a theme,
Too great for me; I pant beneath the weight!
If loud as ocean's were my voice,
If words and thoughts to court my choice
Out-number'd Jands, I could not reach its height.

Merchants o'er proudest heroes reign;
Those trade in bleffing, these in pain,
At slaughter swell, and shout while nations groan:
With purple monarchs, merchants vie;
If great to spend, what, to supply?
Priests pray for blessings; merchants pour them down.

Kings, merchants are in league and love;
Earth's odours pay soft airs above,
That o'er the teeming field prolific range;
Planets are merchants; take, return,
Lustre and heat; by traffic burn;
The whole creation is one vast exchange.

Is merchant an inglorious name?
What says the sons of letter'd fame,
Proud of their volumes, swelling in their cells?
In open life, in change of scene,
Mid various manners, throngs of men,
Experience, arts, and solid wisdom dwells.

Trade, art's mechanic, nature's stores
Well weighs: to starry science soars:
Reads warm in life (dead-colour'd by the pen)
The scites, tongues, interests, of the ball:
Who studies trade, he studies all;
Accomplish'd merchants are accomplish'd men.

STRAIN IV.

THE ARGUMENT.

Pindar invoked. His praise. Britain should decline war; but boldly assert her trade. Encouraged from the throne: Britain's condition without trade. Trade's character, and surprising deeds. Carthage. Solomon's temple. St. Paul's church. The miser's character. The wonderful effects of trade. Why religion recommended to the merchant. What, false joy. What, true. What religion is to the merchant. Why trade more glorious in Britons than others. How warmly, and how long, to be pursued by us. The Briton's legacy Columbus. His praise. America described. Worlds still unknown. Queen Elizabeth. King George the Second. His glory naturally represented.

How shall I farther rouse the soul?
How Sloth's lascivious reign controul
By verse with unextinguish'd ardour wrought?
How every breast inflame with mine?
How bid my theme still brighter shine,
With wealth of words, and unexhausted thought?

* Vast treasure taken from Solomon's tomb 1300 years after his death.

O thou Dircæan swan, on high,
Round whom familiar thunders fly!
While Jove attends a language like his own!
Thy spirit pour, like vernal showers,
My verse shall burst out with the flowers,
While Britain's trade advances with her sun.

Though Britain was not born to fear,
Grasp not at bloody fame from war;
Nor war decline, if thrones your right invade:
Jove gathers tempest black as night:
Jove pours the golden flood of light;
Let Britain thunder, or let Britain trade.

Britain a comet, or a star,
In commerce this, or that in war,
Let Britons shout! earth, seas, and skies resound!
Commerce to kindle, raise, preserve,
And spirit dart through every nerve,
Hear from the throne * a voice through time
renown'd.

So fall from heaven the vernal showers,
To cheer the glebe, and wake the flowers;
The gloom call'd forth sees azure skies display'd;
The bird of voice is proud to sing,
Industrious bees ply every wing,
Distend their cells, and urge their golden trade.

Trade once extinguish'd, Britain's sun
Is gone out too; his race is run;
He shines in vain! her isle's an isle indeed,
A spot too small to be o'ercome;
Ah, dreadful safety! wretched doom!
No foe will conquer what no foe can feed.

Trade's the source, sinew, soul of all!
Trade's all herself; hers, hers, the ball;
Where most unseen, the goddess still is there!
Trade leads the dance, trade lights the blaze;
The courtier's pomp! the student's ease!
'Twas trade at Blenheim fought, and clos'd the year.

What Rome and all her gods defies?
The Punic oar. Behold it rise
And battle for the world! trade gave the call;
Rich cordial from his naval art
Sent the strong spirits to his heart,
That bid an Afric merchant grasp the ball.

Where is, on earth, Jehovah's home?
Trade mark'd the soil, and built the dome,
In which his Majesty first deign'd to dwell;
The walls with silver sheets o'erlaid,
Rich, as the sun, through gold unweigh'd,
Bent the moon'd arch, and bid the column swell.

Grandeur unknown to Solomon!
Methinks the labouring earth should groan,
Beneath yon load † created sure, not made!
Servant and rival of the skies!
Heaven's arch alone can higher rise:
What hand immortal rais'd thee?—Humble trade.
Where hadst thou been, if left at large,
Those sinewy arms that tugg'd the barge,

* The King's speech.

† St. Paul's, built by the coal-tax.

Had caught at pleasure on the flowery green?
 If they that watch'd the midnight star
 Had swung behind the rolling ear,
 Or fill'd it with disgrace, where hadst thou been?

As by repletion men consume,
Abundance is the miser's doom;
 Expend it nobly; he that lets it rust,
 Which, passing numerous hands, would shine;
 Is not a man, but living mine,
 Foe to the gods, and rival to the dust.

Trade barbarous lands can polish fair;
 Make earth well worth the wise man's care;
 Call forth her forests, charm them into fleets;
 Can make one house of human race;
 Can bid the distant poles embrace;
 Hers, every sun; and India, India meets.

Trade monarchs crowns, and arts imports,
 With bounty feeds, with laurel courts:
 Trade gives fair virtue fairer still to shine;
 Enacts those guards of gain, the laws;
 Exalts ev'n freedom's glorious cause.—
 Trade! warn'd by Tyre, O make religion thine!

You lend each other mutual aid:
 Why is heaven's smile, in wealth, convey'd!
 Not to place vice, but virtues in our power:
 Pleasure declin'd, is luxury,
 Boundless in time and in degree:
 Pleasure enjoy'd, the tumult of an hour.

False joy's a discomposing thing,
 That jars on Nature's trembling string,
 Tempests the spirits, and untunes the frame:
 True joy, the sunshine of the soul,
 A bright serene that calms the whole;
 Which they ne'er knew, whom other joys inflame.

Merchant! religion is the care
 To grow as rich—as angels are;
 To know false coin from true; to sweep the main;
 The mighty stake secure, beyond
 The strongest tie of field, or fund:
 Commerce gives gold, religion makes it gain.

Join, then, religion to thy store,
 Or India's mines will make thee poor:
 Greater than Tyre! O bear a nobler mind
 Sea-sovereign isle! proud war decline,
 Trade patronize! what glory thine,
 Ardent to bless, who couldst subdue mankind!

Rich commerce ply with warmth divine
 By day, by night; the stars are thine,
 Wear out the stars in trade! eternal run
 From age to age, the noble glow,
 A rage to gain, and to bestow,
 While ages last! in trade burn out the sun!

Trade, Britain's all, our fires sent down
 With toil, blood, treasure, ages won;
 This, Edgar great bequeath'd; this, Edward bold:
 Let Forbushers, let Raleighs fire!
 O let Columbus's shade inspire!
 New worlds disclose, with Drake surround an old,

Columbus! scarce inferior fame
 For thee to find, than heaven to frame
 That womb of gold and gem: her wide domain,
 An universe! her rivers, seas!
 Her fruits, both men and gods to please!
 Heaven's fairest birth! and, but for thee, in vain!

Worlds still unknown deep shadows wrap;
 Call wonders forth from nature's lap;
 New glory pour on her Eternal Sire:
 O noble search! O glorious care!
 Are ye not Britons? why despair?
 New worlds are due to such a godlike fire.

Swear by the great Eliza's soul,
 That trade, as long as water's roll—
 Ah! no; the gods chastise my rash decree:
 By great Eliza do not swear;
 For thee, O George! the gods declare:
 And thou for them! late time shall swear by thee.

Truth, bright as stars, with thee prevails;
 Full be thy fame, as swelling sails,
 Constant, as tides, thy mind; as masts, elate;
 Thy justice, an unerring helm
 To steer Britannia's fickle realm;
 Thy numerous race, sure anchor of her state?

STRAIN V.

THE ARGUMENT.

What is the bound of Britain's power. Beyond that of the most famed in history. The sign Lyra. What the constellations are. Argo.
 The whale. The Dolphin. Eridanus. The lion. Libra. Virgo. Bernice. The British ladies censured. The moon. What the sea is.
 Apostrophe to the emperor. The Spanish armada. How Britain should speak her resentment.
 What gives power. What navies do in war.
 The Tartar. Mogul. Africa. China. Who master of the world. What the history of the world is. The genealogy of glory. Mistakes about it. Peace the merchant's harvest. Ships of divine origin. Merchants ambassadors. The Briton's voyage. Praise the food of glory. Britain's record.

BRITANNIA's state what bounds confine!
 (Of rising thought O golden mine!
 Mountains, Alps, streams, gulfs, oceans, set no bound
 She sallies till she strikes the star;
 Expanding wide, and launching far
 As wind can fly, or rolling wave resound.

Small isle! For Cæsars, for the son
 Of Jove, who burst from Macedon,
 For gorgeous easterns blazing o'er mankind;
 Then, when they call'd the world their own,
 Not equal fame from fable shone:
 They rose to gods, in half thy sphere confin'd.

Here, no demand for fancy's wing;
 Plain truth's illustrious: as I sing,
 O hear yon spangled harp repeat my lay!
 Your starry lyre has caught the sound,
 And spreads it to the planets round,
 Who best can tell where ends Britannia's sway.

The skies (fair-printed page!) unfold
The naval fame of heroes old;
As in a mirror show th' adventurous throng:
The deeds of Grecian mariners
Are read by gods, are writ in stars,
And noble verse, that shall endure as long.

The skies are records of the main,
Thence Argo listens to my strain;
Chiron, for song renown'd, his noble rage
For naval fame and song renews,
As Britain's fame he bears, and views;
Chiron, the Shovell of a former age.

The whale (for late I sung his praise)
Pours grateful lustre on my lays;
How smiles Arion's friend * with partial beams!
Eridanus would flatter too,
But jealousies his smile subdue;
He fears a British rival in the Thames.

In pride the lion lifts his mane,
To see his British brothers reign
As stars below: the balance, George! from thine,
Which weighs the nations, learns to weigh
More accurate the night and day;
From thy fair daughters Virgo learns to shine.

Of Britain's court, ye lesser lights!
How could the wise-man gaze whole nights
On Richmond's eye, on Berenice's hair!
But, oh! you practise shameful arts;
Your own retain, seize others' hearts,
Pirates, not merchants, are the British fair.

This truth I swear by Cynthia's beam.
Pale Queen! be flush'd at Britain's fame;
And, rolling, tell the nations—"o'er the main
"To share her empire is thy pride."
He, mighty power! who curbs the tide,
Uncurbs, extends, throws wide Britannia's reign.

What is the main! Ye kings renown'd!
Britannia's centre, and your bound;
Austrian! where-e'er Leviathan can roll,
Is Britain's home! And Britain's mine,
Where'er the ripening sun can shine,
Parts are for emperors; for her the whole.

Why, Austrian! wilt thou hover still
On doubtful wing, and want the skill
To see thy welfare in the world's? Too late
Another Churchill thou may'st find,
Another Churchill, not so kind,
And other Blenheims, big with other fate.

Ill thou remember'st, ill dost own,
Who rescued an ungrateful throne;
Ill thou consider'st, that the kind are brave;
Ill dost thou weigh, that in time's womb
A day may sleep, a day of doom,
As great to ruin, as was that to save.

How would'st thou smile to hear my strain,
Whose boasted inspiration's vain?

* The Dolphin.

Yet what if my prediction should prove true?
Know'st thou the fatal pair who shine
O'er Britain's trading empire thine?
As one rejected, what, if one subdue?

What naval scene adorns the seat
Of awful Britain's high debate*,
Inspires her councils, and records her power?
The nations know, in glowing balls
On sinking thrones, the tempest falls,
When her august assembled senates lour.
O language fit for thoughts so bold!
Would Britain have her anger told;
Ah! never let a meaner language sound,
Than that which prostrates human souls,
Through heaven's dark vault impetuous rolls
And nature rocks, when angry Jove has frown'd.

Not realms unbounded, not a flood
Of natives, not expence of blood,
Or reach of counsel gives the world a lord:
Trade calls him forth, and sets him high,
As mortal man, o'er men can fly:
Trade leaves poor gleanings to the keenest sword.

Nay, her's the sword! for fleets have wings;
Like lightning fly to distant kings;
Like gods descend at once on trembling states:
Is war proclaim'd? Our wars are hurl'd
To farthest confines of the world,
Surprise your ports, and thunder at your gates.

The king of tempests, Æolus,
Sends forth his finion'd people, thus,
On rapid errands: as they fly, they roar,
And carry fable clouds, and sweep
The land, the desert, and the deep!
Earth shakes! proud cities fall! and thrones adore!

The fools of nature ever strike
On bare outsides; and loath, or like,
As glitter bids; in endless error vie;
Admire the purple and the crown:
Of human welfare and renown,
Trade's the big heart; bright empire, but their eye.

Whence Tartar Grand? or Mogul Great?—
Trade gilt their titles, pour'd their state;
While Afric's black, lascivious, slothful breed,
To clasp their ruin, fly from toil;
That meanest product on their soil,
Their people sell: one half on t'other feed.

Of nature's wealth from commerce rent,
Afric's a glaring monument:
Mid citron forests and pomegranate groves
(Curst, in a paradise!) the pines;
O'er generous glebe, o'er golden mines
Her beggar'd, famish'd, tradeless native roves:

Not so thine, China, blooming-wide;
Thy numerous fleets might bridge the tide;
Thy products would exhaust both India's mines:
Shut be that gate of trade! or woe
To Britain's! Europe 'twill o'erflow.—
Ungrateful song! her growth † inspires thy lines.

† The Spanish Armada in the House of Lords.

‡ Coffee.

Britain! to these, and such as these,
The river broad, and foaming seas
Which fewer lands to mortals less renown'd,
Devoid of naval skill or might;
Those sever'd parts of earth unite:
Trade's the full pulse, that sends their vigour round.

Could, O! could one engrossing hand
The various streams of trade command,
That, like the sun, would gaze nation's awe;
That awful power the world would brave.
Bold war, and empire proud, his slave;
Mankind his subjects; and his will, their law.

Hast thou look'd round the spacious earth?
From commerce, grandeur's humble birth:
To George from Noah, empires living, dead,
Their pride, their shame, their rise, their fall,
Time's whole plain chronicle is all
One bright encomium, undesign'd, on trade.

Trade springs from peace, and wealth from trade,
And power from wealth! of power is made
The god on earth: hail, then, the dove of peace!
Whose olive speaks the raging flood
Of war repress'd: what's loss of blood?
War is the death of commerce and increase.

Then perish war!—Detested war!
Shalt thou make gods? like Cæsar's star?
What calls man fool so loud as this has done,
From Nimrod's down to Bourbon's line?—
Why not adore too, as divine,
Wide-wasting storms, before the genial sun?

Peace is the merchant's summer clear!
His harvest! harvest round the year!
For peace with laurel every mast be bound;
Each deck carouse, each flag stream out,
Each cannon sound, each sailor shout!
For peace let every sacred ship be crown'd;

Sacred are ships, of birth divine!
An angel drew the first design;
With which the patriarch nature's ruins brav'd:
Two world's abroad, an old and new,
He safe o'er foaming billows flew:
The gods made human race, a pilot, saw'd.

How sacred too the merchant's name!—
When Britain blaz'd meridian fame*; [law;
Bright shone the sword, but brighter trade gave
Merchants in distant courts rever'd,
Where prouder statesmen ne'er appear'd,
Merchants ambassadors! and thrones in awe.

'Tis theirs to know the tides, the times;
The march of stars; the births of climes;
Summer and winter theirs; theirs land and sea,
Theirs are the seasons, months, and years;
And each a different garland wears.—
O that my song could add eternity!

Praise is the sacred oil that feeds
The burning lamp of godlike deeds;

* In Queen Elizabeth's reign.

Immortal glory pays illustrious cares:
Whither, ye Britons! are you bound?
O noble voyage! glorious round!
Launch from the Thames, and end among the stars.

If to my subject rose my soul,
Your fame should last while oceans roll:
When other worlds in depths of time shall rise,
As we the Greeks of mighty name,
May they Britannia's fleet proclaim,
Look up, and read her story in the skies.

Ye Syrens, sing; ye Tritons, blow;
Ye Nereids, dance; ye billows, flow;
Roll to my measures, O ye starry throng;
Ye winds in concert breathe around;
Ye navies! to the concert bound
From pole to pole! to Britain all belong.

THE MORAL.

The most happy should be the most virtuous. Of eternity. What Britain's arts should be. Whence slavery.

BRITAIN! thus blest, thy blessing know;
Or bliss, in vain! the gods bestow;
Its end fulfil, means cherish, source adore:
Vain swellings of thy soul repress;
They most may lose, who most possess;
Then let bliss awe, and tremble at thy store.

Nor be too fond of life at best,
Her cheerful, not enamour'd guest:
Let thought fly forward; 'twill gay prospects give;
Prospects immortal; that deride
A Tyrian wealth, a Persian pride,
And make it perfect fortitude to live.

O for eternity! a scene!
To fair adventurers serene?
O! on that sea to deal in pure renown!
Traffic with gods! what transports roll;
What boundless import to the soul!
The poor man's empire! and the subjects crown!

Adore the gods, and plough the seas:
These be thy arts, O Britain! these.
Let others pant for an immense command;
Let others breathe war's fiery god;
The proudest victor fears thy nod,
Long as the trident fills thy glorious hand.

Glorious, while heaven-born freedom lasts,
Which trade's soft spurious daughter blasts;
For what is tyranny? A monstrous birth
From luxury, by bribes caress'd,
By glowing power in shades compress'd,
Which stalks around, and chains the groaning earth.

THE CLOSE.

This subject now first sung. How sung. Preferable to Pindar's subjects. How Britain should be sung by all.

THESE, trade! I first, who boast no store,
Who owe the nought, thus snatch from shore

The shore of prose, where thou hast slumber'd
long;

And send thy flag triumphant down
The tide of time, to sure renown;
O bless my country! and thou pay'st my song.

Thou art the Briton's noblest theme,
Why, then, unsung? My simple aim
To dress plain sense, and fire the generous blood;
Not sport imaginations vain,
But lift, with yon ethereal train,
The shining muse, to serve the public good.

Of ancient art and ancient praise,
The springs are open'd in my lays:
Olympic heroes ghosts around me throng,
And think their glory sung anew;
Till chiefs of equal fame they view;
Nor grudge to Britons bold their Theban song.

Not Pindar's theme with mine compares,
As far surpass, as useful cares
Transcend diversion light and glory vain:
The wreath fantastic, shouting throng,
And panting steed, to him belong
The charioteer's, not empire's golden rein.

Nor Chandos! thou the muse despise
That would to glowing Aetna rise
(Such Pindar's breast) thou Theron of our time!
Seldom to man the gods impart
A Pindar's head, or Theron's heart:
In life, or song, how rare the true sublime!

None British-born, will sure disdain
This new, bold, moral, patriot strain,
Though not with genius with some virtue crown'd;
(How vain the muse!) the lay may last,
Thus twin'd around the British mast,
The British mast, with nobler laurels bound!

Weak ivy curls round naval oak,
And smiles at wind and storm unbroke;
By strength not hers sublime: thus, proud to soar,
To Britain's grandeur cleaves my strain:
And lives, and echoes through the plain,
While o'er the billow Britain's thunders roar.

Be dumb, ye groveling sons of verse,
Who sing not actions, but rehearse,
And fool the muse with impotent desire;
Ye sacrilegious! who presume
To tarnish Britain's naval bloom,
Sing Britain's fame, with all her hero's fire.

CHORUS.

" Ye Syrens, sing; ye Tritons, blow;
" Ye Nereids, dance; ye billows, flow;
" Roll to my measures, O ye starry throng!
" Ye winds! in concert breathe around;
" Ye navies! to the concert bound
" From pole to pole; to Britain all belong;
" Britain to heaven; from heaven descend, my
" song."

Not that her blooms are mark'd with beauty's hue,
My rustic muse her votive chaplet brings,
Unseen, unheard, O GRAY, to thee she sings!
While slowly-pacing through the church-yard dew,
At curfew-time, beneath the dark-green yew,
Thy pensive genius strikes the moral strings;
Or borne sublime on inspiration's wings,
Hears Cambria's bards devote the dreadful clue
Of Edward's race, with murders foul defil'd:
Can aught my pipe to reach thine ear essay?
No bard divine! For many a care beguil'd
By the sweet magic of thy soothing lay,
For many a raptur'd thought and vision wild,
To thee this strain of gratitude I pay.

To thee this strain of gratitude I pay,
For many a raptur'd thought and vision wild,
By the sweet magic of thy soothing lay,
No hard divine! But many a care beguild:
Can aught my pipe to teach thee rhyme or style?
Of Edward's race, who numbers feel'd and wild:
Hence Capricious's hand dearest the dross'd chime
Of borne tublins on inspiration's wings:
The pensive genius strikes the moral strings;

THE LIFE OF GRAY.

THE life of GRAY, "the British Pindar," has been written by his friend and editor Mr. Mason, from personal knowledge, and the intelligence obtained from his correspondence with his friends.

The facts stated in the present account, are chiefly taken from Mr. Mason's narrative, with the addition of such particulars as subsequent information has supplied.

Thomas Gray, descended of a reputable family in the city of London, was born in Cornhill, December 26. 1716. His grandfather was a considerable merchant. His father, Philip Gray, was what was then called a money-scrivener, which was the profession of Milton's father; but being of an unsocial and inactive disposition, he rather diminished than increased his paternal fortune. His mother's name was Dorothy Antrobus. They had many children, of whom the poet was the fifth born. All of them, except him, died in their infancy.

He was educated at Eton School, under the care of Mr. Antrobus, his mother's brother, then assistant to Dr. George, and also Fellow of St. Peter's College, Cambridge. While at school, he contracted a friendship with Mr. Horace Walpole, the present Earl of Orford, who has been so long conspicuous for his skill in the fine arts, and his love of letters, and Mr. Richard West, son of the Right Honourable Richard West, Esq., Lord Chancellor of Ireland, a youth of great promise, on whom he set a high value.

In 1734, he removed from Eton to Cambridge, and entered a pensioner in St. Peter's College, and his friend West to Christ-Church, Oxford, where they commenced a correspondence, part of which is included in the collection of letters published by Mr. Mason.

When he entered at St. Peter's College, his effeminacy and fair complexion drew upon him the name of Miss Gray. It is remarkable that Milton had the same appellation of Miss at the University.

Mr. Walpole was at that time of King's College in the same University. They frequently met, conversed on subjects of taste, and drank nothing but tea.

In April 1738, West left Christ-Church for the Inner Temple, and, in September following, Gray returned to London, intending likewise to apply himself to the study of the law, in the same Society, for which purpose his father had either hired or bought him a set of chambers.

It was his first ambition to excel in Latin poetry; and upon this occasion he addressed a Sapphic Ode to his friend West, which is the more curious, as Mr. Mason informs us it was the first voluntary production of his muse. A copy of Latin verses in the Cambridge collections, and his translation from Statius, are of an earlier date.

The splendor and picturesque turn of his genius are strongly marked in this juvenile performance.

The following spring, upon an invitation which Mr. Walpole gave him to be his companion in his travels, his intention of studying the law was laid aside for the present, and never after put in execution. About the end of March 1739, they set out for France together, visiting, in the course of their travels through that country, Paris, Chantilly, Rheims, Dijon, Lyons, the Chartreuse, and other places.

In November they arrived at Turin; from thence they proceeded to Genoa, Bologna, Florence, Rome, Naples, &c. In July 1740, they returned to Florence, where they staid till towards the end of April 1741, and then set out for Venice.

At Rome he wrote the following Alcaic Ode to West, (Ad. C. Favonium Zephyrinum,) immediately after his journey to Frascati and the Cascades of Tivoli :

Mater rosarum, cui teneræ vigent
Auræ Favoni, cui Venus it comes Lasciva, Nympharum choreis
Et volucrum celebrata cantu !

Dic, non inertem fallere quâ diem

 Dulcè canens Venusinus ales;
 Mirum! canenti conticuit nemus,
 Sacrique fontes, et retinent adhuc
 (sic Musa jussit) saxa molles
 Docta modos, veteresque lauri.
 Mirare nec tu me citharæ rudem

 Amæna, jucundumque ver incompositum docuere carmen;
 Hærent sub omni nam folio nigri
 Phœbea luci (credite) somnia,
 Argutiusque et lympa et auræ
 Nescio quid solito loquuntur.

At Florence, Gray conceived the design, and wrote the first book of a didactic poem in Latin, entitled De Principiis Cogitandi, which he addressed to West (ad Favonium), but unfortunately never completed.

An unfortunate disagreement between the two travellers, arising from the difference of their tempers, occasioned their separation at Reggio. Gray being, even from his earliest years, curious, pensive, and philosophical; Mr. Walpole, gay, lively, and consequently inconsiderate. The latter, however, enjoined Mr. Mason to charge him with the chief blame in their quarrel, confessing that more attention and complaisance, more deference to a warm friendship, superior judgment and prudence, might have prevented a rupture that gave much uneasiness to them both; though in 1744, a reconciliation was effected between them by a lady who wished well to both parties.

Gray continued his journey to Venice, in a manner suitable to his own little fortune; and, having continued there till about the middle of July, he returned home through Padua, Verona, Milan and Turin, and, repassing the Alps, pursued almost the same route by which he had before gone to Italy.

His Letters, published by Mr. Mason, contain a very pleasing account of many parts of his journey. His descriptions of Versailles, of the amusements at Rheims, of the confluence of the Rhone and Saone, visit to the Grande Chartreuse, and the passage of the Alps, bear more particular marks of his genius and disposition. When he ascends the Alps, we see even the native grandeur of his ideas heightened. He is hardly any longer a mortal being, nec vox sonat hominem, particularly when he goes up to the Grande Chartreuse, that wild magical enthusiasm so natural to him, seems to possess his whole soul.

On his return from his travels, and after the misunderstanding with Mr. Walpole, when his natural melancholy, heightened by chagrin, had led his wishes to a gloomy dereliction of society, he again visited the Chartreuse. The situation was perfectly suitable to his state of mind, and there he wrote, in the Album of the fathers, such an Alcaic Ode as he himself only could have written. It is marked with all the finest touches of his melancholy muse, and flows with such an originality of expression, that one can hardly lament he did not honour his own language, by making it the vehicle of this noble imagery and pathetic sentiment :

Oh tu, severi religio loci,
 Quocunque gaudes nomine (non leve
 Nativa nam certè fluenta
 Numen habet, veteresque sylvas;
 Præsentio rem et conspici mus Deum
 Per invias rupes, fera per juga,
 Clivosque præruptos, sonantes
 Inter aquas, nemorumque noctem;
 Quàm si repositus sub trabe citreâ
 Fulgeret auro, et Phidiacâ manu)
 Salve vocanti ritè, fessò et
 Da placidam juveni quietem.
 Quod si invidendis sedibus, et frui
 Fortuna sacrâ lege silentii
 Vetat volentem, me resorbens
 In medios violenta fluctus:
 Saltem remoto des, Pater, angulo
 Horas senectæ ducere liberas;
 Tutumque vulgari tumultu
 Surripias, hominumque curis.

He returned to England September 1. 1741, and, in about two months afterwards, buried his father; who, by the neglect of his business, and an injudicious waste of money upon a new house at Wanstead, so much lessened his patrimony, that it would by no means enable him to prosecute the study of the law, without his becoming burthensome to his mother and aunt.

These two sisters had, for many years, kept an India warehouse in Cornhill, under the joint names of Gray and Antrobus. Upon Mr. Gray's death, having acquired what would support them decently for the rest of their lives, they retired to Stoke, near Windsor, to the house of their other sister Mrs. Rogers, lately become the widow of a gentleman of that name, who had, in the earlier part of his life, followed the profession of the law, but retired from business many years before his death.

Gray, though he had taken his resolution of declining the study of the law, was too delicate to hurt two persons, for whom he had the tenderest affection, by peremptorily declaring his real intentions; and therefore changed, or pretended to change the line of that study: And accordingly, towards the end of the subsequent year, went to Cambridge to take his bachelor's degree in civil law.

But the narrowness of his circumstances was not the only thing that distressed him at this period. He had lost the friendship of Mr. Walpole abroad. He had also lost much time in his travels; and he well knew, that whatever improvement he might have made in this interval, either in taste or science, such improvement would be of little use to him in his present situation and exigencies. This was not all. His other friend West, he found, on his return, oppressed by sickness and a load of family misfortunes. These, the sympathizing heart of Gray made his own. But his cares were vain. West's health declined daily, and he left London in March 1742; and, for the benefit of the air, went to David Mitchell's, Esq. at Pope's in Hertfordshire.

During an interval of something more than two months, they maintained a constant correspondence on subjects of literature and their classical studies. The last letter from West is dated May 11. 1742. Gray returned an answer May 27. Immediately afterwards, he went upon a visit to his relations at Stoke, where he wrote his Ode on the Spring. He sent it, as soon as written, to his beloved friend; but he was dead before it reached Hertfordshire.

There seems to be a kind of presentiment in that pathetic piece, which readers of taste will feel when they learn this anecdote, and which will make them read it with redoubled pleasure. It will also throw a melancholy grace on the Ode on the Distant Prospect of Eton, and on the Ode to Adversity, both of them written the August following: for as both these poems abound with pathos, those who have feeling hearts will feel this excellence the more strongly, when they know the cause from whence it arose; and the unfeeling will perhaps learn to respect what they cannot taste, when they are prevented from imputing to a splenetic melancholy, what, in fact, sprung from the most benevolent of all sensations.

It is probable, that the Elegy in a Country Church-Yard was begun, if not finished, about this time, though the conclusion, as it stands at present, is certainly different from what it was in the first manuscript copy.

The first impulse of his sorrow, for the death of his friend, gave birth to a little sonnet, in English, on the Petrarchian model, which is exceedingly tender and mournful.

In vain to me the smiling mornings shine,
And redd'ning Phœbus lifts his golden fire :
The birds in vain their amorous descant join ;
Or cheerful fields resume their green attire :
These ears, alas ! for other notes repine,
A different object do these eyes require :
My lonely anguish melts no heart but mine ;
And in my breast the imperfect joys expire.

Yet morning smiles the busy race to cheer,
And new-born pleasure brings to happier men :
The fields to all their wonted tribute bear :
To warm their little loves the birds complain :
I fruitless mourn to him, that cannot hear,
And weep the more, because I weep in vain.

The only addition he afterwards made to his didactic poem, De Principiis Cogitandi, is the apostrophe in hexameters to the friend he had lost, written in the genuine strain of classical majesty, with which he intended to begin the fourth book.

Hactenus haud segnis Naturæ arcana retexi
Musarum interpres, primusque Britannia per arva
Romano liquidum deduxi flumine rivum.
Cum tu opere in medio, spes tanti et causa laboris,
Linqvis, et æternam fati te condis in umbram !
Vidi cōmet duro graviter concussa dolore
Pectora, in alterius non unquam lenta dolorem ;
Et languere oculos vidi, et pallescere amantem
Vultum, quo nunquam pietas nisi rara, fidesque,
Altus amor veri, et purum spirabat honestum.
Visa tamen tardi demùm inclementia morbi
Cessare est, reducemque iterum roseo ore Salutem
Speravi, atque unâ tecum, dilecte Favoni !
Credulus heu longos, ut quondâm, fallere soles :
Heu spes nequicquam dulces, atque irrita vota !
Heu mœstos soles, sine te quos ducere flendo
Per desideria, et questus jam cogor inanes !
At Tu, sancta anima, et nostri non indiga luctûs,
Stellanti templo, sincerique ætheris igne,
Unde orta es, fruire ; atque o si secura, nec ultra
Mortalis, notos olim miserata labores
Respectes, tenuisque vacet cognoscere curas ;
Humanam si fortè altâ de sede procellam
Contemplerè, metus, stimulosque cupidinis acres,
Gaudiaque et gemitus, parvoque in corde tumultum
Irarum ingentem, et sævos sub pectore fluctus ;
Respice et has lacrymas, memori quas ictus amore
Fundo ; quod possum, juxtâ lugere sepulchrum
Dum juvat, et mutæ vana hæc jactare favillæ.

Having made a visit of some length at Stoke, where he wrote a considerable part of his more finished poems, he returned to Cambridge, which, from this period, became his principal residence. He spent, indeed, during the lives of his mother and aunts, his summer vacations at Stoke, and after they died, in making little tours or visits to his friends in different parts of the country.

The conveniences resulting from that situation, to a person of circumscribed fortune and a studious life, were, in his estimation, more than a counterbalance for the dislike, which, on several accounts, he bore to the place. He was admitted to the degree of Bachelor of the Civil Law in the winter 1742, as appears by his letter to his intimate friend, Dr. Wharton of Old Park, near Durham, formerly fellow of Pembroke-Hall, Cambridge, dated December 27. 1742, in which he employs his usual vein of ridicule on the University. From this time he appears to have laid aside composition almost entirely. Less pleased with exerting his own powers than in contemplating the exertions of others, he applied himself, with intense assiduity, to the study of the best Greek authors; inasmuch, that in the space of about six years, there were hardly any writers of note in that language, which he had not only read but digested; remarking, by the mode of common-place, their contents, their difficult and corrupt passages; and all this with the accuracy of a critic, added to the diligence of a student.

During this interval, however, he was not so entirely occupied with his stated employment, as to have no time for expressing his aversion to the ignorance and dullness which appeared to surround him; but of what he intended on this subject, a short fragment only remains, which seems to have been intended as a Hymn to Ignorance; and had he proceeded with it, would have contained much good satire upon false science and scholastic pedantry. What he wrote of it is purely introductory; yet many of the lines are so strong, and the general cast of the versification so musical, that it will probably give the admirers of Dryden and Pope a higher opinion of his poetical talents, than many of his lyric productions have done.

Hail, horrors, hail! ye ever gloomy bowers,
Ye gothic fanes, and antiquated towers,
Where rushy Camus' slowly-winding flood
Perpetual draws his humid train of mud:
Glad I revisit thy neglected reign,
Oh take me to thy peaceful shade again.

But chiefly thee, whose influence breath'd from high,
Augments the native darkness of the sky;
Ah ignorance! soft salutary power!
Prostrate with filial reverence I adore.
Thrice hath Hyperion roll'd his annual race,
Since weeping I forsook thy fond embrace.
Oh say, successful dost thou still oppose
Thy leaden Ægis 'gainst our ancient foes?
Still stretch, tenacious of thy right divine,
The massy sceptre o'er thy slumbering line?
And dew's Lethean through the land dispense
To sleep in slumbers each benighted sense?
If any spark of wit's delusive ray
Break out, and flash a momentary day,
With damp, cold touch forbid it to aspire,
And huddle up in fogs the dangerous fire.

Oh say—she hears me not, but careless grown,
Lethargic nods upon her ebon throne.

Goddeſs! awake, arise, alas my fears!
Can powers immortal feel the force of years?
Not thus of old, with ensigns wide unfurl'd,
She rode triumphant o'er the vanquish'd world;
Fierce nations own'd her unresisted might,
And all was ignorance, and all was night.

Oh sacred age! Oh times for ever lost!
(The school-man's glory, and the churchman's boast.)
For ever gone—yet still to fancy new,
Her rapid wings the transient scene pursue,
And bring the buried ages back to view.

High on her car, behold the grandam ride
Like old Sesostris with barbaric pride;

* * * * a team of harness'd monarchs bend
* * * *

In 1744, he appears to have given up entirely his didactic poem, and to have relinquished, for some time at least, any farther solicitations of the muse.

Mr. Walpole, notwithstanding, being desirous to preserve what he had already written, and to perpetuate the merit of their deceased friend, importuned him to publish his own poems, together with those of West; but this he declined, from the apprehension, that the joint stock of both would hardly fill a small volume.

In 1747, Mr. Mason, then scholar of St. John's College, afterwards fellow of Pembroke-Hall, was introduced to his acquaintance. He had written the year before, his "Monody on the Death of Pope," and his "Il Bellicoso," and "Il Pacifico," and Gray had revised them at the request of a friend. This laid the foundation of an intimacy, which continued without interruption till the death of Gray.

The same year, a favourite cat, belonging to Mr. Walpole, happening to be drowned, Gray amused himself on the occasion, with writing an elegant little Ode; in which he has happily united both humour and instruction.

But the following year was distinguished by a far more important effort of his muse, the initiatory fragment of an Essay on the Alliance of Education and Government, which is superior to every thing in the same style of writing in our language. He meant to show, that both must concur to produce great and useful men. It was intended to be addressed to the President Montesquieu, and possibly the intervening death of that great man might be a means of his relinquishing his purpose. It opens with two similes, an uncommon kind of exordium; but which, it is probable, he intentionally chose to intimate the analogical method he meant to pursue in his subsequent reasonings.

As sickly plants betray a nigard earth,
Whose barren bosom starves her gen'rous birth,
Nor genial warmth, nor genial juice retains
Their roots to feed, and fill their verdant veins:
And as in climes, where winter holds his reign,
The soil, though fertile, will not teem in vain,
Forbids her gems to swell, her shades to rise,
Nor trusts her blossoms to the churlish skies:
To draw mankind in vain the vital airs,
Unform'd, unfriended, by those kindly cares,
That health and vigour to the soul impart,
Spread the young thought, and warm the opening heart:
So fond instruction on the growing powers
Of nature idly lavishes her stores,
If equal justice, with unclouded face,
Smile not indulgent on the rising race,
And scatter with a free, though frugal hand,
Light golden showers of plenty o'er the land:
But tyranny has fix'd her empire there,
To check their tender hopes with chilling fear,
And blast the blooming promise of the year.

This spacious animated scene survey,
From where the rolling orb, that gives the day,
His sable sons with nearer course surrounds
To either pole, and life's remotest bounds.
How rude foe'er th' exterior form we find,
Howe'er opinion tinge the varied mind,
Alike to all the kind, impartial heav'n
The sparks of truth and happiness has giv'n:
With sense to feel, with memory to retain,
They follow pleasure, and they fly from pain;
Their judgment mends the plan their fancy draws,
Th' event presages, and explores the cause;
The soft returns of gratitude they know,
By fraud elude, by force repell the foe;
While mutual wishes, mutual woes endear
The social smile and sympathetic tear.

Say, then, through ages by what fate confin'd
To different climes seem different souls assign'd?
Here measur'd laws and philosophic ease
Fix, and improve the polish'd arts of peace.

There industry and gain their vigil keep,
 Command the winds, and tame th' unwilling deep.
 Here force and hardy deeds of blood prevail;
 There languid pleasure sighs in every gale.
 Oft o'er the trembling nations from afar
 Has Scythia breath'd the living cloud of war;
 And, where the deluge burst, with sweepy sway,
 Their arms, their kings, their gods were roll'd away.
 As oft have issued, host impelling host,
 The blue-eyed myriads from the Baltic coast.
 The prostrate south to the destroyer yields
 Her boasted titles, and her golden fields;
 With grim delight the brood of winter view
 A brighter day, and heav'ns of azure hue,
 Scent the new fragrance of the breathing rose,
 And quaff the pendent vintage as it grows.
 Proud of the yoke, and pliant to the rod,
 Why yet does Asia dread a monarch's nod,
 While European freedom still withstands
 Th' encroaching tide, that drowns her lessening
 And sees far off with an indignant groan
 Her native plains, and empires once her own.
 Can opener skies and suns of fiercer flame
 O'erpower the fire, that animates our frame;
 As lamps, that shed at eve a cheerful ray,
 Fade and expire beneath the eye of day?
 Need we the influence of the northern star
 To string our nerves and steel our hearts to war?
 And, where the face of nature laughs around,
 Must sick'ning virtue fly the tainted ground?
 Unmanly thought! what seasons can controul,
 What fancied zone can circumscribe the soul,
 Who, conscious of the source from whence she springs,
 By reason's light, on resolution's wings,
 Spite of her rail companion, dauntless goes
 O'er Lybia's deserts and through Zembla's snows?
 She bids each slumb'ring energy awake,
 Another touch, another temper take,
 Suspends th' inferior laws, that rule our clay:
 The stubborn elements confess her sway;
 Their little wants, their low desires, refine,
 And raise the mortal to a height divine.

Not but the human fabric from the birth
 Imbibes a flavour of its parent earth.
 As various tracts enforce a various toil,
 The manners speak the idiom of their soil.
 An iron-race the mountain-cliffs maintain,
 Foes to the gentler genius of the plain:
 For where unwearied sinews must be found
 With side-long plough to quell the flinty ground,
 To turn the torrent's swift-descending flood,
 To brave the savage rushing from the wood,
 What wonder, if to patient valour train'd
 They guard with spirit, what by strength they gain'd?
 And while their rocky ramparts round they see,
 The rough abode of want and liberty,
 (As lawless force from confidence will grow)
 Insult the plenty of the vales below?
 What wonder, in the sultry climes, that spread,
 Where Nile redundant o'er his summer bed
 From his broad bosom life and verdure flings,
 And broods o'er Egypt with his wat'ry wings,
 If with advent'rous oar and ready sail,
 The dusky people drive before the gale;
 Or on frail floats to neighb'ring cities ride
 That rise and glitter o'er the ambient tide.

* * * *

How much it is to be wished, that Gray had completed what he thus admirably begun! The design is the noblest which he ever attempted; and also, as far as he carried it into execution, the most exquisitely finished.

The Ode on Eton College was his first English production which appeared in print. It was published in folio, by Doddsley, in 1747; about the same time, at Mr. Walpole's request, he sat for his picture to Echart, in which, on a paper which he held in his hand, Mr. Walpole wrote the title of this ode; and to intimate his own high just opinion of it, added this line of Lucan by way of motto,

Nec licuit populis parvum temere, Nile, videre.

Phars. lib. x. l. 296.

This highly-finished ode, together with his three other monostrophic odes on Spring, on a Favourite Cat, to Adversity, was afterwards inserted in "Doddsley's Miscellany." The Ode to Adversity was first printed under the title of an Hymn to Adversity, which is here dropped for the sake of uniformity. It is unquestionably as truly lyrical as any of his other odes.

In 1750, he put his last hand to the Elegy Written in a Country Church-Yard, which, when finished, was communicated first to Mr. Walpole, and by him to several persons of distinction. This brought Gray acquainted with Lady Cobham, and furnished an occasion for his Long Story, a composition in ballad-measure, in which the different colours of wit and humour are peculiarly and intimately blended.

The Elegy, having found its way into the "Magazine of Magazines," he wrote Mr. Walpole, February 11. 1751, desiring him that he would put his own manuscript into the hands of Doddsley, and order him to print it immediately.

This was the most popular of all his productions. It ran through eleven editions in a very short space of time, was finely translated into Latin by Messrs. Anstey and Roberts, and in the same year another, though inferior, version of it was published by Lloyd. In the manuscript copy, he gave it only the simple title of Stanzas Written in a Country Church-Yard. Mr. Mason persuaded him to call it an Elegy, because the subject authorised him so to do, and the alternate measure in which it was written, seemed peculiarly fit for that species of composition.

In 1753, Mr. Bentley, wishing to supply every ornament that his pencil could contribute, drew not only for it, but also for the rest of Gray's productions, a set of designs, which were handsomely repaid by the following complimentary stanzas, many of which are equal in merit to the best in his most finished poems.

In silent gaze the tuneful choir among,
Half-pleas'd, half-blushing let the muse admire,
While Bentley leads her sister-art along,
And bids the pencil answer to the lyre.
See, in their course, each transitory thought
Fix'd by his touch a lasting essence take;
Each dream, in fancy's airy colouring wrought,
To local symmetry and life awake!
The tardy rhymes that us'd to linger on,
To censure cold, and negligent of fame,
In swifter measures animated run,
And catch a lustre from his genuine flame.
Ah! could they catch his strength, his easy grace,
His quick creation, his unerring line;
The energy of Pope they might efface,
And Dryden's harmony submit to mine.
But not to one in this benighted age
Is that diviner inspiration giv'n
That burns in Shakspeare's or in Milton's page,
The pomp and prodigality of heav'n.
As when conspiring in the diamond's blaze,
The meaner gems, that singly charm the sight,
Together dart their intermingled rays,
And dazzle with a luxury of light.
Enough for me, if to some feeling breast
My lines a secret sympathy impart;

And as their pleasing influence flows congest,
A sigh of soft reflection beave the heart.

The paper on which the last stanza was written being broken, the words in Italics were supplied by Mr. Mason, who very ingenuously and very justly expresses his dissatisfaction with the termination of the third line: the end of the fourth, however, is not less exceptionable; perhaps it would be better if it stood thus:

Enough for me, if to some feeling breast,
My lines a secret sympathy convey;
And as their pleasing influence there shall rest,
A sigh of soft reflection steal away.

The panegyric is certainly carried too far; there is so much of grotesque fancy in the designs, that they have failed to please universally. Let the reader peruse the second stanza, and turn to the design for the Ode to Adversity. Let him behold the Quarter Staff of Jupiter, the Horse-Lock, the Hunting Whip, and the Talons, and bid defiance to risibility if he can. The original drawings, in Mr. Mason's opinion, are infinitely superior to the published engravings of them.

The head-pieces to the Long Story, exhibiting a view of Stoke-Pogis church and mansion, were copied from a sketch by Gray. The Church-yard was the subject of his Elegy.

In the March following, Gray sustained a loss which he long and severely felt; his mother, to whom his conduct was exemplary for the discharge of every filial duty, and who merited all the tenderness and attention she received, was taken from him by death. She was buried in the same vault, where her sister's remains had been deposited, more than three years before, in the church-yard of Stoke. As the inscription on the the tombstone (at least the latter part of it) is undoubtedly of Gray's writing, it here would claim a place, if it had not a peculiar pathos to recommend it, and at the same time a true inscriptive simplicity.

In the vault beneath, are deposited,
In hope of a joyful resurrection,
The remains of
MARY ANTROBUS.
She died, unmarried, Nov. v. M,DCC,XLIX.
Aged LXVI.
In the same pious confidence,
Beside her friend and sister,
Here sleep the remains of Dorothy Gray,
Widow, the careful tender mother
Of many children, one of whom alone
Had the misfortune to survive her.
She died March XI. M,DCC,LIII.
Aged LXVII.

The lines, in which Pope has expressed his piety, beautiful as they are, and much as they deserve to be praised, appear, notwithstanding, to excite less of sympathy than a single stroke in this inscription, or a passage in a letter to Mr. Mason, written the following December, on the death of his father and friend, Dr. Marmaduke Pricket, a young physician. "I have seen the scene you describe, and know how dreadful it is; I know too, I am the better for it. We are all idle and thoughtless things, and have no sense, no use in the world, any longer than that sad impression lasts; the deeper it is engraved the better."

Impressions of grief on the generality of mankind, like characters marked on the sand of the sea, are speedily effaced by the influx of business or pleasure; but the traces of them on the heart of Gray were too deeply inscribed to be soon obliterated. He cherished the remembrance of his loss with a melancholy pleasure, of which the present writer can easily comprehend the value; for he knows what it is to lose persons that his eyes and heart have been long used to, and he never desires to part with the remembrance of that loss.

Gray, as is evident by a letter to Dr. Wharton, finished his Ode on the Progress of Poesy, early in 1755; the Bard also was begun about that time, and the following beautiful fragment On the Pleasure arising from Vicissitude:

Now the golden morn aloft
 Waves her dew-bespangled wing,
 With vermil cheek, and whisper soft
 She wooes the tardy spring :
 Till April starts, and calls around
 The sleeping fragrance from the ground ;
 And lightly o'er the living scene
 Scatters his freshest, tenderest green.

New born flocks, in rustic dance,
 Frisking ply their feeble feet ;
 Forgetful of their wint'ry trance
 The birds his presence greet :
 But chief, the sky-lark warbles high
 His trembling thrilling ecstasy ;
 And, lessening from the dazzled sight,
 Melts into air and liquid light.

Yesterday the fullen year
 Saw the snowy whirlwind fly ;
 Mute was the music of the air,
 The herd stood drooping by :
 Their raptures now that wildly flow,
 No yesterday, nor morrow know ;
 'Tis man alone that joy describes
 With forward and reverted eyes.
 Smiles on past misfortune's brow,
 Soft reflection's hand can trace ;
 And o'er the cheek of sorrow throw
 A melancholy grace :
 While hope prolongs our happier hour ;
 Or deepest shades, that dimly lower
 And blacken round our weary way,
 Gilds with a gleam of distant day.

Still, where rosy pleasure leads,
 See a kindred grief pursue ;
 Behind the steps that misery treads
 Approaching comfort view :
 The hues of bliss more brightly glow,
 Chastis'd by sabler tints of woe ;
 And blended form, with artful strife,
 The strength and harmony of life.
 See the wretch, that long has tost
 On the thorny bed of pain,
 At length repair his vigour lost,
 And breathe, and walk again :
 The meanest floweret of the vale,
 The simplest note that swells the gale,
 The common sun, the air, the skies,
 To him are opening Paradise.

Humble quiet builds her cell
 Near the course where pleasure flows ;
 She eyes the clear crystalline well,
 And tastes it as it goes.

From the loose hints in his common-place book, he appears to have planned a fourth Ode on the Connection between Genius and Grandeur ; but it cannot now be ascertained if any part of it was actually written.

In 1756, he removed from St. Peter's College to Pembroke-Hall, in consequence of two or three young men of fortune, who lived in the same stair-case, having, for some time, intentionally disturbed him with their riots. He complained to the governing part of the Society ; and not thinking that his remonstrance was sufficiently attended to, he "left his lodgings," as he himself expresses it, "because the rooms were noisy, and the people of the house uncivil."

Upon the death of Cibber, in 1757, the Duke of Devonshire, then Lord Chamberlain, made him an offer of the vacant office of Poet-Laureat, through the hands of Lord John Cavendish, his brother ; but the disgrace brought upon that office, by the inability of some who had filled it, probably induced him to decline the appointment, which was bestowed on Whitehead.

The same year, he published the Progress of Poesy, and the Bard, his two greatest lyric performances. Their merit was not immediately perceived, nor generally acknowledged. Garrick wrote a few lines in their praise. Lloyd and Colman wrote in concert two Odes to "Oblivion" and "Obscurity," in which they were ridiculed with much contempt and much ingenuity.

In 1759, his curiosity drew him away from Cambridge, to a lodging in Southampton-row, near the Museum, where he resided near three years, reading and transcribing. His extracts, amounting in all to a tolerably-sized folio, are at present in the hands of Lord Orford, who printed the speech of Sir Thomas Wyat from them, in the second number of his "Miscellaneous Antiquities."

In 1762, when the Professorship of Modern Languages and History at Cambridge, became vacant by the death of Mr. Turner, he was, as he says, "cockered and spirited up," till he asked it of Lord Bute, who sent him a civil refusal, and the place was given to Mr. Laurence Bocket, the tutor of Sir James Lowther.

His constitution was weak, and believing that his health was promoted by exercise and change of place, he undertook, in 1765, a journey into Scotland, of which his account, so far as it extends, is very curious and elegant ; for, as his comprehension was ample, his curiosity extended to all the works of art, all the appearances of nature, and all the monuments of past events. He naturally contracted a friendship with Dr. Beattie, whom he found "a poet, a philosopher, and a good man." The Marischal College at Aberdeen offered him the degree of Doctor of Laws, which, having omitted to take it at Cambridge, he thought it decent to refuse.

In 1767, Dr. Beattie, desirous that his country should afford some testimony of its regard to Gray, solicited his permission, to Mr. Foulis, to print, at the University press of Glasgow, an elegant edition of his works. Doddsley had before asked the same favour, and Gray, unwilling to refuse, gratified both with a copy, containing a few notes, and the imitations of the Norse poetry, intended to supplant the Long Story, which was printed at first only to illustrate Mr. Bentley's designs.

The death of Mr. Bocket, in July 1768, left another opening to the Professorship, which he had before unsuccessfully sought. Lord Bute, however, was not then in office, and the Duke of Grafton, to preclude a request, within two days of the vacancy, appointed Gray.

This place was valuable in itself, the salary being 400 l. a year ; but what rendered it particularly acceptable to Gray, was its being given him without any solicitation.

On the Duke of Grafton being elected Chancellor of the University, in 1769, gratitude prompted Gray, unasked, to furnish an irregular Ode for Music, to be performed at his installation ; and whatever the celebrated Junius (notwithstanding his compliment to Gray) might pretend, it was the offering of no venal muse. The ode in its structure is dramatic, and it contains nothing of the complimentary kind, which is not entirely suited to the characters employed. In point of lyrical arrangement and expression, it is equal to most of his other odes.

Not long after the bustle of the installation was over, ill health made another journey necessary, and he visited the lakes of Westmoreland and Cumberland. The impressions he received from the wonderful scenery that surrounded him, he transmitted to his friend, Dr. Wharton, in epistolary journals, with all the wildness of Salvator, and the softness of Claude.

In May 1771, writing to the same friend, he complains of a violent cough, which had troubled him for three months, and which he called incurable ; adding, that till this year he never knew what (mechanical) low spirits were.

The anxiety he felt from holding, as a sinecure, an office, the duties of which he thought himself bound to perform, without doubt, contributed to the latter complaint.

The object of his professorship being twofold, and the patent allowing him to effect one of its designs by deputy, it is understood, that he liberally rewarded, for that purpose, the teachers in the University of Italian and French.

The other part he himself prepared to execute ; but though the professorship was instituted in 1724, none of his predecessors had furnished a plan of lectures.

Embarrassed by this and other difficulties, and retarded by ill health, the undertaking at length became so irksome, that he seriously proposed to resign the office.

About the end of May he removed from Cambridge to London, after having suffered from irregular attacks of an hereditary gout, to which he had long been subject, and from which a life of singular temperance could not protect him.

In London his indisposition having increased, Dr. Gisborne advised him to remove from his lodgings in Jermyn-street to Kensington. This change was of so much benefit, that he was soon enabled to return to Cambridge, from whence he meditated a journey to Old Park, near Durham, the residence of his friend Dr. Wharton, which he hoped might re-establish his health; but his intentions and hopes were delusive.

On the 24th of July, while at dinner in the College-hall, he felt a sudden nausea, which obliged him to rise from table, and retire to his chamber. The gout had fixed on his stomach, and resisted all the powers of medicine. On the 29th, he was seized with a strong convulsion fit, which, on the 30th, returned with increased violence; and the next evening he expired, in the 55th year of his age.

He was sensible at times, almost to the last, and from the first aware of his extreme danger, but expressed no visible concern at the thoughts of his approaching dissolution. He was buried in the vault, in which his aunt and his mother were interred, in the church-yard of Stoke, agreeable to his own direction.

By his will, dated July 2. 1770, he appointed Mr. Mason, and the Rev. Dr. Browne, President of Pembroke-hall, his joint executors; and left "Mr. Mason all his books, manuscripts, coins, music, printed or written, and papers of all kinds, to preserve or destroy at his own discretion."

His Poems and Letters were collected and published by Mr. Mason, in one volume 4to, 1775, to which he prefixed "Memoirs of his Life and Writings," with "imitations, variations and additional notes," and republished in 4 vols. 8vo. 1778. The common editions of his Poems are too numerous to be specified. To the edition in 8vo. 1786, were added notes and parallel passages by Mr. Wakefield. The notes are in general pertinent and judicious, and the parallel places discover extensive erudition, and are selected with taste and judgment. An edition, with a perpetual commentary, is preparing for the press, which the present writer is happy to announce as the production of his friend Alexander Thomson, Esq. author of "Whist," "The Paradise of Taste," and other ingenious performances. The Latin language was enriched with an elegant and spirited translation of the Bard, in 1775, and an admirable Greek version of the Elegy in a Country Church-yard, proceeded from the classical pen of Dr. Norbury, in 1793. The imitations it has produced are innumerable.

It may be collected from the narrative of Mr. Mason, that the greatest part of Gray's life was spent in that kind of learned leisure, which has only self-improvement and self-gratification for its object. He was remarkably disinterested in all his pursuits. He never read or wrote with a view of making labours useful to himself. He may be said to have been one of those few personages in the annals of literature, especially in the poetical class, who are devoid of self-interest, and at the same time attentive to economy; and also was among mankind in general, one of these very few economists who possess that talent untinged with the slightest stain of avarice. When his circumstances were at the lowest, he gave away such sums in charity, as would have done credit to an ampler purse. But what chiefly deterred him from taking any advantage by his literary pursuits, was a certain degree of pride, which led him to despise the idea of being thought an author by profession.

However, it is probable, that, early in life, he had an intention of publishing an edition of Strabo; for his papers contain a great number of notes and geographical disquisitions on that author, particularly with respect to that part of Asia which comprehends Persia and India. The indefatigable pains which he took with the writings of Plato, and the quantity of critical, as well as explanatory observations, which he has left upon almost every part of his works, plainly indicate that no man in Europe was better prepared to republish and illustrate that philosopher than Gray. Another work, on which he bestowed uncommon labour, was the Anthologia. In an interleaved copy of that collection of Greek epigrams, he has transcribed several additional ones, which he selected in his extensive reading, has inserted a great number of critical notes and emendations, and subjoined a copious index, in which every epigram is arranged under the name of its respective author. But whether he intended this manuscript for the press or not is uncertain. The only work which he meditated upon with that view from the beginning, was a History of English Poetry, upon a plan sketched out by Pope. He has mentioned this himself in an advertisement prefixed to those three fine imitations of Norse and Welch poetry, which he gave to the world in the last edition of his poems. But after he had made some considerable preparations for the execution of this design, and Mr. Mason had offered him his assistance, he was informed that Mr. Warton was engaged in a work of the same kind. The undertaking was therefore relinquished by mutual consent; and, in 1770, on Mr. Warton's desiring a sight of the plan, he readily sent him the following "Sketch of the arrangement of the subject" in a letter, which was published in the "Gentleman's Magazine" for February 1783.

"Introduction. On the poetry of the Galic or Celtic nations, as far back as it can be traced.—On that of the Goths, its introduction into these islands by the Saxons and Danes, and its duration.—On the origin of rhyme among the Franks, the Saxons, and Provençaux.—Some account of the Latin rhyming poetry, from its early origin, down to the fifteenth century.

"Part I. On the School of Provence, which rose about the year 1100, and was soon followed by the French and Italians. Their heroic poetry, or Romances in verse, Allegories, Fabliaux, Syrvientes, Comedies, Farces, Canzoni, Sonnets, Balades, Madrigals, Sestines, &c. Of their imitators, the French: and of the first Italian School, commonly called the Sicilian, about the year 1200, brought to perfection by Dante, Petrarch, Boccace, and others.—State of Poetry in England from the Conquest, 1066, or rather, from Henry the Second's time, 1154, to the reign of Edward the Third, 1327.

"Part II. On Chaucer, who first introduced the manner of the Provençaux, improved by the Italians, into our country: his character and merits at large: the different kinds in which he excelled—Gower, Occleve, Lydgate, Hawes, Gawen Douglas, Lyndesay, Bellenden, Dunbar, &c.

"Part III. Second Italian School, of Ariosto, Tasso, &c. an improvement on the first, occasioned by the revival of Letters, the end of the fifteenth century. The Lyric poetry of this and the former age introduced from Italy by Lord Surrey, Sir T. Wyatt, Bryan, Lord Vaulx, &c. in the beginning of the sixteenth century.

"Part IV. Spenser, his character: subject of his poem, allegoric and romantic, of Provençal invention; but his manner of tracing it, borrowed from the Second Italian School.—Drayton, Fairfax, Phineas Fletcher, Golding, Phaer, &c. This School ends in Milton.—A Third Italian School, full of conceit, begun in Queen Elizabeth's reign, continued under James and Charles the First, by Donne, Crashaw, Cleiveland, carried to its height by Cowley, and ending perhaps in Sprat.

"Part V. School of France, introduced after the Restoration—Waller, Dryden, Addison, Prior, and Pope—Which has continued to our own times."

Among other sciences, Gray had acquired a great knowledge of Gothic architecture. He endeavoured to trace this mode of building from the time it commenced, through its various changes, till it arrived at its perfection in the reign of Henry VIII., and ended in that of Elizabeth. For this purpose, he did not so much depend upon written accounts, as that internal evidence which the buildings themselves give of their respective antiquity. On this account, he applied himself to the study of heraldry, as a preparatory science, and has left behind him a number of genealogical papers, more than sufficient to prove him a complete master of it. The Remarks on Saxon Churches in the Introduction to Mr. Bentham's "History of Ely" were drawn up by Gray.

But the favourite study of Gray, for the last ten years of his life, was natural history, which he then rather resumed than began; as by the instructions of his uncle Antrobus, he was a considerable botanist at fifteen. The marginal notes which he has left on Linnaeus and other writers, on the vegetable, animal, and fossil kingdoms, are very numerous. But the most considerable are on "Hudson's Flora Anglica," and the tenth edition of the Systema Naturæ, which latter he interleaved and filled almost entirely. While employed on zoology, he also read Aristotle's treatise on that subject with great care, and explained many difficult passages of that obscure ancient, from the lights he had acquired from modern naturalists. Excepting pure mathematics, and the studies dependent on that science, there was hardly any part of human learning, in which he had not acquired a competent skill; in most of them a consummate mastery.

Of his amusements, the chief and almost the only one (excepting the frequent experiments he made on flowers, for the purpose of investigating the process of vegetation) was music. His taste in this art was equal to his skill in any more important science. Vocal music he chiefly preferred. His instrument was the harpsicord; on which, though he had little execution, yet he accommodated his voice so judiciously to his playing, as to give an auditor considerable pleasure. His judgment in statuary and painting was exquisite, and formed from an almost instinctive perception of those graces beyond the reach of art, in which the divine works of the great masters abound. He had a fine taste in prints, in his choice of which he observed the same judicious rule which he followed in making his collection of music; which was not so much to get together complete sets of the works of any master, as to select those (the best in their kind) which would recal to his memory, the capital pictures, statues, and buildings, which he had seen and studied.

Of Gray's religious opinions but little is known; there are, however, sufficient traces left to show him a believer. To Bolingbroke's scepticism he has written an answer. His sentiments of Shaftesbury cannot be mistaken; and both Voltaire and Hume he censures with freedom. In private life he was most respected by those who best knew him; he was a man of good-breeding, virtue, and humanity.

Mr. Mason has declined drawing up any formal character of Gray; but has adopted one from a letter to James Boswell, Esq., by the Rev. Mr. Temple, Rector of St. Gluvias in Cornwall, first printed anonymously in the "London Magazine."

"Perhaps he was the most learned man in Europe. He was equally acquainted with the elegant and profound parts of science, and that not superficially but thoroughly. He knew every branch of history, both natural and civil; had read all the original historians of England, France, and Italy; and was a great antiquarian. Criticism, metaphysics, morals, politics, made a principal part of his study; voyages and travels of all sorts were his favourite amusements, and he had a fine taste in painting, prints, architecture, and gardening. With such a fund of knowledge, his conversation must have been equally instructing and entertaining; but he was also a good man, a man of virtue and humanity. There is no character without some speck, some imperfection; and I think the greatest defect in his was an affectation in delicacy, or rather effeminacy, and a visible fastidiousness, or contempt and disdain of his inferiors in science. He also had, in some degree, that weakness which disgusted Voltaire so much in Mr. Congreve; though he seemed to value others chiefly according to the progress they had made in knowledge, yet he could not bear to be considered himself merely as a man of letters; and though without birth, or fortune, or station, his desire was to be looked upon as a private independent gentleman, who read for his amusement. Perhaps it may be said, What signifies so much knowledge, when it produced so little? Is it worth taking so much pains to leave no memorial but a few poems? But let it be considered that Mr. Gray was to others at least innocently employed; to himself, certainly beneficially. His time passed agreeably; he was every day making some new acquisition in science; his mind was enlarged, his heart softened, his virtue strengthened; the world and mankind were shown to him without a mask; and he was taught to consider every thing as trifling, and unworthy of the attention of a wise man, except the pursuit of knowledge and practice of virtue, in that state wherein God hath placed us."

The friendship of Mr. Mason could not fail him here; yet his judgment surely has been suspended; for to leave his friend under the idea of a fastidious fribble, was, to say no more, unfavourable to his memory. That such is the idea, no one, who reads the character, can doubt. It is true, the world knew it. There was a reserve in his behaviour, too near resembling fastidiousness; and he was apt to indulge himself in such modish niceties of dress, as did not always correspond with the sobriety of an academic gown. After his return from his travels, he commonly wore a muff, an object of no small derision with the University lads. If he went to a coffee-house, he would tell the waiter, in a tone the most effeminate, to give him "that silly paper book," meaning the "Gentleman's Magazine," and sometimes the "Review." Timorous, as effeminate, and fearful of accidents, he had a ladder to let down from his window, in case of fire. Some young men of his college idly and wantonly set up a false alarm, in order to draw him upon his ladder; and this, among other circumstances was said to be the occasion of his removing to Pembroke-Hall.

Mr. Mason has remarked, that Gray's effeminacy was affected most before those whom "he did not wish to please;" and that he is unjustly charged, with making knowledge his sole reason of preference, as he paid his esteem to none, whom he did not likewise believe to be good.

As a poet, his excellence will be confessed by all who are entitled to judge of it, except now and then by a jealous critic educated at Oxford, and assiduous in depreciating the merit of every author, who flourished at a rival University. On his poetry, it is needless to bestow praises, or to repel the attacks of envy and rancour. If Gray was not a poet of the first order, there is no poetry existing; and if his bold expressions be nonsense, so are the most rapturous passages of Sophocles, Klopstock, Shakspeare and Milton, and the sublimest figures of divine inspiration. In sublimity, pathos, and enthusiasm, he is perhaps excelled by Dryden and Collins; but in richness of imagery, glow of expression, and harmony of numbers, he surpasses the two great masters of English lyric poetry.

Gray's poems are not numerous; but all of them, at least his serious pieces, have great merit; and whoever writes but as correctly as he has written, will not find himself able to write much. His pieces have all the marks of close study and patient revision; and the smallness of their number, compared with the length of time he was known as a poet, sufficiently shows, that they were kept long under his own eyes, before they were submitted to those of the public. They may, therefore, be regarded as a kind of standard of the correctness to which English poetry has arrived in our days.

The Elegy Written in a Country Church-Yard, is, perhaps, the first of the kind in any language; its subject, like the subject of Milton's Epic, is universally interesting, the allegorical imagery is sublime, and the natural description picturesque; the sentiment is mostly simple and pathetic, and the versification has a melody, which has not often been attained, and cannot be surpassed.

The principal respect in which it has been supposed defective is want of plan. Dr. Knox, in his "Essays," has observed, "that it is thought by some to be no more than a confused heap of splendid ideas, thrown together without order, and without proportion." That it is, however, not destitute of plan, is sufficiently demonstrated by Scott, in his "Critical Essays." The analysis shows, that it is perfectly regular, though simple in its general plan; but the arrangement might perhaps have been in some parts improved. Some passages have been censured by Mr. Kelly, in the "Babbling," with great injustice. Unacknowledged imitations of Collins, Young, Pope, Tickell, Thomson, &c. have been pointed out by other critics. These, however, are by no means certain. There are so many instances of a coincidence totally casual, that it is difficult to ascertain what is, or is not really a designed or accidental imitation. When Gray condescends to imitate, he recovers his level at least by some new thoughts, some dignity of verse, or some luminous embellishments of diction.

In the first copy of this exquisite poem, the conclusion was different from that which he afterwards composed; and though his after-thought was unquestionably the best, yet there is a pathetic melancholy in the four rejected stanzas, following, With incense kindled at the muse's flame, which highly claims preservation.

The thoughtless world to majesty may bow,
Exalt the brave, and idolize success;
But more to innocence their safety owe,
Than pow'r, or genius, e'er conspir'd to bless.
And thou, who mindful of th' unhonour'd dead,
Dost in these notes their artless tale relate,
By night and lonely contemplation led
To wander in the gloomy walks of fate:
Hark! how the sacred calm, that breathes around,
Bids every fierce tumultuous passion cease;
In still small accents whispering from the ground,
A grateful earnest of eternal peace.
No more, with reason and thyself at strife,
Give anxious cares and endless wishes room;
But through the cool sequester'd vale of life
Pursue the silent tenor of thy doom.

And here the poem was originally intended to conclude, before the happy idea of the hoary-bearded swain, &c. suggested itself to him. Mr. Mason thinks the third of these rejected stanzas equal to any in the whole elegy.

After the stanza, ending, To meet the sun upon the upland lawn, in the first copy, followed this stanza :

Him have we seen the greenwood side along,
While o'er the heath we hied, our labour done,
Oft as the woodlark pip'd her farewell song,
With wistful eyes pursue the setting sun.

Mr. Mason wonders that he rejected this stanza, as it not only has the same sort of Doric delicacy, which charms us peculiarly in this part of the poem, but also completes the account of his whole day : whereas, this evening scene being omitted, we have only his morning walk, and his noon-tide repose.

The stanza, considered in itself, is not a bad one, but Gray was right in suppressing it. The poet's evening had been described before, at the opening of the poem ; to have described it again would have been superfluous, and an instance of that disgusting redundancy, which is sure to create confusion, and which we always meet with in the works of common writers. Diversity of situation is also wanting ; we had the wood before, Hard by yon wood, &c., and here we have it again, The greenwood-side along, &c.

Between the line, Grav'd on the stone beneath you aged thorn, and the epitaph, Gray originally inserted a very beautiful stanza, which was printed in some of the first editions, but afterwards omitted ; because he thought, that it was too long a parenthesis in this place. The lines, however, are, in themselves, exquisitely fine, and demand preservation.

There scatter'd oft, the earliest of the year,
By hands unseen are show'rs of violets found ;
The redbreast loves to build and warble there,
And little footsteps lightly print the ground.

Mr. Edwards endeavoured to supply what he thought a defect in the Elegy, by adding after, Some Cromwell guiltless, &c., the two following stanzas, which are strongly marked with the characters of simplicity, tenderness, and harmony :

Some lovely fair, whose unaffected charms
Shone with attraction to herself unknown ;
Whose beauty might have blest a monarch's arms,
And virtue cast a lustre on the throne.
That humble beauty warm'd an honest heart,
And cheer'd the labours of a faithful spouse ;
That virtue form'd for every decent part,
The healthful offspring that adorn'd their house.

Gray, in his Church-Yard Elegy, certainly showed great excellence in dwelling on the tenderest interests of human nature. His easy native pathos brought those interests to the heart. But his genius was not marked alone by that tender and melancholy sensibility, so interesting in that inimitable performance. That impression was only its bas-relief. There was a Gothic grandeur in the structure, of the most striking and powerful effect. Yet this could be felt, could be tasted only by the few, while the natural pictures of the former were caught by and melted in every eye.

It is observable, that sublimity of genius has been generally attended with a strong affection for the demonry of the ancient northern fable. Milton was particularly fond of it. It was the study of his youth and the dream of his age. This passion seems natural. There is something sublime in the Gothic mythology, in the idea of ancient hardihood, and the feats of former times, that is peculiarly adapted to a natural grandeur of imagination. In the mythology of the Greeks, every thing seems little, seems puerile in comparison. Hence Gray's strong attachment to every thing that breathed of the former. The hall of Odin was heaven itself to him, and Ossian the very demon of poetry. It would be superfluous for the present writer to enlarge on the effect this enthusiasm had on Gray's poetical writings. The readers of poetry are no strangers to that sublime expression, and to that noble air of mind, which distinguish his two greater odes, the Progress of Poesy, and the Bard. They breathe the high spirit of lyric enthusiasm ; the transitions are sudden and impetuous, the language full of fire and force, and the imagery carried, without impropriety, to the most daring height. They have been accused of obscurity ; but the one can be obscure to those only who have not read Pindar, and the other only to those who are unacquainted with the history of our own nation. Ample justice has been very lately done them by Mr. Potter, the justly celebrated translator of Eschylus and Euripides, in his "Curfory Examination of the Lyric Performances of Gray, &c." and by his ingenious commentator, Mr. Wakefield.

"These two Pindaric Odes of Gray," says Mr. Wakefield, "have a much greater resemblance to the Theban Bard, than any thing of the kind in our own, and probably in any other language. Wildness of thought, and irregularity of verse, had usually been esteemed the only way to resemble Pindar. The characteristic excellencies of Pindar's poetry are sublimity of conception, boldness of metaphor, dignity of style, rapidity of composition, and magnificence of phraseology. If a fair judgment can be formed upon those few specimens, which the desolations of time have spared; in grandeur of imagery, and regularity of thought, he is surpassed by Gray; as on the other hand, he may justly claim a superiority from the moral dignity of his compositions.

"These sublime and elaborate productions of genius chastised by learning, and of learning invigorated by genius, are, from their nature, by no means calculated to please the generality of readers, especially upon a slight acquaintance. A frequent and diligent contemplation of them is necessary to an adequate perception of their beauties; and perhaps no small tincture of that erudition which enabled the author to produce them. Indeed, that spirit of lyric inspiration which they breathe, that divine glow of pathos, which at the same time melts and inflames the reader, cannot operate with their full effect, but on a congenial soul, attuned to the bold vibrations of enthusiastic poetry. The motto justly proclaims—

To wisdom's ear 'tis sense and sweetness all,
Darkness and dissonance to vulgar minds.

"He who can continue amidst the blaze of splendor that bursts around him, amidst the torrent of sublimity that pours along, sedately speculating upon petty blemishes, is certainly a stranger to those sensations which animated Pindar and Gray; and deserves, for the punishment of his malice, that poetical curse denounced by the pathetic Collins, upon all those who could reflect on the author of the "Seasons," without emotions of benevolence and concern.

With him, sweet bard! may fancy die,
And joy desert the blooming year."

It must be acknowledged, however, that the The Progress of Poetry, though impregnated throughout with the fire and energy proper to lyric poetry, has a stiffness to which Pindar had certainly no recourse, and from which Dryden's "Alexander's Feast" is entirely exempt; and that the Bard, though adorned with those thoughts that breathe, and words that burn, that Gray's muse could so richly supply, is too artificial as opposed to natural, and sometimes loaded, rather than enriched with poetical imagery. But when every deduction is made that criticism requires, the Bard of Gray is entitled to rank with the "Alexander's Feast" of Dryden, and the "Passions" of Collins.

Of his other lyric pieces, the Ode on Spring,¹ Ode on Eton College, Ode on a Favourite Cat, Ode to Adversity, and the Music Ode, please the generality of readers more than the Fatal Sisters, Descent of Odin, and Triumphs of Owen. They are by no means without faults, but the spirit of poetry, and exquisite charms of the verse, are sufficient almost to obtain reverence for their defects. The Ode on Eton College, is, in the opinion of the present writer, superior to the rest. The sentiments are natural and consonant to the feelings of humanity, and exhibited with perspicuity of method, and in an elegant, intelligible, and expressive language. The Sonnet on the Death of West, and the Epitaph on Sir William Williams, are the most perfect compositions of the kind in our language.

Indolence is an almost certain characteristic of genius, and irresolution is a natural effect of indolence. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that Gray made many poetical essays and beginnings on subjects, from which, either by accident, or through a want of industry, he was afterwards diverted. Among these, was the following scene of a tragedy, taken from Tacitus, on the death of Agrippina, which leaves us to regret, that he only attempted a tragedy:

ACT I. SCENE I.

Agrippina, Accronia.

Agrippina.

'Tis well, begone! your errand is perform'd:

[Speaks as to Anicetus entering.

The message needs no comment. Tell your master,
 His mother shall obey him. Say you saw her
 Yielding due reverence to his high command :
 Alone, unguarded, and without a liſtor,
 As fits the daughter of Germanicus.
 Say, ſhe retired to Antium; there to tend
 Her household cares, a woman's beſt employment.
 What if you add, how ſhe turn'd pale, and trembled;
 You think, you ſpied a tear ſtand in her eye,
 And would have dropp'd, but that her pride reſtrain'd it?
 (Go! you can paint it well) 'twill profit you,
 And pleaſe the ſtripling. Yet 'twould daſh his joy
 To hear the ſpirit of Britannicus
 Yet walks on earth; at leaſt there are who know
 Without a ſpell to raiſe, and bid it fire
 A thouſand haughty hearts, unus'd to ſhake
 When a boy frowns, nor to be lur'd with ſmiles
 To taſte of hollow kindneſs, or partake
 His hoſpitable board: They ate aware
 Of th' unpledg'd bowl, they love not Aconite.

Aceronia.

He's gone; and much I hope theſe walls alone,
 And the mute air are privy to your paſſion.
 Forgive your ſervant's fears, who ſees the danger
 Which fierce reſentment cannot fail to raiſe
 In haughty youth, and irritated power.

Agrippina.

And doſt thou talk to me, to me, of danger,
 Of haughty youth, and irritated power,
 To her that gave it being, her that arm'd
 This painted Jove, and untaught his novice hand
 To aim the forked bolt; whiſt he ſtood trembling
 Scar'd at the ſound, and dazzled with its brightneſs?
 'Tis like, thou haſt forgot, when yet a ſtranger
 To adoration, to the grateful ſteam
 Of flattery's incenſe, and obſequious vows
 From voluntary realms, a puny boy,
 Deck'd with no other luſtre, than the blood
 Of Agrippina's race, he liv'd unknown
 To fame, or fortune; haply ey'd at diſtance
 Some edileſhip, ambitious of the power
 To judge of weights, and meaſures; ſcarcely dar'd
 On expectation's ſtrongeſt wing to ſoar
 High as the conſulate, that empty ſhade
 Of long-forgotten liberty: When I
 Oped his young eye to bear the blaze of greatneſs;
 Show'd him, where empire tower'd, and bad him ſtrike
 The noble quarry. Gods! then was the time
 To ſhrink from danger; fear might then have worn
 The maſk of prudence: but a heart like mine,
 A heart that glows with the pure Julian fire,
 If bright ambition from her craggy ſeat
 Diſplay the radiant prize, will mount undaunted,
 Gain the rough heights, and graſp the dangerous honour.

Aceronia.

Through various life I have purſued your ſteps,
 Have ſeen your ſoul, and wonder'd at its daring:
 Hence riſe my fears. Nor am I yet to learn
 How vaſt the debt of gratitude, which Nero
 To ſuch a mother owes; the world, you gave him,
 Suffices not to pay the obligation.

I well remember too (for I was preſent)
 When in a ſecret and dead hour of night,
 Due ſacrifice perform'd with barb'rous rites
 Of mutter'd charms, and ſolemn invocation,
 You bad the magi call the dreadful powers,
 That read futurity, to know the fate
 Impending o'er your ſon; Their anſwer was,

THE LIFE OF GRAY.

If the son reign, the mother perishes.
 Perish (you cry'd) the mother! reign the son!
 He reigns, the rest is heav'n's; who oft has bade,
 Ev'n when its will seem'd wrote in lines of blood,
 'Th' unthought event disclose a whiter meaning.
 Think too how oft in weak and sickly minds
 The sweets of kindness lavishly indulg'd
 Rankle to gall; and benefits too great
 To be repaid, sit heavy on the soul,
 As unrequited wrongs. The willing homage
 Of prostrate Rome, the senate's joint applause,
 The riches of the earth, the train of pleasures,
 That wait on youth, and arbitrary sway;
 These were your gift, and with them you bestow'd
 The very power he has to be ungrateful.

Agrippina.

Thus ever grave, and undisturb'd reflection
 Pours its cool dictates in the madding ear
 Of rage, and thinks to quench the fire it feels not.
 Say'st thou I must be cautious, must be silent,
 And tremble at the phantom I have rais'd?
 Carry to him thy timid counsels. He
 Perchance may heed 'em: Tell him too, that one,
 Who had such liberal power to give, may still
 With equal power resume that gift, and raise
 A tempest, that shall shake her own creation
 To its original atoms—tell me! say
 This mighty emperor, this dreaded hero,
 Has he beheld the glittering front of war?
 Knows his soft ear the trumpet's thrilling voice,
 And outcry of the battle? Have his limbs
 Sweat under iron harness? Is he not
 The filken son of dalliance, nurs'd in ease
 And pleasure's flowery lap?—Rubellius lives,
 And Sylla has his friends, though school'd by fear
 To bow the supple knee, and court the times
 With shows of fair obeisance; and a call,
 Like mine, might serve belike to wake pretensions
 Drowfier than theirs, who boast the genuine blood
 Of our imperial house.

Aceronia.

Did I not wish to check this dangerous passion,
 I might remind my mistress that her nod
 Can rouse eight hardy legions, wont to stem
 With stubborn nerves the tide, and face the rigour
 Of bleak Germania's snows. Four, not less brave,
 That in Armenia quell the Parthian force
 Under the warlike Corbulo, by you
 Mark'd for their leader: These, by ties confirm'd,
 Of old respect and gratitude, are yours.
 Surely the Massians too, and those of Egypt,
 Have not forgot your fire: The eye of Rome
 And the prætorian camp have long rever'd,
 With custom'd awe, the daughter, sister, wife,
 And mother of their Cæsars.

Agrippina.

Ha! by Juno,
 It bears a noble semblance. On this base
 My great revenge shall rise; or say we found
 The trump of liberty; there will not want,
 Even in the servile senate, ears to own
 Her spirit stirring voice; Soranus there,
 And Cassius: Vetus too, and Thrasea,
 Minds of the antique cast, rough, stubborn souls,
 That struggle with the yoke. How shall the spark
 Unquenchable, that glows within their breasts,
 Blaze into freedom, when the idle herd

(Slaves from the womb, created but to stare,
And bellow in the Circus) yet will start,
And shake 'em at the name of liberty,
Stung by a senseless word, a vain tradition,
As there were magic in it? wrinkled bedlams
Teach it their grandchildren, as somewhat rare
That anciently appear'd, but when, extends Beyond their chronicle—oh! 'tis a cause
To arm the hand of childhood, and rebrace
The slacken'd sinews of time-wearied age.

Yes, we may meet, ingrateful boy, we may!
Again the buried genius of old Rome
Shall from the dust uprear his reverend head,
Rous'd by the shout of millions: There before
His high tribunal thou and I appear
Let majesty sit on thy awful brow,
And lighten from thy eye: Around thee call
The gilded swarm that wantons in the sunshine
Of thy full favour; Seneca be there
In gorgeous phrase of labour'd eloquence
To dress thy plea, and Burrhus strengthen it
With his plain soldier's oath, and honest seeming.

Against thee, liberty and Agrippina:
The world, the prize; and fair befall the victors.

But soft! why do I waste the fruitless hours
In threats unexecuted? Haste thee, fly
These hated walls, that seem to mock my shame,
And cast me forth in duty to their lord.

Accronia.

'Tis time we go, the sun is high advanc'd,
And, ere mid-day, Nero will come to Baia.

Agrippina.

My thought aches at him; not the basilisk
More deadly to the sight, than is to me
The cool injurious eye of frozen kindness.
I will not meet its poison. Let him feel
Before he sees me.

Accronia.

Why then stays my sovereign,
Where he so soon may—

Agrippina.

Yes, I will be gone,
But not to Antium—all shall be confess'd,
Whate'er the frivolous tongue of giddy fame
Has spread among the crowd; things, that but whisper'd
Have arch'd the hearer's brow, and riveted
His eyes in fearful ecstasy: No matter
What; so't be strange, and dreadful.—Sorceries,
Assassinations, poisonings—the deeper
My guilt, the blacker his ingratitude.

And you, ye manes of ambition's victims,
Enshrined Claudius, with the pitied ghosts
Of the Syllani, doom'd to early death,
(Ye unavailing horrors, fruitless crimes!)
If from the realms of night my voice ye hear,
In lieu of penitence, and vain remorse,
Accept my vengeance. Though by me ye bled,
He was the cause. My love, my fears for him
Dried the soft springs of pity in my heart,
And froze them up with deadly cruelty.
Yet if your injur'd shades demand my fate,
If murder cries for murder, blood for blood,
Let me not fall alone; but crush his pride,
And sink the traitor in his mother's ruin.

Exeunt.

THE LIFE OF GRAY.

SCENE II.

Otho, Poppæa.Otho.

Thus far we're safe. Thanks to the rosy queen
 Of amorous thefts: And had her wanton son
 Lent us his wings, we could not have beguil'd
 With more elusive speed the dazzled sight
 Of wakeful jealousy. Be gay securely;
 Dispell, my fair, with smiles, the tim'rous cloud
 That hangs on thy clear brow. So Helen look'd,
 So her white neck reclin'd, so was she borne
 By the young Trojan to his gilded bark
 With fond reluctance, yielding modesty,
 And oft reverted eye, as if she knew not
 Whether she fear'd, or wish'd to be pursu'd.

These speeches, it must be acknowledged, are too long for dramatic exhibition, and the language may be somewhat too poetical for the stage; yet had the play been finished, these circumstances might possibly have been accommodated; at all events, it must, in such hands, have made a noble dramatic poem.

The following initiatory fragment of his poem, De Principiis Cogitandi, the most considerable in itself all his Latin compositions, and perhaps the most laboured of any of his poems, entitles him to rank with Jonson, Donne, Crashaw, Cowley, Milton, Addison, who cultivated Latin poetry with the greatest success:

Unde animus scire incipiat: quibus inchoet orsa
 Principiis seriem rerum, tenuemque catenam
 Mnemosyne: Ratio unde rudi sub pectore tardum
 Augeat imperium; et primum mortalibus ægris
 Ira, Dolor, Metus, et Curæ nascantur inanes,
 Hinc canere aggredior. Nec dedignare canentem,
 O decus! Angliacæ certe O lux altera gentis!
 Si quâ primus iter monstras, vestigia conor
 Signare incertâ, tremulâque insistere plantâ.
 Quin potius duc ipse (potes namque omnia) sanctum
 Ad limen, (si ritè adeo, si pectore puro,)
 Obscuræ referans Naturæ ingentia claustra.
 Tu cæcas rerum causas, fontemque severum
 Pande, Pater; tibi enim, tibi, veri magne Sacerdos,
 Corda patent hominum, atque altæ penetralia Mentis.
 Tuque aures adhibe vacuas, facilesque, Favonî,
 (Quod tibi crescit opus) simplex nec despice carmen,
 Nec vatem: non illa leves primordia motus,
 Quanquam parva, dabunt. Latum vel amabile quicquid
 Uquam oritur, trahit hinc ortum; nec surgit ad auras,
 Quin ea conspirent simul, eventusque secudent.
 Hinc variæ vitæ artes, ac mollior usus,
 Dulce et amicitiae vinclum: Sapientia dia
 Hinc roseum accendit lumen, vultuque sereno
 Humanas aperit mentes, nova gaudia monstrans,
 Deformesque fugat curas, vanosque timores:
 Scilicet et rerum crescit pulcherrima virtus.
 Illa etiam, quæ te (mirum) noctesque diesque
 Assiduè fovet inspirans, linguamque sequentem
 Temperat in numeros, atque horas mulcet inertes;
 Aurea non aliâ se jactat origine musa.
 Principio, ut magnum sædus Natura creatrix
 Firmavit, tardis jussitque inolescere membris
 Sublimes animas; tenebroso in carcere partem
 Noluit ætheream longo torpere vœterno:
 Nec per se proprium passa exercere vigorem est,
 Ne sociæ molis conjunctos sperneret artus,
 Ponderis oblita, et cœlestis conscia flammæ.
 Idcirco innumero ductu tremere undique fibras
 Nervorum instituit: tum toto corpore miscens
 Implicuit latè ramos, et sensile textum,

Implevitque humore suo (seu lymphâ vocanda,
Sive aura est) tenuis certè, atque levissima quædam
Vis versatur agens, parvosque infusa canales
Perfluit; assidue externis quæ concita plagis,
Mobilis, incussique fidelis nuntia motûs,
Hinc indè accensâ contage relabitur usque
Ad superas hominis sedes, arcemque cerebri.
Namque illuc posuit solium, et sua templa sacra vit
Mens animi: hanc circum coeunt, densoque feruntur
Agmine notitiæ, simulacraque tenuia rerum:
Ecce autem naturæ ingens aperitur imago
Immensæ, varique patent commercia mundi.

Ac uti longinquis descendunt montibus amnes
Velivulus Tamisis, flaventisque Indus arenæ,
Euphratesque, Tagusque, et opimo flumine Ganges,
Undas quisque suas volvens, cursuque sonoro
In mare prorumpunt: hos magno acclinis in antro
Excipit oceanus, natorumque ordine longo
Dona recognoscit venientum, ultròque serenat
Ceruleam faciem, et diffuso marmore ridet.
Haud aliter species properant se inferre novellæ
Certatem menti, atque aditus quino agmine complent.

Primas tactus agit partes, primusque minutæ
Laxat iter cæcum turbæ, recipitque ruentem.
Non idem huic modus est, qui fratribus! amplius ille
Imperium affectat senior, penitusque medullis,
Visceribusque habitat totis, pellisque recentem
Funditur in telam, et latè per stamina vivit.
Necdum etiam matris puer eluctatus ab alvo
Multiplices solvit tunicas, et vincula rupit;
Sopitus molli somno, tepidoque liquore
Circumfusus adhuc: tactus tamen aura laceffit
Jamdudum levior sensus, animamque reclusit.
Idque magis simul, ac solitum blandumque calorem
Frigore mutavit cœli, quod verberat acri
Impete inassuetos artus: tum sævior adstat,
Humanæque comes vitæ Dolor excipit; ille
Cunctantem frustra et tremulo multa ore querentem
Corripit invadens, ferreisque amplectitur ulnis.
Tum species primùm patefacta est candida Lucis (Usque vices adeò Natura bonique, malique, Exæquat, justâque manu sua damna rependit)
Tum primùm, ignotosque bibunt nova lumina soles.

Carmine quo, Dea, te dicam, gratissima cœli
Progenies, ortumque tuum; gemmantia rore
Ut per prata levi lustras, et floribus halans
Purpureum Veris gremium, scenamque virentem
Pingis, et umbriferos colles, et cœrula regna?
Gratia te, Venerisque Lepos, et mille Colorum,
Formarumque chorus sequitur, Motusque decentes.
At caput invisum Stygiis Nox atra tenebris
Abdidit, horrendæque simul Formidinis ora,
Pervigilesque æstus Curarum, atque anxius Angor:
Undique Lætitia florent mortalia corda,
Purus et arridet largis fulgoribus Æther.

Omnia nec tu ideò invalidæ se pandere Menti
(Quippe nimis teneros posset vis tanta dici Perturbare, et inexpertos confundere visus)
Nec capere infantes animos, neu cernere credas
Tam variam molem, et miræ spectacula lucis:
Nescio quâ tamen hæc oculos dulcedine parvos
Splendida percussit novitas, traxitque sequentes;
Nonne videmus enim, latis inserta fenestris
Sicubi se Phœbi dispergant aurea tela,
Sive lucernarum rutilus colluxerit ardor,
Extemplo huc obverti aciem, quæ fixa repertos

Haurit inexpletum radios, fruiturque tuendo.
 Altior huic vero sensu, majorque videtur
 Addita, judicioque arcè connexa potestas,
 Quod simul atque ætas volventibus auxerit annis,
 Hæc simul, assiduo depascens omnia visu,
 Perspiciet, vis quanti loci, quid polleat ordo,
 Juncturæ quis honos, ut res accendere rebus
 Lumina conjurant inter se, et mutua fulgent.

Nec minor in geminis viget auribus insita virtus,
 Nec tantum in curvis quæ pervigil excubet antris.
 Hinc atque hinc (ubi Vox tremefecerit ostia pulsu Aëriis invecta rotis) longequæ recurset:
 Scilicet Eloquio hæc sonitus, hæc fulminis alas,
 Et mulcere dedit dictis et tollere corda,
 Verbaque meteri numeris, versuque ligare
 Repperit, et quicquid discant Libethrides undæ,
 Calliope quotiès, quotiès Pater ipse canendi
 Evolvat liquidum carmen, calamove loquenti
 Inspiret dulces animat, digitisque figuret.

At medias fauces, et linguæ humentia templa
 Gustus habet, quæ se insinuet jucunda saporum.
 Luxuries, dona Autumnii, Bacchique voluptas.

Naribus interea confedit odora hominum vis,
 Docta leves captare auras, Panchaia quales
 Vere novo exhalat, Floræve quod oscula fragrant
 Roscida, cum Zephyri furtim sub vespertis horâ
 Respondet votis, mollemque aspirat amorem.

Tot portas altæ capitis circumdedit arcu
 Alma Parens, sensûsque vias per membra reclusit,
 Haud solas: namque intus agit vivata facultas,
 Quæ sese explorat, contemplatusque repente
 Ipse suas animus vires, momentaque cernit.
 Quid velit, aut possit, cupiat, fugiatve, vicissim
 Percipit imperio gaudens; neque corpora fallunt
 Morigera ad celeres actus, ac numina mentis.
 Qualis Hamadryadum quondam si fortè sororum
 Una, novos peragrans saltus, et devia rura;
 (Atque illam in viridi suadet procumbere ripâ Fontis pura quies, et opaci frigoris umbra)
 Dum prona in latices speculi de margine pendet,
 Mirata est subitam venienti occurrere Nympham:
 Mox eosdem, quos ipsa, artus, eadem ora gerentem
 Unâ inferre gradus, unâ succedere sylvæ
 Aspicit alludens; seseque agnoscit in undis.
 Sic sensu interno rerum simulacra suarum
 Mens ciet, et proprios observat conscia vultus.
 Nec verò simplex ratio, aut jus omnibus unum
 Constat imaginibus. Sunt quæ bina ostia norunt;
 Hæ privos servant aditus; sine legibus illæ
 Passim, quæ data porta, ruunt, animoque propinquant.
 Respice, cui a cunis tristes extinxit ocellos,
 Sæve et in eternas merisit natura tenebras:
 Illi ignota dies lucet, vernusque colorum
 Offusus nitor est, et vivæ gratia formæ.
 Corporis at filum, et motus, spatiumque, locique
 Intervalla datur certo dignoscere tactu:
 Quandoquidem his iter ambiguum est, et janua duplex,
 Exclusæque oculis species irrumpere tendunt
 Per digitos. Atqui solis concessa potestas
 Luminibus blandæ est radios immittere lucis

Undique proporro sociis, quacunque patescit
 Notitiæ campus, mista lasciva feruntur
 Turba voluptatis comites, formæque dolorum
 Terribiles visu, et porta glomerantur in omni.
 Nec vario minus introitu, magnum ingruit illud,

Quo facere et fungi, quo res existere circum
 Quamque sibi proprio cum corpore scimus et ire
 Ordine, perpetuoque per ævum flumine labi.

Nunc age quo valeat pacto, qua sensilis arte
 Affectare viam, atque animi tentare lateras
 Materies (dictis aures adverte faventes)
 Exsequar. Imprimis spatii quam multa per æquor
 Millia multigenis pandant se corpora seclis
 Expende; haud unum invenies, quod mente licebit
 Amplecti, nedum proprius dependere sensu,
 Molis egens certæ, aut solido sine robore, cujus
 Denique mobilitas linquit, texturave partes
 Ulla nec ovarum circumcassura coercet.
 Hæc conjuncta adeo tota compage fatetur
 Mundus, et extremo clamant in limine rerum,
 (Si rebus datur extremum) primordia. Firmat
 Hæc eadem tactus (tactum quis dicere falsum Audeat?) hæc oculi nec lucidus arguit orbis.

Inde potestatum enasci densissima proles;
 Nam quodcunque ferit visum, tangive laborat,
 Quicquid nare bibis, vel concava concipit auris,
 Quicquid lingua sapit, credas hoc omne, necesse est,
 Ponderibus, textu, discussu, mole, figura
 Particulas præstare leves, et semina rerum.
 Nunc oculos igitur pascunt, et luce ministra
 Fulgere cuncta vides, spargique coloribus orbem,
 Dum de sole trahunt alias, aliasque supernè
 Dotorquent, retroque docent se vertere flammæ.
 Nunc trepido inter se fervent corpuscula pulsu,
 Ut tremor æthera per magnum, lateque natantes
 Aurarum fluctus avidi vebrantia claustra
 Auditus queat allabi, sonitumque propaget.
 Cominus interdum non ullo interprete per se
 Nervorum invadunt teneras quatientia fibras,
 Sensiferumque urgent ultro per viscera motum.

* * * * *

The first six lines of this fragment plainly intimate that his general design was to be comprised in four books. First, On the origin of our ideas. Second, On the distribution of the ideas in the memory. Third, On the province of reason, and its gradual improvement. Fourth, On the cause and effects of the passions. It is evident also, from the exordium, that he meant to make the same use of Locke's "Essay on the Human Understanding," that Lucretius did of the dogmas of Epicurus. His hexameters are, as far as modern ones can be, after the manner of Virgil; they move in the succession of his pauses, and close with his elisions.

The following Alcaic fragment is so happily executed, that it might impose upon the best critic as being a genuine ancient composition.

O lachrymarum fons, tenero sacros
 Ducentium ortus ex animo; quater
 Felix! in imo qui scatentem
 Pectore te, pia Nympha, sensit.

The following fragment of an Heroic Epistle from Sophonisba to Massinissa, in pentameters, is the best, because the only original specimen of his Ovidian verse. His copiousness of language is such as very few possess, and his versification is skilfully constructed, and commonly leaves the ear fully satisfied.

Egregium accipio promissi Munus amoris,
 Inque manu mortem, jam fruitura, fero:
 Atque utinam citius mandasses, luce vel unâ;
 Transieram Stygios non inhonesta lacus.
 Victoris nec passa toros, nova nupta, mariti,
 Nec sacran fastus, Roma superba, tuos.

Scilicet hæc partem tibi, Massinissa, triumphî
 Detractam, hæc pompæ jura minora suæ
 Imputat, atque uxor quod non tua pressa catenis,
 Objecta et sævæ plausibus urbis eo :
 Quin tu pro tantis cepisti præmia factis,
 Magnum Romanæ pignus amicitia !
 Scipiadae excuses, oro, si tardius utar
 Munere. Non nimium vivere, crede, velim,
 Parva mora est, breve sed tempus mea fama requirit :
 Detinet hæc animam cura suprema meam.
 Quæ patriæ prodesse meæ Regina ferebar,
 Inter Eliseas gloria prima nurus,
 Ne videar flammæ nimis indulgisse secundæ,
 Vel nimis hostiles extimuisse manus.
 Fortunam atque annos liceat revocare priores,
 Gaudiaque heu ! quantis nostra repensa malis.
 Primitiasne tuas meministi atque arma Syphacis
 Fusa, et per Tyrias ducta trophæa vias ?
 (Laudis at antiquæ forsan meminisse pigebit, Quodque decus quondam causa ruboris erit.)
 Tempus ego certe memini, feliciæ Pænis
 Quo te non puduit solvere vota deis ;
 Mæniaque intransitum vidi : longo agmine duxit
 Turba salutantum, purpureique patres.
 Fæminea ante omnes longe admiratur euntem
 Hæret et aspectu tota caterva tuo.
 Sam flexi, regale decus, per colla capilli,
 Jam decet ardenti fuscus in ore color !
 Commendat frontis generosa modestia formam,
 Seque cupit laudi surripuisse suæ.
 Prima genas tenui signat vix flore juventas,
 Et dextræ soli credimus esse virum.
 Dum faciles gradiens oculos per singula jactas,
 (Seu rexit casus lumina, sive Venus)
 In me (vel certè visum est) conversa morari
 Sensi ; virgineus percalit ora pudor.
 Nescio quid vultum molle spirare tuendo,
 Credideramque tuos lentius ire pedes.
 Quærebam, juxta æqualis si dignior esset,
 Quæ poterat visus deinuisse tuos :
 Nulla fuit circum æqualis quæ dignior esset,
 Afferuitque decus conscia forma suum.

 Atque iterum hesternum munere victor ades.

There is so much of nature in the sentiment as well as poetry in the description of the triumphal entry of young Massinissa, that it is much to be regretted he did not finish this epistle.

The moral and intellectual character of Gray, as given by Dr. Johnson, entitles him to considerable, but not unalloyed praise. His pencil has thrown little into shade ; at the same time that we see the great genius, we see a man of singularities, almost too violent for the commerce of society. Of the rigorous examination to which he has subjected his poetry, the present writer is not inclined to make the eulogy. Declining all consideration of the general plan and conduct of the pieces, he has confined himself solely to strictures on the words and forms of expression. Verbal criticism is an ordeal which the most perfect composition cannot pass without injury.

The partial and uncandid mode of criticism adopted by Dr. Johnson, in his remarks on Gray, seems to have given general, and indeed just offence. Particular resentment has been expressed, as might be expected, by his Alma Mater the university of Cambridge. An ingenious vindication of his "Lyric Performances" by Mr. Potter, appeared in 1782, which was followed in the same year, by an able defence of "his writings" in "Remarks on Dr. Johnson's Life of Gray," &c. His atrabilious mode of criticising, and style of expression, have been successfully imitated by Professor Young of Glasgow, in an ironical continuation of his "Criticism on the Poems of Gray," intitled, "A Criticism on the Elegy written in a Country Church-Yard," 8vo. 1783. He has also fallen under Mr. Wakefield's severest indignation. The refutation of his strictures upon Gray he thinks a necessary service to the public, without which they might operate with a malignant influence upon the national taste. His censure, however, is too general, and expressed with too much vehemence. Dr. Johnson's remarks, undoubtedly betray a blindness to poetic beauty, an unreasonable fastidiousness of taste, and an unbecoming illiberality of spirit, yet they are not without some foundation; particularly that his language is encumbered and harsh, and that his poetry was in a manner the effect of industry and perseverance. He appears to have turned an unwilling eye upon the beauties of Gray, because his jealousy would not suffer him to see such superlative merit in a contemporary, yet he is compelled to pass a panegyric on the Elegy in a Country Church-Yard, and the Ode to Adversity. The present writer perfectly agrees with Mr. Wakefield in his general idea (though he should not choose to adopt his mode of expressing it) that Dr. Johnson was not possessed of delicate sensibility; and to this cause, as well as to his political and religious prejudices, he is inclined to impute the coldness with which he applauds some of the productions of our best writers, and the severity with which he censures the lyric performances of Gray. It is perhaps certain, that no one poetical reader will universally subscribe to his decisions, but all may admire his vast intuitive knowledge and power of reasoning.

What has occurred to me from the slight inspection of his letters, is, that his mind had a large grasp; that his curiosity was unlimited, and his judgment cultivated; that he was a man likely to love much where he loved at all, but that he was fastidious and hard to please. His contempt, however, is often employed, where I hope it will be approved, upon scepticism, and infidelity.

As a writer he had this peculiarity, that he did not write his pieces first rudely, and then correct them, but laboured every line as it arose in the train of composition; and he had a notion not very peculiar, that he could not write but at certain times, or at happy moments; a fantastic soppery, to which my kindness for a man of learning and of virtue wishes him to have been superior.

"Gray's poetry is now to be considered; and I hope not to be looked on as an enemy to his name, if I confess that I contemplate it with less pleasure than his life.

"His ode on Spring has something poetical, both in the language and the thought; but the language is too luxuriant, and the thoughts have nothing new. There has of late arisen a practice of giving to adjectives derived from substantives, the termination of participles; such as the cultured plain, the daisied bank; but I was sorry to see, in the lines of a scholar like Gray, the bonied Spring. The morality is natural, but too stale; the conclusion is pretty.

"The poem On the Cat was doubtless by its author considered as a trifle, but it is not a happy trifle. In the first stanza, "the azure flowers that blow," show resolutely a rhyme is sometimes made when it cannot easily be found. Selima, the Cat, is called a nymph, with some violence both to language and sense; but there is good use made of it when it is done; for of the two lines,

What female heart can gold despise?

What cat's averse to fish?

the first relates merely to the nymph, and the second only to the cat. The sixth stanza contains a melancholy truth, that "a favourite has no friend;" but the last ends in a pointed sentence of no relation to the purpose; if what glistened had been gold, the cat would not have gone into the water; and, if she had, would not less have been drowned.

"The Prospect of Eton College suggests nothing to Gray, which every beholder does not equally think and feel. His supplication to father Thames, to tell him who drives the hoop or tosses the ball, is useless and puerile. Father Thames has no better means of knowing than himself. His epithet "buxom health" is not elegant; he seems not to understand the word. Gray thought his language more poetical as it was more remote from common use: finding in Dryden "honey redolent of Spring," an expression that reaches the utmost limit of our language, Gray drove it a little more beyond common apprehension, by making "gales" to be "redolent of joy and youth."

"Of the Ode on Adversity, the hint was at first taken from "O Diva, gratum quæ regis Antium;" but Gray has excelled his original by the variety of his sentiments, and by their moral application. Of this piece, at once poetical and rational, I will not by slight objections violate the dignity.

"My process has now brought me to the wonderful "Wonder of Wonders," the two Sister Odes; by which, though either vulgar ignorance or common sense at first universally rejected them, many have been since persuaded to think themselves delighted. I am one of those that are willing to be pleased, and therefore would gladly find the meaning of the first stanza of the Progress of Poetry.

Gray seems in his rapture to confound the images of "spreading sound and running water." A "stream of music" may be allowed; but where does "music," however "smooth and strong," after having visited the "verdant vales, rowl down the steep again," so as that "rocks and nodding groves rebellow to the roar?" If this be said of music, it is nonsense; if it be said of water, it is nothing to the purpose.

"The second stanza, exhibiting Mars's car and Jove's eagle, is unworthy of further notice. Criticism disdains to chase a school-boy to his common places.

"To the third, it may likewise be objected, that it is drawn from mythology, though such as may be more easily assimilated to real life. Idalia's "velvet-green" has something of cant. An epithet or metaphor drawn from nature ennobles art; an epithet or metaphor drawn from art degrades nature. Gray is too fond of words arbitrarily compounded. "Many-twinkling" was formerly censured as not analogical; we may say "many-spotted," but scarcely "many-spotting." This stanza, however, has something pleasing.

"Of the second ternary of stanzas, the first endeavours to tell something, and would have told it, had it not been crossed by Hyperion: the second describes well enough the universal prevalence of poetry; but I am afraid that the conclusion will not rise from the premises. The caverns of the North, and the plains of Chili, are not the residences of "glory and generous shame." But that poetry and virtue go always together, is an opinion so pleasing, that I can forgive him who resolves to think it true.

"The third stanza sounds big with "Delphi," and "Egean," and "Ilissus," and "Meander," and "hallowed fountain," and "solemn sound;" but in all Gray's odes there is a kind of cumbrous splendour which we wish away. His position is at last false: in the time of Dante and Petrarch, from whom he derives our first school of poetry, Italy was over-run by "tyrant power" and "coward vice;" nor was our state much better when we first borrowed the Italian arts.

"Of the third ternary, the first gives a mythological birth of Shakspeare. What is said of that mighty genius is true; but it is not said happily: the real effects of this poetical power are put out of sight by the pomp of machinery. Where truth is sufficient to fill the mind, fiction is worse than useless; the counterfeit debases the genuine.

"His account of Milton's blindness, if we supposed it caused by study in the formation of his poem, a supposition surely allowable, is poetically true, and happily imagined. But the car of Dryden, with his two couriers, has nothing in it peculiar; it is a car in which any other rider may be placed.

The Bard appears, at the first view, to be, as Algarotti and others have remarked, an imitation of the prophecy of Nereus. Algarotti thinks it superior to its original; and, if preference depends only on the imagery and animation of the two poems, his judgment is right. There is in the Bard more force, more thought, and more variety. But to copy is less than to invent; and the copy has been unhappily produced at a wrong time. The fiction of Horace was to the Romans credible; but its revival disgusts us with apparent and unconquerable falsehood. Incredulus odi.

"To select a singular event, and swell it to a giant's bulk, by fabulous appendages of spectres and predictions, has little difficulty; for he that forsakes the probable may always find the marvellous. And it has little use; we are affected only as we believe; we are improved only as we find something to be imitated or declined. I do not see that the Bard promotes any truth, moral or political.

"His stanzas are too long, especially his epodes; the ode is finished before the ear has learned its measures, and consequently before it can receive pleasure from their consonance and recurrence.

"Of the first stanza, the abrupt beginning has been celebrated; but technical beauties can give praise only to the inventor. It is in the power of any man to rush abruptly upon his subject, that has read the ballad of Johnny Armstrong,

Is there ever a man in all Scotland—

"The initial resemblances, or alliterations, "ruin, ruthless, helm, or hauberk," are below the grandeur of a poem that endeavours at sublimity.

"In the second stanza, the Bard is well described; but in the third we have the puerilities of obsolete mythology. When we are told that "Cadwallo hush'd the stormy main," and that "Mordred made huge Plinlimmon bow his cloud-top'd head," attention recoils from the repetition of a tale that, even when it was first heard, was heard with scorn.

"The weaving of the winding sheet he borrowed, as he owns, from the northern bards; but their texture, however, was very properly the work of female powers, as the act of spinning the thread of life in another mythology. Theft is always dangerous; Gray has made weavers of slaughtered bards, by a fiction outrageous and incongruous. They are then called upon to "Weave the warp, and weave the woof," perhaps with no great propriety; for it is by crossing the woof with the warp that men weave the web or piece; and the first line was dearly bought by the admission of its wretched correspondent, "Give ample room and verge enough." He has, however, no other line as bad.

"The third stanza of the second ternary is commended, I think, beyond its merit. The personification is indistinct. Thirst and hunger are not alike; and their features, to make the imagery perfect, should have been discriminated. We are told, in the same stanza, how "towers are fed." But I will no longer look for particular faults; yet let it be observed that the ode might have been concluded with an action of better example; but suicide is always to be had without expence of thought.

"These odes are marked by glittering accumulations of ungraceful ornaments; they strike rather than please; the images are magnified by affectation; the language is laboured into harshness. The mind of the writer seems to work with unnatural violence. "Double, double, toil and trouble." He has a kind of strutting dignity, and is tall by walking on tiptoe. His art and his struggle are too visible, and there is too little appearance of ease and nature.

"To say that he has no beauties, would be unjust: a man like him, of great learning and great industry, could not but produce something valuable. When he pleases least, it can only be said that a good design was ill directed.

"His translations of Northern and Welsh poetry deserve praise; the imagery is preserved, perhaps often improved; but the language is unlike the language of other poets.

"In the character of his Elegy I rejoice to concur with the common reader; for by the common sense of readers uncorrupted with literary prejudices, after all the refinements of subtilty, and the dogmatism of learning, must be finally decided all claim to poetical honours. The Church-Yard abounds with images which find a mirror in every mind, and with sentiments to which every bosom returns an echo. The four stanzas, beginning "Yet even these bones," are to me original: I have never seen the notions in any other place; yet he that reads them here, persuades himself that he has always felt them. Had Gray written often thus, it had been vain to blame, and useless to praise him."

THE WORKS OF GRAY.

ODE ON THE SPRING.

Lo! where the rosy-bosom'd hours,
Fair Venus' train appear,
Disclose the long-expecting flowers,
And wake the purple year!
The Attic warbler pours her throat,
Responsive to the cuckoo's note,
The untaught harmony of spring:
While, whispering pleasure as they fly,
Cool zephyrs through the clear blue sky
Their gather'd fragrance fling.

Where'er the oak's thick branches stretch
A broader browner shade;
Where'er the rude and moss-grown beech
O'er-canopies the glade*,
Beside some water's rushy brink
With me the muse shall sit, and think
(At ease reclin'd in rustic state)
How vain the ardour of the crowd,
How low, how little are the proud,
How indigent the great!

Still is the toiling hand of care:
The panting herd's repose:
Yet hark, how through the peopled air
The busy murmur glows!
The insect youth are on the wing,
Eager to taste the honied spring,
And float amid the liquid noon †:
Some lightly o'er the current skim,
Some show their gaily-gilded trim
Quick glancing to the sun ‡.

And they that creep, and they that fly,
Shall end where they began.
Alike the busy and the gay
But flutter through life's little day.
In fortune's varying colours drest:
Brush'd by the hand of rough mischance,
Or chill'd by age, their airy dance
They leave in dust to rest.

Methinks I hear in accents low
The sportive kind reply;
Poor moralist! and what art thou?
A solitary fly!
Thy joys no glittering female meets,
No hive hast thou of boarded sweets,
No painted plumage to display:
On hasty wings thy youth is flown:
Thy fun is set, thy spring is gone—
We frolic while 'tis May.

ODE

ON THE DEATH OF A FAVOURITE CAT.

Drowned in a Tub of Gold Fishes.

'Twas on a lofty vase's side,
Where China's gayest art had dy'd
The azure flowers that blow;
Demurest of the tabby kind,
The pensive Selima reclin'd,
Gaz'd on the lake below.

Her conscious tail her joy declar'd;
The fair round face, the snowy beard,
The velvet of her paws,
Her coat, that with the tortoise vies,
Her ears of jet, and emerald eyes,
She saw; and purr'd applause.

Still had she gaz'd; but 'midst the tide
Two angel forms were seen to glide,
The genii of the stream:
Their scaly armour's Tyrian hue
Through richest purple to the view
Betray'd a golden gleam.

The hapless nymph with wonder saw:
A whisker first, and then a claw,
With many an ardent wish,
She stretch'd in vain to reach the prize:
What female heart can gold despise?
What cat's averse to fish?

Presumptuous maid! with looks intent
Again she stretch'd, again she bent,
Nor knew the gulf between.
(Malignant fate sat by, and smil'd)
The slippery verge her feet beguil'd,
She tumbled headlong in.

Eight times emerging from the flood
She mew'd to every watery god,
Some speedy aid to send.
No dolphin came, no Nereid stirr'd;
Nor cruel Tom, nor Susan heard,
A favourite has no friend!

From hence, ye beauties, undeceiv'd,
Know, one false step is ne'er retriev'd,
And be with caution bold.
Not all, that tempts your wandering eyes
And heedless hearts, is lawful prize;
Not all that glitters, gold.

ON A DISTANT PROSPECT OF ETON COLLEGE.

"Αἰθρῶπιος ἱκανὴν προφάσιν εἰς τὸ δευχεῖν."

MENANDER.

Ye distant spires, ye antique towers,
That crown the watery glade,
Where grateful science still adores
Her Henry's * holy shade;
And ye, that from the stately brow
Of Windsor's heights th' expanse below
Of grove, of lawn, of mead survey,
Whose turf, whose shade, whose flowers among Wanders the hoary Thames along
His silver-winding way.

Ah, happy hills, ah, pleasing shade,
Ah, fields belov'd in vain,
Where once my careless childhood stray'd,
A stranger yet to pain?
I feel the gales, that from ye blow,
A momentary bliss bestow,
As waving fresh their gladsome wing,
My weary soul they seem to sooth,
And, † redolent of joy and youth,
To breathe a second spring.

Say, father Thames, for thou hast seen
Full many a sprightly race
Disporting on thy margin green
The paths of pleasure trace,
Who foremost now delight to cleave
With pliant arm thy glassy wave?
The captive linnet which enthrall?
What idle progeny succeed
To chase the rolling circle's speed,
Or urge the flying ball?

While some on earnest business bent
Their murmuring labours ply
Gainst graver hours, that bring constraint
To sweeten liberty;

* King Henry the Sixth, Founder of the College.

† "And bees their honey redolent of spring"

Dryden's Fable on the Pythag. System.

Some bold adventurers disdain
The limits of their little reign,
And unknown regions dare descry;
Still as they run they look behind,
They hear a voice in every wind,
And snatch a fearful joy.

Gay hope is theirs, by fancy fed,
Less pleasing, when possess'd;
The tear forgot as soon as shed,
The sunshine of the breast:
Theirs buxom health, of rosy hue;
Wild wit, invention ever new,
And lively cheer of vigour born;
The thoughtless day, the easy night,
The spirits pure, the slumbers light,
That fly th' approach of morn.

Alas, regardless of their doom,
The little victims play!
No sense have they of ills to come,
Nor care beyond to-day.
Yet see how all around them wait
The ministers of human fate,
And black misfortune's baleful train,
Ah, show them where in ambush stand
To seize their prey, the murderous band!
Ah, tell them, they are men!

These shall the fury passions tear,
The vultures of the mind,
Disdainful anger, pallid fear,
And shame that skulks behind;
Or pining love, shall waste their youth,
Or jealousy, with rankling tooth,
That inly gnaws the secret heart,
And envy wan, and faded care,
Grim-visag'd comfortless despair.
And sorrow's piercing dart.

Ambition this shall tempt to rise,
Then whirl the wretch from high,
To bitter scorn a sacrifice,
And grinning infamy,
The stings of falsehood those shall try,
And hard unkindness' alter'd eye,
That mocks the tear it forc'd to flow;
And keen remorse, with blood defil'd,
And moody madness * laughing wild
Amidst severest woe.

Lo, in the vale of years beneath
A grisly troop are seen,
The painful family of death,
More hideous than their queen;
This racks the joints, this fires the veins,
That every labouring sinew strains,
Those in the deeper vitals rage:
Lo, poverty, to fill the band,
That numbs the soul with icy hand,
And slow-consuming age.

To each his sufferings: all are men,
Condemn'd alike to groan;

* — "Madness laughing in his ireful mood."

Dryden's Fable of Palamon and Arcite.

The tender for another's pain,
The unfeeling for his own.
Yet ah ! why should they know their fate !
Since sorrow never comes too late,
And happiness too swiftly flies.
Thought would destroy their paradise,
No more ; where ignorance is bliss,
'Tis folly to be wise.

HYMN TO ADVERSITY.

ÆSCHYLUS, in AGAMEMNONE.

DAUGHTER of Jove, relentless power,
Thou tamer of the human breast,
Whose iron scourge, and torturing hour,
The bad affright, amidst the best !
Bound in thy adamant chain
The proud are taught to taste of pain,
And purple tyrants vainly groan
With pangs unfelt before, unpitied, and alone.
When first thy fire to send on earth
Virtue, his darling child, design'd,
To thee he gave the heavenly birth,
And bade to form her infant mind.
Stern rugged nurse ; thy rigid lore
With patience many a year she bore :
What sorrow was, thou bad'st her know,
And from her own she learn'd to melt at others woe.
Scar'd at thy frown terrific, fly
Self-pleasing folly's idle brood,
Wild laughter, noise, and thoughtless joy,
And leave us leisure to be good.
Light they disperse, and with them go
The summer friend, the flattering foe ;
By vain prosperity receiv'd,
To her they vow their truth, and are again believ'd.
Wisdom, in sable garb array'd,
Immers'd in rapturous thought profound,
And melancholy, silent maid,
With leaden eye, that loves the ground,
Still on thy solemn steps attend :
Warm charity, the general friend,
With justice, to herself severe,
And pity, dropping soft the sadly-pleasing tear.
Oh, gently on thy suppliant's head,
Dread goddess, lay thy chastening hand !
Not in thy gorgon terrors clad,
Nor circled with the vengeful band
(As by the impious thou art seen)
With thundering voice, and threatening mien,
With screaming horror's funeral cry,
Despair, and fell disease, and ghastly poverty,
Thy form benign, oh goddess wear,
Thy milder influence impart,
Thy philosophic train be there
To soften, not to wound my heart,

The generous spark extinct revive,
Teach me to love and to forgive,
Exact my own defects to scan,
What others are, to feel, and know myself a man.

E L E G Y

WRITTEN IN A COUNTRY CHURCH-YARD.

THE curfew tolls * the knell of parting day,
The lowing herd wind slowly o'er the lea,
The plowman homeward plods his weary way,
And leaves the world to darkness and to me.

Now fades the glimmering landscape on the sight,
And all the air a solemn stillness holds,
Save where the beetle wheels his droning flight,
And drowsy tinklings lull the distant folds ;

Save that, from yonder ivy-mantled tower,
The moping owl does to the moon complain
Of such as, wandering near her secret bower,
Molest her ancient solitary reign.

Beneath those rugged elms, that yew-tree's shade,
Where heaves the turf in many a mouldering heap,
Each in his narrow cell for ever laid,
The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep.

The breezy call of incense-breathing morn,
The swallow twittering from the straw-built shed,
The cock's shrill clarion, or the echoing horn,
No more shall rouse them from their lowly bed.

For them no more the blazing hearth shall burn,
Or busy housewife ply her evening care :
No children run to lisp their fire's return,
Or climb his knees the envied kiss to share.

Oft did the harvest to their sickle yield,
Their furrow oft the stubborn glebe has broke ;
How jocund did they drive their team afield !
How bow'd the woods beneath their sturdy stroke !

Let not ambition mock their useful toil,
Their homely joys, and destiny obscure ;
Nor grandeur hear with a disdainful smile,
The short and simple annals of the poor.

The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
Await alike the inevitable hour.
The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

Nor you, ye proud, impute to these the fault,
If memory o'er their tomb no trophies raise,
Where through the long-drawn aisle and fretted vault,

The peeling anthem swells the note of praise.

Can storied urn or animated bust
Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath ?
Can honour's voice provoke the silent dust,
Or flattery sooth the dull cold ear of death ?

Perhaps in this neglected spot is laid
Some heart once pregnant with celestial fire ;

* — "squilla di lontano

"Che paja 'l giorno pianger, che si muore."

Dante. Purgat. l. 8.

Hands, that the rod of empire might have sway'd,
Or wak'd to ecstasy the living lyre.

But knowledge to their eyes her ample page,
Rich with the spoils of time, did ne'er unroll;
Chill penury repress'd their noble rage,
And froze the genial current of the soul.

Full many a gem of purest ray serene,
The dark unfathom'd caves of ocean bear:
Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
And waste its sweetness on the desert air.

Some village-Hampden, that with dauntless breast
The little tyrant of his fields withstood;
Some mute inglorious Milton here may rest,
Some Cromwell guiltless of his country's blood.

Th' applause of listening senates to command,
The threats of pain and ruin to despise,
To scatter plenty o'er a smiling land,
And read their history in a nation's eyes,

Their lot forbade; nor circumscrib'd alone
Their growing virtues, but their crimes confin'd;
Forbade to wade through slaughter to a throne,
And shut the gates of mercy on mankind.

The struggling pangs of conscious truth to hide,
To quench the blushes of ingenuous shame,
Or heap the shrine of luxury and pride
With incense kindled at the muse's flame.

Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife,
Their sober wishes never learn'd to stray;
Along the cool sequester'd vale of life
They kept the noiseless tenor of their way.

Yet ev'n these bones from insult to protect
Some frail memorial still erected nigh,
With uncouth rhymes and shapeless sculpture
deck'd,

Implores the passing tribute of a sigh.

Their name, their years, spelt by th' unletter'd
muse,

The place of fame and elegy supply:
And many a holy text around she strews,
That teach the rustic moralist to die.

For who, to dumb forgetfulness a prey,
This pleasing anxious being e'er resign'd,
Left the warm precincts of the cheerful day,
Nor cast one longing lingering look behind?

On some fond breast the parting soul relies,
Some pious drops the closing eye requires;
Ev'n from the tomb the voice of nature cries,
* Ev'n in our ashes live their wonted fires.

For thee, who, mindful of th' unhonour'd dead,
Dost in these lines their artless tale relate;
If chance, by lonely contemplation led,
Some kindred spirit shall inquire thy fate.

* "Ch'i veggio nel pensier, dolce mio fuoco,

Petrarch, Son. 169.

Haply some hoary-headed swain may say,
" Oft have we seen him at the peep of dawn
" Brushing with hasty steps the dews away
" To meet the sun upon the upland lawn."

" There at the foot of yonder nodding beech,
" That wreathes its old fantastic roots so high,
" His listless length at noontide would he stretch,
" And pore upon the brook that bubbles by.

" Hard by yon wood, now smiling as in scorn,
" Muttering his wayward fancies he would rove,
" Now drooping woful wan, like one forlorn,
" Or craz'd with care, or cross'd in hopelefs love.

" One morn I miss'd him on the custom'd hill,
" Along the heath and near his favourite tree;
" Another came; nor yet beside the rill,
" Nor up the lawn, nor at the wood was he;

" The next with dirges due in sad array
" Slow through the church-way path we saw him
" borne.

" Approach and read (for thou canst read) the lay
" Grav'd on the stone beneath yon aged thorn."

THE EPITAPH.

HERE rests his head upon the lap of earth,
A youth to fortune and to fame unknown,
Fair science frown'd not on his humble birth,
And melancholy mark'd him for her own.

Large was his bounty, and his soul sincere,
Heaven did a recompense as largely send;
He gave to misery all he had, a tear;
He gain'd from heaven ('twas all he wish'd) a friend.

No farther seek his merits to disclose,
Or draw his frailties from their dread abode,
(* There they alike in trembling hope repose),
The bosom of his Father and his God.

THE PROGRESS OF POESY.

A PINDARIC ODE.

Φωναντα σουλεισιν ες
Δι το παν ερμηνειαν χαλζει. PINDAR, OLYMP. II.

ADVERTISEMENT.

WHEN the author first published this and the following ode, he was advised, even by his friends, to subjoin some few explanatory notes, but had too much respect for the understanding of his readers to take that liberty.

I. I.

† AWAKE, Æolian lyre, awake,
And give to rapture all thy trembling strings.
From Helicon's harmonious springs
A thousand rills their mazy progress take:

* — preventosa spemæ. Petrarch, Son. 114.

† "Awake, my glory: awake, lute and harp."
David's Psalms.

The laughing flowers, that round them blow,
Drink life and fragrance as they flow.
Now the rich stream of music winds along,
Deep, majestic, smooth, and strong,
Through verdant vales, and Ceres' golden reign :
Now rolling down the steep amain,
Headlong, impetuous, see it pour ;
The rocks and nodding groves rebellow to the roar.

I. 2.

* Oh! sovereign of the willing soul,
Parent of sweet and solemn-breathing airs,
Enchanting shell! the fullen cares,
And frantic passions, hear thy soft controul,
On Thracia's hills the lord of war
Has curb'd the fury of his car,
And dropp'd his thirsty lance at thy command.
† Perching on the scepter'd hand
Of Jove, thy magic lulls the feather'd king,
With ruffled plume, and flagging wing :
Quench'd in dark clouds of slumber lie
The terror of his beak, and lightning of his eye.

I. 3.

‡ Thee the voice, the dance, obey,
Temper'd to thy warbled lay,
O'er Idalia's velvet-green
The rosy-crowned loves are seen.
On Cytherea's day
With antic sports, and blue-ey'd pleasures,
Frisking light in frolic measures ;
Now pursuing, now retreating,
Now in circling troops they meet :
'To brisk notes in cadence beating
§ Glance their many-twinkling feet.
Slow melting strains their queen's approach declare:
Where'er she turns, the graces homage pay.
With arts sublime, that float upon the air,
In gliding state she wins her easy way :
O'er her warm cheek, and rising bosom, move
|| The bloom of young desire, and purple light of love.

Pindar styles his own poetry with its musical accompaniments, Αἰολίης μολπῆς, Αἰολίδης χορδαί, Αἰολίδων πνευαὶ αὐλῶν. Æolian song, Æolian strings, the breath of the Æolian flute.

The subject and simile, as usual with Pindar, are united. The various sources of poetry, which gives life and lustre to all it touches, is here described: its quiet majestic progress enriching every subject (otherwise dry and barren) with a pomp of diction and luxuriant harmony of numbers; and its more rapid and irresistible course, when swollen and hurried away by the conflict of tumultuous passions.

* Man's feeble race what ills await,
Labour, and penury, the racks of pain,
Disease, and sorrow's weeping train,
And death, sad refuge from the storms of fate!

And justify the laws of Jove.
Say, has he given in vain the heavenly muse?
Night, and all her sickly dews,
Her spectres wan, and birds of boding cry,
He gives to range the dreary sky;

She deigns to hear the savage youth repeat
In loose numbers wildly sweet
Their feather-cinctur'd chiefs, and dusky loves.
Her track, where'er the goddess roves,

Th' unconquerable mind, and freedom's holy flame.

THE BARD:

A PINDARIC ODE.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE following Ode is founded on a tradition current in Wales, that Edward the First, when he completed the conquest of that country, ordered all the Bards that fell into his hands, to be put to death.

I. 1.

‘ Ruin seize thee, ruthless king!
‘ Confusion on thy banners wait,
‘ Though fann'd by conquest's crimson wing,
‘ † They mock the air with idle state.
‘ Helm, nor ‡ hauberk's twisted mail,
‘ Nor e'en thy virtues, tyrant, shall avail
‘ To save thy secret soul from nightly fears,
‘ From Cambria's curse from Cambria's tears!
Such were the sounds that o'er the § crested pride
Of the first Edward scatter'd wild dismay,
As down the steep of || Snowden's shaggy side
He wound with toilsome march his long array.

is not worthy of so great a man. Mr. Mason, indeed, of late days, has touched the true chords, and with a masterly hand, in some of his Chorusses—above all, in the last of Caractacus.

“ Hark! heard ye not yon footstep dread? &c.”

* Διὸς ἀετοὶ δόρυχα θύον. Olymp. 2. Pindar compares himself to that bird, and his enemies to ravens that creak and clamour in vain below, while it pursues its flight, regardless of their noise.

† “ Mocking the air with colours idly spread.”

Shakespeare's King John.

‡ The hauberk was a texture of steel ringlets, or rings interwoven, forming a coat of mail, that sat close to the body, and adapted itself to every motion.

§ “ —The crested adder's pride.”

Dryden's Indian Queen.

|| Snowden was a name given by the Saxons to that mountainous tract, which the Welsh themselves call Craigian-eryri; it included all the highlands of Caernarvonshire and Merionethshire, as far as east the river Conway. R. Hygden, speaking of the castle of Conway, built by King Edward the First, says, “ Ad ortum amnis Conway ad clium montis Erery ;” and Matthew of Westminster, (ad. ann. 1283,) “ Apud Aberconway ad pedes montis Snowdonia fecit erigi castrum forte.”

Stout * Glo'ster stood aghast in speechless trance :
To arms † cried † Mortimer, and couch'd his quivering lance.

I. 2.

On a rock, whose haughty brow
Frown's o'er old Conway's foaming flood,
Rob'd in the sable garb of woe,
With haggard eyes the poet stood ;
(† Loose his beard, and hoary hair
§ Stream'd, like a meteor, to the troubled air)
And with a master's hand, and prophet's fire,
Struck the deep sorrows of his lyre.
* Hark, how each giant oak, and desert cave,
* Sighs to the torrents awful voice beneath !
* O'er thee, oh king ! their hundred arms they weave,
* Revenge on thee in hoarse murmurs breathe ;
* Vocal no more, since Cambria's fatal day,
* To high-born Hoel's harp, or soft Llewellyn's
* lay.

I. 3.

* Cold is Cadwallo's tongue,
* That hush'd the stormy main ;
* Brave Urien sleeps upon his craggy bed :
* Mountains, ye mourn in vain
* Modred, whose magic song
* Made huge Plinlimmon bow his cloud-top'd
* head.
* ¶ On dreary Arvon's shore they lie,
* Smear'd with gore, and ghastly pale :
* Far, far aloof th' affrighted ravens sail :
* The famish'd ¶ eagle screams and passes by.
* Dear lost companions of my tuneful art,
*  Dear as the light that visits these sad eyes,
* Dear as the ruddy drops that warm my heart,
* Ye died amidst your dying country's cries—

* Gilbert de Clare, surnamed the Red, Earl of Gloucester and Hertford, son-in-law to King Edward.

† Edmond de Mortimer, lord of Wigmore.

They both were Lords-Marchers, whose lands lay on the borders of Wales, and probably accompanied the king in his expedition.

‡ The image was taken from the well-known picture of Raphael representing the Supreme Being in the vision of Ezekiel : there are two of these paintings (both believed original), one at Florence, the other at Paris.

§ Shone like a meteor streaming to the wind.

¶ The shores of Caernarvonshire opposite to the isle of Anglesey.

* Camden and others observe, that eagles used annually to build their aerie among the rocks of Snowdon, which from thence (as some think) were named by the Welsh Craigan-cryti, or the crags of the eagles. At this day (I am told) the highest point of Snowdon is called The Eagle's Nest. That bird is certainly no stranger to this island, as the Scots and the people of Cumberland, Westmoreland, &c. can testify : it even has built its nest in the Peak of Derbyshire. [See Willoughby's Ornithol. published by Ray.]

 *As dear to me as are the ruddy drops
That visit my sad heart.*

Shakesp. Jul. Cæs.

* No more I weep. They do not sleep.
* On yonder cliffs, a ghastly band,
* I see them sit, they linger yet,
* Avengers of their native land :
* With me in dreadful harmony they join,
* And * weave with bloody hands the tissue of thy
* line.

 " And warms the nations with redoubled ray.
 " Enough for me : with joy I see
 " The different doom our fates assign.
 " Be thine despair, and scepter'd care ;
 " To triumph, and to die, are mine."
 He spoke, and headlong from the mountain's height
 Deep in the roaring tide he plung'd to endless night.

considerable body of troops into Ireland, to the assistance of Siötryg with the Silken Beard, who was then making war on his father-in-law Brian, King of Dublin: the Earl and all his forces were cut to pieces; and Siötryg was in danger of a total defeat; but the enemy had a greater loss, by the death of Brian, their king, who fell in the action. On Christmas-day (the day of the battle), a native of Caithness, in Scotland, saw at a distance, a number of persons on horseback, riding full speed towards a hill, and seeming to enter into it. Curiosity led him to follow them, till, looking through an opening in the rocks, he saw twelve gigantic figures, resembling women: they were all employed about a loom; and as they wove, they sung the following dreadful song; which when they had finished, they tore the web into twelve pieces, and (each taking her portion) galloped six to the north, and as many to the south.

Now the storm begins to lour,

Glittering lances are the loom,

Weaving many a soldier's doom,
Orkney's wo, and Randver's bane.

See the griesly texture grow,

And the weights that play below,
Each a gasping warrior's head.

Shafts for shuttles, dipt in gore,
Shoot the trembling cords along;

Keep the tissue close and strong.

In the Introduction to it be meant to have produced some specimens of the style that reigned in ancient times among the neighbouring nations, or those who had subdued the greater part of this island, and were our progenitors; the following three imitations made a part of them. He has long since dropped his design, especially after he had heard that it was already in the hands of a person well qualified to do it justice, both by his taste, and his researches into antiquity.

Note—The Valkyriur were female divinities, servants of Odin (or Woden) in the Gothic mythology. Their name signifies choosers of the slain. They were mounted on swift horses, with drawn swords in their hands; and in the throng of battle selected such as were destined to slaughter, and conducted them to Valkalla, the hall of Odin, or paradise of the brave; where they attended the banquet, and served the departed heroes with horns of mead and ale.

Mista black, terrific maid,
Sangrida, and Hilda see,
Join the wayward work to aid:
'Tis the woof of victory.

Ere the ruddy sun be set,
Pikes must shiver, javelins sing,
Blade with clattering buckler meet,
Hauberk crash, and helmet ring.

(Weave the crimson web of war),
Let us go, and let us fly,
Where our friends the conflict share,
Where they triumph, where they die.

As the paths of fate we tread,
Wading through th' ensanguin'd field
Gondula, and Geira spread
O'er the youthful king your shield.

We the reins to slaughter give,
Ours to kill, and ours to spare:
Spite of danger he shall live.
(Weave the crimson web of war).

They, whom once the desert-beach
Pent within its bleak domain,
Soon their ample sway shall stretch
O'er the plenty of the plain.

Low the dauntless Earl is laid,
Gor'd with many a gaping wound:
Fate demands a nobler head;
Soon a king shall bite the ground.

Long his loss shall Eirin weep,
Ne'er again his likeness see;
Long her strains in sorrow sleep,
Strains of immortality!

Horror covers all the heath,
Clouds of carnage blot the sun.
Sisters, weave the web of death;
Sisters, cease, the work is done.

Hail the task, and hail the hands!
Songs of joy and triumph sing!
Joy to the victorious bands;
Triumph to the younger king.

Mortal, thou that hear'st the tale,
Learn the tenour of our song.
Scotland, through each winding vale
Far and wide the notes prolong.

Sisters, hence, with spurs of speed:
Each her thundering faulchion wield;
Each bestride her fable steed.
Hurry, hurry to the field.

THE DESCENT OF ODIN.

An Ode.

(FROM THE NORSE TONGUE.)

In Bartholinus, de causis contemnendæ mortis; Hafnia, 1689, quarto.

UPREIS ODINN ALLDA GAUFR, &c.

UPROSE the King of Men with speed,
And saddled strait his coal-black steed;

Down the yawning sleep he rode,
That leads to * Hela's drear abode,
Him the Dog of Darkness spied,
His shaggy throat he open'd wide,
While from his jaws, with carnage fill'd,
Foam and human gore distill'd;
Hoarse he bays with hideous din,
Eyes that glow, and fangs that grin;
And long pursues, with fruitless yell,
The father of the powerful spell.
Onward still his way he takes,
(The groaning earth beneath him shakes),
Till full before his fearless eyes
The portals nine of hell arise.

Right against the eastern gate,
By the moss-grown pile he sat;
Where long of yore to sleep was laid
The dust of the prophetic maid.
Facing to the northern clime,
Thrice he trac'd the Runic rhyme;
Thrice pronounc'd, in accents dread,
The thrilling verse that wakes the dead;
Till from out the hollow ground,
Slowly breath'd a fullen sound.

PR. What call unknown, what charms presume
To break the quiet of the tomb;
Who thus afflicts my troubled sprite,
And drags me from the realms of night?
Long on these mouldering bones have beat
The winter's snow, the summer's heat,
The drenching dews, and driving rain!
Let me, let me sleep again.
Who is he with voice unblest,
That calls me from the bed of rest?

O. A traveller, to thee unknown,
Is he that calls, a warrior's son.
Thou the deeds of light shalt know;
Tell me what is done below,
For whom yon glittering board is spread,
Drest for whom yon golden bed?

PR. Mantling in the goblet, see
The pure beverage of the bee,
O'er it hangs the shield of gold;
'Tis the drink of Balder bold:
Balder's head to death is given,
Pain can reach the sons of heaven!
Unwilling I my lips uncloze:
Leave me, leave me to repose.

O. Once again my call obey.
Prophetess, arise, and say,
What dangers Odin's child await,
Who the author of his fate?

PR. In Hoder's hand the hero's doom:
His brother sends him to the tomb.
Now my weary lips I close:
Leave me, leave me to repose.

O. Prophetess, my spell obey.
Once again arise, and say,
Who th' avenger of his guilt,
By whom shall Hoder's blood be spilt.

* Niflheimr, the hell of the Gothic nations, consisted of nine worlds, to which were devoted all such as died of sickness, old age, or by any other means than in battle: Over it presided Hela, the Goddess of Death.

PR. In the caverns of the west,
By Odin's fierce embrace compress'd,
A wond'rous boy shall Rinda bear,
Who ne'er shall comb his raven hair,
Nor wash his visage in the stream,
Nor see the sun's departing beam,
Till he on Hoder's corse shall smile,
Flaming on the funeral pile.
Now my weary lips I close:
Leave me, leave me to repose.

O. Yet a while my call obey.
Prophetess, awake, and say,
What virgins these, in speechless woe,
That bend to earth their solemn brow,
That their flaxen tresses tear,
And snowy veils, that float in air.
Tell me whence their sorrows rose,
Then I leave thee to repose.

PR. Ha! no traveller art thou
King of men, I know thee now,
Mightiest of a mighty line—

O. No boding maid of skill divine
Art thou, nor prophetess of good;
But mother of the giant-brood!

PR. Hie thee hence, and boast at home,
That never shall inquirer come
To break my iron sleep again;
Till * Lok has burst his tenfold chain.
Never, till substantial night
Has reassum'd her ancient right;
Till wrap'd in flames, in ruin hurl'd,
Sinks the fabric of the world.

THE TRIUMPHS OF OWEN†.

A FRAGMENT.

From Mr. Evans's Specimens of the Welsh Poetry; London, 1764, quarto.

OWEN's praise demands my song,
Owen swift, and Owen strong;
Fairest flower of Roderic's stem,
‡ Gwyneth's shield, and Britain's gem.
He nor heaps his brooded stores,
Nor all profusely pours;
Lord of every regal art,
Liberal hand, and open heart.

Big with hosts of mighty name,
Squadrons three against him came;
This the force of Eirin hiding,
Side by side as proudly riding,
On her shadow long and gay
§ Lochlin plows the watery way:

* Lok is the Evil Being, who continues in chains till the twilight of the gods approaches, when he shall break his bonds; the human race, the stars, and sun, shall disappear, the earth sink in the seas, and fire consume the skies; even Odin himself and his kindred deities shall perish. For a farther explanation of this mythology, see Mallet's Introduction to the History of Denmark, 1755, quarto.

† Owen succeeded his father Griffin in the principality of North Wales, A. D. 1120. This battle was fought near forty years afterwards.

Catch the winds, and join the war;
Black and huge along they sweep,
Burthens of the angry deep.

Dauntless on his native sands

* The Dragon-son of Mona stands;

In glittering arms and glory drest,

High he rears his ruby crest.

There the thundering strokes begin,

There the press, and there the din;

Talymalfra's rocky shore

Echoing to the battle's roar,

Where his glowing eye-balls turn,

Thousand banners round him burn:

Where he points his purple spear,

Hasty, hasty rout is there,

Marking with indignant eye

Fear to stop, and to shame fly.

There Confusion, Terror's child,

Conflict fierce, and Ruin wild,

Agony, that pants for breath,

Despair and honourable Death.

THE DEATH OF HOEL.

FROM THE WELSH †.

HAD I but the torrent's might,

With headlong rage and wild affright

Upon Deira's squadrons hurl'd,

To rush, and sweep them from the world!

Too, too secure in youthful pride,

By them my friend, my Hoel, died,

Great Cian's son: of Madoc old,

He ask'd no heaps of hoarded gold;

Alone in nature's wealth array'd,

He ask'd, and had the lovely maid.

To Cattræth's vale, in glitt'ring row,

Twice two hundred warriors go;

Every warrior's manly neck

Chains of regal honour deck;

Wreath'd in many a golden link:

From the golden cup they drink

Nectar, that the bees produce,

Or the grape's ecstatic juice.

Flush'd with mirth and hope they burn:

But none from Cattræth's vale return,

Save Aëron brave, and Conan strong,

(Bursting through the bloody throng)

And I, the meanest of them all,

That live to weep, and sing their fall.

EPITAPH,

AT BECKENHAM, ON MRS. CLARKE ‡.

Lo! where this silent marble weeps,

A friend, a wife, a mother, sleeps;

* The red dragon is the device of Cadwallader, which all his descendants bore on their banners.

† Of Anneurim, styled the Monarch of the Bards. He flourished about the time of Talieffin, A. D. 570. This ode is extracted from the Gododin, (See Mr. Evans's Specimens, p. 71. and 93.) and now first published.

Vol. X.

A heart, within whose sacred cell
The peaceful virtues lov'd to dwell;

Affection warm, and faith sincere,

And soft humanity, were there.

In agony, in death, resign'd,

She felt the wound she left behind.

Her infant image, here below,

Sits smiling on a father's woe;

Whom what awaits, while yet he strays

Along this lonely vale of days?

A pang, to secret sorrow dear;

A sigh, an unavailing tear;

Till time shall every grief remove,

With life, with memory, and with love.

STANZAS,

Suggested by a view of the Seat and Ruins at Kingsgate, in Kent, 1766.

OLD, and abandon'd by each venal friend,

Here H——d took the pious resolution,

To smuggle a few years, and strive to mend

A broken character and constitution.

On this congenial spot he fix'd his choice;

Earl Goodwin trembled for his neighbouring land;

Here sea-gulls scream, and cormorants rejoice,

And mariners, though shipwreck'd, fear to land.

Here reign the blustering north and blasting east,

No tree is heard to whisper, bird to sing;

Yet nature could not furnish out the feast,

Art he invokes new terrors still to bring.

Now mouldering fanes and battlements arise,

Turrets and arches nodding to their fall,

Unpeopled monasteries delude our eyes,

And mimic desolation covers all.

"Ah!" said the sighing peer, "had B——te been "true,

Nor G——'s, nor B——d's promises been vain,

Far other scenes than this had grac'd our view,

And realiz'd the horrors which we feign.

"Purg'd by the sword, and purify'd by fire,

Then had we seen proud London's hated walls;

Owls should have hooted in St. Peter's choir,

And foxes stunk and litter'd in St. Paul's."

ODE FOR MUSIC.

Performed at the Senate-house at Cambridge, July 1.

"While bright-ey'd Science watches round:
Hence, away, 'tis holy ground!"

From yonder realms of empyrean day
Bursts on my ear th' indignant lay:
There sit the fainted sage, the bard divine,
The few, whom Genius gave to shine
Through every unborn age and undiscover'd clime.
Rapt in celestial transport they,
Yet hither oft a glance from high
They send of tender sympathy
To bless the place, where on their opening soul
First the genuine ardor stole.
'Twas Milton struck the deep-ton'd shell,
And, as the choral warblings round him swell,
Meek Newton's self bends from his state sublime,
And nods his hoary head, and listens to the rhyme.

"Ye brown o'erarching groves,
That Contemplation loves,
Where willowy Camus lingers with delight!
Oft at the blush of dawn
I trod your level lawn,
Oft woo'd the gleam of Cynthia silver-bright
In cloisters dim, far from the haunts of Folly,
With Freedom by my side, and soft-ey'd Melan-
"choly."

But hark! the portails sound, and pacing forth
With solemn steps and flow,
High potentates, and dames of royal birth,
And mitred fathers in long order go:
Great * Edward, with the lilies on his brow,
From haughty Gallia torn,
And sad † Chatillon, on her bridal morn
That wept her bleeding love, and princely ‡ Clare,
And || Anjou's Heroine, and § the paler Rose,
The rival of her crown and of her woes,
And  either Henry there,
The murder'd saint, and the majestic lord,
That broke the bonds of Rome.
(Their tears, their little triumphs o'er,

* Edward the Third; who added the Fleur de lys of France to the arms of England. He founded Trinity-College.

† Mary de Valentia, Countess of Pembroke, daughter of Guy de Chatillon Comte de St. Paul in France: of whom tradition says, that her husband Audemar de Valentia, Earl of Pembroke, was slain at a tournament on the day of his nuptials. She was the foundress of Pembroke-College, or Hall, under the name of Aula Maria de Valentia.

‡ Elizabeth de Burg, Countess of Clare, was wife of John de Burg, son and heir of the Earl of Ulster, and daughter of Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Gloucester, by Joan of Acres, daughter of Edward the First. Hence the poet gives her the epithet of Princely. She founded Clare-Hall.

|| Margaret of Anjou, wife of Henry the Sixth, foundress of Queen's-College. The poet has celebrated her conjugal fidelity in a former ode.

§ Elizabeth Widdville, wife of Edward the Fourth (hence called the paler Rose, as being of the House of York.) She added to the foundation of Margaret of Anjou.

 Henry the Sixth and Eighth. The former the founder of King's, the latter the greatest benefactor to Trinity-College.

Their human passions now no more,
Save Charity, that glows beyond the tomb)
All that on Granta's fruitful plain
Rich streams of regal bounty pour'd,
And bade these awful fanes and turrets rise,
To hail their Fitzroy's festal morning come;
And thus they speak, in soft accord,
The liquid language of the skies:

"What is grandeur, what is power?

"Heavier toil, superior pain.

"What the bright reward we gain?

"The grateful memory of the good.

"Sweet is the breath of vernal shower,

"The bee's collected treasure's sweet,

"Sweet Music's melting fall, but sweeter yet

"The still small voice of Gratitude."

Foremost, and leaning from her golden cloud,
The † venerable Marg'ret see!

"Welcome, my noble son," she cries aloud,

"To this, thy kindred train, and me:

"Pleas'd in thy lineaments, we trace

"A ‡ Tudor's fire, a Beaufort's grace.

"Thy liberal heart, thy judging eye,

"The flower unheeded shall descry,

"And bid it round heaven's altars shed

"The fragrance of its blushing head:

"Shall raise from earth the latent gem,

"To glitter on the diadem.

"Lo! Granta waits to lead her blooming band,

"Not obvious, not obtrusive, she

"No vulgar praise, no venal incense flings;

"Nor dares with courtly tongue refin'd

"Profane thy inborn royalty of mind:

"She reveres herself and thee.

"With modest pride to grace thy youthful brow,

"The laureat-wreath, || that Cecil wore, she "brings,

"And to thy just, thy gentle hand

"Submits the fasces of her sway,

"While spirits blest above, and men below,

"Join with glad voice the loud symphonious lay.

"Through the wild waves as they roar,

"With watchful eye and dauntless mien,

"Thy steady course of honour keep,

"Nor fear the rocks, nor seek the shore:

"The star of Brunswick smiles serene,

"And gilds the horrors of the deep."

A LONG STORY§.

IN Britain's isle, no matter where,
An ancient pile of building stands:

† Countess of Richmond and Derby; the mother of Henry the Seventh, foundress of St. John's and Christ's-Colleges.

‡ The countess was a Beaufort, and married to a Tudor; hence the application of this line to the Duke of Grafton, who claims descent from both these families.

|| Lord Treasurer Burleigh was Chancellor of the University, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

§ Lady Cobham, who first lived at the mansion-house at Stoke-Pogis, having read and admired the Elegy in a Country Church-yard, in M. S. she wished to be acquaint-

The Huntingdons and Hattons there
Employ'd the power of fairy hands

To raise the ceiling's fretted height,
Each pannel in achievements clothing,
Rich windows that exclude the light,
And passages, that lead to nothing*.

Full oft within the spacious walls,
When he had fifty winters o'er him,
† My grave Lord-keeper led the brawls;
The seal and maces danc'd before him.

His bushy beard, and shoe-strings green,
His high-crown'd hat, and fatten doublet,
Mov'd the stout heart of England's queen,
Though Pope and Spaniard could not trouble it.

What, in the very first beginning!
Shame of the versifying tribe!
Your history whither are you spinning!
Can you do nothing but describe?

A house there is (and that's enough)
From whence one fatal morning issues
‡ A brace of warriors, not in buff,
But rustling in their silks and tissues.

The first came cap-a-pee from France,
Her conquering destiny fulfilling,
Whom meaner beauties eye askance,
And vainly ape her art of killing.

The other amazon kind heaven
Had arm'd with spirit, wit, and satire:
But Cobham had the polish given,
And tipp'd her arrows with good-nature.

To celebrate her eyes, her air—
Coarse panegyrics would but tease her.
Melissa is her nom de guerre.
Alas, who would not wish to please her!

ed with the author; accordingly her relation, Miss Speed, and Lady Schaub, then at her house, undertook to bring this about by making him the first visit. He happened to be from home when the ladies arrived at his aunt's solitary mansion, and, when he returned, was surprised to find, written on one of his papers, in the parlour where he usually read, the following note: "Lady Schaub's compliments to Mr. Gray; she is sorry not to have found him at home, to tell him that Lady Brown is very well." This necessarily obliged him to return the visit, and soon after induced him to compose a ludicrous account of this little adventure, for the amusement of the ladies in question.

The mansion-house at Stoke-Pogis, then in the possession of Viscountess Cobham. The style of building, which we now call Queen Elizabeth's, is here admirably described, both with regard to its beauties and defects; and the third and fourth stanzas delineate the fantastic manners of her time with equal truth and humour. The house formerly belonged to the Earls of Huntingdon, and the family of Hatton.

† Sir Christopher Hatton, promoted by Queen Elizabeth for his graceful person and fine dancing. Brawls were a sort of figure dance, then in vogue.

‡ The reader is already apprised who these ladies were; the two descriptions are prettily contrasted; and nothing can be more happily turned than the compliment to Lady Cobham, in the eighth stanza.

With bonnet blue and capuchine,
And aprons long, they hid their armour,
And veil'd their weapons bright and keen,
In pity to the country farmer.

Fame, in the shape of * Mr. P—t
(By this time all the parish know it),
Had told, that thereabouts there lurk'd
A wicked imp they call a poet:

Who prowld the country far and near,
Bewitch'd the children of the peasants,
Dried up the cows, and lam'd the deer,
And suck'd the eggs, and kill'd the pheasants.

My lady heard their joint petition,
Swore by her coronet and ermine,
She'd issue out her high commission,
To rid the manor of such vermin.

The heroines undertook the task,
Through lanes unknown, o'er stiles they ventur'd,
Rap'd at the door, nor stay'd to ask,
But bounce into the parlour enter'd.

The trembling family they daunt,
They flirt, they sing, they laugh, they tattle,
Rummage his mother, pinch his aunt,
And up stairs in a whirlwind rattle.

Each hole and cupboard they explore,
Each creek and cranny of his chamber,
Run hurry-skurry round the floor,
And o'er the bed and tester clamber;

Into the drawers and china pry,
Papers and books a huge imbroglio!
Under a tea-cup he might lie,
Or creas'd, like dogs-ears, in a folio.

On the first marching of the troops
The Muses, hopeless of his pardon,
Convey'd him, underneath their hoops,
To a small closet in the garden.

So Rumour says: (who will believe)
But that they left the door a-jar,
Where, safe and laughing in his sleeve,
He heard the distant din of war.

Short was his joy. He little knew
The power of magic was no fable;
Out of the window, wisk, they flew,
But left a spell upon the table.

The words too eager to unriddle,
The poet felt a strange disorder:
Transparent bird-lime form'd the middle,
And chains invisible the border.

So cunning was the apparatus,
The powerful pot-hooks did so move him,
That, will he, nill he, to the Great-house
He went, as if the devil drove him.

Yet on his way (no sign of grace,
For folks in fear are apt to pray),

* This gentleman, a neighbour and acquaintance of Gray's in the country, was much displeased at the liberty here taken with his name; yet, surely, without any great reason.

To Phœbus he preferr'd his case,
And begg'd his aid that dreadful day.

The godhead would have back'd his quarrel;
But with a blush, on recollection,
Own'd that his quiver and his laurel
'Gainst four such eyes were no protection.

The court was fat, the culprit there,
Forth from the gloomy mansions creeping,
The Lady Janes and Joans repair,
And from the gallery stand peeping:

Such as in silence of the night
Come (sweep) along some winding entry,
(Styack * has often seen the sight)
Or at the chapel-door stand centry:

In peaked hoods and mantles tarnish'd,
Sour visages, enough to scare ye,
High dames of honour once, that garnish'd
The drawing-room of fierce Queen Mary.

The peerefs comes. The audience stare,
And doff their hats with due submission:
She curtsies, as she takes her chair,
To all the people of condition.

The bard, with many an artful fib,
Had in imagination fenc'd him,
Disprov'd the arguments of † Squib,
And all that ‡ Groom could urge against him.

But soon his rhetoric forsook him,
When he the solemn hall had seen;
A sudden fit of ague shook him.
He stood as mute as poor || Maclean.

Yet something he was heard to mutter:
"How in the park, beneath an old tree
" (Without design to hurt the butter,
" Or any malice to the poultry),

" He once or twice had penn'd a sonnet:
" Yet hop'd that he might save his bacon:
" Numbers would give their oaths upon it,
" He ne'er was for a conj'rer taken."

The ghostly prudes, with hagg'd § face,
Already had condemn'd the sinner.
My lady rose, and with a grace—
She smil'd, and bid him come to dinner ¶.

" Jesu-Maria! Madam Bridget,
" Why, what can the Viscountess mean?"
Cried the square-hoods in woeful fidget,
" The times are alter'd quite and clean!

* The house-keeper.

† The steward.

‡ Groom of the chamber.

|| A famous highwayman, hanged the week before.

§ Hagg'd, i. e. the face of a witch or hag; the epithet Hagg'd has been sometimes mistaken, as conveying the same idea; but it means a very different thing, viz. wild and farouche, and is taken from an unreclaimed hawk, called an hagard.

¶ Here the story finishes; the exclamation of the ghosts which follows, is characteristic of the Spanish manners of the age, when they are supposed to have lived; and the 500 stanzas, said to be lost, may be imagined to contain the remainder of their long-winded expostulation.

" Decorum's turn'd to mere civility;
" Her air and all her manners show it.
" Commend me to her affability!
" Speak to a commoner and poet!"

[Here 500 stanzas are lost.]

And so God save our noble king,
And guard us from long-winded lubbers,
That to eternity would sing,
And keep my lady from her rubbers.

GRAY OF HIMSELF.

Too poor for a bribe, and too proud to importune,
He had not the method of making a fortune;
Could love and could hate, so was thought something odd,

No very great wit, he believ'd in a God:
A post or a pension he did not desire,
But left church and state to Charles Townshend and Squire.

TRANSLATION FROM STATIUS.

THIRD in the labours of the disc came on,
 With sturdy step and flow, Hippomedon;
 Artful and strong he pois'd the well-known
 weight,
 By Phlegyas warn'd, and fir'd by Mnestheus fate,
 That to avoid, and this to emulate.
 His vigorous arm he try'd before he flung,
 Brac'd all his nerves, and every sinew strung;
 Then with a tempest's whirl and wary eye,
 Pursu'd his cast, and hurl'd the orb on high;
 The orb on high tenacious of its course,
 True to the mighty arm that gave it force,
 Far overleaps all bound, and joys to see
 Its ancient lord secure of victory.
 The theatre's green height and woody wall
 Tremble ere it precipitates its fall,
 The ponderous mass sinks in the cleaving ground,
 While vales and woods and echoing hills rebound.
 As when from Ætna's smoking summit broke,
 The eyeless Cyclops heav'd the craggy rock;
 Where ocean frets beneath the dashing oar,
 And parting surges round the vessel roar;
 'Twas there he aim'd the meditated harm,
 And scarce Ulysses 'scap'd his giant arm.
 A tiger's pride the victor bore away,
 With native spots and artful labour gay,
 A shining border round the margin roll'd,
 And calm'd the terrors of his claws in gold.

CLAY'S SONNET ON THE DEATH OF WEST.

EDINBURGH:

1794.

THE LIFE OF R. WEST.

THE few melancholy incidents which form the slender history of the life of WEST, were given to the world by Mr. Mason, in his "Memoirs of the life of Gray," together with his poetical remains, and whatever was most valuable of his prose writings, consisting chiefly of his correspondence with Gray.

Richard West was born in 1716. His father, Richard West, Esq. was Lord Chancellor of Ireland, during the two last years of the reign of George I. His grandfather, by the mother, the celebrated Bishop Burnet.

He was educated at Eton School, where he formed an acquaintance with Gray, which was improved by a similarity of taste and of pursuits into a friendship of uncommon ardour and sincerity.

He removed from Eton to Christ-Church College, Oxford, in 1734, about the same time that Gray left that place for Cambridge. Each of them carried with him the reputation of an excellent classical scholar; though, it is said, that at the time West's genius was reckoned the most brilliant of the two; a judgment which, in Mr. Mason's opinion, was not well founded.

At the time of his leaving School, he commenced a correspondence with Gray, which continued, with very little intermission, for the space of about eight years.

This correspondence, which is included in the collection of letters published by Mr. Mason, ascertains not only the scope and turn of their genius, but of their temper. It includes also several specimens of their juvenile compositions, and at the same time marks the progress they had made in literature.

"Though Mr. West's part of that correspondence," says Mr. Mason, "will undoubtedly show that he possessed very extraordinary talents, yet, on Mr. Gray's side, there seems, superadded to these, such a manly precision of taste, and maturity of judgment, as would induce one to believe Mr. Walpole's phrase not very hyperbolical, who has often asserted to me that "Gray never was a boy."

The letters are characterized by an elegant simplicity, derived from a diligent study of the best classical models, and cannot fail to be acceptable to such ingenious youths, who being about the same age, have a relish for the same studies, and bosoms susceptible of the same warmth of friendship.

"Next to seeing you," says West, in his letter to Gray, dated November 14. 1735, "is the pleasure of seeing your handwriting; next to hearing you is the pleasure of hearing from you. Really and sincerely I wonder at you that you thought it not worth while to answer my last letter. I hope this will have better success in behalf of your quondam schoolfellow; in behalf of one who has walked hand in hand with you, like the two children in the wood,

Through many a flowery path and shelly grot,
Where learning lull'd us in her private maze."

This last expression prettily distinguishes their studies, when out of the public school, which would naturally, at their age, be vague and desultory.

The relish he had contracted for polite literature, before his removal to Oxford, rendered the abstruse studies which occupy the attention of young men, altogether tasteless and irksome.

"Song was his favourite and first pursuit."

Minstrel, Book I. Stanza 57.

"As yet," he writes Gray, May 24. 1736, "I have not looked into Sir Isaac. Public disputations I hate; mathematics I reverence; history, morality, and natural philosophy, have the greatest charms in my eye; but who can forget poetry? they call it idleness, but it is surely the most enchanting thing in the world, "ac dulce otium et pœne omni negotio pulchrius."

In the December following, he exhorted his friend, whose thoughts were directed to the study of the law, as a profession for life, "not to throw poetry, like a nauseous weed, away, but to cherish its sweets in his bosom."

Mix with your grave designs a little pleasure,
Each day of business has its hour of leisure.

As a proof of his attachment to his classic companions, "I have sent you," says he, "an elegy of Tibullus translated. Tibullus, you must know, is my favourite elegiac poet; for his language is more elegant, and his thoughts more natural than Ovid's. Ovid excels him only in wit, of which no poet had more, in my opinion. The reason I choose so melancholy a kind of poesy, is because my low spirits and constant ill health (things in me not imaginary as you surmise, but too real, alas! and I fear constitutional) have tuned my heart to elegies of woe." It is to be regretted that Mr. Mason has omitted this version, only because it is a mere version, and because it is not written in alternate, but heroic rhyme, which he thinks is not the species of English measure adapted to elegiac poetry.

In 1737, he addressed to Gray, and his friends at Cambridge, the beautiful elegiac epistle, Ad Amicos, imitated from Elegy V. Book III. of Tibullus, and a letter of Pope's, in sickness, to Steele. "This melancholy elegy, and this melancholy letter," says he, "I turned into a more melancholy epistle of my own, during my sickness, in the way of imitation; and this I send to you and my friends at Cambridge, not to divert them, for it cannot; but merely to show them how sincere I was when sick."

Almost all Tibullus's elegy is imitated in this epistle, from whence his transition to Pope's letter is very artfully contrived, and bespeaks a degree of judgment much beyond his years.

In Spring 1738, he left Christ-Church for the Inner-Temple, and Gray removed from Cambridge to town the latter end of that year, intending also to apply himself to the study of the law in the same society.

Upon this occasion, Gray addressed to him the delicate "Sapphic Ode," beginning "Barbaras ades aditure mecum," with the following beautiful Alcaic fragment:

O lachrymarum fons, tenero sacros
Ducentium ortus ex animo; quater
Fœlix! in imo qui scatentem
Pectore te, pia Nympha, sensit.

It may perhaps be said, without paying too great a compliment to Gray's genius, that no poet of the Augustan age ever produced four more perfect lines, or what would sooner impose on the best critic, as being a genuine ancient composition.

To Gray's elegant ode, West returned a Latin Elegy, beginning Quid mihi tam grata misisti dona Camanæ, written September 17. 1738.

He spent the greatest part of the winter with his mother and sisters at Epsom, during which time several letters passed between the two friends, on subjects of literature and their classical studies.

In the spring 1739, Gray went abroad with Mr. Walpole, and spent near two years in travelling through France and Italy, from whence he transmitted to West and his parents, from time to time, entertaining accounts of the places he visited, interspersed occasionally with some exquisitely finished pieces of Latin poetry, which he composed on the spot, for the entertainment of his friend.

Nothing that Gray saw was suffered to escape him. From no relation, though purposely designed for the public eye, can so much information be drawn as from his casual letters; and the elegant ease of his epistolary style has a charm in it for all readers of true taste.

During this interval of his friend's absence, West resided at the Temple, with little attention to the business of the place. His thoughts were directed towards the law; but he hung back with fond reluctance on the muse.

While Gray was at Florence, 1740, he addressed to him a Latin Elegy, beginning, Ergo desidia videtur tibi crimine dignus, expressing his wishes to see Italy and Greece.

Finding that his aversion to the profession for which he had destined himself, became almost insuperable, he wrote to Gray on the subject, expressing, in the strongest manner, the ennui that almost overwhelmed him, and intimating his having quitted the Temple.

"I lived at the Temple," he writes his friend, June 5. 1740, "till I was sick of it. I have just left it; and I find myself as much a lawyer as I was when I was in it. It is certain, at least, I may study the law here as well as I could there. My being in chambers did not signify to me a pinch of snuff. They tell me my father was a lawyer, and, as you know, eminent in the profession; and such a circumstance must be of advantage to me. My uncle [Burnet] too makes some figure in Westminster Hall; and there's another advantage: Then my grandfather's name would get me many friends. Is it not strange that a young fellow that might enter the world with so many advantages will not know his own interest?" &c. &c.

To this letter, written apparently in much agitation of mind, which he endeavours to conceal by an unusual carelessness of manner, Gray returned an answer which presents the finest picture of the writer's mind, and is replete with delicate feeling, manly sense, and epistolary ease.

"You are yet young, have some advantages and opportunities, and an undoubted capacity, which you have never yet put to the trial. Set apart a few hours; see how the first year will agree with you, and at the end of it you are still the master; if you change your mind, you will only have got the knowledge of a little, somewhat that can do no hurt, or give you cause of repentance. If your inclination be not fixed upon any thing else, it is a symptom that you are not absolutely determined against this, and warns you not to mistake mere indolence for inability."

In April 1741, he communicated to Gray the sketch of a tragedy he had begun, under the title of Pausanias, which Gray appears to have criticised with much freedom; but Mr. Mason did not find among Gray's papers either the sketch itself, or Gray's free critique upon it.

In the September following, Gray returned to England, and found West sinking under the pressure of sickness and a load of family misfortunes. These the sympathising heart of Gray made his own. He did all in his power, for he was now with him in London, to soothe the sorrows of his friend; he endeavoured to alleviate them by every office of the purest and most cordial affection. But the distresses of West's mind had already too far affected a body, from the first weak and delicate. His health visibly declined during the winter, and as the spring advanced, his complaints terminated in a deep consumption.

In March 1742, he left town, and, for the benefit of the air, went to Pope, the residence of David Mitchell, Esq. near Hatfield in Hertfordshire.

His first letter to Gray from that place, is dated March 28. 1742; and during the two following months they maintained a constant correspondence.

His letter, dated April 4. contains a masterly critique on his friend's tragedy, and a description of his own cough in Latin hexameters, which "has this remarkable in it, that it was the production of four o'clock in the morning, while he lay in his bed tossing and coughing, and all unable to sleep."

His health daily declined, yet he continued to amuse himself with poetical composition; and, on May 5. addressed to his friend, the beautiful Ode to May, with this modest introduction: "I am going to write down a little ode (if it deserves the name) for your perusal, which I am afraid will hardly stand the test of criticism."

"I rejoice," says Gray in the answer which he returned, May 8. "to see you putting up your prayers to the May. She cannot choose but come at such a call. It is as light and genteel as herself. The first stanza (if what you say to me in it did not make me think it the best) I should call the worst of the five (except the fourth line). The two next are very picturesque, Miltonic and musical; her bed is so soft and so snug that I long to lie with her. But these two lines, "Great Nature," are my favourites. The exclamation of the flowers is a little step too far. The last stanza is full as good as the second and third, the last line bold, but I think not too bold."

His last letter to Gray is dated May 11. in which he expostulates with him about his peculiar species of melancholy: "What, are there no joys among the living? Alphene immemor atque unanims false sodalibus," and concludes with, "I will take my leave of you for the present, with a vale et vive-paulisper cum vivis;" so little was the amiable youth then aware of the short time that he himself would be numbered among the living. But this, it has been frequently remarked, is almost constantly the case with such persons as die of that most remediless, yet most flattering of all distempers, a consumption.

"Shall humanity," says Mr. Mason, "be thankful or sorry that it is so? Thankful surely. For, as this malady generally attacks the young and the innocent, it seems the merciful intention of Heaven, that to these death should come unperceived, and as it were by stealth, divested of one of its sharpest stings, the lingering expectation of their dissolution."

Gray returned an answer, May 27, and immediately afterwards went upon a visit to his relations at Stoke, where he wrote the "Ode on Spring," which he sent, as soon as written, to his beloved friend; but he was dead before it reached Hertfordshire.

He died June 1. 1742, only twenty days after he had written the letter above mentioned, and was buried in the Chancel of Hatfield church, beneath a stone bearing the following inscription: "Here lieth the body of Richard West, Esq. only son to the Right Honourable Richard West, Esq. Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who died the 1st of June 1742, in the 26th year of his age."

When the ode was returned to Gray with the melancholy news, the first impulse of his sorrow produced a tender "Sonnet" in English, and also a sublime apostrophe in hexameters, with which he intended to begin one of his books, "De Principiis Cogitandi." Nothing can more pathetically display the feelings of a heart, wounded by such a loss, than that apostrophe and the "Sonnet" in which he gave them vent.

In 1747, Mr. Walpole recommended to Gray the task of printing West's poems, and his own, in the same volume, which it appears from his letter he was not averse from doing: "But I much fear," he says, "our joint stock would hardly compose a small volume: what I have is less considerable than you would imagine, and of that little we would not be willing to publish all."

After the death of Gray, his friend and editor, Mr. Mason, interspersed in his "Epistolary Correspondence," 1775, as much of the poetry of West as he was persuaded his friend would have published had he prosecuted the task which Mr. Walpole recommended.

The collection is singularly small, consisting chiefly of the Ode to May, the epistle Ad Amicos, and some specimens of Latin poetry.

On his character, which appears to have been truly amiable and excellent, it is unnecessary to enlarge. The reader will acquire the best idea of it, if, after perusing his letters and poems, he use his own memory as a mirror, and collect into one assemblage the scattered features.

As a poet, it is sufficient praise, that the "blossoms of his genius" were thought worthy of being associated with the correct and manly performances of Gray. They show what he would have been, if he had been allowed, like him, to produce "fruits worthy of Paradise." He resembles Gray in many instances. Among others, they were both deeply enamoured with the excellencies of ancient literature, and strongly attached to the cultivation of Latin poetry. Their Latin poems discover an extraordinary copiousness and command of phraseology, a remarkable perspicuity of contexture, and a native facility and fluency. They may be justly considered as legitimate classical compositions. In his elegies, Tibullus was professedly West's model for language and versification. With Tibullus in view, he has, however, a manner and character of his own, and shows inherent powers of invention and sentiment. In his English Poetry, he discovers taste and delicacy of sentiment, joined to a great share of poetical imagination. His images are pleasing, his language chaste and elegant, and his versification correct and harmonious. The epistle Ad Amicos, is characterised by that nervous and eloquent simplicity which appears so easy, and which is yet so difficult to imitate. It unites the spirit and propriety of Pope's versification, with the elegance and harmony of Parnell. The Ode to May has not received from Gray more praise than it deserves. It is an extraordinary effort of fancy, expression, and versification. It is characterised by energy and melody in the highest degree, and may be justly considered as the choicest specimen of classical composition that English poetry can produce.

MISCELLANIES.

AD AMICOS.

[Imitated from Tibullus, Book iii. Elegy 8. and Mr. Pope's Letter in Sicknefs to Mr. Steele.]

Yes, happy youths! on Cadmus' sedgey side
You feel each joy that friendship can divide,
Each realm of science and of art explore,
And with the ancient blend the modern lore,
Studious alone to learn whate'er may tend
To raise the genius, or the heart to mend;
Now pleas'd along the cloister'd walks you rove,
And trace the verdant mazes of the grove,
Where social oft and oft alone ye choose
To catch the zephyr, and to court the muse;
Meantime at me (while all devoid of art
These lines give back the image of my heart)
At me the pow'r that comes or soon or late,
Or aims, or seems to aim, the dart of Fate;
From you remote methinks alone I stand,
Like some sad exile in a desert land,
Around no friends their lenient care to join
In mutual warmth, and mix their heart with mine.
Or real pains, or those which fancy raise,
For ever blot the sunshine of my days;
To sickness still, and still to grief, a prey,
Health turns from me her rosy face away.

Just Heav'n! what sin, ere life begins to bloom,
Devotes my head untimely to the tomb?
Did ere this hand against a brother's life
Drug the dire bowl, or point the murd'rous knife?
Did e'er this tongue the sland'rer's tale proclaim,
Or madly violate my Maker's name?

Vos tenet, Etruscis manat quæ fontibus unda,
Unda sub æstivum non adeunda canem
Nunc autem sacris Baiarum maxima lymphis,
Quum se purpureo vere remittit hiems.
At mihi Persephone nigram deununtiat horam
Inmerito juveni parce nocere, Dea.
Non ego tentavi nulli temeranda virorum
Audax laudandæ sacra docere Deæ.
Nec mea mortiferis infecit pocula succis
Dextera, nec quiquam tætra venena dedit.
Nec nos insana meditantés jurgia mente
Ihpiâ in adversos solvimus ora Deos.

Did e'er this heart betray a friend or foe,
Or know a thought but all the world might know?
As yet just started from the lists of time
My growing years have scarcely told their prime;
Useless as yet through life I've idly run,
No pleasures tasted, and few duties done.
Ah! who ere autumn's mellowing suns appear
Would pluck the promise of the vernal year,
Or ere the grapes their purple hue betray,
Tear the crude cluster from the mourning spray?
Stern pow'r of fate! whose ebon sceptre rules
The Stygian deserts and Cimmerian pools,
Forbear, nor rashly smite my youthful heart,
A victim yet unworthy of thy dart;
Ah! stay till age shall blast my with'ring face,
Shake in my head, and falter in my pace;
Then aim the shaft, then meditate the blow,
And to the dead my willing shade shall go.

How weak is man to reason's judging eye!
Born in this moment, in the next we die;
Part mortal clay, and part ethereal fire,
Too proud to creep, too humble to aspire.
In vain our plans of happiness we raise;
Pain is our lot, and patience is our praise:
Wealth, lineage, honours, conquest, or a throne,
Are what the wise would fear to call their own.
Health is at best a vain precarious thing,
And fair-fac'd youth * is ever on the wing:

Et nondum cani nigros læsere capillos,
Nec venit tardo curva Senectæ pede.
Natalem nostri primum videre parentes
(Quum cecidit fato consul uterque pari)
Quid fraudare juvat vitem crescentibus uvis?
Et modo nata mala vellere poma manu?
Parcite, pallentes undas quicumque tenetis,
Duraque fortiti tertia regna Dei.
Elysios olim liceat cognoscere campos,
Letheamque ratem, Cimmeriosque lacus,
Quum mea rugosa pallebunt ora senectâ,

Atque utinam vano nequidquam terrear æstu!

* Youth, at the very best, is but a betrayer of human life in a gentler and smoother manner than age; it is like the stream that nourishes a plant upon a bank, and

'Tis like the stream aside whose wat'ry bed
Some blooming plant exalts his flow'ry head,
Nurs'd by the wave the spreading branches rise,
Shade all the ground, and flourish to the skies;
The waves the while beneath in secret flow,
And undermine the hollow bank below;
Wide and more wide the waters urge their way,
Bare all the roots, and on their fibres prey:
Too late the plant bewails his foolish pride,
And sinks untimely in the whelming tide.

But why repine? does life deserve my sigh?
Few will lament my loss whene'er I die.
For those the wretches * I despise or hate,
I neither envy nor regard their fate.
For me, whene'er all-conq'ring death shall spread
His wings around my unrepining head,
I care not †: though this face be seen no more,
The world will pass as cheerful as before,
Bright as before the day-star will appear,
The fields as verdant, and the skies as clear;
Nor storms nor comets will my doom declare,
Nor signs on earth, nor portents in the air;
Unknown and silent will depart my breath,
Nor Nature e'er take notice of my death.
Yet some there are (ere spent my vital days)
Within whose breasts my tomb I wish to raise:
Lov'd in my life, lamented in my end, [mend:
Their praise would crown me as their precepts
To them may these fond lines my name endear,
Not from the poet, but the friend sincere ‡.

[ADDRESSED TO MR. GRAY.]

ERGO diffidiæ videor tibi crimine dignus;
Et meritò: victas do tibi sponte manus.
Arguor et veteres nimium contemnere Musas,
Irata et nobis est Medicæa Venus.
Mene igitur statuas et inania saxa vereri!
Stultule! marmoreâ quid mihi cum Venere?
Hic veræ, hic vivæ Veneres, et mille per urbem,
Quarum nulla queat non placuisse Jovi.
Cedite Romanæ formosæ, et cedite Graiæ,
Sintque oblita Helenæ nomen et Hermonia:
Et quascunque refert ætas vetus, Heroinæ:
Unus honor nostris venit Angliasin.
Oh quales vultus, Oh quantum numen ocellis!
I nunc et Tuscas improbe confer opes.
Ne tamen hæc abtusa nimis præcordia credas,
Neu me adeo nulla Pallade progenitum:
Testor Pieridumque umbras et flumina Pindî
Me quoque Calliopes semper amasse choros;
Et dudum Ausonias urbes, et visere Graias
Cura est, ingenio si licet ire meo:
Sive est Phidiacum marmor, seu mentoris æra,
Seu paries Coe nobilis e calamo;
Nec minus artificum magna argumenta recentium
Romanique decus nominis et Veneti:
Quâ Furor et Mavors et sævo in marmore vultus,
Quaque et formoso mollior ære Venus.
Quaque loquax spirat fucus, vivique labores,
Et quicquid calamo dulcius ausa manus:
Hic nemora, et sola marens Melibæus in umbrâ,
Lymphaque muscoso profiliens lapide;
Illic majus opus, faciesque in pariete major
Exurgens, Divûm et numina Cælicûm;
O vos sælices, quibus hæc cognoscere fas est,
Et totâ Italiâ, qua patet usque, frui!
Nulla dies vobis eat injucunda, nec usquam
Noritis quid sit tempora amara pati.

Perpetuo exercet teneras luctamine costas,
Oraque distorquet, vocemque immutat anhelant:
Nec cessare locus: sed sævo concita motu
Molle domat latus, et corpus labor omne fatigat:
Unde molesta dies, noctemque insomnia turbant.

Sufficiant tua vox dulcis, nec vultus amatus.

ODE TO MAY.

DEAR Gray ! that always in my heart
Possesses far the better part,
What mean these sudden blasts that rise,
And drive the zephyrs from the skies ?
O join with mine thy tuneful lay,
And invoke the rardy May.

Come, fairest nymph ! resume thy reign,
Bring all the graces in thy train :
With balmy breath and flow'ry tread
Rise from thy soft ambrosial bed,
Where in Elysian slumber bound
Embow'ring myrtles veil thee round.

Awake, in all thy glories drest,
Recal the zephyrs from the west;
Restore the sun, revive the skies,
At mine and nature's call arise!
Great nature's self upbraids thy slay,
And misses her accustom'd May.

See! all her works demand thy aid,
The labours of Pomona fade;
A plaint is heard from ev'ry tree,
Each budding flow'ret calls for thee;
The birds forget to love and sing,
With storms alone the forests ring.

Come then, with pleasure at thy side,
Diffuse thy vernal spirit wide;
Create where'er thou turn'st thy eye
Peace, plenty, love, and harmony,
Till ev'ry being share its part,
And heav'n and earth be glad at heart.

THE LIFE OF LYTTLETON.

GEORGE LYTTLETON, afterwards Lord Lyttleton, was the eldest son of Sir Thomas Lyttleton, Bart. of Hagley in Worcestershire, and was born January 17. 1708-9. His mother, Christian Temple, was sister of Sir Richard Temple, Bart. of Stowe, in Buckinghamshire, afterwards Lord Viscount Cobham. He had six brothers and as many sisters.

He received the first rudiments of education at Eton School, where he was so much distinguished, that his exercises were recommended as models to his school-fellows. His poetical compositions procured him the reputation of an elegant and correct versifier. His Soliloquy on a Beauty in the Country, and his verses on Good Humour, were written at school.

From Eton he went to Christ-Church, Oxford, where he retained the same reputation of superiority, and displayed his abilities to the public in a poem on Blenheim, written in 1727.

In 1728, being then nineteen, he began his travels, and visited France and Italy; but resided some time at Luneville in Lorraine, as appears by his Letters to his Father, in which he describes the places he visited, and relates some of the principal incidents of his journey.

In one of his letters, he thus expresses his dissatisfaction at the thought of returning to Luneville, "Luneville was my school of breeding, and I was there more unavoidably subject to quelques bevue d'ecolier, as the politesse practised in that is fuller of ceremony than elsewhere, and a good deal peculiar to itself. This is the first and strongest reason why I despair of being happy in Lorraine. I have already complained of the foppish ignorance and contempt for all I have been taught to value, but is so fashionable there."

It is impossible to peruse his Letters to his Father, without being charmed with the manly and virtuous sentiments which he discovers, his strong and hereditary aversion to vice and folly, and particularly with the unaffected ardour of filial affection which runs through the whole.

At Paris he amused himself with poetical composition, and wrote a very manly and correct Epistle to Dr. Ayscough, who had been his tutor at Oxford, and afterwards married his aunt, became tutor to the young Princes, and Dean of Bristol.

In 1730, he wrote a poetical Epistle to Pope, from Rome, and the same year returned to England, and addressed an Epistle to Lord Hervey, from Worcestershire.

When he returned, he obtained a seat in Parliament for Oakhampton in Devonshire, and soon distinguished himself among the most eager opponents of Walpole; though his father, who was one of the Lords of Admiralty, from 1727 to 1741, always voted with the Court.

For many years his name was seen in every account of every debate in the House of Commons. He opposed the Standing Army, he opposed the Excise, he supported the motion for petitioning the king to remove Walpole, and concurred with Pulteney, Pitt, &c. in all the measures of opposition.

His zeal for the public good, is the only motive that can justify the violence of his opposition to Walpole, from the charge of ingratitude; for it appears, from his letter to his father, dated at Luneville, that Walpole's recommendation procured him the friendship of Prince Craon: "You will let Sir Robert Walpole know how much I am obliged to his letter, and do justice to Prince Craon, who has expressed his regard to it in the strongest manner, and by a kindness which I cannot enough acknowledge."

In 1735, he published his Persian Letters, in imitation of those of Montesquieu, whom he had known in England. The character of a young man, Dr. Johnson observes, is very visible in them. They have something of that indistinct and headstrong ardour for liberty which a man of genius always catches when he enters the world, and always suffers to cool as he passes forward.

In 1736, he addressed an elegant copy of verses to his cousin, Pitt, on his losing his commission in the army, for his conduct in Parliament.

In 1737, the Prince of Wales established a separate court, and received with open arms the opponents of the minister. Upon the resignation of Mr. Pelham, he was made his secretary, with the addition of 240 l. annually of salary, as appears by his letter to his father, dated from Clifden: "I came here yesterday to thank his Royal Highness for having augmented my salary 240 l. a-year, by putting it upon the same foot with that of Mr. Molyneux under the king when he was prince."

He persuaded the prince, whose business it was now to be popular, that he would advance his character by the patronage of literature, and by his recommendation, Mallet was made under secretary, with 200 l.; and Thomson had a pension of 100 l. a-year. For Thomson he always retained his kindness, and was able at last to procure him the place of Surveyor-general of the Leeward Islands.

Moore courted his patronage by an apologetical poem, called the "Trial of Selim, the Persian," but was not equally successful.

He was now considered as a leader in the Opposition, and Pope, who was incited to direct his satire against the ministry, commended him among the other patriots. This drew upon him the reproaches of Fox, who, in the House of Commons, imputed to him as a crime, his intimacy with a lampooner, so unjust and licentious. Lyttleton supported his friend, and replied, that he thought it an honour to be received into the familiarity of so great a poet.

In 1741, he married Lucy, daughter of Hugh Fortescue, Esq. of Filleigh, in Devonshire, with whom he enjoyed the most perfect state of matrimonial felicity.

Walpole being at length, after a long struggle, driven from his places, Lyttleton was, in 1744, made one of the Lords of the Treasury; and from that time, as warmly supported as he had formerly opposed the schemes of the ministry.

When weary of faction and debate, he used very often, with Pitt, to visit his cousin West, at Wickham, from whose conversation, it is said, he received that conviction of the truth of Christianity, which produced, in 1747, his Dissertation on the Conversion of St. Paul, "a treatise to which infidelity has never been able to fabricate a specious answer."

This work his father had the happiness of seeing, and expressed his pleasure in a letter which deserves to be inserted.

"I have read your religious treatise with infinite pleasure and satisfaction. The style is fine and clear, the arguments close, cogent, and irresistible. May the King of kings, whose glorious cause you have so well defended, reward your pious labours, and grant that I may be found worthy, through the merits of Jesus Christ, to be an eye witness of that happiness which I do not doubt he will bountifully bestow on you! In the mean time, I shall never cease glorifying God for having endowed you with such useful talents, and giving me so good a son." The pleasure which such a letter must have given to such a son is inexpressible.

In January 1747, his wife, whom he tenderly loved, died in child-bed. Her sickness is feelingly described in his forty-first letter to his father; and he perpetuated her memory in a Monody, written in the same year, that will be read while conjugal affection, and a taste for poetry exist in this country. She was buried at Over-Arley in Staffordshire, but a very elegant monument is erected to her memory, in the chancel of the church at Hagley.

Though for some time inconsolable for her death, he sought happiness in a second marriage with Elizabeth, daughter of Field-Marshal Sir Robert Rich, in 1749. "She was an intimate and dear friend," says West, in a letter to Dr. Doddridge, June 17. 1749, "of his former wife's, which is some kind of proof of her merit: I mean the goodness of her heart, for that is the chief merit which Mr. Lyttleton esteems, and I hope she will not in this disappoint his expectations: in all other points she is well suited to him, being extremely well accomplished in languages, music, painting, and very sensible and well bred." It is said that the experiment was unsuccessful.

In 1751, his father died, when he inherited a Baronet's title, with a large estate; which, if he did not augment, he was at least careful to adorn with expensive buildings and rural decorations. Hagley-Park, the scene of these lavish operations, is frequently described as a terrestrial paradise.

Shenstone was Lyttleton's neighbour, friend, and his rival in landscape-gardening; and, it is said, [that his improvements at the Leasowes, excited, at first, the contempt, and afterwards the envy of the inhabitants of Hagley, "who took care," says Dr. Johnson, "to defeat the curiosity which they could not suppress, by conducting their visitants perversely, to inconvenient points of view, and introducing them at the wrong end of a walk, to detect a deception; injuries of which Shenstone would heavily complain."

This charge against the Lyttleton family has been denied by Mr. Greaves, who says, "that the Lyttleton family went so frequently with their company to the Leasowes, that they were unwilling to break in upon Shenstone's retirement upon every occasion; and, therefore, often went to the principal points of view, without waiting for any one to conduct them regularly through the whole walks. Of this Shenstone would sometimes peevishly complain, though I am persuaded he never really suspected any ill-natured intention in his worthy and much-valued neighbours." One cannot easily be persuaded, that a mind so pure and benevolent as that of Lyttleton, was ever debased by such unworthy passions.

As he continued his activity in parliament, he was gradually advancing his claim to preferment. In 1754, he resigned his seat at the Treasury-Board, on being appointed Cofferer to the Household, and Privy Counsellor. In December 20. 1755, he exchanged the place of Cofferer, for the great office of Chancellor of the Exchequer; an office, however, that required some qualifications, which he soon perceived himself to want; and which he retained only till the appointment of Mr. Legge, November 16. 1756.

In 1756, he made a journey into Wales, of which he has given a pleasing account in Two Letters to Mr. Bower, the celebrated historian of the Popes, a man whose Profession of Protestantism he firmly believed, and whose interest and fame having once espoused, he never was persuaded by the universal outcry to disown.

In an affectionate letter to Dr. Doddridge, on his removing to Lisbon, for the recovery of his health, October 5. 1751, he thus expresses his attachment to Bower; "You have brought on your distemper, by too continual study and labour in your spiritual functions, and remission of mind is absolutely necessary for your recovery. I therefore request it of you not to write the preface to Bower's book; it will do more harm than good to him; the merit of the work will bear it up against all these attacks; and as to the ridiculous story of my having discarded him, the intimate friendship in which we continue to live, will be a sufficient answer to that, and better than any testimony formally given."

It appears by an attestation of Mrs. Bower, printed in the "London Chronicle," October 11. 1766, that, during "seventeen years that she constantly lived with him, he always professed himself a Protestant, and acted conformable to that profession;" and that he died in the communion of the Church of England, and "made an edifying departure."

In 1757, when the inauspicious commencement of the war with France made the dissolution of the ministry unavoidable, he lost with the rest his employment; but his services were rewarded with a peerage, being created Baron Lyttleton of Frankley, in the county of Worcester.

In 1760, he published his Dialogues of the Dead, which were very eagerly read; though the production rather of leisure than of study, rather effusions than compositions. They show the elegance of his taste, rather than the power of his genius, or the strength of his judgment. He has copied Fenelon more than Fontenelle.

His last literary production in prose, was his History of Henry the Second, in 3 vols., 4to, 1767 and 1771, the result of the researches and deliberations of twenty years.

The story of this publication, as given by Dr. Johnson, is remarkable. "The whole work was printed twice over; a great part of it three times, and many sheets four or five times. The book-sellers paid for the first impression; but the charges and repeated operations of the press, were at the expence of the author, whose ambitious accuracy is known to have cost him at least a thousand pounds. He began to print in 1755. Three volumes appeared in 1764; a second edition of them in 1767; a third edition in 1768, and the conclusion in 1771. Andrew Reid, a man not without considerable abilities, and not unacquainted with letters or with life, was employed, I know not at what price, to point the pages of Henry the Second. Lyttleton took money for his copy; of which, when he had paid the pointer, he probably gave the rest away; for he was very liberal to the indigent. When time brought the History to a third edition, the superintendence of typography and punctuation, was committed to a man originally a comb-maker, but then known by the name of Dr. Sanders. To the Doctor's edition is appended, what the world had never seen before, a list of errors, in nineteen pages."

Every reader will wish, that in this passage, Dr. Johnson had observed his own humane maxim in the "Life of Addison," of not giving "a pang to a daughter, a brother, or a friend." The nice attention to punctuation, with which Henry the Second was published, is attributed to such anxiety as only vanity can dictate, when good motives were avowed by Lyttleton, and known to his friends; such as his desire to correct mistakes, his fear of being too harsh on the turbulent Becket, &c.

This work is justly ranked among the most valuable historical performances in the English language. It is executed with great fidelity, and with a strict regard to the authority of original writers. The style is perspicuous and unaffected; generally correct, and often elegant and masterly. The sentiments and remarks are judicious and pertinent; liberal with respect to religion, and friendly to the cause of liberty and the rights of mankind. The account of the state of our ancient government, laws, customs, and manners, is very copious, and eminently useful; so as to make the work strictly and properly a constitutional history.

His Verses to the Countess of Egremont, and Letter to Lord Hardwicke, in 1761, were his last poetical compositions.

He spent the latter part of his life in retirement; and, after a lingering illness, died at Hagley-Park, August 22. 1773, in the 64th year of his age. He was buried at Hagley; and the following inscription is cut on the side of his lady's monument.

This unadorned stone was placed here

By the particular desire and express

Directions, of the Right Honourable

GEORGE LORD LYTTLETON;

Who died August 21. 1773, aged 64.

By his first lady he had one son, Thomas, who inherited his title and estates, and two daughters, Mary, who died an infant, and Lucy, married to Lord Valentia, of the kingdom of Ireland, 1767. His second lady brought him no issue. Thomas Lord Lyttleton, married Apphia, second daughter of Broome Writts, Esq., of Chipping-Norton, Oxfordshire, the widow of Colonel Peach, and died in 1780, leaving no issue. He was as remarkable for an early display as for a flagitious prostitution of great abilities. He attained no small consequence as a parliamentary speaker, and was appointed Chief Justice in Eyre, November 18. 1775; a place which his father, with better pretensions, could never procure.

A small collection of "Poems by a Young Nobleman lately deceased," &c. 4to, 1780, has been given to him, and two small volumes of "Letters," 1780 and 1782, are supposed to have been written by him, which few have read without pleasure. That they are spurious is generally understood; but as to composition, sentiment, and language, they are exactly the kind of letters he would have written; it is a sort of epistolary portrait, a picture of his mind, a strong likeness, and the work of no common hand. A similar deception seems to have been practised in "The Correspondents, an original novel," 12mo, 1775, which exhibits a series of letters, supposed to have been written by his father and Mrs. Peach. They bear indeed, notwithstanding a similarity of style, that runs through the whole series, many marks of originality, several touches relative to time, place, and circumstance, not likely to be founded on fiction. His uncle William Henry Lyttleton, Lord Westcote, of the kingdom of Ireland, created Lord Lyttleton of Frankley, in Worcestershire, August 15. 1794, is the present representative of the family.

Lyttleton, according to Dr. Johnson, had never the appearance of a strong or a healthy man; and had a slender uncompact frame, and a meagre face. It is certain, however, that, at one period of his life, he entertained a more favourable opinion of his constitution; for, in a letter to his father, dated from the neighbourhood of Soissons in France, he says, "I believe there is not a young man alive, who has more happiness to boast of than myself, being blest with a sound constitution, affectionate friends, and easy fortune."

An affecting and instructive narrative of his death has been given by his physician Dr. Johnstone; of Kidderminster, which, as it is descriptive of his moral character, is here subjoined.

"On Saturday evening, the symptoms of his Lordship's disorder, which for a week past had alarmed us, put on a fatal appearance, and his Lordship believed himself to be a dying man. From this time he suffered by restlessness rather than pain; and although his nerves were apparently much fluttered, his mental faculties never seemed stronger when he was thoroughly awake.

"His Lordship's bilious and hepatic complaints seemed alone not equal to the expected mournful event: his long want of sleep, whether the consequence of irritation in the bowels, or, which is more probable, of causes of a different kind, accounts for his loss of strength, and for his death, very sufficiently.

"Though his Lordship wished his approaching dissolution not to be lingering, he waited for it with resignation. He said, "It is a folly, a keeping me in misery, now to attempt to prolong life;" yet he was easily persuaded, for the satisfaction of others, to do or take any thing that he thought proper for him. On Saturday he had been remarkably better, and we were not without some hopes of his recovery.

"On Sunday, about 11 in the forenoon, his Lordship sent for me, and said he felt a great hurry, and wished to have a little conversation with me in order to divert it. He then proceeded to open the fountains of that heart from whence goodness had so long flowed, as from a copious spring. "Doctor," said he, "you shall be my confessor. When I first set out in the world, I had friends who endeavoured to shake my belief in the Christian religion. I saw difficulties which staggered me; but I kept my mind open to conviction. The evidences and doctrines of Christianity, studied with attention, made me a most firm and persuaded believer of the Christian religion. I have made it the rule of my life, and it is the ground of my future hopes. I have erred and sinned; but have repented, and never indulged any vicious habit. In politics and public life, I have made public good the rule of my conduct. I never gave counsels which I did not at that time think the best. I have seen that I was sometimes in the wrong; but I did not err designedly. I have endeavoured in private life to do all the good in my power, and never for a moment could indulge malicious or unjust designs against any person whatsoever."

"At another time, he said, I must leave my soul in the same state it was in before this illness; I find this a very inconvenient time for solicitude about any thing."

"On the evening, when the symptoms of death came on, he said, I shall die; but it will not be your fault.—When Lord and Lady Valentia came to see his Lordship, he gave them his solemn benediction, and said, "Be good, be virtuous my Lord; you must come to this." Thus he continued giving his dying benedictions to all around him. On Monday morning, a lucid interval gave some small hopes; but these vanished in the evening; and he continued dying, but with very little uneasiness, till Tuesday morning, August 22, when, between seven and eight o'clock, he expired almost without a groan."

The Works of George Lord Lyttleton, formerly printed separately, with some other pieces never before printed, were collected and published by his nephew, George Edward Ayscough, Esq., in one volume A^o, 1774.

The pieces, formerly printed separately, and collected into this publication, are, Observations on the Life of Cicero; Observations on the present State of Affairs, in a letter to a member of Parliament; Letters from a Persian in England, to his Friend at Ispahan; Observations on the Conversion and Apostleship of St. Paul; Dialogues of the Dead; Miscellaneous Poems.

The pieces which were never before printed, are, Observations on the Roman History; Four Dia- logues of the Dead; Four Speeches in Parliament; Letters to Sir Thomas Lyttleton; and An Account of a Journey into Wales, in two letters, to Mr Bower.

The name of Lyttleton, as a man of dignified sentiment and excellent qualities, both of head and heart, is enrolled in the tablet of literary merit, by the general suffrages of his countrymen.

In the several characters of a judicious critic, an entertaining traveller, a wise and upright statesman, and a good man, his reputation is so decisively fixed, and so firmly established, that it can receive little additional lustre from encomium and panegyric; and is in no danger of suffering from the attacks of criticism or censure.

As a poet, his compositions are characterised by elegance, ease, and harmony, without much elevation, energy, or enthusiasm. In his Monody, the most popular of his productions, the virtues and accomplishments of his excellent lady, are commemorated in numbers equally harmonious and tender. He who can read it without melting into tears, has little claim to sensibility. It appears to have flowed simply from the genuine feelings of a most susceptible and deeply afflicted heart. His Progress of Love discovers delicacy of sentiment, pleasing imagery, and correct and harmonious versification. It is not, however, entirely free from the studied expression and false ornaments by which pastoral poetry is often fantastically disguised. His Advice to Belinda, unites spirit and propriety, sense and harmony, in the highest degree. His Epistle to Dr. Ayscough, is vigorously and elegantly written. His Epistle to Pope is finely encomiastic; the conclusion highly poetical. His other Epistles have their brighter passages. His Songs and Epigrams are commonly sprightly and easy.

Among his contemporaries, the testimonies to his merits, are too numerous to be specified. Pope, Thomson, Hammond, and Shenstone, are lavish in his praise. The following couplet of Pope is selected for the sake of the candid and judicious criticism of the present respectable master of Winchester School.

Free as young Lyttleton her cause pursue;
Still true to virtue, and as warm as true.

"A just, and not overcharged encomium," says Dr. Warton, "on an excellent man, who always served his friends with warmth (witness his kindness to Thomson), and his country with activity and zeal. His Poems and Dialogues of the Dead, are written with elegance and ease; His observations on the Conversion of St. Paul, with clearness and closeness of reasoning, and his History of Henry the Second, with accuracy and knowledge of those early times, and of the English constitution; and which was compiled from a laborious search into authentic documents, and the records lodged in the Tower and at the Rolls. A little before he died, he told me that he had determined to throw out of the collection of all his works, which was then soon to be published, his first juvenile performance, the Persian Letters, in which he said there were principles and remarks that he wished to retract and alter. Another little piece, written also in his early youth, does him much honour. The Observations on the Life of Tully, in which, perhaps, a more dispassionate and impartial character of Tully is exhibited, than in the panegyrical volume of Middleton."

His poetical character, as given by Dr. Johnson, is sparing and invidious, and cannot be generally allowed, without some exceptions in favour of the Progress of Love and Blenheim. His inveterate prejudices against pastoral poetry and blank verse, are well known.

"Lord Lyttleton's poems are the works of a man of literature and judgment, devoting part of his time to versification. They have nothing to be despised, and little to be admired. Of his Progress of Love, it is sufficient blame to say, that it is pastoral. His blank verse in Blenheim, has neither much force nor much elegance. His little performances, whether Songs or Epigrams, are sometimes sprightly, and sometimes insipid. His Epistolary poems have a smooth equality, which cannot much tire, because they are short, but which seldom elevates or surprises. But from this censure ought to be excepted his Advice to Belinda, which, though for the most part written when he was very young, contains much truth and much prudence, very elegantly and vigorously expressed, and shows a mind attentive to life, and a power of poetry which cultivation might have raised to excellence."

THE PROGRESS OF LOVE, IN FOUR ECLOGUES.

- I. UNCERTAINTY. To Mr. Pope.

UNCERTAINTY. ECLOGUE I.

TO MR. POPE.

POPE, to whose reed beneath the beachen shade,
The nymphs of Thames a pleas'd attention paid;
While yet thy muse, content with humbler praise
Warbled in Windsor's grove her sylvan lays;
Though now, sublimely borne on Homer's wing
Of glorious wars and godlike chiefs she sing:
Wilt thou with me revisit once again
The crystal fountain, and the flowery plain?
Wilt thou, indulgent, hear my verse relate
The various changes of a lover's state;
And, while each turn of passion I pursue,
Ask thy own heart if what I tell be true?
To the green margin of a lonely wood,
Whose pendant shades o'erlook'd a silver flood,
Young Damon came, unknowing where he stray'd,
Full of the image of his beauteous maid:
His flock, far off, unfed, untended, lay,
To every savage defenceless prey;
No sense of interest could their master move,
And every care seem'd trifling now but love.
A while in pensive silence he remain'd,
But, though his voice was mute, his looks complain'd;
At length the thoughts within his bosom pent
Forc'd his unwilling tongue to give them vent.
"Ye nymphs," he cried, "ye Dryads, who so long
Have favor'd Damon, and inspir'd his song;
For whom, retir'd, I shun the gay resorts
Of sportful cities, and of pompous courts;
In vain I bid the restless world adieu,
To seek tranquillity and peace with you.
Though wild ambition and destructive rage,
No factions here can form, no wars can wage:
Though envy frowns not on your humble shades,
Nor calumny your innocence invades:
Yet cruel love, that troubler of the breast,
Too often violates your boasted rest;

"With inbred storms disturbs your calm retreat,
And taints with bitterness each rural sweet.
"Ah luckless day! when first with fond sur-
"On Delia's face I fix'd my eager eyes! [prise
"Then in wild tumults all my soul was tost,
"Then reason, liberty, at once were lost: [gone,
"And every wish, and thought, and care, was
"But what my heart employ'd on her alone.
"Then too she smil'd: can smiles our peace de"stroy,
"Those lovely children of content and joy!
"How can soft pleasure and tormenting woe
"From the same spring at the same moment flow:
"Unhappy boy! these vain inquiries cease,
"Thought could not guard, nor will restore, thy
"peace:
"Indulge the frenzy that thou must endure,
"And sooth the pain thou know'st not how to "cure,
"Come, flattering memory! and tell my heart
"How kind she was, and with what pleasing art
"She strove its fondest wishes to obtain,
"Confirm her power, and faster bind my chain,
"If on the green we danc'd, a mirthful band;
"To me alone she gave her willing hand:
"Her partial taste, if e'er I touch'd the lyre,
"Still in my song found something to admire.
"By none but her my crook with flowers was
"crown'd,
"By none but her my brows with ivy bound:
"The world that Damon, was her choice believ'd,
"The world, alas! like Damon, was deceiv'd.
"When last I saw her, and declar'd my fire
"In words as soft as passion could inspire,
"Coldly she heard, and full of scorn withdrew,
"Without one pitying glance, one sweet adieu.
"The frightened hind, who sees his ripen'd corn
"Up from the roots by sudden tempests torn,
"Whose fairest hopes destroy'd and blasted lie,
"Feels not so keen a pang of grief as I.

" Ah, now have I deserv'd, inhuman maid,
 " To have my faithful service thus repaid?
 " Where all the marks of kindness I receiv'd,
 " But dreams of joy, that charm'd me and de-
 " ceiv'd?
 " Or did you only nurse my growing love,
 " That with more pain I might your hatred
 " prove?
 " Sure guilty treachery no place could find
 " In such a gentle, such a generous mind:
 " A maid brought up the woods and wilds among
 " Could ne'er have learnt the art of courts fo-
 " young:
 " No; let me rather think her anger feign'd,
 " Still let me hope my Delia may be gain'd;
 " 'Twas only modesty that seem'd disdain,
 " And her heart suffer'd when she gave me pain."
 Pleas'd with this flattering thought, the love-sick boy
 Felt the faint dawning of a doubtful joy;
 Back to his flock more cheerful he return'd,
 When now the setting sun more fiercely burn'd,
 Blue vapours rose along the mazy rills,
 And light's last blushes ting'd the distant hills.

HOPE. ECLOGUE II.

TO MR. DODDINGTON.

[Afterwards Lord Melcombe Regis.]

HEAR, Doddington, the notes that shepherds sing,
 Like those that warbling hail the genial spring.
 Nor Pan, nor Phoebus, tunes our artless reeds:
 From love alone their melody proceeds.
 From love, Theocritus, on Enna's plains,
 Learnt the wild sweetness of his Doric strains.
 Young Maro, touch'd by his inspiring dart,
 Could charm each ear, and soften every heart:
 Me too his power has reach'd, and bids with
 thine

My rustic pipe in pleasing concert join*.

Damon no longer sought the silent shade,
 No more in unfrequented paths he stray'd,
 But call'd the swains to hear his jocund song,
 And told his joy to all the rural throng.

" Blest be the hour," he said, " that happy hour,
 " When first I own'd my Delia's gentle power;
 " Then gloomy discontent and pining care
 " Forsook my breast, and left soft wishes there;
 " Soft wishes there they left, and gay desires,
 " Delightful languors, and transporting fires.
 " Where yonder limes combine to form a shade,
 " These eyes first gaz'd upon the charming maid;
 " There she appear'd, on that auspicious day,
 " When swains their sportive rites to Bacchus
 " pay:
 " She led the dance—heavens! with what grace
 " Who could have seen her then, and not have
 " lov'd?

" I strove not to resist so sweet a flame,
 " But gloried in a happy captive's name;
 " Nor would I now, could love permit, be free,
 " But leave to brutes their savage liberty.

* Mr. Doddington had written some very pretty love verses, which have never been published.

" And art thou then, fond youth, secure of joy?
 " Can no reverse thy flattering bliss destroy?
 " Has treacherous love no torment yet in store?
 " Or hast thou never prov'd his fatal power?
 " Whence flow'd those tears that late bedew'd
 " thy cheek?
 " Why sigh'd thy heart as if it strove to break!
 " Why were the desert rocks invoc'd to hear
 " The plaintive accent of thy sad despair?
 " From Delia's rigour all those pains arose,
 " Delia, who now compassionates my woes,
 " Who bids me hope; and in that charming word
 " Has peace and transport to my soul restor'd.
 " Begin my pipe, begin the gladsome lay;
 " A kiss from Delia shall thy music pay;
 " A kiss obtain'd 'twixt struggling and consent,
 " Given with forc'd anger, and disguis'd content.
 " No laureat wreaths I ask, to bind my brows,
 " Such as the muse on lofty bards bestows:
 " Let other swains to praise or fame aspire;
 " I from her lips my recompence require.
 " Why stays my Delia in her secret bower?
 " Light gales have chas'd the late impending
 " shower;
 " Th' emerging sun more bright his beams extends;
 " Oppos'd, its beauteous arch the rainbow bends!
 " Glad youths and maidens turn the new-made
 " hay:
 " The birds renew their songs on every spray!
 " Come forth, my love, thy shepherd's joys to
 " crown:
 " All nature smiles.—Will only Delia frown?
 " Hark how the bees with murmurs fill the " plain,
 " While every flower of every sweet they drain:
 " See, how beneath yon hillock's shady steep,
 " The shelter'd herds on flowery couches sleep:
 " Nor bees, nor herds, are half so blest as I,
 " If with my fond desires my love comply;
 " From Delia's lips a sweeter honey flows,
 " And on her bosom dwells more soft repose.
 " Ah how, my dear, shall I deserve thy charms?
 " What gift can bribe thee to my longing arms?
 " A bird for thee in silken bands I hold,
 " Whose yellow plumage shines like polish'd gold;
 " From distant isles the lovely stranger came,
 " And bears the fortunate Canaries name;
 " In all our woods none boasts so sweet a note,
 " Not ev'n the nightingale's melodious throat.
 " Accept of this; and could I add beside
 " What wealth the rich Peruvian mountains hide:
 " If all the gems in eastern rocks were mine,
 " On thee alone their glittering pride should shine.
 " But, if thy mind no gifts have power to move,
 " Phoebus himself shall leave th' Aonian grove:
 " The tuneful nine, who never sue in vain,
 " Shall come sweet suppliants for their favourite
 " swain.
 " For him each blue-ey'd Naiad of the flood,
 " For him each green-hair'd sister of the wood,
 " Whom oft beneath fair Cynthia's gentle ray
 " His music calls to dance the night away.
 " And you, fair nymphs, companions of my love,
 " With whom she joys the cowslip meads to
 " rove,

" I beg you, recommend my faithful flame,
 " And let her often hear her shepherd's name :
 " Shade all my faults from her inquiring sight,
 " And show my merits in the fairest light;
 " My pipe your kind assistance shall repay,
 " And every friend shall claim a different lay.
 " But see! in yonder glade the heavenly fair
 " Enjoys the fragrance of the breezy air—
 " Ah, thither let me fly with eager feet;
 " Adieu, my pipe; I go my love to meet—
 " O, may I find her as we parted last,
 " And may each future hour be like the past!
 " So shall the whitest lamb these pastures feed,
 " Propitious Venus, on thy altars bleed."

JEALOUSY. ECLOGUE III.

TO MR. EDWARD WALPOLE.

THE gods, O Walpole, given no bliss sincere;
 Wealth is disturb'd by care, and power by fear;
 Of all the passions that employ the mind,
 In gentle love the sweetest joys we find:
 Yet ev'n those joys dire jealousy molests,
 And blackens each fair image in our breasts.
 O may the warmth of thy too tender heart
 Ne'er feel the sharpness of his venom'd dart!
 For thy own quiet, think thy mistress just,
 And wisely take thy happiness on trust.

Begin, my muse, and Damon's woes rehearse,
 In wildest numbers and disorder'd verse.

On a romantic mountain's airy head
 (While browsing goats at ease around him fed)
 Anxious he lay, with jealous cares oppress'd;
 Distrust and anger labouring in his breast—
 The vale beneath a pleasing prospect yields
 Of verdant meads and cultivated fields;
 Through these a river rolls its winding flood,
 Adorn'd with various tufts of rising wood;
 Here half conceal'd in trees a cottage stands,
 A castle there the opening plain commands;
 Beyond, a town with glittering spires is crown'd,
 And distant hills the wide horizon bound:
 So charming was the scene, a while the swain
 Beheld delighted, and forgot his pain:
 But soon the stings infix'd within his heart
 With cruel force renew'd their raging smart:
 His flowery wreath, which long with pride he wore,

The gift of Delia, from his brows he tore,
 Then cried, " May all thy charms, ungrateful
 " maid,

" Like these neglected roses, droop and fade!
 " May angry heaven deform each guilty grace,
 " That triumphs now in that deluding face!
 " Those alter'd looks may every shepherd fly,
 " And ev'n thy Daphnis hate thee worse than I!
 " Say, thou inconstant, what has Damon done,
 " To lose the heart his tedious pains had won?
 " Tell me what charms you in my rival find,
 " Against whose power no ties have strength to " bind?

" Has he, like me, with long obedience strove
 " To conquer your disdain, and merit love?
 " Has he with transport every smile ador'd,
 " And died with grief at each ungentle word?

" Ah, no! the conquest was obtain'd with ease;
 " He pleas'd you, by not studying to please;
 " His careless indolence your pride alarm'd;
 " And, had he lov'd you more, he less had charm'd.
 " O pain to think! another shall possess
 " Those balmy lips which I was wont to press:
 " Another on her panting breast shall lie,
 " And catch sweet madness from her swimming
 " eye!—

" I saw their friendly flocks together feed,
 " I saw them hand in hand walk o'er the mead:
 " Would my clos'd eye had sunk in endless night,
 " Ere I was doom'd to bear that hateful sight!
 " Where'er they pass'd, he blasted every flower,
 " And hungry wolves their helpless flocks de-

" vour!—

" Ah wretched swain could no examples move
 " Thy heedless heart to shun the rage of love?
 " Hast thou not heard how poor Menalcas died
 " A victim to Parthenia's fatal pride?
 " Dear was the youth to all the tuneful plain;
 " Lov'd by the nymphs, by Phoebus lov'd in vain:
 " Around his tomb their tears the muses paid;
 " And all things mourn'd, but the relentless maid.
 " Would I could die like him, and be at peace?
 " These torments in the quiet grave would cease;
 " There my vex'd thoughts a calm repose would
 " find

" And rest, as if my Delia still were kind.

" No, let me live, her falsehood to upbraid:

" Some god perhaps my just revenge will aid.—

" Alas! what aid, fond swain, wouldst thou re" ceive!

" Could thy heart bear to see its Delia grieve?

" Protect her, heaven! and let her never know

" The slightest part of hapless Damon's woe:

" I ask no vengeance from the powers above;

" All I implore is never more to love,—

" Let me this fondness from my bosom tear,

" Let me forget that e'er I thought her fair.

" Come, cool indifference, and heal my breast;

" Wearied, at length, I seek thy downy rest:

" No turbulence of passion shall destroy

" My future ease with flattering hopes of joy.

" Hear mighty Pan, and, all ye sylfians, hear

" What by your guardian deities I swear;

" No more my eyes shall view her fatal charms,

" No more I'll court the traitors to my arms;

" Nor all her arts my steady soul shall move,

" And she shall find that reason conquers love!"—

Scarce had he spoke, when through the lawn below

Alone he saw the beauteous Delia go;

At once transported, he forgot his vow,

(Such perjuries the laughing gods allow!)

Down the steep hills with ardent haste he flew;

He found her kind, and soon believ'd her true.

POSSESSION. ECLOGUE IV.

TO LORD COBHAM.

COBHAM, to thee this rural lay I bring,
 Whose guiding judgment gives me skill to sing;

* See Mr. Gay's Dione.

Though far unequal to those polish'd strains,
With which thy Congreve charm'd the listening plains:

Yet shall its music please thy partial ear, [dear;
And sooth thy breast with thoughts that once were Recall those years which time has thrown behind,
When smiling love with honour shar'd thy mind:
When all thy glorious days of prosperous fight
Delighted less than one successful night.

The sweet remembrance shall thy youth restore,
Fancy again shall run past pleasure's o'er;
And, while in Stowe's enchanting walks you stray,

This theme may help to cheat the summer's day.

Beneath the covert of a myrtle wood,

To Venus rais'd, a rustic altar stood.

To Venus and to Hymen, there combin'd,

In friendly league to favour human-kind.

With wanton Cupids, in that happy shade,

The gentle virtues and mild wisdom play'd.

Nor there in sprightly pleasure's genial train,

Lurk'd sick disgust, or late-repenting pain,

Nor force, nor interest, join'd unwilling hands,

But love consenting tied the blissful bands,

Thither, with glad devotion, Damon came,

To thank the powers who blest'd his faithful
 flame:

Two milk-white doves he on their altar laid,

And thus to both his grateful homage paid:

"Hail, bounteous god! before whose hallow'd shrine

"My Delia vow'd to be for ever mine,

"While, glowing in her cheeks, with tender love,

"Sweet virgin modesty reluctant strove!

"And hail to thee, fair queen of young desires!"

"Long shall my heart preserve thy pleasing fires,

"Since Delia now can all its warmth return,

"As fondly languish, and as fiercely burn.

"O the dear bloom of last propitious night!

"O shade more charming than the fairest light!

"Then in my arms I clasp'd the melting maid,

"Then all my pains one moment overpaid:

"Then first the sweet excess of bliss I prov'd,

"Which none can taste but who like me have lov'd.

"Thou too, bright goddess, once, in Ida's grove,

"Didst not disdain to meet a shepherd's love;

"With him, while frisking lambs around you play'd,

"Conceal'd you sported in the secret shade:

"Scarce could Anchises' raptures equal mine,

"And Delia's beauties only yield to thine.

"What are ye now, my once most valued joys?

"Inspid trifles all, and childish toys—

"Friendship itself ne'er knew a charm like this,

"Nor Colin's talk could please like Delia's kisses.

"Ye muses, skill'd in every winning art,

"Teach me more deeply to engage her heart;

"Ye nymphs, to her your freshest roses bring,

"And crown her with the pride of all the spring.

"On all her days let health and peace attend;

"May she ne'er want, nor ever lose, a friend!

"May some new pleasure every hour employ:

"But let her Damon be her highest joy!

"With thee, my love, for ever will I stay,

"All night carest thee, and admire all day;

"In the same field our mingled flocks we'll feed,

"To the same spring our thirsty heifers lead,

"Together will we share the harvest toils,

"Together press the vine's autumnal spoils.

"Delightful state, where peace and love combine,

"To bid our tranquil days unclouded shine!

"Here limpid fountains roll through flowery
 meads;

"Here rising forests lift their verdant heads:

"Here let me wear my careless life away,

"And in thy arms insensibly decay.

"When late old age our heads shall silver o'er,

"And our slow pulses dance with joy no more;

"When time no longer will thy beauties spare,

"And only Damon's eye shall think thee fair;

"Then may the gentle hand of welcome death,

"At one soft stroke, deprive us both of breath!

"May we beneath one common stone be laid,

"And the same cypress both our ashes shade!

"Perhaps some friendly muse, in tender verse,

"Shall deign our faithful passion to rehearse

"And future ages, with just envy mov'd,

"Be told how Damon and his Delia lov'd."

SOLILOQUY OF A BEAUTY IN THE COUNTRY.

Written at Eaton School.

'Twas night; and Flavia, to her room retir'd,

With evening chat and sober reading tir'd;

There, melancholy, pensive, and alone,

She meditates on the forsaken town:

On her rais'd arm reclin'd her drooping head,

She sigh'd and thus in plaintive accents said:

"Ah, what avails it to be young and fair;

"To move with negligence, to dress with care?

"What worth have all the charms our pride can boast,

"If all in envious solitude are lost?

"Where none admire, 'tis useless to excel;

"Where none are beaux, 'tis vain to be a belle;

"Beauty, like wit, to judges should be shown;

"Both most are valued, where they best are known.

"With every grace of nature or of art,

"We cannot break one stubborn country heart:

"The brutes, insensible, our power defy:

"To love exceeds a squire's capacity.

"The town, the court, is beauty's proper sphere;

"That is our heaven, and we are angels there:

"In that gay circle thousand Cupids rove,

"The court of Britain is the court of love.

"How has my conscious heart with triumph
 glow'd,

"How have my sparkling eyes their transport show'd,

"At each distinguish'd birth-night ball, to see

"The homage, due to empire, paid to me!

" When every eye was fix'd on me alone,
 " And dreaded mine more than the monarch's
 " frown;
 " When rival statesmen for my favour, strove,
 " Less jealous in their power than in their love.
 " Chang'd is the scene; and all my glories die,
 " Like flowers transplanted to a colder sky:
 " Lost is the dear delight of giving pain,
 " The tyrant joy of hearing slaves complain.
 " In stupid indolence my life is spent,
 " Supinely calm, and dully innocent:
 " Unblest I wear my useless time away;
 " Sleep (wretched maid!) all night, and dream
 " all day;
 " Go at set hours to dinner and to prayer
 " (For dullness ever must be regular.)
 " Now with mamma at tedious whist I play;
 " Now without scandal drink insipid tea;
 " Or in the garden breathe the country air,
 " Secure from meeting any tempter there;
 " From books to work, from work to books, I
 " rove,
 " And am (alas!) at leisure to improve!—
 " Is this the life a beauty ought to lead?
 " Were eyes so radiant only made to read?
 " These fingers, at whose touch ev'n age would
 " glow,
 " Are these of use for nothing but to sew?
 " Sure erring nature never could design
 " To form a housewife in a mould like mine!
 " O Venus, queen and guardian of the fair,
 " Attend propitious to thy votary's prayer:
 " Let me revisit the dear town again:
 " Let me be seen!—could I that wish obtain,
 " All other wishes my own power would gain." }

BLLENHEIM.

Written at the University of Oxford, in the Year 1727.

PARENT of arts, whose skilful hand first taught
 The towering pile to rise, and form'd the plan
 With fair proportion; architect divine.
 Minerva; thee to my adventurous lyre
 Assistant I invoke, that means to sing
 Blenheim, proud monument of British fame,
 Thy glorious work! for thou the lofty towers
 Didst to his virtue raise, whom oft thy shield
 In peril guarded, and thy wisdom steer'd
 Through all the storms of war.—Thee too I call,
 Thalia, sylvan muse, who lov'st to rove
 Along the shady paths and verdant bowers
 Of Woodstock's happy grove: there tuning sweet
 Thy rural pipe, while all the Dryad train
 Attentive listen; let thy warbling song
 Paint with melodious praise the pleasing scene,
 And equal these to Pindus' honour'd shades.

When Europe freed, confess'd the saving power
 Of Marlborough's hand; Britain, who sent him forth

Chief of confederate hosts, to fight the cause
 Of liberty and justice, grateful rais'd
 This palace, sacred to her leader's fame:
 A trophy of success; with spoils adorn'd
 Of conquer'd towns and glorying in the name

Of that auspicious field, where Churchill's sword
 Vanquish'd the might of Gallia, and chastis'd
 Rebel Bavar.—Majestic in its strength,
 Stands the proud dome, and speaks its great design.

Hail, happy chief, whose valour could deserve
 Reward so glorious! grateful nation, hail,
 Who paid'st his service with so rich a meed!
 Which most shall I admire, which worthiest praise,
 The hero or the people? honour doubts,
 And weighs their virtues in an equal scale.
 Not thus Germania pays th' uncancell'd debt
 Of gratitude to us—Blush, Cæsar, blush,
 When thou behold'st these towers; ingrate, to thee
 A monument of shame! can'st thou forget
 Whence they are nam'd, and what an English arm

Did for thy throne that day? but we disdain
 Or to upbraid or imitate thy guilt.

Still thy obdurate heart against the sense
 Of obligation infinite; and know,
 Britain, like heaven, protects a thankless world
 For her own glory, nor expects reward.

Pleas'd with the noble theme, her task the muse

Pursues untir'd, and through the palace roves
 With ever-new delight. The tapestry rich
 With gold, and gay with all the beauteous paint
 Of various-colour'd silks, dispos'd with skill,
 Attracts her curious eye. Here Ister rolls
 His purple wave; and there the Granic flood
 With passing squadrons foams: here hardy Gaul
 Flies from the sword of Britain; there to Greece
 Effeminate Persia yields.—In arms oppos'd,
 Marlborough and Alexander vie for fame
 With glorious competition; equal both
 In valour and in fortune: but their praise
 Be different, for with different views they fought;
 This to subdue, and that to free mankind.

Now, through the stately portals issuing forth,
 The muse to softest glories turns, and seeks
 The woodland shade, delighted. Not the vale
 Of Tempe fam'd in song, or Ida's grove,
 Such beauty boasts. Amid the mazy gloom
 Of this romantic wilderness once stood
 The bower of Rosamonda, hapless fair,
 Sacred to grief and love; the crystal fount
 In which she us'd to bathe her beauteous limbs
 Still warbling flows, pleas'd to reflect the face
 Of Spencer, lovely maid, when tir'd she sits
 Beside its flowery brink, and views those charms
 Which only Rosamond could once excel.
 But see where, flowing with a nobler stream,
 A limpid lake of purest waters rolls
 Beneath the wide-stretch'd arch, stupendous work,
 Through which the Danube might collected pour
 His spacious urn! Silent a while and smooth
 The current glides, till with an headlong force
 Broke and disorder'd, down the steep it falls
 In loud cascades; the silver-sparkling foam
 Glitters reluctant in the dancing ray.

In these retreats repos'd the mighty soul
 Of Churchill, from the toils of war and state,
 Splendidly private, and the tranquil joy
 Of contemplation felt, while Blenheim's dome
 Triumphal ever in his mind renew'd

The memory of his fame, and sooth'd his thoughts
 With pleasing record of his glorious deeds.
 So, by the rage of faction home recall'd,
 Lucullus, while he wag'd successful war
 Against the pride of Asia, and the power
 Of Mithridates, whose aspiring mind
 No losses could subdue, enrich'd with spoils
 Of conquer'd nations, back return'd to Rome,
 And in magnificent retirement past
 The evening of his life.—But not alone,
 In the calm shades of honourable ease,
 Great Marlborough peaceful dwelt: indulgent
 heaven

Gave a companion to his softer hours,
 With whom conversing, he forgot all change
 Of fortune, or of state, and in her mind
 Found greatness equal to his own, and lov'd
 Himself in her.—Thus each by each admir'd
 In mutual honour, mutual fondness join'd:
 Like two fair stars, with intermingled light,
 In friendly union they together shone,
 Aiding each other's brightness, till the cloud
 Of night eternal quench'd the beams of one.
 Thee, Churchill, first the ruthless hand of death
 Tore from thy consort's side, and call'd thee
 hence

To the sublimer seats of joy and love;
 Where fate again shall join her soul to thine,
 Who now, regardless of thy fame, erects
 The column to thy praise, and soothes her woe
 With pious honours to thy sacred name
 Immortal. Lo! where, towering in the height
 Of yon aerial pillar, proudly stands
 Thy image, like a guardian god, sublime,
 And awes the subject plain: beneath his feet,
 The German eagles spread their wings; his hand
 Grasps victory, its slave. Such was thy brow
 Majestic, such thy martial port, when Gaul
 Fled from thy frown, and in the Danube sought
 A refuge from thy sword.—There, where the field
 Was deepest stain'd with gore, on Hochstet's plain,
 The theatre of thy glory, once was rais'd
 A meaner trophy, by the imperial hand;
 Extorted gratitude! which now the rage
 Of malice impotent, beseeching ill
 A regal breast, has level'd to the ground:
 Mean insult! this, with better auspices,
 Shall stand on British earth to tell the world
 How Marlborough fought, for whom, and how repaid

His services. Nor shall the constant love
 Of her who rais'd this monument be lost
 In dark oblivion: that shall be the theme
 Of future bards in ages yet unborn,
 Inspir'd with Chaucer's fire, who in these groves
 First tun'd the British harp, and little deem'd
 His humble dwelling should the neighbour be
 Of Blenheim, house superb; to which the throng
 Of travellers approaching shall not pass
 His roof unnoted, but respectful hail
 With reverence due. Such honour does the muse
 Obtain her favourites.—But the noble pile
 (My theme) demands my voice.—O shade ador'd,
 Marlborough! who now above the starry sphere
 Dwell'st in the palaces of heaven, enthron'd

Among the demigods, deign to defend
 This thy abode, while present here below,
 And sacred still to thy immortal fame,
 With tutelary care. Preserve it safe
 From time's destroying hand, and cruel stroke
 Of factious envy's more relentless rage.
 Here may, long ages hence, the British youth,
 When honour calls them to the field of war,
 Behold the trophies which thy valour rais'd;
 The proud reward of thy successful toils
 For Europe's freedom, and Britannia's fame;
 That fir'd with generous envy, they may dare
 To emulate thy deeds.—So shall thy name,
 Dear to thy country, still inspire her sons
 With martial virtue; and to high attempts
 Excite their arms, till other battles won,
 And nations sav'd new monuments require,
 And other Blenheims shall adorn the land.

TO THE REVEREND DR. AYSCOUGH,

AT OXFORD.

Written from Paris in the Year 1728.

SAY, dearest friend, how roll thy hours away?
 What pleasing study cheats the tedious day?
 Dost thou the sacred volumes oft explore
 Of wise antiquity's immortal lore,
 Where virtue, by the charms of wit refin'd,
 At once exalts and polishes the mind?
 How different from our modern guilty art,
 Which pleases only to corrupt the heart;
 Whose curs'd refinements odious vice adorn,
 And teach to honour what we ought to scorn!
 Dost thou in sage historians joy to see
 How Roman greatness rose with liberty:
 How the same hands that tyrants durst control
 Their empire stretch'd from Atlas to the pole;
 Till wealth and conquest into slaves refin'd
 The proud luxurious masters of mankind?
 Dost thou in letter'd Greece each charm admire,
 Each grace, each virtue, freedom could inspire;
 Yet in her troubled state see all the woes,
 And all the crimes, that giddy faction knows;
 Till, rent by parties, by corruption sold,
 Or weakly careless, or too rashly bold,
 She sunk beneath a mitigated doom,
 The slave and tutored of protecting Rome?
 Does calm philosophy her aid impart,
 To guide the passions, and to mend the heart?
 Taught by her precepts, hast thou learnt the end

To which alone the wise their studies bend;
 For which alone by nature were design'd
 The powers of thought—to benefit mankind?
 Not, like a cloyster'd drone, to read and dose,
 In undeserving, undeserv'd, repose;
 But reason's influence to diffuse; to clear
 Th' enlighten'd world of every gloomy fear;
 Dispel the mists of error, and unbind
 Those pedant chains that clog the freeborn mind.
 Happy who thus his leisure can employ!
 He knows the purest hours of tranquil joy;
 Nor vex with pangs that busier bosoms tear,
 Nor lost to social virtue's pleasing care;

Safe in the port, yet labouring to sustain
Those who still float on the tempestuous main.

So Locke the days of studious quiet spent;
So Boyle in wisdom found divine content;
So Cambray, worthy of a happier doom,
The virtuous slave of Louis and of Rome.

Good * Worlter thus supports his drooping age,
Far from court flattery, far from party-rage;
He, who in youth a tyrant's frown defy'd,
Firm and intrepid on his country's side,
Her boldest champion then, and now her mildest guide!

O generous warmth! O sanctity divine!
To emulate his worth, my friend, be thine:
Learn from his life the duties of the gown;
Learn, not to flatter, nor insult the crown;
Nor, basely servile, court the guilty great,
Nor raise the church a rival to the state:
To error mild, to vice alone severe,
Seek not to spread the law of love by fear.
The priest who plagues the world can never mend:
No foe to man was e'er to God a friend.
Let reason and let virtue faith maintain;
All force but theirs is impious, weak, and vain.

Me other cares in other climes engage,
Cares that become my birth, and suit my age;
In various knowledge to improve my youth,
And conquer prejudice, worst foe to truth;
By foreign arts domestic faults to mend,
Enlarge my notions, and my views extend;
The useful science of the world to know,
Which books can never teach, or pedants show.

A nation here I pity and admire,
Whom noblest sentiments of glory fire,
Yet taught, by custom's force and bigot fear,
To serve with pride, and boast the yoke they bear:
Whose nobles, born to cringe and to command,
(In courts a mean, in camps a generous band),
From each low tool of power, content receive
Those laws, their dreaded arms to Europe give.
Whose people (vain in want, in bondage blest;
Though plunder'd, gay; industrious, though opprest)

With happy follies rise above their fate,
The jest and envy of each wiser state.

Yet here the muses deign'd a while to sport
In the short sun-shine of a favouring court:
Here Boileau, strong in sense and sharp in wit,
Who, from the ancients, like the ancients writ,
Permission gain'd inferior vice to blame,
By flattering incense to his master's fame.
Here Moliere, first of comic wits, excell'd
Whate'er Athenian theatres beheld;
By keen, yet decent, satire skill'd to please,
With morals mirth uniting, strength with ease.
Now, charm'd, I hear the bold Corneille inspire
Heroic thoughts, with Shakspeare's force and fire!
Now sweet Racine, with milder influence, move
The soften'd heart to pity and to love.

With mingled pain and pleasure, I survey
The pompous works of arbitrary sway;
Proud palaces, that drain'd the subjects' store,
Rais'd on the ruins of the oppress'd and poor;

* Bp. Hough.

Where ev'n mute walls are taught to flatter state,
And painted triumphs style ambition GREAT *.
With more delight those pleasing shades I view,
Where Conde from an envious court withdrew †;
Where, sick of glory, faction, power, and pride,
(Sure judge how empty all, who all had tried!)
Beneath his palms the weary chief repos'd,
And life's great scene in quiet virtue clos'd.

With shame that other fam'd retreat I see,
Adorn'd by art, disgrac'd by luxury ‡:
Where Orleans wasted every vacant hour,
In the wild riot of unbounded power;
Where feverish debauch and impious love
Stain'd the mad table and the guilty grove.

With these amusements is thy friend detain'd,
Pleas'd and instructed in a foreign land;
Yet oft a tender wish recalls my mind
From present joys to dearer left behind?
O native isle, fair freedom's happiest seat!
At thought of thee, my bounding pulses beat;
At thought of thee, my heart impatient burns,
And all my country on my soul returns.
When shall I see thy fields, whose plenteous grain
No power can ravish from th' industrious swain?
When kifs, with pious love, the sacred earth
That gave a Burleigh or a Russell birth?
When, in the shade of laws, that long have stood,
Propt by their care, or strengthen'd by their blood,

Of fearless independence wisely vain,
The proudest slave of Bourbon's race disdain?

Yet, oh! what doubt, what sad presaging voice,
Whispers within, and bids me not rejoice;
Bids me contemplate every state around,
From sultry Spain to Norway's icy bound;
Bids their lost rights, their ruin'd glories see;
And tells me, these, like England, once were free!

TO MR. POYNTZ,

AMBASSADOR AT THE CONGRESS OF SOISSONS,
IN 1728.

Written at Paris.

O THOU, whose friendship is my joy and pride,
Whose virtues warm me, and whose precept guide;

Thou to whom greatness, rightly understood,
Is but a larger power of being good;
Say, Poyntz, amidst the toil of anxious state,
Does not thy secret soul desire retreat?
Dost thou not wish (the task of glory done)
Thy busy life at length might be thy own;
That, to thy lov'd philosophy resign'd,
No care might ruffle thy unbended mind?
Just is the wish. For sure the happiest meed,
To favour'd man by smiling heaven decreed,
Is, to reflect at ease on glorious pains,
And calmly to enjoy what virtue gains.

Not him I praise, who, from the world retir'd,
By no enlivening generous passion fir'd,

the galleries of Versailles.*

‡ St. Cloud.

On flowery couches slumbers life away,
 And gently bids his active powers decay;
 Who fears bright glory's awful face to see,
 And shuns renown as much as infamy.
 But blest is he, who, exercis'd in cares,
 To private leisure public virtue bears;
 Who tranquil ends the race he nobly run,
 And decks repose with trophies labour won.
 Him honour follows to the secret shade,
 And crowns propitious his declining head;
 In his retreats their harps the muses string,
 For him in lays unbought spontaneous sing;
 Friendship and truth on all his moments wait.
 Pleas'd with retirement better than with state;
 And round the bower, where humbly great he lies,

Fair olives bloom, or verdant laurels rise.

So when thy country shall no more demand
 The needful aid of thy sustaining hand;
 When peace restor'd shall, on her downy wing,
 Secure repose and careless leisure bring;
 Then, to the shades of learned ease retir'd,
 The world forgetting, by the world admir'd,
 Among thy books and friends, thou shalt possess
 Contemplative and quiet happiness:
 Pleas'd to review a life in honour spent,
 And painful merit paid with sweet content.
 Yet, though thy hours unclogg'd with sorrow roll,
 Though wisdom calm, and science feed thy soul,
 One dearer bliss remains to be possess'd,
 That only can improve and crown the rest.—

Permit thy friend this secret to reveal,
 Which thy own heart perhaps would better tell;
 The point to which our sweetest passions move
 Is, to be truly lov'd, and fondly love.
 This is the charm that smooths the troubled breast,
 Friend of our health, and author of our rest:
 Bids every gloomy vexing passion fly,
 And tunes each jarring string to harmony.
 Ev'n while I write, the name of love inspires
 More pleasing thoughts, and more enlivening fires;
 Beneath his power my raptur'd fancy glows,
 And every tender verse more sweetly flows.
 Dull is the privilege of living free;
 Our hearts were never form'd for liberty:
 Some beauteous image, well imprinted there,
 Can best defend them from consuming care.
 In vain to groves and gardens we retire,
 And nature in her rural works admire;
 Though grateful these, yet these but faintly charm;
 They may delight us, but can never warm.
 May some fair eyes, my friend, thy bosom fire
 With pleasing pangs of ever-gay desire;
 And teach thee that soft science, which alone
 Still to thy searching mind rests slightly known!
 Thy soul, though great, is tender and refin'd,
 To friendship sensible, to love inclin'd,
 And therefore long thou canst not arm thy breast
 Against the entrance of so sweet a guest.
 Hear what th' inspiring muses bid me tell,
 For heaven shall ratify what they reveal:

“ A chosen bride shall in thy arms be plac'd,
 “ With all th' attractive charms of beauty grac'd,
 “ Whose wit and virtue shall thy own express,
 “ Distinguish'd only by their softer dress:

“ Thy greatness she, or thy retreat, shall share;
 “ Sweeten tranquillity, or soften care;
 “ Her smiles the taste of every joy shall raise,
 “ And add new pleasure to renown and praise;
 “ Till charm'd you own the truth my verse would “ prove,
 “ That happiness is near allied to love.”

VERSES

To be written under a Picture of Mr. Poyntz.

SUCH is thy form, O Poyntz, but who shall find
 A hand, or colours, to express thy mind?
 A mind unmov'd by every vulgar fear,
 In a false world that dares to be sincere;
 Wise without art; without ambition great;
 Though firm, yet pliant; active, though sedate;
 With all the richest stores of learning fraught,
 Yet better still by native prudence taught;
 That, fond the griefs of the distressed to heal,
 Can pity frailties it could never feel;
 That, when misfortune sued, ne'er sought to know
 What sect, what party, whether friend or foe;
 That, fix'd on equal virtue's temperate laws,
 Despises calumny, and shuns applause;
 That, to its own perfections singly blind,
 Would for another think this praise design'd.

AN EPISTLE TO MR. POPE.

FROM ROME, 1730.

IMMORTAL bard! for whom each muse has wove
 The fairest garlands of th' Aonian grove;
 Preserv'd our drooping genius to restore,
 When Addison and Congreve are no more;
 After so many stars extinct in night,
 The darken'd age's last remaining light!
 To thee from Latian realms this verse is writ,
 Inspir'd by memory of ancient wit; [boast,
 For now no more these climes their influence
 Fall'n is their glory, and their virtue lost;
 From tyrants, and from priests, the muses fly,
 Daughters of reason and of liberty!
 Nor Baiae now nor Umbria's plain they love,
 Nor on the banks of Nar or Mincio rove;
 To Thames's flowery borders they retire,
 And kindle in thy breast the Roman fire.
 So in the shades, where, cheer'd with summer rays,
 Melodious linnets warbled sprightly lays,
 Soon as the faded, falling leaves complain
 Of gloomy winter's un auspicious reign,
 No tuneful voice is heard of joy or love,
 But mournful silence saddens all the grove.

Unhappy Italy! whose alter'd state
 Has felt the worst severity of fate:
 Not that barbarian hands her fasces broke,
 And bow'd her haughty neck beneath their yoke;
 Nor that her palaces to earth are thrown,
 Her cities desert, and her fields unsown;
 But that her ancient spirit is decay'd,
 That sacred wisdom from her bounds is fled;
 That there the source of science flows no more,
 Whence its rich streams supplied the world before.
 Illustrious names! that once in Latium shin'd,
 Born to instruct, and to command mankind;

Chiefs, by whose virtue mighty Rome was rais'd,
And poets, who those chiefs sublimely prais'd;
Oft I the traces you have left explore,
Your ashes visit, and your urns adore;
Oft kifs, with lips devout, some mouldering stone,
With ivy's venerable shade o'ergrown;
Those horrid ruins better pleas'd to see
Than all the pomp of modern luxury.

As late on Virgil's tomb fresh flowers I strow'd,
While with th' inspiring muse my bosom glow'd,
Crown'd with eternal bays, my ravish'd eyes
Beheld the poet's awful form arise:

" Stranger, he said, whose pious hand has paid
These grateful rites to my attentive shade,
When thou shalt breathe thy happy native air,
To Pope this message from his master bear:
Great bard, whose numbers I myself inspire,
To whom I gave my own harmonious lyre,
If, high exalted on the throne of wit,
Near me and Homer thou aspire to sit,
No more let meaner satire dim the rays
That flow majestic from thy nobler bays;
In all the flowery paths of Pindus stray,
But shun that thorny, that unpleasing way;
Nor, when each soft engaging muse is thine,
Address the least attractive of the nine.
Of thee more worthy were thy task, to raise
A lasting column to thy country's praise;
To sing the land, which yet alone can boast
That liberty corrupted Rome has lost;
Where science in the arms of peace is laid,
And plants her palm beneath the olive's shade.
Such was the theme for which my lyre I strung,
Such was the people whose exploits I sung;
Brave, yet refin'd, for arms and arts renown'd,
With different bays by Mars and Phœbus
crown'd;
Dauntless opposers of tyrannic sway,
But pleas'd a mild Augustus to obey.
If these commands submissive thou receive,
Immortal and unblam'd thy name shall live,
Envy to black Cocytus shall retire;
And howl with furies in tormenting fire;
Approving time shall consecrate thy lays,
And join the patriot's to the poet's praise."

TO LORD HERVEY.

IN THE YEAR 1730. FROM WORCESTERSHIRE.

" Strenua nos exercet inertia : navibus atque [est ;
" Quadrigis petimus bene vivere : quod petis, hic
" Est ulubris, animus si te non deficit æquus."

HOR.

FAVOURITE of Venus and the tuneful nine,
Pollio, by Nature form'd in courts to shine,
Wilt thou once more a kind attention lend,
To thy long absent and forgotten friend;
Who, after seas and mountains wander'd o'er,
Return'd at length to his own native shore,
From all that's gay retir'd, and all that's great,
Beneath the shades of his paternal seat.
Has found that happiness he sought in vain
On the fam'd banks of Tiber and of Seine?

'Tis not to view the well-proportion'd pile,
The charms of Titian's and of Raphael's style;

VOL. X.

At soft Italian sounds to melt away;
Or in the fragrant groves of myrtle stray;
That lulls the tumults of the soul to rest,
Or makes the fond possessor truly blest.
In our own breasts the source of pleasure lies,
Still open, and still flowing to the wise;
Not forc'd by toilsome art and wild desire
Beyond the bounds of nature to aspire,
But, in its proper channels gliding fair;
A common benefit, which all may share.
Yet half mankind this easy good disdain,
Nor relish happiness unbought by pain;
False is their taste of bliss, and thence their search is vain.

So idle, yet so restless, are our minds,
We climb the Alps, and brave the raging winds;
Through various toils to seek content we roam,
Which with but thinking right were ours at home.
For not the ceaseless change of shifted place
Can from the heart a settled grief erase,
Nor can the purer balm of foreign air
Heal the distemper'd mind of aking care.
The wretch, by wild impatience driven to rove,
Vext with the pangs of ill-requited love,
From pole to pole the fatal arrow bears,
Whose rooted point his bleeding bosom tears;
With equal pain each different clime he tries,
And is himself that torment which he flies.

For how should ills, which from our passions
flow,

Be chang'd by Afric's heat, or Russia's snow?
Or how can aught but powerful reason cure
What front unthinking folly we endure?
Happy is he, and he alone, who knows
His heart's uneasy discord to compose;
In generous love of others good, to find
The sweetest pleasures of the social mind;
To bound his wishes in their proper sphere;
To nourish pleasing hope, and conquer anxious fear;
This was the wisdom ancient sages taught,
This was the sovereign good they justly sought;
This to no place or climate is confin'd,
But the free native produce of the mind.

Nor think, my lord, that courts to you deny
The useful practice of philosophy:
Horace, the wisest of the tuneful choir,
Not always chose from greatness to retire;
But, in the palace of Augustus, knew
The same unerring maxims to pursue,
Which, in the Sabine or the Velian shade,
His study and his happiness he made.

May you, my friend, by his example taught,
View all the giddy scene with sober thought;
Undazzled every glittering folly see,
And in the midst of slavish forms be free;
In its own centre keep your steady mind,
Let prudence guide you, but let honour bind.
In show, in manners, act the courtier's part,
But be a country gentleman at heart.

ADVICE TO A LADY.

M.DCC.XXXI.

THE counsels of a friend, Pelinda, hear,
Too roughly kind to please a lady's ear,

R

Unlike the flatteries of a lover's pen,
Such truths as women seldom learn from men.
Nor think I praise you ill, when thus I show
What female vanity might fear to know.
Some merit's mine, to dare to be sincere;
But greater yours, sincerity to bear.

Hard is the fortune that your sex attends;
Women, like princes, find few real friends:
All who approach them their own ends pursue;
Lovers and ministers are seldom true.
Hence oft from reason heedless beauty strays,
And the most trusted guide the most betrays!
Hence, by fond dreams of fancied power amus'd,
When most ye tyrannize, you're most abus'd.

What is your sex's earliest, latest care,
Your heart's supreme ambition?—To be fair.
For this, the toilet every thought employs,
Hence all the toils of dress, and all the joys:
For this, hands, lips, and eyes, are put to school,
And each instructed feature has its rule:
And yet how few have learnt, when this is given,

Not to disgrace the partial boon of heaven!
How few with all their pride of form can move!
How few are lovely, that are made for love!
Do you, my fair, endeavour to possess
An elegance of mind as well as dress;
Be that your ornament, and know to please
By graceful nature's unaffected ease.

Nor make to dangerous wit a vain pretence,
But wisely rest content with modest sense;
For wit, like wine, intoxicates the brain,
Too strong for feeble woman to sustain:
Of those who claim it more than half have none;
And half of those who have it are undone.

Be still superior to your sex's arts,
Nor think dishonesty a proof of parts:
For you, the plainest is the wisest rule:
A cunning woman is a knavish fool.

Be good yourself, nor think another's shame
Can raise your merit, or adorn your fame.
Prudes rail at whores, as statesmen in disgrace
At ministers, because they wish their place.
Virtue is amiable, mild, serene;
Without, all beauty; and all peace within:
The honour of a prude is rage and storm,
'Tis ugliness in its most frightful form.
Fiercely it stands, defying gods and men,
As fiery monsters guard a giant's den.

Seek to be good, but aim not be great:
A woman's noblest station is retreat:
Her fairest virtues fly from public sight,
Domestic worth, that shuns too strong a light.

To rougher man ambition's task resign:
'Tis ours in senates or in courts to shine;
To labour for a sunk corrupted state,
Or dare the rage of envy, and be great.
One only care your gentle breasts should move,
Th' important business of your life is love;
To this great point direct your constant aim,
This makes your happiness, and this your fame.

Be never cool reserve with passion join'd;
With caution choose; but then be fondly kind.
The selfish heart, that but by halves is given,
Shall find no place in love's delightful heaven;

Here sweet extremes alone can truly bless:
The virtue of a lover is excess.

A maid unask'd may own a well-plac'd flame;
Not loving first, but loving wrong, is shame.

Contemn the little pride of giving pain,
Nor think that conquest justifies disdain.
Short is the period of insulting power:
Offended Cupid finds his vengeful hour;
Soon will resume the empire which he gave,
And soon the tyrant shall become the slave.

Blest is the maid, and worthy to be blest,
Whose soul, entire by him she loves possess,
Feels every vanity in fondness lost,
And asks no power but that of pleasing most:
Here is the bliss, in just return, to prove
The honest warmth of undissembled love;
For her, inconstant man might cease to range,
And gratitude forbid desire to change.

But, lest harsh care the lover's peace destroy,
And roughly blight the tender buds of joy,
Let reason teach what passion vain would hide,
That Hymen's bands by prudence should be tied,
Venus in vain the wedded pair would crown,
If angry fortune on their union frown:
Soon will the flattering dream of bliss be o'er,
And cloy'd imagination cheat no more.

Then, waking to the sense of lasting pain,
With mutual tears the nuptial couch they stain;
And that fond love, which should afford relief,
Does but increase the anguish of their grief:
While both could easier their own sorrows bear,
Than the sad knowledge of each other's care.

Yet may you rather feel that virtuous pain,
Than sell your violated charms for gain;
Than wed the wretch whom you despise or hate,
For the vain glare of useless wealth or state.
The most abandon'd prostitutes are they,
Who not to love, but avarice, fall a prey:
Nor aught avails the specious name of wife;
A maid so wedded is a whore for life.

Ev'n in the happiest choice, where favouring
heaven
Has equal love and easy fortune given,
Think not, the husband gain'd, that all is done:
The prize of happiness must still be won:
And oft, the careless find it to their cost,
The lover in the husband may be lost;
The graces might alone his heart allure;
They and the virtues meeting must secure.

Let ev'n your prudence wear the pleasing dress
Of care for him, and anxious tenderness.
From kind concern about his weal or woe,
Let each domestic duty seem to flow.
The household sceptre if he bids you bear,
Make it your pride his servant to appear:
Endearing thus the common acts of life,
The mistress still shall charm him in the wife;
And wrinkled age shall unobserv'd come on,
Before his eye perceives one beauty gone:
Ev'n o'er your cold, your ever-sacred urn,
His constant flame shall unextinguish'd burn.

Thus I, Belinda, would your charms improve,
And form your heart to all the arts of love.
The task were harder, to secure my own—
Against the power of those already known:

For well you twist the secret chains that bind
 With gentle force the captivated mind,
 Skill'd every soft attraction to employ,
 Each flattering hope, and each alluring joy,
 I own your genius; and from you receive
 The rules of pleasing, which to you I give.

S O N G.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1732.

When Delia on the plain appears,
 Aw'd by a thousand tender fears,
 I would approach, but dare not move:
 Tell me, my heart, if this be love?

Whene'er she speaks, my ravish'd ear
 No other voice but hers can hear,
 No other wit but hers approve:
 Tell me, my heart, if this be love?

If she some other youth commend,
 Though I was once his fondest friend,
 His instant enemy I prove:
 Tell me, my heart, if this be love?

When she is absent, I no more
 Delight in all that pleas'd before,
 The clearest spring, or shadiest grove:
 Tell me, my heart, if this be love?

When, fond of power, of beauty vain,
 Her nets she spread for every swain,
 I strove to hate, but vainly strove:
 Tell me, my heart, if this be love?

S O N G.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1733.

The heavy hours are almost past
 That part my love and me:
 My longing eyes may hope at last
 Their only wish to see.

But how, my Delia, will you meet
 The man you've lost so long?
 Will love in all your pulses beat,
 And tremble on your tongue?

Will you in every look declare
 Your heart is still the same;
 And heal each idly-anxious care
 Our fears in absence frame?

Thus, Delia, thus I paint the scene,
 When shortly we shall meet;
 And try what yet remains between
 Of loitering time to cheat.

But, if the dream that soothes my mind
 Shall false and groundless prove;
 If I am doom'd at length to find
 You have forgot to love:

All I of Venus ask, is this;
 No more to let us join:
 But grant me here the flattering bliss,
 To die, and think you mine.

DAMON AND DELIA.

In Imitation of Horace and Lydia.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1732.

Damon.

TELL me, my Delia, tell me why
 My kindest, fondest looks you fly?
 What means this cloud upon your brow?
 Have I offended? Tell me how!—
 Some change has happen'd in your heart,
 Some rival there has stol'n a part;
 Reason these fears may disapprove:
 But yet I fear, because I love.

Delia.

First tell me, Damon, why to-day
 At Belvidera's feet you lay?
 Why with such warmth her charms you prais'd,
 And every trifling beauty rais'd,
 As if you meant to let me see
 Your flattery is not all for me?
 Alas! too well your sex I knew,
 Nor was so weak to think you true.

Damon.

Unkind! my falsehood to upbraid,
 When your own orders I obey'd;
 You bid me try, by this deceit,
 The notice of the world to cheat,
 And hide, beneath another name,
 The secret of our mutual flame.

Delia.

Damon, your prudence I confess,
 But let me wish it had been less;
 Too well the lover's part you play'd,
 With too much art your court you made;
 Had it been only art, your eyes
 Would not have join'd in the disguise.

Damon.

Ah! cease thus idly to molest
 With groundless fears thy virgin breast.
 While thus at fancied wrongs you grieve,
 To me a real pain you give.

Delia.

Though well I might your truth distrust,
 My foolish heart believes you just:
 Reason this faith may disapprove;
 But I believe, because I love.

O D E.

In Imitation of Pastor Fido.

("O primavera gioventu del anno.")

WRITTEN ABROAD IN 1729.

PARENT of blooming flowers and gay desires,
 Youth of the tender year, delightful spring,
 At whose approach, inspir'd with equal fires,
 The amorous nightingale and poet sing!

Again dost thou return, but not with thee
 Return the smiling hours I once possess;
 Blessings thou bring'st to others, but to me
 The sad remembrance that I once was blest.

R ij

Thy faded charms, which winter snatch'd away,
Renew'd in all their former lustre shine;
But, ah! no more shall hapless I be gay,
Or know the vernal joys that have been mine
Though linnets sing, though flowers adorn the green, [bear:
Though on their wings soft zephyrs fragrance
Harsh is the music, joyless is the scene,
The odour faint: for Delia is not there.

Cheerless and cold I feel the genial sun,
From thee while absent I in exile rove;
Thy lovely presence, fairest light, alone
Can warm my heart to gladness and to love.

PARTS OF AN ELEGY OF TIBULUS.

TRANSLATED, 1729-30.

("Divitias alius fulvo sibi congerat auro.")

LET others heap of wealth a shining store,
And, much possessing, labour still for more;
Let them, disquieted with dire alarms,
Aspire to win a dangerous fame in arms;
Me tranquil poverty shall lull to rest,
Humbly secure, and indolently blest;
Warm'd by the blaze of my own cheerful hearth,
I'll waste the wintery hours in social mirth;
In summer pleas'd attend to harvest toils,
In autumn press the vineyard's purple spoils,
And oft to Delia in my bosom bear
Some kid, or lamb, that wants its mother's care:
With her I'll celebrate each gladsome day,
When swains their sportive rites to Bacchus pay:
With her new milk on Pales' altar pour,
And deck with ripen'd fruits Pomona's bower.
At night, how soothing would it be to hear,
Safe in her arms, the tempest howling near;
Or, while the wintery clouds their deluge pour,
Slumber assisted by the beating shower!
Ah! how much happier, than the fool who braves,
In search of wealth, the black tempestuous waves!
While I, contented with my little store,
In tedious voyage seek no distant shore;
But, idly lolling on some shady seat,
Near cooling fountains shun the dog-star's heat:
For what reward so rich could fortune give,
That I by absence should my Delia grieve?
Let Great Meffalla shine in martial toils,
And grace his palace with triumphal spoils;
Me beauty holds, in strong though gentle chains,
Far from tumultuous war and dusty plains.
With thee, my love, to pass my tranquil days,
How would I slight ambition's painful praise!
How would I joy with thee, my love, to yoke
The ox, and feed my solitary flock!
On thy soft breast might I but lean my head,
How downy should I think the woodland bed!

The wretch, who sleeps not by his fair-one's Detests the gilded couch's useless pride, [side,
Nor knows his weary, weeping eyes to close,
Though murmuring rills invite him to repose.
Hard were his heart, who thee, my fair, could leave

For all the honours prosperous war can give;

Though through the vanquish'd east he spread his fame,
And Parthian tyrants tremble at his name;
Though, bright in arms, while hosts around him
bleed,

With martial pride he prest his foaming steed.
No pomps like these my humble vows require;
With thee I'll live, and in thy arms expire.
Thee may my closing eyes in death behold!
Thee may my faltering hand yet strive to hold!
Then, Delia then, thy heart will melt in woe,
Then o'er my breathless clay thy tears will flow;
Thy tears will flow, for gentle is thy mind,
Nor dost thou think it weakness to be kind.
But, ah! fair mourner, I conjure thee, spare
Thy heaving breasts and loose dishevell'd hair:
Wound not thy form; lest on th' Elysian coast
Thy anguish should disturb my peaceful ghost.

But now nor death nor parting should employ
Our sprightly thoughts, or damp our bridal joy:

We'll live, my Delia; and from life remove
All care, all business, but delightful love.
Old age in vain those pleasures would retrieve
Which youth alone can taste, alone can give;
Then let us snatch the moment to be blest,
This hour is love's—be fortune's all the rest.

S O N G.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1732.

SAY, Myra, why is gentle love
A stranger to that mind,
Which pity and esteem can move
Which can be just and kind?

Is it, because you fear to share
The ills that love molest;
The jealous doubt, the tender care,
That rack the amorous breast?

Alas! by some degree of woe
We every bliss must gain:
The heart can ne'er a transport know,
That never feels a pain.

VERSES,

Written at Mr. Pope's House at Twickenham, which he had lent to Mrs. Greville.

IN AUGUST 1735.

Go, Thames, and tell the busy town,
Not all its wealth or pride
Could tempt me from the charms that crown
Thy rural flowery side:

Thy flowery side, where Pope has plac'd
The muse's green retreat,
With every smile of nature grac'd,
With every art complete,

But now, sweet bard, thy heavenly song
Enchants us here no more;
Their darling glory lost too long
Thy once-lov'd shades deplore,

Yet still, for beauteous Greville's sake,
The muse's here remain;
Greville, whose eyes have power to make
A Pope of every swain.

EPIGRAM.

NONE without hope e'er lov'd the brightest fair:
But love can hope, where reason would despair.

TO MR. WEST, AT WICKHAM*.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1740.

FAIR nature's sweet simplicity,
With elegance refin'd,
Well in thy seat, my friend, I see,
But better in thy mind.

To both, from courts and all their state,
Eager I fly, to prove
Joys far above a courtier's fate,
Tranquillity and love.

TO MISS LUCY FORTESCUE.

ONCE, by the muse alone inspir'd
I sung my amorous strains:
No serious love my bosom fir'd;
Yet every tender maid, deceiv'd,
The idly-mournful tale believ'd,
And wept my fancied pains.

But Venus now, to punish me
For having feign'd so well,
Has made my heart so fond of thee,
That not the whole Aonian choir
Can accents soft enough inspire,
Its real flame to tell.

TO THE SAME;

WITH HAMMOND'S ELEGIES.

ALL that of love can be express'd,
In these soft numbers see;
But, Lucy, would you know the rest,
It must be read in me.

TO THE SAME.

To him who in an hour must die,
Not swifter seems that hour to fly,
Than flow the minutes seem to me,
Which keep me from the sight of thee.

Not more that trembling wretch would give,
Another day or year to live;
Than I to shorten what remains
Of that long hour which thee detains

Oh! come to my impatient arms,
Oh! come, with all thy heavenly charms,
At once to justify and pay
The pain I feel from this delay.

* See the Inscriptions in Mr. West's Poems.

TO THE SAME.

To ease my troubled mind of anxious care,
Last night the secret casket I explor'd,
Where all the letters of my absent fair
His richest treasure careful love had stor'd.

In every word a magic spell I found
Of power to charm each busy thought to rest;
Though every word increas'd the tender wound
Of fond desire still throbbing in my breast.

So to his hoarded gold the miser steals,
And loses every sorrow at the sight;
Yet wishes still for more, nor ever feels
Entire contentment, or secure delight

Ah! should I lose thee, my too lovely maid,
Couldst thou forget thy heart was ever mine,
Fear not thy letters should the change upbraid;
My hand each dear memorial shall resign:

Not one kind word shall in my power remain,
A painful witness of reproach to thee;
And lest my heart should still their sense retain,
My heart shall break, to leave thee wholly free.

A PRAYER TO VENUS,

IN HER TEMPLE AT STOWE.

To the same.

FAIR Venus, whose delightful shrine surveys
Its front reflected in the silver lake,
These humble offerings, which thy servant pays,
Fresh flowers, and myrtle wreaths, propitious take.

If less my love exceeds all other love,
Than Lucy's charms all other charms excel,
Far from my breast each soothing hope remove,
And there let sad despair for ever dwell.

But if my soul is fill'd with her alone;
No other wish nor other object knows:
Oh! make her, goddess, make her all my own,
And give my trembling heart secure repose!

No watchful spies I ask, to guard her charms,
No walls of brass, no steel-defended door:
Place her but once within my circling arms,
Love's surest fort, and I will doubt no more.

TO THE SAME.

ON HER PLEADING WANT OF TIME.

ON Thames's bank, a gentle youth
For Lucy sigh'd, with matchless truth,
Ev'n when he sigh'd in rhyme;
The lovely maid his flame return'd,
And would with equal warmth have burn'd,
But that she had not time.

Oft he repair'd with eager feet
In secret shades his fair to meet,
Beneath th' accustom'd lime:

She would have fondly met him there,
And heal'd with love each tender care,
But that she had not time.

"It was not thus, inconstant maid!
"You acted once," (the shepherd said)
"When love was in its prime:"
She griev'd to hear him thus complain;
And would have writ to ease his pain,
But that she had not time.

How can you act so cold a part?
No crime of mine has chang'd your heart,
If love be not a crime.—
We soon must part for months, for years—
She would have answer'd with her tears,
But that she had not time.

TO THE SAME.

Your shape, your lips, your eyes, are still the same,
Still the bright object of my constant flame;
But where is now the tender glance, that stole,
With gentle sweetness, my enchanted soul?
Kind fears, impatient wishes, soft desires,
Each melting charm that love alone inspires?
These, these are lost; and I behold no more
The maid, my heart delighted to adore.
Yet, still unchang'd, still doating to excess,
I ought, but dare not try, to love you less;
Weakly I grieve, unpitied I complain;
But not unpunish'd shall your change remain;
For you, cold maid, whom no complaints can move,
Were far more blest, when you like me could love.

TO THE SAME.

When I think on your truth, I doubt you no more,
I blame all the fears I gave way to before:
I say to my heart, "Be at rest, and believe
"That whom once she has chosen she never will
"leave."

But, ah! when I think on each ravishing grace
That plays in the smiles of that heavenly face;
My heart beats again; I again apprehend
Some fortunate rival in every friend.

These painful suspicions you cannot remove,
Since you neither can lessen your charms nor my love:
But doubts caus'd by passion you never can blame;
For they are not ill-founded, or you feel the same.

TO THE SAME.

WITH A NEW WATCH.

With me while present may thy lovely eyes
Be never turn'd upon this golden toy:
Think every pleasing hour too swiftly flies;
And measure time, by joy succeeding joy!
But when the cares that interrupt our bliss
To me not always will thy sight allow;
Then oft with kind impatience look on this,
Then every minute count—as I do now.

AN IRREGULAR ODE.

Written at Wickham in 1746.

TO THE SAME.

Ye sylvan scenes with artless beauty gay,
Ye gentle shades of Wickham, say,
What is the charm that each successive year,
Which sees me with my Lucy here,
Can thus to my transported heart
A sense of joy unfelt before, impart?

Is it glad summer's balmy breath, that blows
From the fair jasmine and the blushing rose?
Her balmy breath, and all her blooming store
Of rural bliss, was here before:
Oft have I met her on the verdant side
Of Norwood-hill, and in the yellow meads,
Where Pan the dancing Graces leads,
Array'd in all her flowery pride.
No sweeter fragrance now the gardens yield,
No brighter colours paint th' enamel'd field.

Is it to love these new delights I owe?
Four times has the revolving sun
His annual circle through the zodiac run;
Since all that love's indulgent power
On favour'd mortals can bestow,
Was given to me in this auspicious bower.

Here first my Lucy, sweet in virgin charms,
Was yielded to my longing arms;
And round our nuptial bed,
Hovering with purple wings, th' Italian boy
Shook from his radiant torch the blissful fires
Of innocent desires,
While Venus scatter'd myrtles o'er her head.
Whence then this strange increase of joy?
He, only he, can tell, who, match'd like me,
(If such another happy man there be)
Has by his own experience tried
How much the wife is dearer than the bride.

TO THE MEMORY OF THE SAME LADY.

A Monody. A. D. 1747.

"Ipse cavà solans ægrum testudine amorem,
"Te dulcis conjux, te solo in littore secum,
"Te veniente die, te decedente canebat."

At length escap'd from every human eye,
From every duty, every care, [share,
That in my mournful thoughts might claim
Or force my tears their flowing stream to dry;
Beneath the gloom of this embowering shade,
This lone retreat, for tender sorrow made,
I now may give my burden'd heart relief,
And pour forth all my stores of grief;
Of grief surpassing every other woe,
Far as the purest bliss, the happiest love
Can on th' ennobled mind bestow,
Exceeds the vulgar joys that move
Our gross desires, inelegant and low.

Ye tufted-groves, ye gently-falling rills,
 Ye high o'ershadowing hills,
 Ye lawns gay-smiling with eternal green,
 Oft have you my Lucy seen!
 But never shall you now behold her more:
 Nor will she now with fond delight
 And taste refin'd your rural charms explore.
 Clos'd are those beauteous eyes in endless night,
 Those beauteous eyes where beaming us'd to shine
 Reason's pure light and virtue's spark divine.

Oft would the Dryads of these woods rejoice
 To hear her heavenly voice;
 For her despising, when she deign'd to sing,
 The sweetest songsters of the spring:
 The woodlark and the linnet pleas'd no more;
 The nightingale was mute,
 And every shepherd's flute
 Was cast in silent scorn away,
 While all attended to her sweeter lay.
 Ye larks and linnets, now resume your song
 And thou, melodious Philomel,
 Again thy plaintive story tell;
 For death has stopt that tuneful tongue,
 Whose music could alone your warbling notes excel.

In vain I look around
 O'er all the well-known ground,
 My Lucy's wonted footsteps to descry;
 Where oft we us'd to walk,
 Where oft in tender talk
 We saw the summer sun go down the sky;
 Nor by yon fountain's side,
 Nor where its waters glide
 Along the valley, can she now be found:
 In all the wide-stretch'd prospects ample bound
 No more my mournful eye
 Can aught of her espy,
 But the sad sacred earth where her dear relics lie.

O shades of Hagley, where is now your boast?
 Your bright inhabitant is lost.
 You she preferr'd to all the gay resorts
 Where female vanity might wish to shine,
 The pomp of cities, and the pride of courts.
 Her modest beauties shunn'd the public eye:
 To your sequester'd dales,
 And flower-embroider'd vales,
 From an admiring world she chose to fly:
 With nature there retir'd, and nature's God,
 The silent paths of wisdom trod,
 And banish'd every passion from her breast,
 But those, the gentlest and the best,
 Whose holy flames with energy divine
 The virtuous heart enliven and improve,
 The conjugal and the maternal love.

Sweet babes, who, like the little playful fawns,
 Were wont to trip along these verdant lawns
 By your delighted mother's side,
 Who now your infant steps shall guide?
 Ah! where is now the hand whose tender care
 To every virtue would have form'd your youth,
 And strew'd with flowers the thorny ways of truth?

O loss beyond repair!

O wretched father! left alone,
 To weep their dire misfortune, and thy own!
 How shall thy weaken'd mind, oppress'd with
 woe,

And drooping o'er thy Lucy's grave,
 Perform the duties that you doubly owe!
 Now she, alas! is gone,
 From folly and from vice their helpless age to save?

Where were ye, Muses, when relentless fate
 From these fond arms your fair disciple tore;
 From these fond arms, that vainly strove
 With hapless ineffectual love
 To guard her bosom from the mortal blow?
 Could not your favouring power, Aonian maids,
 Could not, alas! your power prolong her date,
 For whom so oft in these inspiring shades,
 Or under Camden's moss-clad mountains hoar,
 You open'd all your sacred store,
 What'er your ancient sages taught,
 Your ancient bards sublimely thought,
 And bade her raptur'd breast with all your spirit
 glow?

Nor then did Pindus or Castalia's plain,
 Or Aganippe's fount your steps detain,
 Nor in the Thespian vallies did you play;
 Nor then on * Mincio's bank
 Beset with osiers dank,
 Nor where † Clitumnus rolls his gentle stream,
 Nor where through hanging woods,
 Steep ‡ Anio pours his floods,
 Nor yet where § Meles or ¶ Ilissus stray.
 Ill does it now beseem,
 That, of your guardian care bereft,
 To dire disease and death your darling should be left.

Now what avails it that in early bloom,
 When light fantastic toys
 Are all her sex's joys,
 With you she search'd the wit of Greece and Rome;
 And all that in her latter days
 To emulate her ancient praise
 Italia's happy genius could produce;
 Or what the Gallic fire
 Bright sparkling could inspire,
 By all the Graces temper'd and refin'd;
 Or what in Britain's isle,
 Most favour'd with your smile,
 The powers of reason and of fancy join'd
 To full perfection have conspir'd to raise?
 Ah! what is now the use

* The Mincio runs by Mantua, the birth-place of Virgil.

† The Clitumnus is a river of Umbria, the residence of Propertius.

‡ The Anio runs through Tibur or Tivoli, where Horace had a villa.

§ The Meles is a river of Ionia, from whence Homer, supposed to be born on its banks, is called Melisigenes.

¶ The Ilissus is a river at Athens.

Of all these treasures that enrich her mind,
To black oblivion's gloom for ever now con-sign'd.

At least, ye nine, her spotless name
'Tis yours from death to save,
And in the temple of immortal fame
With golden characters her worth engrave.
Come then, ye virgin sisters, come,
And strew with choicest flowers her hal-
low'd tomb:
But foremost thou, in fable vestment clad,
With accents sweet and sad, [urn
Thou, plaintive muse, whom o'er his Laura's
Unhappy Petrarch call'd to mourn;
O come, and to this fairer Laura pay
A more impassion'd tear, a more pathetic lay.

Tell how each beauty of her mind and face
Was brighten'd by some sweet peculiar grace!
How eloquent in every look [spoke!
Through her expressive eyes her soul distinctly
Tell how her manners, by the world refin'd,
Left all the taint of modish vice behind,
And made each charm of polish'd courts agree
With candid truth's simplicity,
And uncorrupted innocence!
Tell how to more than manly sense
She join'd the softening influence
Of more than female tenderness:
How, in the thoughtless days of wealth and joy,
Which oft the care of others' good destroy,
Her kindly-melting heart
To every want and every woe,
To guilt itself when in distress,
The balm of pity would impart,
And all relief that bounty could bestow!
Ev'n for the kid or lamb that pour'd its life
Beneath the bloody knife,
Her gentle tears would fall,
Tears from sweet virtue's source, benevolent to all.

Not only good and kind,
But strong and elevated was her mind:
A spirit that with noble pride
Could look superior down
On fortune's smile or frown;
That could without regret or pain
To virtue's lowest duty sacrifice
Or interest or ambition's highest prize;
That, injur'd or offended, never tried
Its dignity by vengeance to maintain,
But by magnanimous disdain.
A wit that, temperately bright,
With inoffensive light
All pleasing shone; nor ever past
The decent bounds that wisdom's sober hand,
And sweet benevolence's mild command,
And bashful modesty, before it cast.
A prudence undeceiving, undeceiv'd,
That nor too little nor too much believ'd,
That scorn'd unjust suspicion's coward fear,
And without weakness knew to be sincere.
Such Lucy was, when, in her fairest days,
Amidst th' acclaim of universal praise,
In life's and glory's freshest bloom, [tomb.
Death came remorseless on, and sunk her to the

So, where the silent streams of Liris glide,
In the soft bosom of Campania's vale,
When now the wintery tempests all are fled,
And genial summer breathes her gentle gale,
The verdant orange lifts its beauteous head:
From every branch the balmy flowerets rise,
On every bough the golden fruits are seen;
With odours sweet it fills the smiling skies,
The wood-nymphs tend, and th' Idalian queen.
But, in the midst of all its blooming pride,
A sudden blast from Apenninus blows,

Cold with perpetual snows: [and dies.
The tender blighted plant shrinks up its leaves,

Arise, O Petrarch, from th' Elysian bowers,
With never-fading myrtles twin'd,
And fragrant with ambrosial flowers,
Where to thy Laura thou again art join'd;
Arise, and hither bring the silver lyre,
Tun'd by thy skilful hand,
To the soft notes of elegant desire,
With which o'er many a land
Was spread the fame of thy disastrous love;
To me resign the vocal shell,
And teach my sorrows to relate
Their melancholy tale so well,
As may ev'n things inanimate, [move.
Rough mountain oaks, and desert rocks, to pity

What were, alas! thy woes compar'd to mine?
To thee thy mistress in the blissful band
Of Hymen never gave her hand;
The joys of wedded love were never thine:
In thy domestic care
She never bore a share,
Nor with endearing art
Would heal thy wounded heart
Of every secret grief that fester'd there:
Nor did her fond affection on the bed
Of sickness watch thee, and thy languid head
Whole nights on her unwearied arm sustain,
And charm away the sense of pain:
Nor did she crown your mutual flame
With pledges dear, and with a father's tender
name.

O best of wives! O dearer far to me
Than when thy virgin charms
Were yielded to my arms,
How can my soul endure the loss of thee?
How in the world, to me a desert grown,
Abandon'd and alone,
Without my sweet companion can I live?
Without thy lovely smile,
The dear reward of every virtuous toil,
What pleasures now can pall'd ambition give?
Ev'n the delightful sense of well-earn'd praise,
Unshar'd by thee, no more my lifeless thoughts could raise.

For my distracted mind
What succour can I find?
On whom for consolation shall I call?
Support me every friend;
Your kind assistance lend,
To bear the weight of this oppressive woe.
Alas! each friend of mine,
My dear departed love, so much was thine,

That none has any comfort to bestow.
 My books, the best relief
 In every other grief,
 Are now with your idea sadden'd all :
 Each favourite author we together read
 My tortur'd memory wounds, and speaks of Lucy dead.

We were the happiest pair of human kind ;
 The rolling year its varying course perform'd,
 And back return'd again ;
 Another and another smiling came,
 And saw our happiness unchang'd remain :
 Still in her golden chain
 Harmonious concord did our wishes bind :
 Our studies, pleasures, taste, the same.
 O fatal, fatal stroke,
 That all this pleasing fabric love had rais'd
 Of rare felicity,
 On which ev'n wanton vice with envy gaz'd,
 And every scheme of bliss our hearts had form'd,
 With soothing hope, for many a future day,
 In one sad moment broke !—
 Yet, O my soul, thy rising murmurs stay ;
 Nor dare the all-wise Disposer to arraign,
 Or against his supreme decree
 With impious grief complain, [fade ;
 That all thy full-blown joys at once should
 Was his most righteous will—and be that will obey'd.

Would thy fond love his grace to her controul,
 And in these low abodes of sin and pain
 Her pure exalted soul
 Unjustly for thy partial good detain ?
 No—rather strive thy grovelling mind to raise
 Up to that unclouded blaze,
 That heavenly radiance of eternal light,
 In which enthron'd she now with pity sees
 How frail, how insecure, how flight,
 Is every mortal bliss ;
 Ev'n love itself, if rising by degrees
 Beyond the bounds of this imperfect state,
 Whose fleeting joys so soon must end,
 It does not to its sovereign good ascend.
 Rise then, my soul, with hope elate,
 And seek those regions of serene delight,
 Whose peaceful path and ever-open gate
 No feet but those of harden'd guilt shall miss.
 There death himself thy Lucy shall restore,
 There yield up all his pow'r ne'er to divide you
 more.

ON THE SAME LADY.

To the Memory of Lucy Lyttleton,
 Daughter of Hugh Fortescue of Filleigh,
 In the county of Devon, Esq.
 Father to the present Earl of Clinton,
 By Lucy his wife,
 The daughter of Matthew Lord Aylmer,
 Who departed this life the 19th of Jan. 1746-7.
 Aged twenty-nine,
 Having employed the short time assigned to her here
 In the uniform practice of religion and virtue.

Made to engage all hearts, and charm all eyes ;
 Though meek, magnanimous ; though witty, wise ;
 Polite, as all her life in courts had been ;
 Yet good, as she the world had never seen ;
 The noble fire of an exalted mind,
 With gentle female tenderness combin'd.
 Her speech was the melodious voice of love,
 Her song the warbling of the vernal grove ;
 Her eloquence was sweeter than her song,
 Soft as her heart, and as her reason strong ;
 Her form each beauty of her mind express'd,
 Her mind was virtue by the Graces dress'd.

HORACE, BOOK IV. ODE IV.

WRITTEN AT OXFORD, 1725 *.

“ Qualem ministrum fulminis alitem,” &c.

As the wing'd minister of thundering Jove,
 To whom he gave his dreadful bolts to bear,
 Faithful † assistant of his master's love,
 King of the wandering nations of the air,
 When balmy breezes fann'd the vernal sky,
 On doubtful pinions left his parent nest,
 In slight essays his growing force to try,
 While inborn courage fir'd his generous breast ;
 Then, darting with impetuous fury down,
 The flocks he slaughter'd, an unpractis'd foe ;
 Now his ripe valour to perfection grown
 The scaly snake and crested dragon know :

Or, as a lion's youthful progeny,
 Wean'd from his savage dam and milky food,
 The gazing kid beholds with fearful eye,
 Doom'd first to stain his tender fangs in blood :

Such Drusus, young in arms, his foes beheld,
 The Alpine Rhæti, long unmatched in fight :
 So were their hearts with abject terror quell'd ;
 So sunk their haughty spirit at the sight.

Tam'd by a boy, the fierce Barbarians find How guardian prudence guides the youthful flame,

And how great Cæsar's fond paternal mind
 Each generous Nero forms to early fame ;

A valiant son springs from a valiant sire :
 Their race by mettle sprightly couriers prove ;
 Nor can the warlike eagle's active fire
 Degenerate to form the timorous dove.

But education can the genius raise,
 And wise instructions native virtue aid ;
 Nobility without them is disgrace,
 And honour is by vice to shame betray'd.

Let red Metaurus, stain'd with Funic blood,
 Let mighty Asdrubal subdued, confess
 How much of empire and of fame is ow'd
 By thee, O Rome, to the Neronian race.

Of this be witness that auspicious day,
 Which, after a long, black, tempestuous night,

† In the rape of Ganymede, who was carried up
 Jupiter by an eagle, according to the Poetical History.

First smil'd on Latium with a milder ray, [light.
And cheer'd our drooping hearts with dawning
Since the dire African with wasteful ire
Rode o'er the ravag'd towns of Italy;
As through the pine-trees flies the raging fire,
Or Eurus o'er the vext Sicilian sea.

From this bright era, from this prosperous field,
The Roman glory dates her rising power;
From hence 'twas given her conquering sword to wield,
Raise her fall'n gods, and ruin'd shrines restore.

Thus Hannibal at length despairing spoke:

"Like stags to ravenous wolves an easy prey,
"Our feeble arms a valiant foe provoke,
"Whom to elude and 'scape were victory:
"A dauntless nation, that from Trojan fires,
"Hostile Ausonia, to thy destin'd shore
"Her gods, her infant sons, and aged fires,
"Through angry seas and adverse tempests bore:
"As on high Algidus the sturdy oak,
"Whose spreading boughs the axe's sharpness
"feel,
"Improves by loss, and, thriving with the stroke,
"Draws health and vigour from the wounding
"steel.

"Not Hydra sprouting from her mangled head,
"So tir'd the baffled force of Hercules;
"Nor Thebes, nor Colchis, such a monster bred,
"Pregnant of hills, and fam'd for prodigies.

"Plunge her in ocean like the morning sun,
"Brighter she rises from the depths below:
"To earth with unavailing ruin thrown,
"Recruits her strength, and foils the wonder-
"ing foe.

"No more of victory the joyful fame
"Shall from my camp to haughty Carthage fly;
"Lost, lost, are all the glories of her name!
"With Asdrubal her hopes and fortune die!

"What shall the Claudian valour not perform
"Which Power Divine guards with propitious
"care, [storm,
"Which wisdom fleers through all the dangerous
"Through all the rocks and shoals of doubtful
"war?"

VIRTUE AND FAME.

TO THE COUNTESS OF EGREMONT.

VIRTUE and Fame, the other day,
Happen'd to cross each other's way;
Said Virtue, "Hark ye! madam Fame,
"Your ladyship is much to blame;
"Jove bids you always wait on me,
"And yet your face I seldom see:
"The Paphian queen employs your trumpet,
"And bids it praise some handsome strumpet;
"Or thundering through the ranks of war,
"Ambition ties you to her car."
Saith Fame, "Dear madam, I protest,
"I never find myself so blest

"As when I humbly wait behind you!
"But 'tis so mighty hard to find you!
"In such obscure retreats you lurk!
"To seek you is an endless work."
"Well," answer'd Virtue, "I allow "Your plea. But hear, and mark me now.
"I know (without offence to others)
"I know the best of wives and mothers;
"Who never pass'd an useless day
"In scandal, gossiping, or play:
"Whose modest wit, chastis'd by sense,
"Is lively cheerful innocence;
"Whose heart nor envy knows, nor spite,
"Whose duty is her sole delight;
"Nor rul'd by whim, nor slave to fashion,
"Her parents joy, her husband's passion."
Fame smil'd and answer'd, "On my life,
"This is some country parson's wife,
"Who never saw the court nor town,
"Whose face is homely as her gown;
"Who banquets upon eggs and bacon—"
"No, madam, no—you're much mistaken—
"I beg you'll let me set you right—
"'Tis one with every beauty bright;
"Adorn'd with every polish'd art
"That rank or fortune can impart;
"'Tis the most celebrated toast
"That Britain's spacious isle can boast;
"'Tis princely Petworth's noble dame;
"'Tis Egremont—Go, tell it, Fame."

ADDITION EXTEMPORE,

BY EARL HARDWICKE.

FAME heard with pleasure—strait replied,
"First on my roll stands Wyndham's bride;
"My trumpet oft I've rais'd, to sound
"Her modest praise the world around!
"But notes were wanting—Canst thou find
"A muse to sing her face, her mind?
"Believe me, I can name but one,
"A friend of yours—'tis Lyttleton."

LETTER TO EARL HARDWICKE:

OCCASIONED BY THE FOREGOING VERSES.

MY LORD,

A THOUSAND thanks to your Lordship for your addition to my verses. If you can write such extempore, it is well for other poets, that you chose to be Lord Chancellor, rather than a Laureat.
They explain to me a vision I had the night before.

METHOUGHT I saw before my feet,
With countenance serene and sweet,
The muse, who, in my youthful days,
Had oft inspir'd my careless lays.
She smil'd, and said, "Once more I see
"My fugitive return to me;
"Long had I lost you from my bower,
"You scorn'd to own my gentle power;
"With me no more your genius sported,
"The grave historic muse you courted;
"Or, rais'd from earth, with streaming eyes;
"Pursued Urania through the skies;

" But now, to my forsaken track,
 " Fair Egremont has brought you back :
 " Nor blush, by her and virtue led,
 " That soft, that pleasing path to tread ;
 " For there, beneath to-morrow's ray,
 " Ev'n wisdom's self shall deign to play,
 " Lo ! to my flowery groves and springs
 " Her favourite son the goddess brings,
 " The council's and the senate's guide :
 " Law's oracle, the nation's pride :
 " He comes, he joys with thee to join,
 " In singing Wyndham's charms divine :
 " To thine he adds his nobler lays ;
 " Ev'n thee, my friend, he deigns to praise.
 " Enjoy that praise, nor envy Pitt
 " His fame with burgeses or with cit ;
 " For sure one line from such a bard,
 " Virtue would think her best reward."

HYMEN TO ELIZA.

MADAM, before your feet I lay
 This ode upon your wedding-day,
 The first indeed I ever made,
 For writing odes is not my trade :
 My head is full of household cares,
 And necessary dull affairs ;
 Besides that sometimes jealous frumps
 Will put me into doleful dumps.
 And then no clown beneath the sky
 Was e'er more ungallant than I ;
 For you alone I now think fit
 To turn a poet and a wit—
 For you whose charms, I know not how,
 Have power to smooth the wrinkled brow,
 And make me, though by nature stupid,
 As brisk, and as alert as Cupid.
 These obligations to repay,
 Whene'er your happy nuptial day
 Shall with the circling years return,
 For you my torch shall brighter burn
 Than you first my power ador'd,
 Nor will I call myself your lord,
 But am, (as witness this my hand)
 Your humble servant at command.

HYMEN.

Dear child, let Hymen not beguile
 You, who are such a judge of style,
 To think that he these verses made,
 Without an abler penman's aid ;
 Observe them well, you'll plainly see,
 That every line was writ by me.

CUPID

ON READING

MISS CARTER'S POEMS IN MANUSCRIPT.

SUCH were the notes that struck the wondering ear
 Of silent night, when, on the verdant banks
 Of Siloë's hallow'd brook, celestial harps,
 According to seraphic voices, sung
Glory to God on high, and on the earth
Peace and good-will to men !—Resume the lyre,
 Chauntress divine, and every Briton call
 Its melody to hear—so shall thy strains,

More powerful than the song of Orpheus, tame
 The savage heart of brutal vice, and bend
 At pure religion's shrine the stubborn knees
 Of bold impiety.—Greece shall no more
 Of Lesbian Sappho boast, whose wanton muse,
 Like a false Syren, while she charm'd, seduc'd
 To guilt and ruin. For the sacred head
 Of Britain's poetess, the virtues twine
 A nobler wreath, by them from Eden's grove
 Unfading gather'd, and direct the hand
 Of ——— to fix it on her brows.

MOUNT EDGECUMBE.

THE gods, on thrones celestial seated,
 By Jove with bowls of nectar heated,
 All on Mount Edgcombe turn'd their eyes ;
 " That place is mine," great Neptune cries :
 " Behold ! how proud o'er all the main
 " Those stately turrets seem to reign !
 " No views so grand on earth you see !
 " The master too belongs to me :
 " I grant him my domain to share,
 " I bid his hand my trident bear."
 " The sea is your's, but mine the land," Pallas replies ; " by me were plann'd
 " Those towers, that hospital, those docks,
 " That fort, which crown those island rocks :
 " The lady too is of my choir,
 " I taught her hand to touch the lyre ;
 " With every charm her mind I grac'd,
 " I gave her prudence, knowledge, taste."
 " Hold, madam," interrupted Venus,
 " The lady must be shar'd between us :
 " And surely mine is yonder grove,
 " So fine, so dark, so fit for love ;
 " Trees, such as in th' Idalian glade,
 " Or Cyprian lawn, my palace shade."
 Then Oreads, Dryads, Naiads, came ;
 Each nymph alleg'd her lawful claim.
 But Jove, to finish the debate,
 Thus spoke, and what he speaks is fate :
 " Nor god nor goddess, great or small,
 " That dwelling his or hers may call ;
 " I made Mount Edgcombe for you all."

INVITATION.

TO THE DOWAGER DUCHESS D'AIGUILLON.

WHEN peace shall, on her downy wing,
 To France and England friendship bring,
 Come, Aiguillon, and here receive
 That homage we delight to give
 To foreign talents, foreign charms,
 To worth which envy's self disarms
 Of jealous hatred : Come and love
 That nation which you now approve.
 So shall by France amends be made
 (If such a debt can e'er be paid)
 For having with seducing art
 From Britain stol'n her Hervey's heart.

TO COLONEL DRUMGOLD.

DRUMGOLD, whose ancestors from Albion's shore
 Their conquering standards to Hiberna bore,

Though now thy valour, to thy country lost,
 Shines in the foremost ranks of Gallia's host,
 Think not that France shall borrow all thy fame—
 From British fires deriv'd thy genius came:
 Its force its energy, to these it ow'd,
 But the fair polish Gallia's clime bestow'd:
 The Graces there each ruder thought refin'd,
 And liveliest wit with soundest sense combin'd.
 They taught in sportive Fancy's gay attire
 To dress the gravest of th' Aonian choir,
 And gave to sober Wisdom's wrinkled cheek
 The smile that dwells in Hebe's dimple fleck.
 Pay to each realm the debt that each may ask:
 Be thine, and thine alone, the pleasing task,
 In purest elegance of Gallic phrase
 To clothe the spirit of the British lays.
 Thus every flower which every muse's hand
 Has rais'd profuse in Britain's favourite land,
 By thee transplanted to the banks of Seine,
 Its sweetest native odours shall retain.
 And when thy noble friend, with olive crown'd,
 In concord's golden chain has firmly bound
 The rival nations, thou for both shalt raise
 The grateful song to his immortal praise.
 Albion shall think she hears her Prior sing;
 And France, that Boileau strikes the tuneful string,
 Then shalt thou tell what various talents join'd,
 Adorn, embellish, and exalt his mind;
 Learning and wit, with sweet politeness grac'd;
 Wisdom by guile or cunning undebas'd;
 By pride unfullied, genuine dignity;
 A nobler and sublime simplicity.
 Such in thy verse shall Nivernois be shown:
 France shall with joy the fair resemblance own;
 And Albion sighing bid her sons aspire
 To imitate the merit they admire.

EPITAPH ON CAPTAIN GRENVILLE; *

KILLED IN LORD ANSON'S ENGAGEMENT IN 1747.

YE weeping Muses, Graces, Virtues, tell
 If, since your all-accomplish'd Sydney fell,
 You, or afflicted Britain, e'er deplor'd
 A loss like that these plaintive lays record!
 Such spotless honour; such ingenious truth,
 Such ripen'd wisdom in the bloom of youth!
 So mild, so gentle, so compos'd a mind,
 To such heroic warmth and courage join'd;
 He, too, like Sydney, nurs'd in Learning's arms,
 For nobler war forsook her softer charms:
 Like him, possess'd of ev'ry pleasing art,
 The secret wish of every female's heart:
 Like him, cut off in youthful glory's pride,
 He, unrepining, for his country dy'd.

* These verses having been originally written when the Author was in Opposition, concluded thus:

"But nobler far, and greater is the praise
 "So bright to shine in these degenerate days:
 "An age of heroes kindled Sidney's fire;
 "His inborn worth alone could Grenville's deeds
 "inspire."

But some years after, when his Lordship was with Ministry, he erased these four lines. See GENT. MAG. Vol. XLIX. p. 601.

ON GOOD HUMOUR.

WRITTEN AT ETON-SCHOOL, 1729.

TELL me, ye sons of Phœbus, what is this
 Which all admire, but few, too few, possess?
 A virtue 'tis to ancient maids unknown,
 And prudes who spy all faults except their own.
 Lov'd and defended by the brave and wise,
 Though knaves abuse it, and like fools despise.
 Say, Wyndham, if 'tis possible to tell,
 What is the thing in which you most excel?
 Hard is the question, for in all you please;
 Yet sure good-nature is your noblest praise;
 Secur'd by this, your parts no envy move,
 For none can envy him whom all must love.
 This magic power can make ev'n folly please,
 This to Pitt's genius adds a brighter grace,
 And sweetens every charm in Celia's face.

SOME ADDITIONAL STANZAS

TO ASTOLFO'S VOYAGE TO THE MOON.

In Ariosto.

WHEN now Astolfo, stor'd within a vase,
 Orlando's wits had safely brought away;
 He turn'd his eyes towards another place,
 Where, closely cork'd, unnumber'd bottles lay.
 Of finest crystal were those bottles made,
 Yet what was there enclos'd he could not see:
 Wherefore in humble wise the Saint he pray'd,
 To tell what treasure there conceal'd might be,
 "A wondrous thing it is," the Saint replied,
 "Yet undefin'd by any mortal wight;
 "An airy essence, not to be descried,
 "Subtle and thin, that Maidenhead is hight.
 "From earth each day in troops they hither come,
 "And fill each hole and corner of the moon;
 "For they are never easy while at home,
 "Nor ever owner thought them gone too soon.
 "When here arriv'd, they are in bottles pent,
 "For fear they should evaporate again;
 "And hard it is a prison to invent,
 "So volatile a spirit to retain.
 "Those that to young and wanton girls belong
 "Leap, bounce, and fly, as if they'd burst the "glass:
 "But those that have below been kept too long
 "Are spiritless, and quite decay'd, alas!"
 So spake the Saint, and wonder seiz'd the Knight,
 As of each vessel he th' inscription read;
 For various secrets there were brought to light;
 Of which report on earth had nothing said.
 Virginities, that close confin'd he thought
 In t' other world, he found above the sky;
 His sister's and his cousins there were brought,
 Which made him swear, though good St. John was by.
 But much his wrath increas'd, when he espied
 That which was Chloe's once, his mistress dear:
 "Ah, false and treacherous fugitive!" he cried,
 "Little I deem'd that I should meet thee here.

" Did not thy owner, when we parted last,
 " Promise to keep thee safe for me alone?
 " Scarce of our absence three short months are past,
 " And thou already from thy post art flown.
 " Be not enrag'd, replied th' Apostle kind—
 " Since that this maidenhead is thine by right,
 " Take it away; and, when thou hast a mind,
 " Carry it thither whence it took its flight."
 " Thanks, Holy Father!" quoth the joyous Knight,
 " The moon shall be no loser by your grace:
 " Let me but have the use on't for a night,
 " And I'll restore it to its present place."

TO A YOUNG LADY,

WITH THE TRAGEDY OF VENICE PRESERVED.

IN tender Otway's moving scenes we find
 What power the gods have to your sex assign'd:
 Venice was lost, if on the brink of fate
 A woman had not propt her sinking state:
 In the dark danger of that dreadful hour,
 Vain was her senate's wisdom, vain its power;
 But, sav'd by Belvidera's charming tears,
 Still o'er the subject main her towers she rears,
 And stands a great example to mankind,
 With what a boundless sway you rule the mind,
 Skilful the worst or noblest ends to serve,
 And strong alike to ruin or preserve.

In wretched Jaffier, we with pity view
 A mind, to honour false, to virtue true,
 In the wild storm of struggling passions tost,
 Yet saving innocence, though fame was lost;
 Greatly forgetting what he ow'd his friend—
 His country, which had wrong'd him, to defend.

But she, who urg'd him to that pious deed,
 Who knew so well the patriot's cause to plead,
 Whose conquering love her country's safety won,
 Was, by that fatal love, herself undone.

* " Hence may we learn, what passion fain
 " would hide,
 " That Hymen's bands by prudence should be tied.
 " Venus in vain the wedded pair would crown,
 " If angry Fortune on their union frown:
 " Soon will the flattering dreams of joy be o'er,
 " And cloy'd imagination cheat no more;
 " Then, waking to the sense of lasting pain,
 " With mutual tears the bridal couch they stain;
 " And that fond love, which should afford relief,
 " Does but augment the anguish of their grief:
 " While both could easier their own sorrows bear,
 " Than the sad knowledge of each other's care."

May all the joys in love and fortune's power
 Kindly combine to grace your nuptial hour!
 On each glad day may plenty shower delight,
 And warmest rapture bless each welcome night!
 May Heaven, that gave you Belvidera's charms,
 Destine some happier Jaffier to your arms,

* The twelve following lines, with some small variations, have been already printed in "Advice to a Lady;" but, as Lord Lyttelton chose to introduce them here, it was thought more eligible to repeat these few lines, than to suppress the rest of the poem.

Whose bliss misfortune never may allay,
 Whose fondness never may through care decay:
 Whose wealth may place you in the fairest light,
 And force each modest beauty into sight!
 So shall no anxious want your peace destroy,
 No tempest crush the tender buds of joy;
 But all your hours in one gay circle move,
 Nor reason ever disagree with love!

E L E G Y.

TELL me, my heart, fond slave of hopeless love,
 And doom'd its woes, without its joys to prove,
 Canst thou endure thus calmly to erase
 The dear, dear image of thy Delia's face?
 Canst thou exclude that habitant divine,
 To place some meaner idol in her shrine?
 O task, for feeble reason too severe!
 O lesson, nought could teach me but despair!
 Must I forbid my eyes that heavenly sight,
 They've view'd so oft with languishing delight?
 Must my ears shun that voice, whose charming
 sound

Seem'd to relieve, while it increas'd, my wound?

O Waller! Petrarch! you who tun'd the lyre
 To the soft notes of elegant desire?
 Though Sidney to a rival gave her charms,
 Though Laura dying left her lover's arms,
 Yet were your pains less exquisite than mine,
 'Tis easier far to lose, than to resign!

INSCRIPTION

For a Bust of Lady Suffolk; designed to be set up in a Wood at Stowe, 1732.

HER wit and beauty for a court were made:
 But truth and goodness fit her for a shade.

SULPICIA TO CERINTHUS,

IN HER SICKNESS. FROM TIBULLUS.

(Sent to a Friend, in a Lady's Name.)

SAY, my Cerinthus, does thy tender breast
 Feel the same feverish heats that mine molest?
 Alas! I only wish for health again,
 Because I think my lover shares my pain:
 For what would health avail to wretched me,
 If you could, unconcern'd, my illness see?

SULPICIA TO CERINTHUS.

I'm weary of this tedious dull deceit;
 Myself I torture, while the world I cheat:
 Though prudence bids me strive to guard my
 fame,
 Love sees the low hypocrisy with shame:
 Love bids me all confess, and call thee mine,
 Worthy my heart, as I am worthy thine:
 Weakness for thee I will no longer hide;
 Weakness for thee is woman's noblest pride.

CATO'S SPEECH TO LABIENUS,

IN THE NINTH BOOK OF LUCAN.

("Quid quæri, Labiene, jubes," &c.)

WHAT, Labienus, would thy fond desire,
 Of horned Jove's prophetic shrine inquire?

Whether to seek in arms a glorious doom,
 Or basely live, and be a king in Rome?
 If life be nothing more than death's delay;
 If impious force can honest minds dismay,
 Or probity may fortune's frown disdain;
 If well to mean is all that virtue can;
 And right, dependant on itself alone,
 Gains no addition from success?—'Tis known:
 Fix'd in my heart these constant truths I bear,
 And Ammon cannot write them deeper there.
 Our souls, allied to God, within them feel
 The secret dictates of the Almighty will;
 This is his voice, be this our oracle. }
 When first his breath the seeds of life instill'd,
 All that we ought to know was then reveal'd.
 Nor can we think the Omnipresent mind
 Has truth to Libya's desert sands confin'd,
 There, known to few, obscur'd, and lost, to lie—
 Is there a temple of the Deity,
 Except earth, sea, and air, yon azure pole;
 And chief, his holiest shrine, the virtuous soul?
 Where'er the eye can pierce, the feet can move,
 This wide, this boundless universe is Jove.
 Let abject minds, that doubt because they fear,
 With pious awe to juggling priests repair;
 I credit not what lying prophets tell—
 Death is the only certain oracle.
 Cowards and brave must die one destin'd hour—
 This Jove has told; he needs not tell us more.

TO MR. GLOVER;

ON HIS POEM OF LEONIDAS.

Written in the Year 1734.

Go on, my friend, the noble task pursue,
 And think thy genius is thy country's due;
 To vulgar wits inferior themes belong,
 But liberty and virtue claim thy song.
 Yet cease to hope, though grac'd with every charm,
 The patriot verse will cold Britannia warm;
 Vainly thou striv'st our languid hearts to raise,
 By great examples drawn from better days:
 No longer we to Sparta's fame aspire,
 What Sparta scorn'd, instructed to admire;
 Nurs'd in the love of wealth, and form'd to bend
 Our narrow thoughts to that inglorious end:
 No generous purpose can enlarge the mind,
 No social care, no labour for mankind,
 Where mean self-interest every action guides,
 In camps commands, in cabinets presides;
 Where luxury consumes the guilty store,
 And bids the villain be a slave for more.

Hence, wretched nation, all thy woes arise,
 Avow'd corruption, licens'd perjuries,
 Eternal taxes, treaties for a day,
 Servants that rule, and senates that obey.

O people, far unlike the Grecian race,
 That deems a virtuous poverty disgrace,
 That suffers public wrongs and public shame,
 In council insolent, in action tame!
 Say, what is now th' ambition of the great?
 Is it to raise their country's sinking state;
 Her load of debt to ease by frugal care,
 Her trade to guard, her haras'd poor to spare?

Is it like honest Somers, to inspire
 The love of laws, and freedom's sacred fire?
 Is it, like wise Godolphin, to sustain
 The balanc'd world, and boundless power restrain?
 Or is the mighty aim of all their toil,
 Only to aid the wreck, and share the spoil?
 On each relation, friend, dependant, pour,
 With partial wantonness, the golden shower,
 And, sent'd by strong corruption, to despise
 An injur'd nation's unavailing cries!
 Rouse, Britons, rouse! if sense of shame be weak,
 Let the loud voice of threatening danger speak.
 Lo! France, as Persia once, o'er every land
 Prepares to stretch her all-oppressing hand.
 Shall England sit regardless and sedate,
 A calm spectatress of the general fate;
 Or call forth all her virtue, and oppose,
 Like valiant Greece, her own and Europe's foes?
 O let us seize the moment in our power,
 Our follies now have reach'd the fatal hour;
 No later term the angry gods ordain;
 This crisis lost, we shall be wise in vain.

And thou, great poet, in whose nervous lines
 The native majesty of freedom shines,
 Accept this friendly praise; and let me prove
 My heart not wholly void of public love:
 Though not like thee I strike the sounding string
 To notes which Sparta might have deign'd to sing,
 But, idly sporting in the secret shade,
 With tender trifles sooth some artless maid.

TO WILLIAM PITT, ESQ.

ON HIS LOSING HIS COMMISSION,

In the Year 1736.

LONG had thy virtues mark'd thee out for fame,
 Far, far superior to a cornet's name;
 This generous Walpole saw, and griev'd to find
 So mean a post disgrace that noble mind.
 The servile standard from thy freeborn band
 He took, and bade thee lead the patriot band.

PROLOGUE

TO THOMSON'S CORIOLANUS.

Spoken by Mr. Quin.

I COME not here your candour to implore
 For scenes, whose author is, alas! no more;
 He wants no advocate his cause to plead;
 You will yourselves be patrons of the dead.
 No party his benevolence confin'd,
 No sect—alike it flow'd to all mankind.
 He lov'd his friends (forgive this gushing tear:
 Alas! I feel, I am no actor here)
 He lov'd his friends with such a warmth of heart,
 So clear of interest, so devoid of art,
 Such generous friendship, such unshaken zeal,
 No words can speak it; but our tears may tell.—
 O candid truth, O faith without a stain,
 O manners gently firm, and nobly plain,
 O sympathizing love of others' bliss,
 Where will you find another breast like his?
 Such was the man—the poet well you know:
 Oft has he touch'd your hearts with tender woe;

Oft in his crowded house, with just applause,
You heard him teach fair virtue's purest laws;
For his chaste muse employ'd her heaven-taught lyre

None but the noblest passions to inspire,
Not one immortal, one corrupted thought,
One line, which dying he could wish to blot.

Oh! may to-night your favourable doom
Another laurel add, to grace his tomb:
Whilst he, superior now to praise or blame,
Hears not the feeble voice of human fame.
Yet, if to those whom most on earth he lov'd,
From whom his pious care is now remov'd,
With whom his liberal hand, and bounteous heart,
Shar'd all his little fortune could impart;
If to those friends your kind regard shall give
What they no longer can from him receive;
That, that, ev'n now, above yon starry pole,
May touch with pleasure his immortal soul.

EPILOGUE TO LILLO'S ELMERICK.

You, who, supreme o'er every work of wit,
In judgment here, unaw'd unbiass'd, sit,
The palatines and guardians of the pit;
If to your minds this merely modern play
No useful sense, no generous warmth convey;
If fustian here, through each unnatural scene,
In strain'd conceits sound high, and nothing mean;
If lofty dullness for your vengeance call:
Like Elmerick judge, and let the guilty fall.
But if simplicity, with force and fire,
Unlabour'd thoughts and artless words inspire:
If, like the action which these scenes relate,
The whole appear irregularly great;
If master-strokes the nobler passions move;
Then, like the king, acquit us, and approve.

THE LIFE OF MOORE.

OF the personal history of MOORE, the particulars which have been recorded by his biographers are insufficient to satisfy curiosity, and disproportionate to his reputation among the periodical essayists and the writers of verse.

The additional intelligence which the present writer has obtained, is general and scanty; but he has this gratification from giving it to the world, that it affords him an opportunity of recording his obligations to the Rev. Joshua Toulmin, the able and judicious "Historian of Taunton," and continuator of "Neale's History of the Puritans," for a particular account of his descent, birth, and education, drawn up, principally, on the information of his only surviving sister.

Edward Moore was born at Abingdon, in Berkshire, March 22. 1711-12. He was the third son of the Rev. Thomas Moore, M. A. pastor of a society of Protestant dissenters in that town, by Mary, daughter of Thomas Alder, gentleman, of Drayton, a neighbouring village. His grandfather, the Rev. John Moore of Brazen-Nose College, Oxford, had the curacy of Holnest in Dorsetshire, from which he was ejected by the act of uniformity. He became afterwards pastor to a large congregation of Protestant dissenters at Bridgewater, in Somersetshire. His father, in conjunction with his brother, the Rev. John Moore, M. A. conducted the tuition of youth designed for the ministry, or desirous of going through a course of academical learning, at Bridgewater, till he removed to Abingdon, where he died in the end of 1721, or the beginning of 1722.

The seminary at Bridgewater was supported by Mr. John Moore, through a period of more than fifty years (a small interruption in the latter end of Queen Anne's reign excepted, when he was obliged to secrete himself), till the time of his death, Dec. 31. 1748, with great credit and honour to himself, and great benefit to the interests of literature and religion. The only publication attributed to his father, is a tract on the controversy of the day, between the established church and the dissenters, intitled, "The Honesty of Protestant Dissenters vindicated, in answer to Mr. Peck's Character of an Honest Dissenter, in twelve marks, with some Remarks on the additional Preface;" written on liberal principles, with temper, judgment, and ability, not without a seasoning of smartness and wit.

He left seven children. John, born July 3. 1708, a dissenting minister, settled first at Swaffham, in Cambridgeshire, and then at Abingdon, truly respectable for abilities and character. He died September 22. 1774. Thomas, born 1709; Edward, the poet; Samuel, born April 8. 1714; Mary, born September 8. 1716, who died at Taunton, December 6. 1761; Elizabeth, born April 30. 1719, still living, on whose information this account is drawn up, and with whom the family will become extinct; Jane, born October 14. 1721, who died at Bridgewater, November 1790. His widow died in London about 1771, eighty-nine years of age, expressing to the last an affectionate remembrance of the excellencies of his character, and a mournful sense of her great loss in the removal of a most beloved husband, after a most happy union of about 20 years.

His father dying when he was about ten years old, the direction of his education was kindly undertaken by his uncle at Bridgewater. With him he spent some years of his early life, and was then removed to the school of East Orchard, in Dorsetshire.

His original destination appears to have been for trade; and, at a proper age, he was placed with one Mr. Gibson, a wholesale linen draper in London. When he left this house, he went to Ireland, in the capacity of a factor, to one Mr. Johnson a merchant in the city, where he resided some years.

On his return from Ireland, he entered into a partnership in the linen trade with an Irish gentleman in London; but his success in business, though he conducted himself in it with ability and expertness, not answering his expectations, the connection was dissolved.

Whether from a stronger attachment to the study than the counter, from a more ardent zeal in the pursuit of fame than in the search after fortune, or from the cause assigned by himself, in the preface to the quarto edition of his works, 1756, that "his marriage with the Muses, like most other marriages, was more from necessity than inclination," he relinquished the business for which he was bred, became a candidate for fame, and courted the Muses.

It has been generally supposed that he never was in business on his own account; but that he had been engaged in business, will appear from the following stanza in his Ode to Garrick, on the Talk of the Town on his Marriage.

And then there's Belmont to be sure—

Oho! my gentle Neddy Moore,

How does my good Lord Mayor?

And have you left Cheapside, my dear?

And will you write again next year,

And show your fav'rite player?

Attached to the Muses, he early courted public attention; and in 1744 produced his first performance, intitled, Fables for the Female Sex, which was favourably received.

Three of these fables, The Sparrow and the Dove, The Female Seducers, and Love and Vanity, were the production of his ingenious and amiable friend Henry Brooke, Esq. whose assistance he acknowledges in the preface, without distinguishing his share.

"To avoid the misfortunes that may attend me from any accidental success, I think it necessary to inform those who know me, that I have been assisted in the following papers by the author of "Gustavus Vasa." Let the crime of pleasing be his whose talents as a writer, and whose virtues as a man, have rendered him a living affront to the whole circle of his acquaintance."

The eulogy of his poetical associate, whose fables are no small ornament to his collection, is not overcharged. Brooke, with many peculiarities, was a man of knowledge and genius, and, what is much better, a most worthy man, and an excellent citizen.

In 1748, he undertook the defence of Lyttleton, in an ironical poem, called The Trial of Selim the Persian, for High Crimes and Misdemeanors; in which he has shown himself a perfect master of the most elegant kind of panegyric, such as is couched under the appearance of accusation; and for which he was paid with kind words, which, as is common, raised great hopes, that were at last disappointed.

The same year, he produced his first dramatic performance, The Foundling, a comedy, acted at Drury-Lane; but which, though aided by the performance of Garrick, Barry, Yates, Macklin, Mrs. Woffington, and Mrs. Cibber, and highly applauded and commended by Cibber, had but a moderate degree of success. On the first night of its appearance, the character of Faddle (which, it is said, was intended for one Russel) gave great disgust, and was therefore considerably curtailed in all the ensuing representations. It has not since that time been continued as an acting comedy, being generally considered as bearing too near a resemblance to Steele's "Conscious Lovers;" yet in some respects it is preferable to that play, as the intricacy of the plot is more natural, the characters of a more sprightly turn, and drawn in general from higher life, unmixed with the pertness of a chambermaid coquet and kitchen coxcomb, on which the liveliness of Steele's play principally depends. The prologue was written by Brooke.

About this time he wrote *The Trial of Sarab * * , alias Slim Sal, a jeu d'esprit, occasioned by the vivacity and good humour with which he spent an evening, in a lively party of friends, at the house of ——— Palmer, Esq. at Eaton, near St. Neot's in Huntingdonshire. The lady, his daughter, the subject of its genteel wit, is still living.

In 1749, he complimented Garrick in an Ode, on his marriage with Madam Violetti; and the same year, August 10. he united himself in marriage with Miss Jenny Hamilton, a beautiful and accomplished woman, daughter of Mr. Hamilton, table-decker to the princesses, on which occasion Lyttleton stood father.

Miss Hamilton, it is said, had a poetical turn, and had expressed her partiality towards him in the following song, addressed to Miss Duck, daughter of the famous Stephen Duck, in which she quibbles on his name with great ingenuity and delicacy, and yet in a manner that expresses a sincere affection. This specimen of her poetry was handed about before their marriage, and printed in the "Gentleman's Magazine," and other miscellaneous collections of the times.

According to Mr. Toulmin's information, his attachment to Miss Hamilton, and the encouragement his addresses received, gave birth to this song, which was written by Dr. Franklin, the celebrated translator of "Æschylus" and "Lucian," personating Miss Hamilton.

Would you think it, my Duck, (for the fault I must own),
Your Jenny at last is quite covetous grown;
Her millions, if fortune should lavishly pour,
I still should be wretched if I had not More.

As gay as I am, should I spend half my days
In dances, and op'ras, ridottos, and plays,
Her fate your poor Jenny with tears would deplore,
For alas! my dear girl, what are those without More.

'Tis the same thing with pleasure, with money, with men,
And I think I shall never be happy again.
I've lovers, and dangles, and praters, good store,
And yet, like true women, I still sigh for More.

Mama she cries, Jenny, why all this ado,
You may have a husband, you know child, or two;
But I pouted, and whimper'd, and fretted, and swore
That I would not have one unless I had More.

The giant, poor devil, has just now been here,
And has offer'd to settle eight hundred a-year;
But I answer'd the wretch as I once did before,
You know it won't do, Sir, for I must have More.

Though the fool I despise should bespatter my fame,
Yet I think I'm as wise as some folks I could name;
I but worship that idol which others adore,
For those that have thousands would gladly have More.

Now, in spite of this craving, I vow and protest
That avarice ne'er had a place in my breast;
For I swear I'd not envy the miser his store,
Had I but enough for myself and one More.

You will wonder, my girl, who this dear one can be,
Whose merit can boast such a conquest as me;
But you shan't know his name, though I told you before
It begins with an M, but I dare not say More.

He had relied hitherto on his pen for support; and had some hope, from the notice taken of him by Lyttleton, of receiving from his assistance some permanent support. In this he was disappointed. From Garrick's friendship, however, he obtained some advantages.

In 1751, his comedy of Gil Blas was acted at Drury-Lane; and, though violently opposed, was carried through nine nights. This is the least meritorious of his dramas. The design is taken from the story of Aurora in the novel of "Gil Blas;" but bears too near a resemblance to the plot of the "Kind Impostor;" and he has deviated greatly from truth in the manners of his characters.

In 1753, his Gamester, a tragedy, was acted at Drury-Lane, and met with but middling success. As his Gil Blas had been forced upon the town several nights after the strongest public disapprobation of it had been expressed, it was thought by his friends that any piece acted under his name would be treated with vindictive severity. Spence, therefore, permitted it for the first four nights to be imputed to him; but immediately afterwards threw aside the mask, as he supposed the success of the play to be no longer doubtful; when some of the very persons who had applauded it as his work, were among the foremost to condemn it as the performance of Moore.

This tragedy is written in prose. Some part of it was originally composed in blank verse, of which several vestiges remain. It is his best dramatic performance; and still keeps possession of the stage, where it has lately received every possible recommendation, by the appearance of Mrs. Siddons in the character of Mrs. Beverley. The language is nervous, and yet pathetic; the plot is artful, yet well conducted; the characters are strongly marked, yet not unnatural; and the catastrophe is truly tragic, yet not unjust. The distress was censured, on its first appearance, as too great to be borne, and the catastrophe as too horrible; for no other apparent reason, but because it too nearly touched a favourite and fashionable amusement. It was shown in MS. to Young, who approved it greatly, with this remarkable expression, that "gaming wanted such a caustic as the concluding scene of the play presented." In his preface, he says, "I should humbly presume that the working it up to any uncommon degree of horror is the merit of the play, and not its reproach. Nor should so prevailing and destructive a vice as gaming, be attacked upon the theatre, without impressing upon the imagination all the horrors that attend it."

In each of these performances, Garrick exerted himself both as an actor and an author. In the latter, he "distinguished himself," says his biographer, "by uncommon spirit in some scenes, and by great agonizing feelings in the last." Moore, in his preface, expresses his admiration of this inimitable performer: who, in the character of Beverley, exceeded every idea he had conceived of it in writing, and acknowledges himself indebted to him for many popular passages in the play. The scene, in particular, between Lewson and Stukely, has been ascribed wholly to Garrick.

In January 1753, he began a periodical paper, called The World, by Adam Fitz-Adam, which he carried on in weekly numbers, till February 1757. The design, as he explains it in the first number, "was to ridicule, with novelty and good humour, the fashions, follies, vices, and absurdities, of that part of the human species which we call the World, and to trace it through all its business, pleasures, and amusements." The wits of the age were invited to join in it, and gave it their assistance. The Hon. Horace Walpole, the present Earl of Orford, Richard Owen Cambridge, Esq. the Earl of Corke, Sir David Dalrymple Lord Hailes, the Earl of Chesterfield, Dr. Warton, Whitehead, Lovibond, Jenyns, and other writers of eminence, as he expresses it, "ornamented this publication with their bounty, and honoured it with essays." The demand for it greatly exceeded expectation; and, during its appearance, it was the only fashionable vehicle in which men of rank and genius chose to convey their sentiments to the public.

The first paper that Lord Chesterfield sent, being without any notice from whence it came, underwent but a slight inspection, and was very near being excluded on account of its length. This neglect would have stopped any further communications; but fortunately Lyttleton happening to call at Doddsley's, the paper was shown to him. He immediately knew the hand, and still more the manner of writing. Moore, being informed of the discovery, read the paper more attentively, discerned its beauties, and thought proper not only to publish it directly, but to introduce it with an apology for the delay, and a compliment to the writer.

From this time, as Mr. Toulmin informs the present writer, on the authority of Dr. Farr of Taunton, Lord Chesterfield carried his politeness and confidence in the publisher's taste and judgment so far, that when he sent a paper to be inserted, he gave him the liberty to publish it entirely, to alter any part of it, or to suppress it altogether.

On the same authority, it is alleged, that when Moore collected the papers for publication, he solicited leave to dedicate one of the volumes to Mr. Cambridge, who permitted it, upon condition that he himself should write the dedication. The delicacy with which he executed the task, will be readily perceived by the intelligent reader acquainted with this fact.

It is much to be lamented, that either honour or emolument should have been missed by Moore. All his exertions were, however, barely sufficient to ward off the inconveniencies of poverty.

In 1755, he settled with his family at South Lambeth, and occupied the house which is now the property of Mr. Graham, where he had Cooke, the translator of "Hesiod," for his neighbour, with whom he had been acquainted before the publication of his Fables.

They both met at a club held weekly at the Vine and Royal Oak inns; which was usually composed, among others, of several literary characters; Dr. Howard, H. Hatfield, Sir Joseph Mawbey, Bart. &c. They lived on friendly terms with each other, though their manners and habits were very dissimilar.

"Cooke," says Sir Joseph Mawbey, in the account of his life, "Gentleman's Magazine," 1792, began the world with little fortune, and he was early thrown upon the world with strong passions, which, it is supposed, he gratified very freely in the early part of his life. He was, when I knew him, regular and sober, though convivial. No one enjoyed the pleasures of the table more than he, nor was more entertaining at it. Though he spoke with much freedom of men and things, and we did not think his strictures of either well founded, he had such a fund of general knowledge and anecdotes, without being in reality ill natured, that it was impossible for such as knew him thoroughly to avoid being pleased.

"He was, however, not unfrequently dictatorial and assuming, which often disgusted strangers, and made him feared by many. Moore, H. Hatfield, Dr. Howard, and many other lively companions, were visibly restrained by Cooke, who excelled them in learning, and whose spirits generally induced him to take the lead in company at times with infinite humour; at the same time, it must be allowed, few exceeded them in sprightliness and witty conversation."

In 1756, he published his works in a quarto volume, by subscription, with a dedication to the Duke of Newcastle; which contains a delicate compliment to his brother Mr. Pelham, who had honoured him with his patronage.

"Defects in this work," he says in the preface, "there are many, which I have wanted both time and abilities to mend as I could wish. Its merit (if it has any, and I may be allowed to name it), is its being natural and unaffected, and tending to promote virtue and good humour. I have sent this my offspring into the world in as decent a dress as I was able; a legitimate one I am sure it is; and if it should be thought defective in strength, spirit, or vigour, let it be considered, that its father's marriage with the Muses, like most other marriages into that noble family, was more from necessity than inclination."

He continued The World until near the close of his life. The last proof sheet of the complete edition of that work was waiting for his correction, when he died at his house in South Lambeth, February 28. 1757, in the 45th year of his age. He was interred in the new burying-ground belonging to Lambeth parish, near the High-street, without a stone to mark the place of his dust.

His death, it is said, was owing to his apothecary's too closely and injudiciously adhering to the physician's prescription. He had been visited by a severe rheumatic fever, in which he had lost the use of his limbs, so as not to be able to move a finger; but his recovery was fast advancing, when the physician was called to a distance, and directing the use of the bark, left him, in confidence of his restoration, to a state of convalescence. A cold and inflammation of the lungs coming on, and the use of the bark being continued, a fever ensued, which soon terminated fatally.

He left behind him an only son, of his own Christian name. Lord Chesterfield, with a kindness and generosity which will reflect everlasting honour on his name, took upon himself the care and expence of his education, till he was sixteen years of age, when he gave him a fortune of 500 l. He had first a place in the Salt Office; but inclining to the sea service, he afterwards went on board a man of war as a midshipman, and died at sea in 1773.

Mrs. Moore, after his death, obtained the place of necessary woman to the queen's private apartments, and still survives; cherishing an indelible and mournful remembrance of the virtues of a most affectionate consort, and much respected by a numerous and genteel acquaintance.

The World, which he just lived to complete, was published in 6 vols. 12mo, 1757. The subsequent editions, in 4 vols. are too numerous to be specified. His Fables have been frequently reprinted, and with his other poems have been received into the collection of the "Works of the English poets," 1790. In the present edition, the Temple of Hymen is inserted among the Fables contributed by Brooke, omitted in the former editions.

Of Brooke, this brief memorial may suffice. He was born in 1706. His father, the Rev. William Brooke of Rantavan, was rector of the parishes of Killinkare, Mullough, Mybullough, and Licowie, in the county of Cavan in Ireland. His mother was a Digby. He was educated at Dr. Sheridan's school, and from thence removed to the Temple, in his sixteenth year. The engaging sweetness of his temper, and peculiar vivacity of his genius, caught the notice and esteem of the reigning wits. Swift prophesied wonders of him. Pope affectionately loved him. Thus flattered and encouraged, he returned to Ireland, and married privately his cousin, Miss Means, who had her first child before she was fourteen. He went a second time to London; but poetry was as fatal there as love had been in Ireland. The study of the law appeared drier than ever. He renewed his intimacy with Pope, and wrote his poem of "Universal Beauty" under his eye and criticism. Soon, however, he was obliged to return; family affairs demanded his presence. He practised for some time as chamber counsel. In 1737, he went a third time to England, where Pope received him with open arms. Lyttleton soon distinguished and cherished a mind and genius similar to his own. Pitt was particularly fond of him, and introduced him to the Prince of Wales, who caressed him with uncommon liberality, and presented him with many elegant and valuable tokens of his friendship. Here, flushed with ambition, glowing with emulation, and elevated with praise, he produced his tragedy of "Gustavus Vasa." Government took offence at the spirit of liberty which it breathed, and closed the theatres against it, but could not prevent its publication. Encouraged by his success, he took a house at Twickenham, and sent for Mrs. Brooke, who was proposed by the Prince to be nurse to his present Majesty. While every prospect smiled, he was seized with a violent and unconquerable ague, and ordered to return to his native air. He spent the remainder of his life in Ireland. While barrack master under Lord Chesterfield, while writer of the "Farmers Letters," &c. he passed, no doubt, through many busy and interesting scenes, but the particulars are not sufficiently known to be related with certainty. He left the country, and rented a house and farm in Kildare, where he resided for a few years. He afterwards took and improved a farm in the vicinity of the family estate. Shortly after his wife died, and with her all his happiness, and the best part of his existence. At length he withdrew to his paternal seat, where he devoted himself wholly to the Muses. He wrote several tragedies, and formed golden dreams of their success upon the English stage, from his interest with Garrick, but was disappointed. He tried the Irish stage, and was tolerably successful, but not equal to his hopes and his occasions. He was compelled to mortgage, and at last to sell, his paternal estate. From this time he secluded himself entirely from the world. The powers of his mind decayed, and his genius flashed but by fits. This is perceivable in the latter volumes of the "Fool of Quality," and his subsequent novel of "Juliet Grenville," which were the last of his writings. He died October 10. 1783, in the 77th year of his age.

He died as he lived, a Christian. With the meekness of a lamb, and the fortitude of a hero, he supported the tedious infirmities of age, the languors of sickness, and the pains of dissolution; and his death, like his life, was instructive.

Of nineteen children, two only survived him; a son in the army, since dead; and a daughter, who inherited his genius. She published a quarto volume of poems in 1792, and died in 1793.

His "Poetical Works," including fifteen plays, were collected into 4 vols. 8vo, 1778. His "Universal Beauty, a philosophical poem in six books," "Two Books of Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered," "Constantia, or the Man of Law's Tale," modernized from Chaucer, "Redemption, a poem," "Conrade, a fragment," "The Fox Chase, a poem," &c., were recommended by the compiler of this collection, to be inserted with his Fables, in the "Works of the British Poets;" but have been excluded, in consequence of some arrangement relative to the extent of the collection.

The character of Moore, who seems destined as a Fabulist, to be inseparably connected with Brooke, was truly amiable and respectable. He had a peculiar sweetness of temper, and was a most entertaining and pleasing companion. The simplicity of his manners much endeared him to all his acquaintances, and makes them always speak of him with particular fondness and attachment. From the names of his coadjutors in the World, and of the persons to whom his several pieces are addressed, it appears that he was honoured with the friendship of almost all his contemporaries, who were themselves remarkable for talents and for learning; and, it is but justice to observe, that the papers written by him, will suffer no injury by a comparison with those of his coadjutors.

The following letter, furnished by Mr. Toulmin, is a specimen of the vivacity and wit, mingled with a strong portion of the moral sense, which was on all occasions natural to Moore. It is addressed to the Rev. John Ward, a dissenting minister at Taunton, who, venerable as he is himself for learning, worth, piety, and years, deems it an honour to have his name, connected with that of Moore. It was occasioned by his being prevented by Fielding's illness, from appointing an evening on which he might invite Mr. Ward to meet at his lodgings, some of the first wits of the day.

"It is not owing to forgetfulness that you have not heard from me before. Fielding continues to be visited for his sins, so as to be wheeled about from room to room: When he mends, I am sure to see him at my lodgings; and you may depend upon timely notice. What fine things are wit and beauty, if a man could be temperate with one, or a woman chaste with the other! But he that will confine his acquaintance to the sober and the modest, will generally find himself among the dull and the ugly. If this remark of mine should be thought to shoulder itself in without an introduction, you will be pleased to note, that Fielding is a wit; that his disorder is the gout, and intemperance the cause."

"Moore," says Sir Joseph Mawbey, who knew him well, "was cousin german to Fuller the banker (partner with Honeywood). He told me he had been in Ireland, on some scheme of business, I believe in the linen trade. He was a well-bred amiable man, and a cheerful witty and entertaining companion. Cooke and Moore had often proposed to themselves, and to me, considerable pleasure, in attending me at the next assizes of Surrey, of which it was known I was to be Sheriff in February 1757. Before such assize meeting in March, I had, alas! to regret the death of both my neighbours and friends, Cooke being buried on the 1st of January in that year, and Moore on the 5th of March following."

As a poet, his compositions are characterized by a refined elegance of sentiment, and a correspondent happiness of expression. He writes with neatness and terseness, but without much elevation or spirit. Though not a first-rate dramatist, his pleasing tragedy of the Gamester entitles him to rank above the middling class. The plots of his pieces are interesting, his characters well drawn, his sentiments delicate, and his language pleasing; but his greatest recommendation is the purity that runs through all his writings, and the apparent tendency of every piece towards the promotion of morality and virtue.

His Fables, the most popular of all his works, are equal to the best compositions of that kind in our language. In the freedom and ease of the versification, and in the forcibleness of the moral, and the poignancy of the satire, they approach nearer to the manner of Gay than any of the numerous imitations of that popular fabulist. In poetical spirit, beautiful imagery, and harmony of numbers, they possess an unquestionable superiority. They have not only great merit of the moral kind, but they delight us as a just picture of human life.

The Four Fables of Brooke may vie with almost every production of the kind, for poetical colouring, facility of versification, and strength of sentiment. They have all the flowing ease, clearness of expression, and poignancy of satire, that are to be found in Gay, and Moore; with more warmth of poetry and glow of sentiment. But, with all their merit, they are perhaps too extensive for that kind of writing. Fable should be short, strong in the application, quick in the effect, and poignant in the moral. The Temple of Hymen, is properly an allegorical tale: It is flowing, clear, and poetical; and ends with a well turned compliment to Lord Charlemont. The Sparrow and the Dove breathes throughout the true spirit of poetry; but perspicuity is sometimes lost in the flight of the Muse. Perhaps the connection and conduct of the fable would not be injured by the omission of about 150 lines, beginning—Freedom restrain'd by reason's force, and ending—While swelling with the darling theme. The abstruse reasoning and philosophy, which might figure well in another place, are very improper in the character of the Dove. The Female Seducers is a superlative performance; perspicuity, without which genius wants its best support, is sometimes wanting; but all the pictures and descriptions are very highly coloured, and the versification is exquisitely polished and harmonious. Love and Vanity has great strength and vigour of poetry, and some of those peculiarities which run through the great variety of his performances.

The "verses written in a copy of Moore's fables," by Garrick, are not only a handsome compliment to the fair possessor of it, but truly descriptive of the nature and merit of the work, and indirectly a fine encomium on it.

While here the poet paints the charms
Which bless the perfect dame,
How unaffected beauty warms,
And art preserves the flame.
How prudence, virtue, sense, agree,
To form the happy wife;
In Luty, and her book, I see
The picture and the life.

Sir Joseph Mawbey has transcribed, from Cooke's Common-place-book, his "remarks on Moore's Fables;" which the worthy baronet believes "will be allowed to be very just by every lover of poetry."

"June 1743, I read sixteen fables in manuscript, wrote by Mr. Edward Moore. The ninth, The Farmer, the Spaniel, and the Cat, is a very pretty fable; and there are great elegancies in the introduction. The sixteenth, and last fable, called The Female Seducers, is a charming, elegant poem. These two fables are far superior to the rest, and are unexceptionably good. The diction is such as the province of poetry requires; and there are many delicacies in sentiment and expression; and the imagery is strong and delightful. The other fables have their merit; but have many imperfections which, I doubt not, the author will remove before they are printed. The versification, through all, is sweet, with very few exceptions. His images are, some of them, lovely, and lovelily clothed. The following four verses are from the ninth fable, addressed to a lady.

Sweet are the flow'rs, that deck the field;
Sweet are the flowers the blossoms yield;
Sweet is the summer gale that blows;
And sweet, though sweeter you, the rose."

"Here is true simplicity and sweetness. Speaking in the last fable of the dissolution of things, he has some of the beautifullest images I desire to see in poetry; as these lines.

Gone like traces on the deep,
Like a sceptre grasp'd in sleep;
Dews exhal'd from sunny glades,
Melting snows and gliding shades.

Sir Joseph Mawbey justly observes, that Cooke "might have given many other extracts from them, equally beautiful." He appears to have been unacquainted with the real author of The Female Seducers.

Of his miscellaneous pieces, the most considerable is, The Trial of Selim, which contains much fine irony, expressed in elegant versification. His Odes are pleasing and poetical; but have not the fire and enthusiasm, which belong to the higher kinds of lyric poetry. His Songs may be justly ranked among the best compositions of the kind in our language. They are simple, elegant, and sprightly in the highest degree.

"His poetical works," says Sir Joseph Mawbey, "have established his name for genius, though they did not procure him much fortune, nor patrons to place him in a state of independency. There is an easy elegance in his compositions, which renders them as pleasing as any in the English language."

THE WORKS OF MOORE.

To His Grace

THOMAS HOLLES, DUKE OF NEWCASTLE.

MY LORD,

HAD I the honour of being personally known to your Grace, I had not thus presumptuously addressed you, without previous solicitation for so great an indulgence. But that your Grace may neither be surprised nor offended at the liberty I am taking, my plea is, that the great and good man, whose name is prefixed to the first of these poems, was a friend and benefactor to me. The favours I have received at his hands, and the kind assurances he was pleased to give to me of their continuance, which his death only prevented, have left me to lament my own private loss amidst the general concern. It is from these favours and assurances that I flatter myself with having a kind of privilege to address your Grace upon this occasion, and to entreat your patronage of the following sheets. I pretended to no merit with Mr. Pelham, except that of honouring his virtues, and wishing to have been serviceable to them: I pretend to no other with your Grace. My hopes are, that while you are fulfilling every generous intention of the brother whom you loved, your Grace will not think me unworthy of some small share of that notice, with which he was once pleased to honour me.

I will not detain your Grace to echo back the voice of a whole people in favour of your just and prudent administration of public affairs. That the salutary measures you are pursuing may be as productive of tranquillity and honour to your Grace, as they are of happiness to these kingdoms, is the sincere wish of,

My Lord,

Your Grace's

most humble,

most obedient,

and most devoted Servant,

Tully's Head, Pall-Mall, }
Feb. 26. 1756.

EDWARD MOORE.

P R E F A C E.

MOST of the following poems have already made their appearance in detached pieces; but as many of them were printed without a name, I was advised by some particular friends to collect them into a volume, and publish them by subscription. The painful task of soliciting such a subscription was chiefly undertaken by those friends, and with such spirit and zeal, that I should be greatly wanting in gratitude, if I neglected any opportunity, either public or private, of making them my most sincere acknowledgments. I am also obliged to a very valuable friend in Ireland for a considerable number of subscribers in that kingdom, a list of whose names I have not been favoured with, and for which I was desired not to delay publication. I mention this seeming neglect, that my friends on that side the water may not accuse me of any disrespect.

Such as the work now is, I submit it to the public. Defects in it there are many, which I have wanted both time and abilities to amend as I could wish. Its merit (if it has any, and I may be allowed to name it) is its being natural and unaffected, and tending to promote virtue and good-humour. Those parts of it that have been published singly, had the good fortune to please; those that are now added will, I hope, be no discredit to them. Upon the whole, I have sent this my offspring into the world in as decent a dress as I was able: a legitimate one I am sure it is; and if it should be thought defective in strength, spirit, or vigour, let it be considered that its father's marriage with the Muses, like most other marriages into that noble family, was more from necessity than inclination.

P O E M S.

THE DISCOVERY:

AN ODE

To the Right Honourable
HENRY PELHAM.

— Vir bonus est quis? Hor.

TAKE wing, my muse! from shore to shore
Fly, and that happy place explore
Where virtue deigns to dwell;
If yet she treads on British ground,
Where can the fugitive be found,
In city, court, or cell?

Not there, where wine and frantic mirth
Unite the sensual sons of earth
In pleasure's thoughtless train;
Nor yet where sanctity's a show,
Where souls nor joy nor pity know
For human bliss or pain.

Her social heart alike disowns
The race, who shunning crowds and thrones,
In shades sequester'd doze;
Whose sloth no generous care can wake,
Who rot like weeds on Lethe's lake,
In senseless, vile repose.

With these she shuns the factious tribe,
Who spurn the yet unoffer'd bribe,
And at corruption lour;
Waiting till discord havoc cries,
In hopes, like Cataline, to rise
On anarchy to pow'r!

Ye wits, who boast from ancient times,
A right divine to scourge our crimes,
Is it with you she rests?

No. Int'rest, slander are your views,
And virtue now, with every muse,
Flies your unhallow'd breasts.

There was a time, I heard her say,
Ere females were seduc'd by play,
When beauty was her throne;
But now, where dwelt the soft desires,
The furies light forbidden fires,
To love and her unknown.

From these th' indignant goddess flies,
And where the spires of science rise,
A while suspends her wing;

But pedant pride and rage are there,
And faction tainting all the air,
And pois'ning every spring.

Long through the sky's wide pathless way
The muse observ'd the wand'rer stray,
And mark'd her last retreat;
O'er Surrey's barren heaths she flew,
Descending like the silent dew
On Esher's peaceful seat.

There she beholds the gentle Mole
His pensive waters calmly roll,
Amidst Elysian ground:
There through the windings of the grove
She leads her family of love,
And strews her sweets around.

I hear her bid the daughters fair
Oft to yon gloomy grott repair,
Her secret steps to meet;
Nor thou, she cries, these shades forsake,
But come, lov'd consort, come and make
The husband's bliss complete.

Yet not too much the soothing ease
Of rural indolence shall please
My Pelham's ardent breast;
The man whom virtue calls her own
Must stand the pillar of a throne,
And make a nation blest.

Pelham! 'tis thine with temp'rate zeal
To guard Britannia's public weal,
Attack'd on every part:
Her fatal discords to compose,
Unite her friends, disarm her foes,
Demands thy head and heart.

When bold rebellion shook the land,
Ere yet from William's dauntless hand
Her barbarous army fled;
When valour droop'd, and wisdom fear'd,
Thy voice-expiring credit heard,
And rais'd her languid head.

Now by thy strong assisting hand,
Fix'd on a rock I see her stand,
Against whose solid feet,
In vain, through every future age,
The loudest, most tempestuous rage
Of angry war shall beat.

And grieve not if the sons of strife
Attempt to cloud thy spotless life,
And shade its brightest scenes;
Wretches, by kindness unsubdu'd,
Who see, who share the common good,
Yet cavil at the means.

Like these, the metaphysic crew,
Proud to be singular and new,
Think all they see deceit;
Are warm'd and cherish'd by the day,
Feel and enjoy the heav'nly ray,
Yet doubt of light and heat.

THE TRIAL

OF

SELIM THE PERSIAN*,

FOR DIVERS HIGH CRIMES AND MISDEAMEANORS.

THE court was met; the pris'ner brought;
The counsel with instructions fraught;
And evidence prepar'd at large,
On oath, to vindicate the charge.

But first 'tis meet, where form denies
Poetic helps of fancy'd lies,
Gay metaphors, and figures fine,
And similes to deck the line;
'Tis meet (as we before have said)
To call description to our aid.

Begin we then (as first 'tis fitting)
With the three chiefs in judgment sitting.

Above the rest, and in the chair,
Sat Faction with dissembled air;
Her tongue was skill'd in specious lies,
And murmurs, whence dissensions rise;
A smiling mask her features veil'd,
Her form the patriot's robe conceal'd;
With study'd blandishments she bow'd,
And drew the captivated crowd.
The next in place, and on the right,
Sat Envy, hideous to the sight;
Her snaky locks, her hollow eyes,
And haggard form forbade disguise;
Pale discontent and sullen hate
Upon her wrinkled forehead sat;
Her left hand, clench'd, her cheek sustain'd,
Her right (with many a murder stain'd)
A dagger clutch'd, in act to strike,
With starts of rage, and aim oblique.

Last on the left was Clamour seen,
Of stature vast, and horrid mien;
With blotted cheeks, and frantic eyes,
She sent her yellings to the skies;
Prepar'd with trumpet in her hand,
To blow sedition o'er the land.

With these, four more of lesser fame,
And humbler rank, attendant came;
Hypocrisy with smiling grace,
And Impudence with brazen face,

* George Lyttleton, Esq. afterwards Lord Lyttleton. The Persian Letters of this nobleman were written under the character of Selim, which occasioned Mr. Moore to give him the same name in this poem.

Contention bold, with iron lungs,
And Slander with her hundred tongues.

The walls in sculptur'd tale were rich,
And statues proud (in many a nich)
Of chiefs, who fought in faction's cause,
And perish'd for contempt of laws.
The roof in vary'd light and shade,
The seat of anarchy display'd.
Triumphant o'er a falling throne
(By emblematic figures known)
Confusion rag'd, and lust obscene,
And riot with distemper'd mien,
And outrage bold, and mischief dire,
And devastation clad in fire.

Prone on the ground a martial maid
Expiring lay, and groan'd for aid;
Her shield with many a stab was pierc'd,
Her laurels torn, her spear revers'd;
And near her, crouch'd amidst the spoils,
A lion panted in the toils.

With look compos'd the pris'ner stood,
And modest pride. By turns he view'd
The court, the counsel, and the crowd,
And with submissive rev'rence bow'd.

Proceed we now, in humbler strains,
And lighter rhymes, with what remains.

Th' indictment grievously set forth,
That Selim, lost to patriot worth,
(In company with one Will Pitt*,
And many more, not taken yet)

In forty-five, the royal palace †
Did enter, and to shame grown callous,
Did then and there his faith forsake,
And did accept, receive, and take,
With mischievous intent and base,
Value unknown, a certain place.

He was a second time indicted,
For that, by evil zeal excited,
With learning more than layman's share,
(Which parsons want, and he might spare)
In letter to one Gilbert West ‡,
He, the said Selim, did attest,
Maintain, support, and make assertion
Of certain points, from Paul's conversion,
By means whereof the said apostle
Did many an unbeliever jostle,
Starting unfashionable fancies,
And building truths on known romances.

A third charge ran, that knowing well
Wits only eat as pamphlets sell,
He, the said Selim, notwithstanding,
Did fall to answer, shaming, branding
Three curious letters to the Whigs §;
Making no reader care three figs
For any facts contain'd therein;
By which uncharitable sin

* Afterwards Earl of Cbatbam.

† Mr. Lyttleton was appointed a Lord of the Treasury, 25th Dec. 1744.

‡ Intituled, "Observations on the Conversion and Apostleship of St. Paul. In a Letter to Gilbert West, Esq." 8vo 1747.

§ Intituled, "Three Letters to the Whigs; occasioned by the Letter to the Tories," 8vo. 1748.

An author, modest and deserving,
Was destin'd to contempt and starving;
Against the king, his crown and peace,
And all the statutes in that case.

The pleader rose with brief full charg'd,
And on the pris'ner's crimes enlarg'd—
But not to damp the muse's fire
With rhet'ric, such as courts require,
We'll try to keep the reader warm,
And lift the matter from the form.
Virtue and social love, he said,
And honour from the land were fled;
That patriots now, like other folks,
Were made the butt of vulgar jokes;
While Opposition dropp'd her crest,
And courted pow'r for wealth and rest.
Why some folks laugh'd, and some folks rail'd,
Why some submitted, some assail'd,
Angry or pleas'd—all solv'd the doubt
With who were in, and who were out.
The sons of Clamour grew so sickly,
They look'd for dissolution quickly;
Their weekly journals, finely written,
Were sunk in privies all besh—n;
Old-England *, and the London-Evening,
Hardly a soul was found believing in;
And Caleb †, once so bold and strong,
Was stupid now, and always wrong.

Ask ye whence rose this foul disgrace?

Why Selim has receiv'd a place,
And thereby brought the cause to shame;
Proving that people, void of blame,
Might serve their country and their king,
By making both the self-same thing:
By which the credulous believ'd,
And others (by strange arts deceiv'd)
That ministers were sometimes right,
And meant not to destroy us quite.

That bart'ring thus in state affairs,
He next must deal in sacred wares,
The clergy's rights divine invade,
And smuggle in the gospel trade:
And all this zeal to reinstate
Exploded notions, out of date;
Sending old rakes to church in shoals,
Like children, sniv'ling for their souls;
And ladies gay, from smut and libels,
To learn beliefs, and read their Bibles;
Erecting conscience for a tutor,
To daman the present by the future:
As if to evils known and real
'Twas needful to annex ideal;
When all of human life we know
Is care, and bitterness, and woe,
With short transitions of delight,
To set the shatter'd spirits right.
Then why such mighty pains and care,
To make us humbler than we are?
Forbidding short-liv'd mirth and laughter,
By fears of what may come hereafter?

* An Opposition Paper at that time published, in which Mr Lyttleton was frequently abused.

† Caleb D'Anvers, the name assumed by the writers of the Craftsman.

Better in ignorance to dwell;
None fear, but who believe a hell;
And if there should be one, no doubt,
Men of themselves would find it out.

But Selim's crimes, he said, went further,
And barely stopp'd on this side murder;
One yet remain'd to close the charge,
To which (with leave) he'd speak at large.
And, first, 'twas needful to premise,
That though so long (for reasons wise)
The press inviolate had stood,
Productive of the public good;
Yet still, too modest to abuse,
It rail'd at vice, but told not whose.
That great improvements, of late days,
Were made, to many an author's praise,
Who, not so scrupulously nice,
Proclaim'd the person with the vice;
Or gave, where vices might be wanted,
The name, and took the rest for granted,
Upon this plan, a champion * rose,
Unrighteous greatness to oppose,
Proving the man "inventus non est,"
Who trades in pow'r, and still is honest;
And (God be prais'd) he did it roundly,
Flogging a certain junto soundly.
But chief his anger was directed,
Where people least of all suspected;
And Selim, not so strong as tall,
Beneath his grasp appear'd to fall.
But Innocence (as people say)
Stood by, and sav'd him in the fray,
By her assisted, and one Truth,
A busy, prating, forward youth,
He rally'd all his strength anew,
And at the foe a letter threw †:
His weakest part the weapon found,
And brought him senseless to the ground.
Hence Opposition fled the field,
And ignorance with her seven-fold shield;
And well they might, for (things weigh'd fully)
The pris'ner with his whore and bully,
Must prove for every foe too hard,
Who never fought with such a guard.

But Truth and Innocence, he said,
Would stand him here in little stead;
For they had evidence on oath,
That would appear too hard for both.

Of witnesses a fearful train
Came next, th' indictments to sustain;
Detraction, Hatred, and Distrust,
And party, of all foes the worst,
Malice, Revenge, and Unbelief,
And Disappointment worn with grief,
Dishonour foul, unaw'd by shame,
And every fiend that vice can name.
All these in ample form depos'd,
Each fact the triple charge disclos'd,
With taunts and gibes of bitter sort,
And asking vengeance from the court.

* Author of the Letters to the Whigs.

† Probably, "A Congratulatory Letter to Selim on the Letters to the Whigs," 8vo. 1748.

The pris'ner said in his defence,
That he indeed had small pretence
To soften facts so deeply sworn,
But would for his offences mourn;
Yet more he hop'd than bare repentance
Might still be urg'd to ward the sentence.
That he had held a place some years,
He own'd with penitence and tears,
But took it not from motives base,
Th' indictment there mistook the case;
And though he had betray'd his trust
In being to his country just,
Neglecting Faction and her friends,
He did it not for wicked ends,
But that complaints and feuds might cease,
And jarring parties mix in peace.

That what he wrote to Gilbert West,
Bore hard against him, he confess'd;
Yet there they wrong'd him; for the fact is,
He reason'd for belief, not practice;
And people might believe, he thought,
Though practice might be deem'd a fault.
He either dreamt it, or was told,
Religion was rever'd of old,
That it gave breeding no offence,
And was no foe to wit and sense;
But whether this was truth, or whim,
He would not say; the doubt with him
(And no great harm he hop'd) was, how
Th' enlighten'd world would take it now:
If they admitted it, 'twas well;
If not, he never talk'd of hell;
Nor even hop'd to change men's measures,
Or frighten ladies from their pleasures.

One accusation, he confess'd,
Had touch'd him more than all the rest;
Three patriot-letters, high in fame,
By him o'erthrown, and brought to shame.
And though it was a rule in vogue,
If one man call'd another rogue,
The party injur'd might reply,
And on his foe retort the lie;
Yet what accru'd from all his labour,
But foul dishonour to his neighbour?
And he's a most unchristian elf,
Who others damns to save himself.
Besides, as all men knew, he said,
Those letters only rail'd for bread;
And hunger was a known excuse
For prostitution and abuse:
A guinea, properly apply'd,
Had made the writer change his side;
He wish'd he had not cut and carv'd him,
And own'd, he should have bought, not starv'd
him.

The court, he said, knew all the rest,
And must proceed as they thought best;
Only he hop'd such resignation
Would plead some little mitigation;
And if his character was clear
From other faults (and friends were near,
Who would, when call'd upon, attest it)
He did in humblest form request it,
To be from punishment exempt,
And only suffer their contempt.

The pris'ner's friends their claim prefer'd,
In turn demanding to be heard.
Integrity and Honour swore,
Benevolence, and twenty more,
That he was always of their party,
And that they knew him firm and hearty.
Religion, sober dame, attended,
And, as she could, his cause befriended.
She said, 'twas since he came from college,
She knew him introduc'd by knowledge:
The man was modest and sincere,
Nor farther could she interfere.
The Muses begg'd to interpose;
But Envy with loud hissings rose,
And call'd them women of ill fame,
Liars, and prostitutes to shame;
And said, to all the world 'twas known,
Selim had had them every one.
The pris'ner blush'd, the Muses frown'd,
When silence was proclaim'd around,
And Faction, rising with the rest,
In form the pris'ner thus address'd.

You, Selim, thrice have been indicted:
First, that by wicked pride excited,
And bent your country to disgrace,
You have receiv'd, and held a place:
Next, infidelity to wound,
You've dar'd, with arguments profound,
To drive freethinking to a stand,
And with religion vex the land:
And lastly, in contempt of right,
With horrid and unnat'ral spite,
You have an author's fame o'erthrown,
Thereby to build and fence your own.

These crimes successive, on your trial,
Have met with proofs beyond denial;
To which yourself, with shame, conceded,
And but in mitigation pleaded:
Yet that the justice of the court
May suffer not in men's report,
Judgment a moment I suspend,
To reason as from friend to friend.

And first, that you, of all mankind,
With kings and courts should stain your mind!
You! who were Opposition's lord!
Her nerves, her sinews, and her sword!
That you at last, for servile ends,
Should wound the bowels of her friends!
Is aggravation of offence,
That leaves for mercy no pretence.
Yet more——For you to urge your hate,
And back the church, to aid the state!
For you to publish such a letter!
You! who have known religion better!
For you, I say, to introduce
The fraud again!—there's no excuse.
And last of all, to crown your shame,
Was it for you to load with blame
The writings of a patriot-youth,
And summon Innocence and Truth
To prop your cause?——Was this for you?——

But justice does your crimes pursue;
And sentence now alone remains,
Which thus, by me, the court ordains:

" That you return from whence you came,
 " There to be stript of all your fame
 " By vulgar hands; that once a week
 " Old-England pinch you till you squeak;
 " That ribbald pamphlets do pursue you,
 " And lies and murmurs, to undo you.
 " With every foe that worth procures,
 " And only virtue's friends be yours."

ODE TO GARRICK,

UPON THE TALK OF THE TOWN.

" When I said I would die a batchelor, I did not " think I should live till I were married."

Much Ado about Nothing.

No, no; the left-hand box, in blue;
 There! don't you see her?—" See her! Who?"
 Nay, hang me if I tell.

There's Garrick in the music box!
 Watch but his eyes; see there—" O pox!"

" Your servant, Ma'moiselle!"

But tell me, David, is it true?
 Lord help us! what will some folks do?

How will they curse this stranger!
 What! fairly taken in for life!
 A sober, serious, wedded wife!
 O fie upon you, Ranger!

The clergy too have join'd the chat;

" A papist!—Has he thought of that?"

" Or means he to convert her?"

Troth, boy, unless your zeal be stout,

The nymph may turn your faith about,

By arguments experter.

The ladies, pale and out of breath,

Wild as the witches in Macbeth,

Ask if the " deed be done!"

O, David! listen to my lay!

I'll prophesy the things, they'll say,

For tongues you know, will run.

" And pray, what other news d'ye hear?

" Marry'd!—But don't you think my dear,

" He's growing out of fashion?

" People may fancy what they will,

" But Quin's the only actor still,

" To touch the tender passion.

" Nay, madam, did you mind, last night,

" His Archer? Not a line on't right!

" I thought I heard some hisses.

" Good God! if Billy Mills, thought I,

" Or Billy Havard would but try,

" They'd beat him all to pieces.

" 'Twas prudent though to drop his Bayes—

" And (entre nous) the Laureat says,

" He hopes he'll give up Richard.

" But then it tickles me to see,

" In Hastings, such a shrimp as he

" Attempt to ravish Pritchard.

" The fellow pleas'd me well enough

" In — what d'ye call it? Hoadley's stuff;

" There's something there like nature:

" Just so, in life, he runs about,

" Plays at bo-peep, now in, now out,

" But hurts no mortal creature.

" And then there's Belmont, to be sure——

" O ho! my gentle Neddy Moore!

" How does my good Lord Mayor?

" And have you left Cheapside, my dear!

" And will you write again next year,

" To show your fav'rite player?

" But Merope, we own, is fine,

" Eumenes charms in every line;

" How prettily he vapours!

" So gay his dress, so young his look,

" One would have sworn 'twas Mr. Cook,

" Or Mathews, cutting capers."

Thus, David, will the ladies flout,

And councils hold at every rout,

To alter all your plays;

Yates shall be Benedick next year,

Macklin the Richard, Tafwell Lear,

And Kitty Clive be Bayes.

Two parts they readily allow

Are yours; but not one more, they vow;

And thus they close their spite:

You will be Sir John Brute, they say,

A very Sir John Brute all day,

And Fribble all the night.

But tell me, fair ones, is it so?

" You all did love him once *," we know;

What then provokes your gall?

Forbear to rail—I'll tell you why;

Quarrels may come, or madam die,

And then there's hope for all.

And now a word or two remains,

Sweet Davy, and I close my strains:

Think well ere you engage;

Vapours and ague-fits may come,

And matrimonial claims at home,

Unnerve you for the stage.

But if you find your spirits right,

Your mind at ease, your body tight,

Take her; you can't do better.

A pox upon the tattling town!

The fops that join to cry her down

Would give their ears to get her.

Then if her heart be good and kind,

(And sure that face bespeaks a mind

As soft as woman's can be)

You'll grow as constant as a dove,

And taste the purer sweets of love,

Unvisited by Ranby.

ENVY AND FORTUNE:

A TALE.

TO MRS. GARRICK.

SAYS Envy to Fortune, " Soft, soft, Madam Flirt!

" Not so fast with your wheel, you'll be down in " the dirt!

" Well, and how does your David? Indeed, my
 " dear creature, [nature;

" You've shown him a wonderful deal of good—

" His bags are so full, and such praises his due,

" That the like was ne'er known—and all owing
 " to you:

Julius Caesar.

" But why won't you make him quite happy for " life, [wife?"

" And to all you have done add the gift of a Says Fortune, and smil'd, " Madam Envy, God save ye!

" But why always sneering at me and poor Davy?

" I own that sometimes, in contempt of all rules,

" I lavish my favours on blockheads and fools;

" But the case is quite different here, I aver it,

" For David ne'er knew me, till brought me by " merit.

" And yet to convince you—nay, Madam, no
" hisses— [is—"

" Good manners at least—such behaviour as this (For mention but Merit, and Envy flies out
With a hiss and a yell that would silence a rout.

But Fortune went on)—" To convince you, I say,

" That I honour your scheme, I'll about it to-day;

" The man shall be marry'd, so pray now be easy,

" And Garrick for once shall do something to
" please ye."

So saying, she rattled her wheel out of sight,
While Envy walk'd after, and grinn'd with delight. [brewing,

It seems 'twas a trick that she long had been
To marry poor David, and so be his ruin:

For Slander had told her the creature lov'd self,

And car'd not a fig for a soul but himself;

From thence she was sure, had the Devil a daughter, [her:

He'd snap at the girl, so 'twas Fortune that brought

And then should her temper be sullen or haughty,

Her flesh too be frail, and incline to be naughty,

'Twould fret the poor fellow so out of his reason,

That Barry and Quin would set fashions next season.

But Fortune, who saw what the Fury design'd,
Resolv'd to get David a wife to his mind:

Yet afraid of herself in a matter so nice,

She visited Prudence, and begg'd her advice.

The nymph shook her head when the business she knew,

And said that her female acquaintance were few;

That excepting Miss R. * * *—O, yes, there was one,

A friend of that lady's, she visited none;

But the first was too great, and the last was too
good,

And as for the rest, she might get whom she cou'd.

Away hurried Fortune, perplex'd and half mad,

But her promise was pass'd, and a wife must be had:

She travers'd the town from one corner to t'other,

Now knocking at one door, and then at another.

The girls curtsy'd low as she look'd in their faces,

And bridled and primm'd with abundance of graces;

But this was coquettish, and that was a prude,

One stupid and dull, t'other noisy and rude;

A third was affected, quite careless a fourth,

With prate without meaning, and pride without worth;

A fifth, and a sixth, and a seventh were such

As either knew nothing, or something too much—

In short as they pass'd, she to all had objections;

The gay wanted thought, the good-humour'd affections,

The prudent were ugly, the sensible dirty,
And all of them flirts, from fifteen up to thirty.

When Fortune saw this she began to look silly,

Yet still she went on till she reach'd Piccadilly;

But vex'd and fatigu'd, and the night growing late,

She rested her wheel within Burlington gate.

My lady rose up, as she saw her come in, [been?"

" O ho, madam Genius! pray where have you

(For her ladyship thought, from so serious an air,

'Twas Genius come home, for it seems she liv'd
there.)

But Fortune, not minding her ladyship's blunder,
And wiping her forehead, cry'd, " Well may you wonder [case,

" To see me thus flurry'd;"—then told her the

And sigh'd till her ladyship laugh'd in her face.

" Mighty civil indeed!"—" Come, a truce, says

" my lady, [ye.

" A truce with complaints, and perhaps I may aid

" I'll show you a girl that—Here, Martin! go
" tell!

" But she's gone to undress; by and by is as " well—

" I'll show you a sight that you'll fancy uncommon,

" Wit, beauty, and goodness, all met in a woman;

" A heart to no folly or mischief inclin'd,

" A body all grace, and all sweetness a mind."

" O, pray let me see her," says Fortune, and
" smil'd, [child—

" Do but give her to me, and I'll make her my

" But who, my dear, who?—for you have not " told yet"—

" Who, indeed, says my lady, if not Violette?"

The words were scarce spoke when she enter'd
the room;

A blush at the stranger still brighten'd her bloom;

So humble her looks were, so mild was her air,

That Fortune, astonish'd, sat mute in her chair.

My lady rose up, and with countenance bland,

" This is Fortune, my dear," and presented her hand:

The goddess embrac'd her, and call'd her her own;

And, compliments over, her errand made known.

But how the sweet girl colour'd, flutter'd, and trembled,

How oft she said no, and how ill she dissembled;

Or how little David rejoic'd at the news,

And swore, from all others, 'twas her he would choose;

What methods he try'd, and what arts to prevail;

All these, were they told, would but burden my tale—

In short, all affairs were so happily carry'd,

That hardly six weeks pass'd away till they marry'd.

But Envy grew sick when the story she heard,

Violette was the girl that of all she most fear'd;

She knew her good-humour, her beauty and sweetness, [ness;

Her ease and compliance, her taste and her neat-

From these she was sure that her man could not room,

And must rise on the stage, from contentment at home:

So on she went hissing, and inwardly curs'd her,

And Garrick next season will certainly burst her;

To the Right Honourable
HENRY PELHAM,

The Humble Petition of the Worshipful Company of Poets and News-Writers,

SHEWETH,

THAT your Honour's petitioners (dealers in rhymes,
And writers of scandal, for mending the times)
By losses in business, and England's well-doing,
Are sunk in their credit, and verging on ruin.

That these their misfortunes, they humbly conceive,
Arise not from dulness, as some folks believe,
But from rubs in your way which your Honour has laid,

And want of materials to carry on trade.

That they always had form'd high conceits of their use,

And meant their last breath should go out in abuse;
But now (and they speak it with sorrow and tears)
Since your Honour has sat at the helm of affairs,
No party will join them, no faction invite [write;
To heed what they say, or to read what they Sedition, and Tumult, and Discord are fled,
And Slander scarce ventures to lift up her head—
In short, public business is so carry'd on,
That their country is sav'd, and the patriots undone.

To perplex them still more, and sure famine to bring,

(Now satire has lost both its truth and its sting)
If, in spite of their natures, they bungle at praise,
Your Honour regards not, and nobody pays.

Your petitioners, therefore, most humbly entreat (As the times will allow, and your Honour thinks meet) [complaint

That measures be chang'd, and some cause of
Be immediately furnish'd, to end their restraint;
Their credit thereby, and their trade to retrieve,
That again they may rail, and the nation believe.

Or else (if your wisdom should deem it all one)
Now the Parliament's rising, and business is done,
That your Honour would please, at this dangerous crisis,

To take to your bosom a few private vices,
By which your petitioners haply might thrive,
And keep both themselves and Contention alive.

In compassion, good Sir, give them something to say,

And your Homer's petitioners ever shall pray.

THE

TRIAL OF SARAH * * *, ALIAS SLIM SAL,

FOR PRIVATELY STEALING.

THE pris'ner was at large indicted,
For that by thirst of gain excited,
One day in July last, at tea,
And in the house of Mrs. P.
From the left breast of E. M. gent.
With base felonious intent,
Did then and there a heart with strings,
Rest, quiet, peace, and other things,
Steal rob and plunder; and all them
The chattels of the said E. M.

The prosecutor swore, last May
(The month he knew, but not the day)
He left his friends in town, and went
Upon a visit down in Kent:

That staying there a month or two,
He spent his time as others do,
In riding, walking, fishing, swimming;
But being much inclin'd to women,
And young and wild, and no great reasoner,
He got acquainted with the prisoner.

He own'd, 'twas rumour'd in those parts
That she 'ad a trick of stealing hearts,
And from fifteen to twenty-two,
Had made the devil and all to do:

But Mr. W. the vicar,
(And no man brews you better liquor)
Spoke of her thefts as tricks of youth,
The frolics of a girl forsooth:

Things now were on another score,
He said; for she was twenty-four.

However, to make matters short,
And not to trespass on the court,

The lady was discover'd soon,

And thus it was. One afternoon,

The ninth of July last, or near it,

(As to the day, he could not swear it)

In company at Mrs. P.'s,

Where folks say any thing they please;

Dean L. and Lady Mary by,

And Fanny waiting on Miss Y.

(He own'd he was inclin'd to think

Both were a little in their drink)

The pris'ner ask'd, and call'd him cousin,

How many kisses made a dozen?

That being, as he own'd, in liquor,

The question made his blood run quicker,

And, sense and reason in eclipse,

He vow'd he'd score them on her lips.

That rising up to keep his word,

He got as far as kiss the third,

And would have counted t' other nine,

And so all present did opine,

But that he felt a sudden dizziness,

What quite undid him for the business:

His speech, he said, began to falter,

His eyes to stare, his mouth to water,

His breast to thump without cessation,

And all within one conflagration.

Bless me! says Fanny, what's the matter?

And Lady Mary look'd hard at her,

And stamp'd, and wish'd the pris'ner further,

And cry'd out, Part them, or there's murder!

That still he held the pris'ner fast,

And would have stood it to the last;

But struggling to go through the rest,

He felt a pain across his breast,

A sort of sudden twinge, he said,

That seem'd almost to strike him dead,

And after that such cruel smarting,

He thought the soul and body parting.

That then he let the pris'ner go,

And stagger'd off a step or so;

And thinking that his heart was ill,

He begg'd of Miss Y.'s maid to feel.

That Fanny stept before the rest,

And laid her hand upon his breast;

But, mercy on on us! what a scare
The creature gave! No heart was there;
Soufe went her fingers in the hole,
Whence heart, and strings, and all were stole.
That Fanny turn'd, and told the prisoner,
She was a thief, and so she'd christen her;
And that it was a burning shame,
And brought the house an evil name;
And if she did not put the heart in,
The man would pine and die for certain.
The pris'ner then was in her airs,
And bid her mind her own affairs;
And told his reverence, and the rest of 'em,
She was as honest as the best of 'em.
That Lady Mary and Dean I.
Rose up and said, 'Twas mighty well,
But that, in general terms they said it,
A heart was gone, and some one had it:
Words would not do, for search they must,
And search they would, and her the first.
That then the pris'ner dropp'd her anger,
And said, she hop'd they would not hang her;
That all she did was meant in jest,
And there the heart was, and the rest.
That then the Dean cry'd out, O fie!
And sent in haste for Justice I.
Who, though he knew her friends and pity'd her,
Call'd her hard names, and so committed her.

The parties present swore the same;
And Fanny said, the pris'ner's name
Had frighten'd all the country round;
And glad she was the bill was found.
She knew a man, who knew another,
Who knew the very party's brother,
Who lost his heart by mere surprise,
One morning looking at her eyes;
And others had been known to squeak,
Who only chanc'd to hear her speak:
For she had words of such a sort,
That though she knew no reason for't,
Would make a man of sense run mad,
And rifle him of all he had;
And that she'd rob the whole community,
If ever she had opportunity.

The pris'ner now first silence broke,
And curtly d round her as she spoke.
She own'd, she said, it much incens'd her,
To hear such matters sworn against her,
But that she hop'd to keep her temper,
And prove herself "eadem semper."
That what the prosecutor swore
Was some part true, and some part more:
She own'd she had been often seen with him,
And laugh'd and chatted on the green with him;
The fellow seem'd to have humanity,
And told her tales that sooth'd her vanity,
Pretending that he lov'd her vastly,
And that all women else look'd ghastly.
But then she hop'd the court would think
She never was inclin'd to drink,
Or suffer hands like his to daub her, or
Encourage men to kiss and slobber her;
She'd have folks know she did not love it,
Or if she did, she was above it.
But this, she said, was sworn of course,
To prove her giddy, and then worse;

As she whose conduct was thought "lævis,"
Might very well be reckon'd thievish.
She hop'd, she said, the court's discerning
Would pay some honour to her learning,
For every day from four to past six,
She went up stairs, and read the classics.
Thus having clear'd herself of levity,
The rest, she said, would come with brevity.
And first, it injur'd not her honour
To own the heart was found upon her;
For she could prove, and did aver,
The paltry thing belong'd to her:
The fact was thus. This prince of knaves
Was once the humblest of her slaves,
And often had confess'd the dart
Her eyes had lodg'd within his heart:
That she, as 'twas her constant fashion,
Made great diversion of his passion;
Which set his blood in such a ferment,
As seem'd to threaten his interment:
That then she was afraid of losing him;
And so desist'd from abusing him;
And often came and felt his pulse,
And bid him write to Doctor Hulse.
The prosecutor thank'd her kindly,
And sigh'd, and said she look'd divinely;
But told her that his heart was bursting,
And doctors he had little trust in;
He therefore begg'd her to accept it,
And hop'd 'twould mend if once she kept it.
That having no aversion to it,
She said, with all her soul, she'd do it;
But then she begg'd him to remember,
If he should need it in December,
(For winter months would make folks shiver;
Who wanted either heart or liver)
It never could return; and added,
'Twas her's for life, if once she had it.
The prosecutor said, Amen,
And that he wish'd it not again;
And took it from his breast and gave her,
And bow'd, and thank'd her for the favour;
But begg'd the thing might not be spoke of,
As heartless men were made a joke of.
That next day, whisp'ring him about it,
And asking how he felt without it,
He sigh'd, and cry'd, Alack! alack!
And begg'd, and pray'd to have it back;
Or that she'd give him her's instead on't;
But she conceiv'd there was no need on't;
And said, and bid him make no pother,
He should have neither one nor t'other.
That then he rav'd and storm'd like fury,
And said, that one was his "de jure,"
And rather than he'd leave pursuing her,
He'd swear a robbery, and ruin her.

That this was truth she did aver,
Whatever hap betided her;
Only that Mrs. P. she said,
Miss Y. and her deluded maid,
And Lady Mary, and his reverence,
Were folks to whom she paid some deference;
And that she verily believ'd
They were not perjurd, but deceiv'd.
Then Doctor D. begg'd leave to speak,
And sigh'd as if his heart would break;

He said, that he was madam's surgeon,
Or rather, as in Greek chirurgion,
From "cheir, manus, ergon, opus"
(As scope is from the Latin "scopus.")
That he, he said, had known the prisoner
From the first sun that ever rise on her;
And griev'd he was to see her there;
But took upon himself to swear,
There was not to be found in nature
A sweeter or a better creature;
And if the king (God bless him) knew her,
He'd leave St. James's to get to her:
But then as to the fact in question,
He knew no more on't than Hephæstion;
It might be false, and might be true;
And this, he said, was all he knew.

The judge proceeded to the charge,
And gave the evidence at large,
But often cast a sheep's eye at her,
And strove to mitigate the matter,
Pretending facts were not so clear,
And mercy ought to interfere.

The jury then withdrew a moment,
As if on weighty points to comment;
And right or wrong, resolv'd to save her,
They gave a verdict in her favour.

But why or wherefore things were so,
It matters not for us to know:
The culprit, by escape grown bold,
Pilfers alike from young and old,
The country all around her teazes,
And robs or murders whom she pleases.

FABLES FOR THE LADIES.

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION.

THE following Fables were written at intervals, when I found myself in humour, and disengaged from matters of greater moment. As they are the writings of an idle hour, so they are intended for the reading of those, whose only business is amusement. My hopes of profit, or applause, are not immoderate; nor have I printed through necessity, or request of friends. I have leave from her Royal Highness to address her, and I claim the fair for my readers. My fears are lighter than my expectations: I wrote to please myself, and I publish to please others; and this so universally, that I have not wished for correctness to rob the critic of his censure, or my friend of the laugh.

My intimates are few, and I am not solicitous to increase them. I have learnt, that where the writer would please, the man should be unknown.

An author is the reverse of all other objects, and magnifies by distance, but diminishes by approach. His private attachments must give place to public favour; for no man can forgive his friend the ill-natured attempt of being thought wiser than himself.

To avoid, therefore, the misfortunes that may attend me from any accidental success, I think it necessary to inform those who know me, that I have been assisted in the following papers by the author of Gustavus Vasa *. Let the crime of pleasing be his, whose talents as a writer, and whose virtues as a man, have rendered him a living affront to the whole circle of his acquaintance.

* Henry Brooke, Esq.

FABLE I.

THE EAGLE AND THE ASSEMBLY OF BIRDS.

To her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales.

THE moral lay, to beauty due,
I write, fair excellence, to you;
Well pleas'd to hope my vacant hours
Have been employ'd to sweeten yours.
Truth under fiction I impart,
To weed out folly from the heart;
And show the paths, that lead astray
The wand'ring nymph from wisdom's way.
I flatter none. The great and good
Are by their actions understood;
Your monument if actions raise,
Shall I deface by idle praise?
I echo not the voice of fame,
That dwells delighted on your name;

Her friendly tale, however true,
Were flatt'ry, if I told it you.

The proud, the envious, and the vain,
The jilt, the prude, demand my strain;
To these, detesting praise, I write,
And vent, in charity, my spite.
With friendly hand I hold the glass
To all, promiscuous as they pass;
Should folly there her likeness view,
I fret not that the mirror's true;
If the fantastic form offend,
I made it not, but would amend.

Virtue, in every clime and age,
Spurns at the folly-soothing page,
While satire, that offends the ear
Of vice and passion, pleases her.

Premising this, your anger spare,
And claim the fable you who dare.

THE birds in place, by factions press'd,
To Jupiter their pray'rs address'd;
By specious lies the state was vex'd,
Their counsels libellers perplex'd;
They begg'd (to stop seditious tongues)
A gracious hearing of their wrongs.
Jove grants their suit. The eagle sate,
Decider of the grand debate.

The pie, to trust and pow'r preferr'd,
Demands permission to be heard.
Says he, prolixity of phrase
You know I hate. This libel says,
"Some birds there are, who, prone to noise,
"Are hir'd to silence wisdom's voice,
"And skill'd to chatter out the hour,
"Rise by their emptiness to pow'r."

That this is aim'd direct at me,
No doubt, you'll readily agree;
Yet well this sage assembly knows,
By parts to government I rose;
My prudent counsels prop the state;
Magpies were never known to prate.

The kite rose up. His honest heart
In virtue's suff'rings bore a part.
That there were birds of prey he knew;
So far the libeller said true;
"Voracious, bold, to rapine prone,
"Who knew no int'rest but their own;
"Who hov'ring o'er the farmer's yard,
"Nor pigeon, chick, nor duckling spar'd."
This might be true, but if apply'd
To him, in troth, the slanderer ly'd.
Since ignorance then might be misled,
Such things, he thought, were best unsaid.
The crow was vex'd. As yester-morn
He flew across the new-sown corn,
A screaming boy was set for pay,
He knew, to drive the crows away;
Scandal had found out him in turn,
And buzz'd abroad, that crows love corn.

The owl arose, with solemn face,
And thus harangu'd upon the case.
That magpies prate, it may be true,
A kite may be voracious too,
Crows sometimes deal in new-sown pease;
He libels not, who strikes at these;
The slander's here—"But there are birds,
"Whose wisdom lies in looks, not words;
"Blund'ers, who level in the dark,
"And always shoot beside the mark."
He names not me; but these are hints,
Which manifest at whom he squints;
I were indeed that blund'ring fowl,
To question if he meant an owl.

Ye wretches, hence! the eagle cries,
'Tis conscience, conscience that applies;
The virtuous mind takes no alarm,
Secur'd by innocence from harm;
While guilt, and his associate fear,
Are startled at the passing air.

FABLE II.

THE PANTHER, THE HORSE, AND OTHER BEASTS.

THE man, who seeks to win the fair,
So custom says) must truth forbear;

Must fawn and flatter, cringe and lie,
And raise the goddess to the sky.
For truth is hateful to her ear,
A rudeness, which she cannot bear.
A rudeness? Yes. I speak my thoughts;
For truth upbraids her with her faults.

How wretched, Cloe, then am I,
Who love you, and yet cannot lie!
And still to make you less my friend,
I strive your errors to amend!
But shall the senseless sop impart
The softest passion to your heart,
While he, who tells you honest truth,
And points to happiness your youth,
Determines, by his care, his lot,
And lives neglected, and forgot?

Trust me, my dear, with greater ease
Your taste for flatt'ry I could please,
And smiles in each dull line,
Like glowworms in the dark, should shine.
What if I say your lips disclose
The freshness of the op'ning rose?
Or that your cheeks are beds of flow'rs,
Enripen'd by refreshing showers?
Yet certain as these flow'rs shall fade,
Time every beauty will invade.
The butterfly, of various hue,
More than the flow'r resembles you;
Fair, flutt'ring, fickle, busy thing,
To pleasure ever on the wing,
Gaily coquetting for an hour,
To die, and ne'er be thought of more.

Would you the bloom of youth should last?
'Tis virtue that must bind it fast;
An easy carriage, wholly free
From sour reserve, or levity;
Good-natur'd mirth, an open heart,
And looks unskill'd in any art;
Humility, enough to own
The frailties, which a friend makes known;
And decent pride, enough to know
The worth, that virtue can bestow.

These are the charms, which ne'er decay,
Though youth and beauty fade away;
And time, which all things else removes,
Still heightens virtue, and improves.

You'll frown, and ask to what intent
This blunt address to you is sent?
I'll spare the question, and confess
I'd praise you, if I lov'd you less;
But rail, be angry, or complain,
I will be rude, while you are vain.

BENEATH a lion's peaceful reign,
When beasts met friendly on the plain,
A panther, of majestic port,
(The vainest female of the court)
With spotted skin, and eyes of fire,
Fill'd every bosom with desire.
Where'er she mov'd, a servile crowd
Of fawning creatures cring'd and bow'd;
Assemblies every week she held,
(Like modern belles) with coxcombs fill'd,
Where noise, and nonsense, and grimace,
And lies and scandal fill'd the place.

Behold the gay, fantastic thing,
 Encircled by the spacious ring.
 Low bowing, with important look,
 As first in rank the monkey spoke.
 "Gad take me, Madam, but I swear,
 "No angel ever look'd so fair:
 "Forgive my rudeness, but I vow,
 "You were not quite divine till now;
 "Those limbs! that shape! and then those eyes!
 "O, close them, or the gazer dies."
 Nay, gentle pug, for goodness hush,
 I vow, and swear, you make me blush;
 I shall be angry at this rate;
 'Tis so like flatt'ry, which I hate.

The fox, in deeper cunning vers'd,
 The beauties of her mind rehears'd,
 And talk'd of knowledge, taste, and sense,
 To which the fair have vast pretence!
 Yet well he knew them always vain
 Of what they strive not to attain,
 And play'd so cunningly his part,
 That pug was rival'd in his art.

The goat avow'd his am'rous flame;
 And burnt—for what he durst not name;
 Yet hop'd a meeting in the wood
 Might make his meaning understood.
 Half angry at the bold address,
 She frown'd; but yet she must confess,
 Such beauties might inflame his blood,
 But still his phrase was somewhat rude.

The hog her neatness much admir'd;
 The formal ass her swiftness fir'd;
 While all to feed her folly strove,
 And by their praises shar'd her love.

The horse, whose gen'rous heart disdain'd
 Applause, by servile flatt'ry gain'd,
 With graceful courage, silence broke,
 And thus with indignation spoke.

When flatt'ring monkeys fawn, and prate,
 They justly raise contempt or hate;
 For merit's turn'd to ridicule,
 Applauded by the grinning fool.
 The artful fox your wit commends,
 To lure you to his selfish ends;
 From the vile flatt'rer turn away,
 For knaves make friendships to betray.
 Dismiss the train of fops, and fools,
 And learn to live by wisdom's rules;
 Such beauties might the lion warm,
 Did not your folly break the charm;
 For who would court that lovely shape,
 To be the rival of an ape?

He said; and snorting in disdain,
 Spurn'd at the crowd, and sought the plain.

FABLE III.

THE NIGHTINGALE AND GLOWWORM.

THE prudent nymph, whose cheeks disclose
 The lily, and the blushing rose,
 From public view her charms will screen,
 And rarely in the crowd be seen;
 This simple truth shall keep her wise,
 "The fairest fruits attract the flies."

ONE night, a glowworm, proud and vain,
 Contemplating her glitt'ring train,
 Cry'd, Sure there never was in nature
 So elegant, so fine a creature.
 All other insects that I see,
 The frugal ant, industrious bee,
 Or silk-worm, with contempt I view;
 With all that low, mechanic crew,
 Who servilely their lives employ
 In business, enemy to joy.
 Mean, vulgar herd! ye are my scorn,
 For grandeur only I was born,
 Or sure am sprung from race divine,
 And plac'd on earth, to live and shine.
 Those lights that sparkle so on high,
 Are but the glowworms of the sky,
 And kings on earth their gems admire,
 Because they imitate my fire.

She spoke. Attentive on a spray,
 A nightingale forbore his lay;
 He saw the shining morsel near,
 And flew, directed by the glare;
 A while he gaz'd with sober look,
 And thus the trembling prey bespoke.

Deluded fool, with pride elate,
 Know 'tis thy beauty brings thy fate:
 Less dazzling, long thou might'st have lain
 Unheeded on the velvet plain:
 Pride, soon or late, degraded mourns,
 And beauty wrecks whom she adorns.

FABLE IV.

HYMEN AND DEATH.

SIXTEEN, d'ye say? Nay, then 'tis time;
 Another year destroys your prime.
 But stay—The settlement! "That's made."
 Why then's my simple girl afraid?
 Yet hold a moment, if you can,
 And heedfully the fable scan.

THE shades were fled, the morning blush'd,
 The winds were in the caverns hush'd,
 When Hymen, pensive and sedate,
 Held o'er the fields his musing gait.
 Behind him, through the green-wood shade,
 Death's meagre form the god survey'd,
 Who quickly, with gigantic stride,
 Out-went his pace, and join'd his side.
 The chat on various subjects ran,
 Till angry Hymen thus began.

Relentless Death, whose iron sway
 Mortals reluctant must obey,
 Still of thy pow'r shall I complain,
 And thy too partial hand arraign?
 When Cupid brings a pair of hearts
 All over stuck with equal darts,
 Thy cruel shafts my hopes deride,
 And cut the knot that Hymen ty'd.

Shall not the bloody and the bold,
 The miser, hoarding up his gold,
 The harlot, reeking from the stew,
 Alone thy fell revenge pursue?
 But must the gentle, and the kind,
 Thy fury, undistinguish'd, find?

The monarch calmly thus reply'd:
Weigh well the cause, and then decide.
That friend of yours, you lately nam'd,
Cupid, alone is to be blam'd;
Then let the charge be justly laid;
That idle boy neglects his trade,
And hardly once in twenty years,
A couple to your temple bears.
The wretches, whom your office blends,
Silenus now, or Plutus sends;
Hence care, and bitterness, and strife
Are common to the nuptial life.

Believe me; more than all mankind,
Your vot'ries my compassion find;
Yet cruel am I call'd, and base,
Who seek the wretched to release;
The captive from his bonds to free,
Indissoluble but for me.

'Tis I entice him to the yoke;
By me, your crowded altars smoke:
For mortals boldly dare the noose,
Secure that death will set them loose.

FABLE V.

THE POET AND HIS PATRON.

WHY, Cælia, is your spreading waist
So loose, so negligently lac'd?
Why must the wrapping bed-gown hide
Your snowy bosom's swelling pride?
How ill that dress adorns your head,
Distain'd, and rumpled from the bed!
Those clouds, that shade your blooming face,
A little water might displace,
As nature every morn bestows
The crystal dew, to cleanse the rose.
Those tresses, as the raven black,
That wav'd in ringlets down your back,
Uncomb'd, and injur'd by neglect,
Destroy the face, which once they deck'd.

Whence this forgetfulness of dress?
Pray, madam, are you marry'd? Yes.
Nay, then indeed the wonder ceases,
No matter now how loose your dress is;
The end is won, your fortune's made,
Your sister now may take the trade.

Alas! what pity 'tis to find
This fault in half the female kind!
From hence proceed aversion, strife,
And all that fours the wedded life.
Beauty can only point the dart,
'Tis neatness guides it to the heart;
Let neatness then, and beauty strive
To keep a wav'ring flame alive.

'Tis harder far (you'll find it true)
To keep the conquest, than subdue;
Admit us once behind the screen,
What is there farther to be seen?
A newer face may raise the flame,
But every woman is the same.

Then study chiefly to improve
The charm, that fix'd your husband's love.
Weigh well his humour. Was it dress,
That gave your beauty power to bless?

Pursue it still: be neater seen;
'Tis always frugal to be clean;
So shall you keep alive desire,
And time's swift wing shall fan the fire,

In garret high (as stories say)
A poet sung his tuneful lay;
So soft, so smooth his verse, you'd swear
Apollo, and the muses there.
Through all the town his praises rung,
His sonnets at the play-house sung;
High waving o'er his lab'ring head,
The goddesses want her pinions spread,
And with poetic fury fir'd,
What Phœbus faintly had inspir'd.

A noble youth, of taste and wit,
Approv'd the sprightly things he writ,
And sought him in his cobweb dome,
Discharg'd his rent, and brought him home.

Behold him at the stately board,
Who, but the poet, and my lord!
Each day deliciously he dines,
And greedy quaffs the gen'rous wines;
His sides were plump, his skin was sleek,
And plenty wanton'd on his cheek;
Astonish'd at the change so new,
Away th' inspiring goddesses flew.

Now, dropt for politics and news,
Neglected lay the drooping muse;
Unmindful whence his fortune came,
He stifled the poetic flame;
Nor tale, nor sonnet, for my lady,
Lampoon, nor epigram was ready.

With just contempt his patron saw,
(Resolv'd his bounty to withdraw)
And thus, with anger in his look,
The late repenting fool bespoke.

Blind to the good that courts thee grown,
Whence has the sun of favour shone?
Delighted with thy tuneful art,
Esteem was growing in my heart;
But idly thou reject'st the charm,
That gave it birth, and kept it warm.

Unthinking fools alone despise
The arts, that taught them first to rise.

FABLE VI.

THE WOLF, THE SHEEP, AND THE LAMB.

DUTY demands, the parent's voice
Should sanctify the daughter's choice;
In that, is due obedience shown;
To choose, belongs to her alone.

May horror seize his midnight hour,
Who builds upon a parent's power,
And claims, by purchase vile and base,
The loathing maid for his embrace;
Hence virtue sickens: and the breast,
Where peace had built her downy nest,
Becomes the troubled seat of care,
And pines with anguish and despair.

A WOLF, rapacious, rough and bold,
Whose nightly plunders thinn'd the fold,
Contemplating his ill-spent life,
And cloy'd with thefts, would take a wife.

His purpose known, the savage race,
In num'rous crowds, attend the place;
For why, a mighty Wolf he was,
And held dominion in his jaws.
Her fav'rite whelp each mother brought,
And humbly his alliance sought;
But cold by age, or else too nice,
None found acceptance in his eyes.

It happen'd, as at early dawn,
He solitary cross'd the lawn,
Stray'd from the fold, a sportive lamb
Skip'd wanton by her fleecy dam;
When Cupid, foe to man and beast,
Discharg'd an arrow at his breast.

The tim'rous breed the robber knew,
And trembling o'er the meadow flew;
Their nimblest speed the wolf o'ertook,
And courteous, thus the dam bespoke.

Stay, fairest, and suspend your fear,
Trust me, no enemy is near;
These jaws, in slaughter oft imbru'd,
At length have known enough of blood;
And kinder business brings me now,
Vanquish'd, at beauty's feet to bow.
You have a daughter—Sweet, forgive
A wolf's address—In her I live;
Love from her eyes like lightning came,
And set my marrow all on flame;
Let your consent confirm my choice,
And ratify our nuptial joys.

Me ample wealth, and pow'r attend,
Wide o'er the plains my realms extend;
What midnight robber dare invade
The fold, if I the guard am made?
At home the shepherd's cur may sleep,
While I secure his master's sheep.

Discourse like this, attention claim'd;
Grandeur the mother's breast inflam'd;
Now fearless by his side she walk'd,
Of settlements, and jointure talk'd;
Propos'd, and doubled her commands
Of flow'ry fields, and turnip-lands.
The wolf agrees. Her bosom swells;
To Miss her happy fate she tells;
And of the grand alliance vain,
Contemns her kindred of the plain.

The loathing lamb with horror hears,
And wearies out her dam with pray'rs;
But all in vain; mama best knew
What inexperience'd girls should do;
So, to the neighb'ring meadow carry'd,
A formal ass the couple marry'd.

Torn from the tyrant-mother's side,
The trembler goes, a victim-bride,
Reluctant, meets the rude embrace,
And bleats among the howling race.
With horror oft her eyes behold
Her murder'd kindred of the fold;
Each day a sister-lamb is serv'd,
And at the glutton's table carv'd;
The crashing bones he grinds for food,
And flakes his thirst with streaming blood.

Love, who the cruel mind detests,
And lodges but in gentle breasts,
Was now no more. Enjoyment past,
The savage hunger'd for the feast;

But (as we find human race,
A mask conceals the villain's face)
Justice must authorise the treat;
Till then he long'd, but durst not eat.

As forth he walk'd in quest of prey,
The hunters met him on the way;
Fear wings his flight; the marsh he sought;
The snuffing dogs are set at fault.
His stomach balk'd, now hunger gnaws,
Howling, he grinds his empty jaws;
Food must be had, and lamb is nigh;
His maw invokes the fraudulent lie.
Is this (dissembling rage, he cry'd)
The gentle virtue of a bride?

That, leagu'd with man's destroying race,
She sets her husband for the chase?
By treach'ry prompts the noisy hound
To scent his footsteps on the ground?
Thou trait'refs vile! for this thy blood
Shall glut my rage, and dye the wood!

So saying, on the lamb he flies,
Beneath his jaws the victim dies.

FABLE VII.

THE GOOSE AND THE SWANS.

I HATE the face, however fair,
That carries an affected air;
The lisping tone, the shape constrain'd,
The study'd look, the passion feign'd,
Are fopperies, which only tend
To injure what they strive to mend.

With what superior grace enchants
The face, which nature's pencil paints
Where eyes, unexercis'd in art,
Glow with the meaning of the heart!
Where freedom and good-humour sit,
And easy gaiety, and wit!
Though perfect beauty be not there,
The master lines, the finish'd air,
We catch from every look delight,
And grow enamour'd at the sight:
For beauty, though we all approve,
Excites our wonder, more than love,
While the agreeable strikes sure,
And gives the wounds we cannot cure.

Why then, my Amoret, this care,
That forms you, in effect, less fair?
If nature on your cheek bestows
A bloom that emulates the rose,
Or from some heav'nly image drew
A form Apelles never knew,
Your ill-judg'd aid will you impart,
And spoil by meretricious art?
Or had you, nature's error, come
Abortive from the mother's womb,
Your forming care she still rejects,
Which only heightens her defects.
When such, of glitt'ring jewels proud,
Still press the foremost in the crowd,
At every public show are seen,
With look awry, and awkward mien,
The gaudy dress attracts the eye,
And magnifies deformity.

Nature may under-do her part,
But seldom wants the help of art;

Trust her; she is your surest friend,
Nor made your form for you to mend.

A Goose, affected, empty, vain,
The shrillest of the cackling train,
With proud and elevated crest,
Precedence claim'd above the rest.

Says she, I laugh at human race,
Who say, geese hobble in their pace;
Look here! the sland'rous lie detect;
Not haughty man is so erect.

That peacock yonder! Lord, how vain
The creature's of his gaudy train!
If both were stript, I'd pawn my word.
A goose would be the finer bird.

Nature, to hide her own defects,
Her bungled work with finery decks;
Were geese set off with half that show,
Would men admire the peacock? No.

Thus vaunting, cross the mead she stalks,
The cackling breed attend her walks;
The sun shot down his noon-tide beams,
The swans were sporting in the streams;
Their snowy plumes, and stately pride
Provok'd her spleen. Why there, she cry'd,
Again, what arrogance we see!
Those creatures! how they mimic me!
Shall every fowl the waters skim,
Because we geese are known to swim?
Humility they soon shall learn,
And their emptiness discern.

So saying, with extended wings,
Lightly upon the wave she springs;
Her bosom swells, she spreads her plumes,
And the swan's stately crest assumes.
Contempt and mockery ensu'd,
And bursts of laughter shook the flood.

A swan, superior to the rest,
Sprung forth, and thus the fool address'd.

Conceited thing, elate with pride!
Thy affectation all deride;
These airs thy awkwardness impart,
And show thee plainly, as thou art.
Among thy equals of the flock,
Thou hadst escap'd the public mock.
And as thy parts to good conduce,
Been deem'd an honest hobbling goose.

Learn hence to study wisdom's rules;
Know, foppery's the pride of fools;
And striving nature to conceal,
You only her defects reveal.

FABLE VIII.

THE LAWYER AND JUSTICE.

Love! thou divinest good below,
Thy pure delights few mortals know!
Our rebel hearts thy sway disown,
While tyrant lust usurps thy throne.

The bounteous God of nature made
The sexes for each other's aid,
Their mutual talents to employ,
To lessen ills, and heighten joy.
To weaker woman he assign'd
That soft'ning goodness of mind,

That can, by sympathy, impart
Its likeness to the roughest heart.
Her eyes with magic pow'r endu'd,
To fire the dull, and awe the rude.
His rosy fingers on her face
Shed lavish every blooming grace,
And stamp'd (perfection to display)
His mildest image on her clay,

Man, active, resolute, and bold,
He fashion'd in a different mould,
With useful arts his mind inform'd,
His breast with nobler passions warm'd;
He gave him knowledge, taste and sense,
And courage, for the fair's defence.
Her frame, resistless to each wrong,
Demands protection from the strong;
To man she flies, when fear alarms,
And claims the temple of his arms.

By nature's author thus declar'd
The woman's sov'reign, and her guard,
Shall man, by treach'rous wiles, invade
The weakness he was meant to aid?
While beauty, given to inspire
Protecting love, and soft desire,
Lights up a wild-fire in the heart,
And to its own breast points the dart,
Becomes the spoiler's base pretence
To triumph over innocence?

The wolf, that tears the tim'rous sheep,
Was never set the fold to keep;
Nor was the tiger, or the pard
Meant the benighted traveller's guard;
But man, the wildest beast of prey,
Wears friendship's semblance, to betray;
His strength against the weak employs,
And where he should protect, destroys.

Past twelve o'clock, the watchman cry'd,
His brief the studious lawyer ply'd;
The all-prevailing fee lay nigh,
The earnest of to-morrow's lie.
Sudden the furious winds arise,
The jarring casement shatter'd flies;
The doors admit a hollow sound,
And rattling from their hinges bound;
When Justice, in a blaze of light,
Reveal'd her radiant form to fight.

The wretch with thrilling horror shook,
Loose every joint, and pale his look;
Not having seen her in the courts,
Or found her mention'd in reports,
He ask'd, with fault'ring tongue, her name,
Her errand there, and whence she came?

Sternly the white-rob'd Shade reply'd,
(A crimson glow her visage dy'd)
Canst thou be doubtful who I am?
Is Justice grown so strange a name?
Were not your courts for Justice rais'd?
'Twas there, of old, my altars blaz'd.
My guardian thee did I elect,
My sacred temple to protect,
That thou, and all thy venal tribe
Should spurn the goddess for the bribe?
Aloud the ruin'd client cries,
Justice has neither ears, nor eyes;

In foul alliance with the bar,
'Gainst me the judge denounces war,
And rarely issues his decree,
But with intent to baffle me.

She paus'd Her breast with fury burn'd.
The trembling lawyer thus return'd.

I own the charge is justly laid,
And weak th' excuse that can be made;
Yet search the spacious globe, and see
If all mankind are not like me

The gown-man, skill'd in Romish lies,
By faith's false glass deludes our eyes;
O'er conscience rides without controul,
And robs the man to save his soul.

The doctor, with important face,
By fly design, mistakes the case;
Prescribes, and spins out the disease,
To trick the patient of his fees.

The soldier, rough with many a scar,
And red with slaughter, leads the war;
If he a nation's trust betray,
The foe has offer'd double pay.

When vice o'er all mankind prevails,
And weighty int'rest turns the scales,
Must I be better than the rest,
And harbour justice in my breast?
On one side only take the fee,
Content with poverty and thee?

Thou blind to sense, and vile of mind,
Th' exasperated Shade rejoin'd,
If virtue from the world is flown,
Will others' frauds excuse thy own?
For sickly souls the priest was made;
Physicians, for the body's aid;
The soldier guarded liberty;
Man woman, and the lawyer me.
If all are faithless to their trust,
They leave not thee the less unjust.
Henceforth your pleadings I disclaim,
And bar the sanction of my name;
Within your courts it shall be read,
That justice from the law is fled.

She spoke; and hid in shades her face
Till Hardwicke sooth'd her into grace.

FABLE IX.

THE FARMER, THE SPANIEL, AND THE CAT.

Why knits my dear her angry brow?
What rude offence alarms you now?
I said, that Delia's fair, 'tis true,
But did I say she equall'd you?
Can't I another's face commend,
Or to her virtues be a friend,
But instantly your forehead lours,
As if her merit lessen'd yours?
From female envy never free,
All must be blind, because you see.

Survey the gardens, fields, and bow'rs,
The buds, the blossoms, and the flow'rs,
Then tell me where the woodbine grows,
That vies in sweetness with the rose?
Or where the lily's snowy white,
That throws such beauties on the sight?
Yet folly is it to declare,
That these are neither sweet, nor fair,

The crystal shines with fainter rays,
Before the di'mond's brighter blaze;
And sops will say, the di'mond dies,
Before the lustre of your eyes:
But I, who deal in truth, deny
That neither shine when you are by.

When zephyrs o'er the blossoms stray,
And sweets along the air convey,
Sha'n't I the fragrant breeze inhale,
Because you breathe a sweeter gale?

Sweet are the flow'rs, that deck the field;
Sweet is the smell the blossoms yield;
Sweet is the summer gale that blows;
And sweet, though sweeter you, the rose.

Shall envy then torment your breast,
If you are lovelier than the rest?
For while I give to each her due,
By praising them I flatter you;
And praising most, I still declare
You fairest, where the rest are fair.

As at his board a farmer sate,
Replenish'd by his homely treat,
His fav'rite spaniel near him stood,
And with his master shar'd the food;
The crackling bones his jaws devour'd,
His lapping tongue the trenchers scour'd;
'Till sated now, supine he lay,
And snor'd the rising fumes away.

The hungry cat, in turn, drew near,
And humbly crav'd a servant's share;
Her modest worth the master knew,
And straight the fatt'ning morsel threw:
Enrag'd the snarling cur awoke,
And thus, with spiteful envy, spoke.

They only claim a right to eat,
Who earn by services their meat.
Me, zeal and industry inflame
To scour the fields, and spring the game;
Or, plunging in the wint'ry wave,
For man the wounded bird to save.
With watchful diligence I keep
From prowling wolves, his fleecy sheep;
At home his midnight hours secure,
And drive the robber from the door.
For this, his breast with kindness glows;
For this, his hand the food bestows;
And shall thy indolence impart
A warmer friendship to his heart,
That thus he robs me of my due,
To pamper such vile things as you?

I own (with meekness puffs reply'd)
Superior merit on your side;
Nor does my breast with envy swell,
To find it recompens'd so well:
Yet I, in what my nature can,
Contribute to the good of man.
Whose claws destroy the pilf'ring mouse?
Who drives the vermin from the house?
Or, watchful for the lab'ring swain,
From lurking rats secures the grain?
From hence, if he rewards bestow,
Why should your heart with gall o'erflow?
Why pine my happiness to see,
Since there's enough for you and me?

Thy words are just, the farmer cry'd,
And spurn'd the snarler from his side.

FABLE X.

THE SPIDER AND THE BEE.

THE nymph, who walks the public streets,
And sets her cap at all she meets,
May catch the fool who turns to stare,
But men of sense avoid the snare.

As on the margin of the flood,
With silken line, my Lydia stood,
I smil'd to see the pains you took,
To cover o'er the fraudulent hook.
Along the forest as we stray'd,
You saw the boy his lime-twigs spread;
Guess'd you the reason of his fear,
Lest, heedless, we approach'd too near?
For as behind the bush we lay,
The linnet flutter'd on the spray.

Needs there such caution to delude
The scaly fry, and feather'd brood?
And think you, with inferior art,
To captivate the human heart?

The maid, who modestly conceals
Her beauties, while she hides, reveals,
Give but a glimpse, and fancy draws
Whate'er the Grecian Venus was.
From Eve's first fig-leaf to brocade,
All dress was meant for fancy's aid,
Which evermore delighted dwells
On what the bashful nymph conceals.

When Cælia struts in man's attire,
She shows too much to raise desire;
But from the hoop's bewitching round,
Her very shoe has power to wound.

The roving eye, the bosom bare,
The forward laugh, the wanton air,
May catch the fop; for gudgeons strike
At the bare hook, and bait alike;
While salmon play regardless by,
Till art, like nature, forms the fly.

BENEATH a peasant's homely thatch,
A spider long had held her watch;
From morn to night, with restless care,
She spun her web, and wove her snare,
Within the limits of her reign,
Lay many a heedless captive slain,
Or flutt'ring, struggled in the toils,
To burst the chains, and shun her wiles.

A straying bee, that perch'd hard by,
Beheld her with disdainful eye,
And thus began. Mean thing, give o'er,
And lay thy slender threads no more;
A thoughtless fly or two, at most,
Is all the conquest thou canst boast;
For bees of sense thy arts evade,
We see so plain the nets are laid.

The gaudy tulip, thus displays
Her spreading foliage to the gaze;
That points her charms at all she sees,
And yields to every wanton breeze,
Attracts not me; where blushing grows,
Guarded with thorns, the modest rose,
Enamour'd, round and round I fly,
Or on her fragrant bosom lie;

Reluctant, she my ardour meets,
And bashful, renders up her sweets.

To wiser head attention lend,
And learn this lesson from a friend,
She, who with modesty retires,
Adds fuel to her lover's fires,
While such incautious jilts as you,
By folly your own schemes undo.

FABLE XI.

THE YOUNG LION AND THE APE.

'Tis true, I blame your lover's choice,
Though flatter'd by the public voice,
And peevish grow, and sick, to hear
His exclamations, O how fair!
I listen not to wild delights,
And transports of expected nights:
What is to me your hoard of charms
The whiteness of your neck and arms
Needs there no acquisition more,
To keep contention from the door?
Yes; pass a fortnight, and you'll find,
All beauty cloy, but of the mind.

Sense and good humour ever prove
The surest cords to fasten love.
Yet, Phillis, simplest of your sex,
You never think but to perplex,
Coquetting it with every ape
That struts abroad in human shape;
Not that the coxcomb is your taste,
But that it stings your lover's breast;
To-morrow you resign the sway,
Prepar'd to honour, and obey,
The tyrant-mistress change for life,
To the submission of a wife.

Your follies, if you can, suspend,
And learn instruction from a friend.

Reluctant, hear the first address,
Think often, ere you answer, yes;
But once resolv'd, throw off disguise,
And wear your wishes in your eyes.
With caution every look forbear,
That might create one jealous fear,
A lover's ripening hopes confound,
Or give the gen'rous breast a wound.
Contemn the girlish arts to tease,
Nor use your pow'r, unless to please;
For fools alone with rigour sway,
When soon, or late, they must obey.

THE king of brutes, in life's decline,
Resolv'd dominion to resign;
The beasts were summon'd to appear,
And bend before the royal heir.
They came; a day was fix'd; the crowd
Before their future monarch bow'd.

A dapper monkey, pert and vain,
Stepp'd forth, and thus address'd the train.

Why cringe my friends with slavish awe,
Before this pageant king of straw?
Shall we anticipate the hour,
And ere we feel it, own his pow'r?
The counsels of experience prize,
I know the maxims of the wise;

Subjection let us cast away,
And live the monarchs of to-day;
'Tis ours the vacant hand to spurn,
And play the tyrant each in turn.
So shall he right from wrong discern,
And mercy from oppression learn;
At others' woes be taught to melt,
And loathe the ills himself has felt.

He spoke; his bosom swell'd with pride,
The youthful lion thus reply'd.

What madness prompts thee to provoke
My wrath, and dare th' impending stroke?
Thou wretched fool! can wrongs impart
Compassion to the feeling heart?
Or teach the grateful breast to glow,
The hand to give, or eye to flow?
Learn'd in the practice of their schools,
From women thou hast drawn thy rules:
To them return; in such a cause,
From only such expect applause;
The partial sex I not condemn,
For liking those, who copy them.

Would'st thou the gen'rons lion bind,
By kindness bribe him to be kind;
Good offices their likeness get,
And payment lessons not their debt;
With multiplying hand he gives
The good, from others he receives:
Or for the bad makes fair return,
And pays, with int'rest, scorn for scorn.

FABLE XII.

THE COLT AND THE FARMER.

TELL me, Corinna, if you can,
Why so averse, so coy to man?
Did nature, lavish of her care,
From her best pattern form you fair,
That you, ungrateful to her cause,
Should mock her gifts, and spurn her laws?
And miser-like, withhold that store,
Which, by imparting, blesses more?

Beauty's a gift, by heav'n assign'd,
The portion of the female kind;
For this the yielding maid demands
Protection at her lover's hands;
And though by wasting years it fade,
Remembrance tells him, once 'was paid.

And will you then this wealth conceal,
For age to rust, or time to steal?
The summer of your youth to rove,
A stranger to the joys of love?
Then, when life's winter hastens on,
And youth's fair heritage is gone,
Dow'rlcss to court some peasant's arms,
To guard your wither'd age from harms;
No gratitude to warm his breast,
For blooming beauty, once possess'd;
How will you curse that stubborn pride,
Which drove your bark across the tide,
And sailing before folly's wind,
Left sense and happiness behind?

Corinna, lest these whims prevail,
To such as you, I write my tale.

A COLT, for blood, and mettled speed,
The choicest of the running breed,
Of youthful strength, and beauty vain,
Refus'd subjection to the rein.
In vain the groom's officious skill
Oppos'd his pride, and check'd his will;
In vain the master's forming care
Restrain'd with threats, or sooth'd with pray'r;
Of freedom proud, and scorning man,
Wild o'er the spacious plains he ran.

Where'er luxuriant nature spread
Her flow'ry carpet o'er the mead,
Or bubbling streams soft-gliding pass,
To cool and freshen up the grass,
Disdaining bounds, he cropp'd the blade,
And wanton'd in the spoil he made.

In plenty thus the summer pass'd,
Revolving winter came at last;
The trees no more a shelter yield,
The verdure withers from the field,
Perpetual snows invest the ground,
In icy chains the streams are bound;
Cold, nipping winds, and rattling hail,
His lank, unshelter'd sides assail.

As round he cast his rueful eyes,
He saw the thatch'd-roof cottage rise;
The prospect touch'd his heart with cheer,
And promis'd kind deliv'rance near.
A stable, erst his scorn and hate,
Was now become his wish'd retreat;
His passion cool, his pride forgot,
A farmer's welcome yard he sought.

The master saw his woeful plight,
His limbs, that totter'd with his weight,
And, friendly, to the stable led,
And saw him litter'd, dress'd, and fed.
In slothful ease, all night he lay;
The servants rose at break of day;
The market calls. Along the road,
His back must bear the pond'rous load;
In vain he struggles, or complains,
Incessant blows reward his pains.
To-morrow varies but his toil;
Chain'd to the plough, he breaks the soil;
While scanty meals, at night repay
The painful labours of the day.

Subdu'd by toil, with anguish rent,
His self-upbraidings found a vent.
Wretch that I am! he sighing said,
By arrogance and folly led,
Had but my restive youth been brought
To learn the lesson nature taught,
Then had I, like my fires of yore,
The prize from every courser bore;
While man bestow'd rewards and praise,
And females crown'd my latter days.
Now lasting servitude's my lot,
My birth condemn'd, my speed forgot,
Doom'd am I, for my pride, to bear
A living death, from year to year.

FABLE XIII.

THE OWL AND THE NIGHTINGALE.

To know the mistress' humour right,
See if her maids are clean and tight;

If Betty waits without her stays,
She copies but her lady's ways.
When miss comes in with boist'rous shout,
And drops no curtsy going out;
Depend upon't, mamma is one,
Who reads, or drinks too much alone.

If bottled beer her thirst assuage,
She feels enthusiastic rage,
And burns with ardour to inherit
The gifts and workings of the spirit.
If learning crack her giddy brains,
No remedy, but death, remains.
Sum up the various ills of life,
And all are sweet to such a wife.
At home, superior wit she vaunts,
And twits her husband with his wants;
Her ragged offspring all around,
Like pigs, are wallowing on the ground:
Impatient ever of controul,
She knows no order, but of foul;
With books her litter'd floor is spread,
Of nameless authors, never read;
Foul linen, petticoats, and lace
Fill up the intermediate space.
Abroad, at visitings, her tongue
Is never still, and always wrong;
All meanings she defines away,
And stands, with truth and sense, at bay.

If e'er she meets a gentle heart,
Skill'd in the housewife's useful art,
Who makes her family her care,
And builds contentment's temple there,
She starts at such mistakes in nature,
And cries, Lord help us! what a creature!

Melissa, if the moral strike,
You'll find the fable not unlike.

AN owl, puff'd up with self-conceit,
Lov'd learning better than his meat;
Old manuscripts he treasur'd up,
And rummag'd every grocers shop;
At pastry-cooks was known to ply,
And strip, for science, every pyc.
For modern poetry, and wit,
He had read all that Blackmore writ;
So intimate with Curl was grown,
His learned treasures were his own;
To all his authors had access,
And sometimes would correct the press.
In logic he acquir'd such knowledge,
You'd swear him fellow of a college;
Alike to every art and science,
His daring genius bid defiance,
And swallow'd wisdom with that haste,
That cits do custards at a feast.

Within the shelter of a wood,
One ev'ning, as he musing stood,
Hard by, upon a leafy spray,
A nightingale began his lay.
Sudden he starts, with anger stung,
And, screeching, interrupts the song.

Pert, busy thing, thy airs give o'er,
And let my contemplations soar.
What is the music of thy voice,
But jarring dissonance, and noise?

Be wise. True harmony, thou'lt find,
Not in the throat, but in the mind;
By empty chirping not attain'd,
But by laborious study gain'd.
Go read the authors Pope explodes,
Fathom the depth of Cibber's odes,
With modern plays improve thy wit,
Read all the learning Henley writ;
And, if thou needs must sing, sing then,
And emulate the ways of men;
So shalt thou grow, like me, refin'd,
And bring improvement to thy kind.

Thou wretch, the little warbler cry'd,
Made up of ignorance and pride,
Ask all the birds, and they'll declare,
A greater blockhead wings not air.
Read o'er thyself, thy talents scan,
Science was only meant for man.
No useless authors we molest,
I mind the duties of my nest;
With careful wing protect my young,
And cheer their ev'nings with a song.

Thus, following nature, and her laws,
From men and birds I claim applause;
While nurs'd in pedantry and sloth,
An owl is scorn'd alike by both.

FABLE XIV.

THE TEMPLE OF HYMEN*.

As on my couch supine I lay,
Like others, dreaming life away;
Methought, expanded to my sight,
A temple rear'd its stately height.
All ready built, without omitting
One ornament, for temples fitting.

Large look'd the pile, sublime and fair;
But "Who the Godhead worship'd there?"
This to inquire, appearing meet,
Imagination lent me feet,
And thither, without further cavil,
I fairly undertook to travel.

At once, in bright procession spied,
The female world was at my side,
Mingled, like many colour'd patterns,
Nymphs, mes dames, trollops, belles, and flatterns,
From point, and saucy ermine, down
To the plain coif, and russet gown;
All, by inquiry as I found,
On one important errand bound.

Their van, to either tropic spread,
Forerunning expectation led;
Pleasure the female-standard bore,
And youth danc'd lightly on before;
While prudence, judgment, sense, and taste,
The few directing virtues, placed

* This and the three following Fables were written by Henry Brooke, Esq., author of "Gustavus Vasa," the Earl of Essex, "Fool of Quality," &c. The three last were originally printed in Moore's Fables. The first is inserted in this present edition, from Brooke's "Plays and Poems," 8vo. 1778, as a suitable companion to the rest.

To form and guide a woman's mind,
Discarded, sigh'd and slunk behind.

At length, in jubilee, arriving,
Where dwelt the jolly god of wiveing,
All prest promiscuously to enter,
Nor once reflected on the venture,
But here, the muse, affecting state,
Beckon'd her clamorous sex to wait,
Lest such a rendezvous should hinder
To say what past, the while, within door.

Against the portal, full in sight,
His sable vesture starr'd like night,
High thron'd upon an ebon seat,
Beneath a canopy of state,
That o'er his dusky temples nodded,
Was fix'd the matrimonial godhead.

Low at his feet, in pomp display'd,
The world's collected wealth was laid :
Where bags of mammon, pil'd around,
And chests on chests, o'erwhelm'd the ground,
With bills, bonds, parchments, the appointers
Of doweries, settlements, and jointures ;
From whence, in just proportion weigh'd,
And down, by special tail, convey'd,
The future progenies inherit
Taste, beauty, virtue, sense, and merit.

Whatever titles here may suit us
For this same god, Hymen, or Plutus,
Who, from his trade of a gold-finder,
Might now become a marriage-binder,
And, haply, use that precious metal
To solder sexes, like a kettle ;
No earthly god, in my opinion,
Claim'd such an absolute dominion.

To prove his right to adoration
Through every age, and every nation,
Around the spacious dome, display'd
By many a fabled light and shade,
Was emblematically told
The great omnipotence of gold.

And first, in yonder panel seen,
A lad, call'd Paris, strolled the green,
Poor, hungry, wileless, and dejected,
By country, and by kin, neglected ;
Till fortune, as she cross'd the plain,
Conceiv'd a crotchet in her brain,
And, laughing at the bashful blockhead,
Took a huge pippin from her pocket,
Of the true glittering tempting kind,
And gold throughout from core to rind ;
This, in a whim, the dame bestow'd,
Then smiling, turn'd, and went her road.

The neighbours, now, when fame had shown
The youth had got the summum bonum, [em
From many a hut and hamlet crowd,
And duly at his levy bow'd.
His reputation spreads apace—
O, such a shape, and such a face !
His mouth he opens, and they swear
The Delphic oracle is there.

Now, see the king of Troy aspire
To be the wealthy shepherd's fire.
For him, the brightest nymphs contended ;
To him, three goddesses descended,
And show'd, in fair and open day,
Where honour, wit, and beauty lay,

O'er which, our poem, to conceal
From vulgar optics, drops a veil.

In the next panel, you discover
Olympic Jove, that thundering lover,
Who, charm'd with old Acrisius' daughter,
In many a shape had vainly sought her,
And run the round of all his tricks,
Yet still was doubtful where to fix ;
Till, by some wiser head inclin'd,
To cast his blustering bolt behind,
His duller light'ning to withhold,
And wear the brighter form of gold,
He took the hint, he storm'd the tower,
And dropt in yon omnific shower.

In the next board, the tale so common is,
'Twixt Atalanta and Hippomenes,
I shall but slightly stop a minute,
To drop one observation in it ;
Remarking, that howe'er prefer'd to
Their sex, for many a course in virtue,
The bright allurements, well applied,
May tempt good nymphs to turn aside.

Next, Lybia's golden orchard grew
Blooming temptation to the view,
In which a dragon, call'd the Law,
Kept conscientious fools in awe :
Yet, power superior to the crime,
And tall ambition skill'd to climb,
With traitors of a new invention,
Who sell their country for a pension,
Through many a thicket won their way,
And spoil'd the grove, and shar'd the prey.

On the same golden system laid,
The world was in the fifth display'd :
The earth a golden axis turn'd ;
The heavens, with golden planets, burn'd ;
And thence, as astrologians know,
Derived their influence below :
A girdle, call'd the zodiac, grac'd
The glittering round of nature's waste,
Whose mystic charm from gold arises,
For this the Cæstus of the skies is ;
And as in Homer's works, we read
(And Homer is the poet's creed)
Of a well twisted golden tether,
That tied the heavens and earth together,
Such was the cord, or such the cable,
That tied the spheres within this table ;
By which, the artist, underhand,
Would give the wise to understand,
That interest, in every creature,
Throughout religion, law, and nature,
From east to west, and pole to pole,
Moves, binds, suspends, and turns the whole.

While thus, in passing slightly o'er, I
Surveyed the scenes of ancient story ;
Or eyed, with more minute attention,
What prudence here forbids to mention ;
The muse my shoulder tapp'd, to mind me
Of things that pass'd, the while, behind me.

I turn'd, and view'd, with deep surprise,
The phantom that assail'd my eyes :
His hinder-head disrob'd of hair,
His sapless back, and shoulders bare,
Confest the wrinkles of a sage
Who past ten Nestors in his age ;

But clothed before, with decent grace,
And infant sweetness in his face,
Not Smintheus with such vigour strung,
Nor blooming Hebe look'd so young.

On his left hand a palette lay,
With many a tint of colours gay;
While, guided with an easy flight,
The flying pencil graced his right.

Unnumber'd canvasses appear'd,
Before the moving artist rear'd,
On whose inspirited expanse he
Express'd the creatures of his fancy;
So touch'd, with such a swift command,
With such a magic power of hand,
That Nature did herself appear
Less real than her semblance here,
And not a mortal, so betray'd,
Could know the substance from the shade!

Whate'er the world conceives in life,
Worth toil, anxiety, and strife;
Whate'er by ignorance is bought,
By madness wish'd, or folly sought,
The mitres, coronets, and garters,
To which ambition leads his martyrs;
With every joy, and toy, that can
Amuse the various child of man,
Was painted here in many a scene,
A trifling, transient, charming train!

Awhile I stood, in thought suspended,
To guess what these affairs intended;
When lo! the muse in whispers told,
" 'Tis Father Time whom you behold;
" In part discovered to the wife,
" In part conceal'd from human eyes.
" A slave to yon gold-giving power,
" For him he spends each restless hour;
" The product of his toil intends
" As gifts to those his God befriends,
" And paints what other mortals view
" As substances, though shades to you."

She ceas'd, and turning to the sentry,
Desired he'd give the ladies entry;
And straight the portal open'd wide,
And in they delug'd like a tide.
So, to some grove by stress of weather,
Fast flock the fowl of every feather;
A mighty, pretty, prating rabble,
Like Iris rigg'd and tongu'd like Babel;
Then crowding toward the nuptial throne,
By bags of strong attraction known,
Eow bending to their God they bow'd,
And vented thus their prayer aloud:

" Great Power! in whom our sex confides,
" Who rulest the turns of female tides;
" Who kenst while varying fancy ranges
" Through all its doubles, twirls and changes,
" To what a woman's heart is prone,
" A secret to ourselves unknown—
" O give us, give us, Mighty Power!
" The wedded joy of every hour:
" Assign thy favourites in marriage,
" To coaches of distinguish'd carriage;
" To all the frippery of dressing
" A nameless, boundless, endless blessing;
" To drums, ridottos, fights and founds;
" To visits in eternal rounds;

" To card and counter, rake and rattle;
" To the whole lust of tongue and tattle;
" And all the dear delightful trances
" Of countless frolics, fits, and fancies.
" You've heard, that men, unpolish'd boors?
" Lay naughty passions at our doors;
" 'Tis your's to contradict the liar,
" Who are, yourself, our chief desire.
" O then, as widow, or as wife,
" To you we yield each choice in life;
" Or would you every prayer fulfil,
" Wed us, O! wed us, to our will!"

They ceas'd, and, without more addition,
The God confirm'd their full petition:
To Time he beckon'd, and desired
He'd give the good each nymph required;
And from his visionary treasure,
Wed every woman to her pleasure.

The first, who came resolv'd to fix
Upon a gilded coach and fix;
The suit was granted her on sight,
The nymph with ardour seiz'd her right.
A wonder! by possession banish'd,
The coach and dappled couriers vanish'd;
And a foul waggon held the fair
Full laden with a weight of care:
She sigh'd; her sisters caught the sound,
And one insulting laugh went round.

The second was a dame of Britain,
Who by a coronet was smitten;
With boldness she advanc'd her claim,
Exulting in so just a flame.
But ah! where bliss alone was patent,
What unsuspected mischief latent!
The worst in all Pandora's box,
Her coronet contain'd a —.

With this example in her eye,
The third, a widow'd dame, drew nigh,
And fix'd her sight and soul together
Upon a raking hat and feather;
Nor sigh'd in vain, but seiz'd her due,
And clasp'd old age in twenty-two.

Thus, through the difference and degrees
Of sword-knots, mitres, and toupees,
Prim bands, pert bobs and well hung blades,
Long robes, smart jackets, fierce cockades,
And all the fooleries in fashion,
Whate'er became the darling passion,
The good for which they did importune,
Was straight revers'd into misfortune;
And every woman, like the first,
Was, at her own entreaty, curst.

At length, was introduced a fair,
With such a face, and such an air,
As never was on earth, I ween,
Save by poetic organs seen.

With decent grace, and gentle cheer,
The bright adventurer drew near;
Her mild approach the Godhead spied,
And, " Fairest," with a smile, he cried,
" If aught you seek in Hymen's power,
" You find him in a happy hour."
At this, the virgin, half amazed,
As round the spacious dome she gazed,
With caution every symbol eyed,
And, blushing, gracefully replied,

" If you are he, whose power controuls
 " And knits the sympathy of souls,
 " Then, whence this pomp of worthless geer,
 " And why this heap of counters here?
 " Is this vain show of glittering ore,
 " The bliss, that Hymen has in store?
 " Love sees the folly, with the gloss,
 " And laughs to scorn thy useless dross.
 " Where are the symbols of thy reign?
 " And where thy robe of Tyrian grain,
 " Whose tint, in virgin-colours dyed,
 " Derives its blushing from the bride?
 " Where is thy torch, serenely bright,
 " To lovers yielding warmth and light,
 " That from the heart derives its fire,
 " And only can, with life, expire?
 " Will this unactive mass impart
 " The social feelings of the heart?
 " Or can material fetters bind
 " The free affections of the mind?
 " Through every age, the great, the wise,
 " Behold thee with superior eyes;
 " Love spurns thy treasures with disdain,
 " And virtue flies thy hostile reign.
 " By love, congenial souls embrace,
 " Celestial source of human race!
 " From whence the cordial sense within,
 " The bosom'd amities of kin,
 " The call of nature to her kind,
 " And all the tunings of the mind,
 " That, winding Heaven's harmonious plan,
 " Compose the brotherhood of man."

She said, and gracefully withdrew;
 Her steps the muse and I pursue.
 Along an unfrequented way
 The virgin led, nor led astray;
 Till, like the first, in form and size,
 A second fabric struck our eyes:
 We enter'd, guided by the fair,
 And saw a second Hymen there.

A silken robe, of saffron hue,
 About his decent shoulders flew;
 While a fair taper's virgin light
 Gave Ovid to his soul and fight.

An hundred Cupids wanton'd round,
 Whose useless quivers strew'd the ground;
 While, careless of their wonted trade,
 They with the smiling Graces play'd.

Along the wall's extended side,
 With taints of varying nature dyed,
 In needled tapestry, was told
 The tale of many a love of old.

In groves, that breath'd a citron air,
 Together walk'd the wedded pair;
 Or toy'd upon the vernal ground,
 Their beauteous offspring sporting round,
 Or, lock'd in sweet embracement, lay,
 And slept, and lov'd, the night away.

There sat Penelope in tears,
 Besieg'd, like Troy, for ten long years:
 Her suitors, in a neighbouring room,
 Wait the long promise of the loom,
 Which she defers from day to day,
 Till death, determin'd to delay.
 With thoughts of fond remembrance wrung,
 Deep forrowing, o'er her work she hung;

Where in the fields at Ilium fought,
 The labours of her lord she wrought,
 The toil, the dust, the flying foe,
 The rallied host, the instant blow;
 Then sighing, trembled at the view,
 Scar'd at the dangers which she drew.

There too, suspended o'er the wave,
 Alcione was seen to rave,
 When, as the foundering wreck she spied,
 She on her sinking Ceyx cried:
 Her Ceyx, though by seas oppress'd,
 Still bears her image in his breast;
 And, with his fondest, latest breath,
 Murmurs, " Alcione!" in death.

Panthea there, upon a bier,
 Laid the sole lord of her desire:
 His limbs were scatter'd through the plains;
 She join'd and kiss'd the dear remains.
 Too ponderous was her weight of woe
 For sighs to rise, or tears to flow;
 On the lov'd corse she fix'd her view,
 No other use of seeing knew;
 While high and steadfast as she gaz'd,
 Her snowy arm a poniard rais'd,
 Nor yet the desperate weapon staid,
 But for a longer look delay'd,
 Till, plung'd within her beauteous breast,
 She on his bosom sunk to rest.

But, Oh! beyond whate'er was told
 In modern tales, or truths of old,
 One pair, in form and spirit twin'd,
 Out-lov'd the loves of human kind;
 She Hero, he Leander, nam'd,
 For mutual faith as beauty fam'd!
 Their story from its source begun,
 And to the fatal period run.

While bow'd at Cytherea's shrine,
 The youth ador'd her power divine,
 He sees her blooming priestess there,
 Beyond the sea-born goddess fair:
 She, as some god, the stripling eyes,
 Just lighted from his native skies—
 The god whose chariot guides the hour,
 Or haply love's immortal power.

At once their conscious glances spoke
 Like fate the strong and mutual stroke;
 Attracted by a secret force,
 Like currents meeting in their course,
 That thence one stream for ever rolls,
 Together rush'd their mingling souls,
 Too close for fortune to divide,
 For each was lost in either tide.

In vain, by ruthless parents torn,
 Their bodies are asunder borne,
 And towering bulwarks intervene,
 And envious ocean rolls between;
 Love wings their letters o'er the sea,
 And kisses melt the seals away.

And now the sable night impends,
 Leander to the shore descends,
 Exults at the appointed hour,
 And marks the signal on the tower—
 A torch, to guide the lover's way,
 Endear'd beyond the brightest day!

At once he plunges in the tide;
 His arms the Hellespont divide;

The danger and the toil he braves,
And dashes the contending waves.

While near and nearer to his sight
The taper darts a ruddier light,
Recruited at the view, he glows:
Aside the whelming billow throws:
The winds and seas oppose in vain;
He spurns, he mounts, he skims the main.

Now from the tower, where Hero stood,
And threw a radiance o'er the flood,
Leander in the deep she spied,
And would have sprung to join his side;
Howe'er, her wishes make essay,
And clasp and warm him on his way.

The main is cross'd, the shore is gain'd,
The long wish'd hour at last attain'd.
But, lovers, if there e'er arose
A pair so form'd and fond as those,
So lov'd, so beauteous, and so blest,
Alone can speak or think the rest;
Nor will the weeping muse unfold
The close, too tragic to be told!

Long were the loving list to name
With Portia's faith, that swallow'd flame:
But much the longer list were those Whose joys were unallay'd by woes;
Whose bliss no cruel parents cross,
Whose love not ages could exhaust,
Where not a cloud did intervene,
Or once o'ercast their bright serene,
But through the summer's day of life,
The husband, tender as the wife,
Like Henry and his nut-brown maid,
Their faith nor shaken nor decay'd,
Together ran the blissful race,
Together liv'd, and slept in peace.

Long time the much inquiring maid
From story on to story stray'd;
Joy'd in the joys that lovers know,
Or wept her tribute to their woe;
Till Hymen, with a placid air,
Approaching, thus address'd the fair:

"Hail to the nymph, whose sacred train
Of virtues shall restore my reign!
Whate'er the wishes of thy soul,
But speak them, and possess the whole."

"Thanks, gentle power," the maid reply'd;
"Your bounty shall be amply try'd.
I seek not titles, rank, or state,
Superfluous to the truly great;
Nor yet to sordid wealth inclin'd,
The poorest passion of the mind;
But, simply fix'd to nature's plan,
I seek the associate in the man."

"Yet, O beware! for much depends
On what that syllable intends.
Give him a form that may delight
My inward sense, my mental sight;
In every outward act design'd
To speak an elegance of mind."

"In him, by science, travel, taste,
Be nature polish'd, not defac'd;
And set, as is the brilliant stone,
To be with double lustre shown."

"Sweet be the music of his tongue,
And as the lyre of David strung,

VOL. X

"To steal from each delighted day
Affliction, care, and time, away.
"Within his comprehensive soul
Let Heaven's harmonious system roll;
"There let the great, the good, the wise,
Of sam'd antiquity arise,
"From ev'ry age and ev'ry clime
Eluding death, and circling time!
"There let the sacred virtues meet,
And range their known and native seat!
"There let the charities unite,
And human feelings weep delight."
"Kind power! if such a youth you know,
He's all the heaven I ask below."
So wish'd the much aspiring maid,
Pale turn'd the power, and, sighing, said:
"Alas! like him you fondly claim,
Through every boasted form and name,
That graces nature's varying round,
A second is not to be found!
"Your suit, fair creature, must miscarry,
Till Charlemont resolves to marry."

FABLE XV.

THE SPARROW, AND THE DOVE.

It was, as learn'd traditions say,
Upon an April's blithsome day,
When pleasure, ever on the wing,
Return'd, companion of the spring,
And cheer'd the birds with am'rous heat,
Instructing little hearts to beat;
A sparrow, frolic, gay, and young,
Of bold address, and flippant tongue,
Just left his lady of a night,
Like him, to follow new delight.

The youth, of many a conquest vain,
Flew off to seek the chirping train;
The chirping train he quickly found,
And with a faucy ease, bow'd round.

For every she his bosom burns,
And this, and that he wooes by turns;
And here a sigh, and there a bill,
And here—those eyes, so form'd to kill!
And now, with ready tongue, he strings
Unmeaning, soft, resistless things;
With vows, and demme's skill'd to woo,
As other pretty fellows do.

Not that he thought this short essay
A prologue needful to his play;
No, truit me, says our learned letter,
He knew the virtuous sex much better;
But these he held as specious arts,
To show his own superior parts,
The form of decency to shield,
And give a just pretence to yield.

Thus finishing his courtly play,
He mark'd the fav'rite of a day;
With careless impudence drew near,
And whisper'd Hebrew in her ear;
A hint, which like the mason's sign,
The conscious can alone divine.

The flutt'ring nymph, expert at feigning,
Cry'd, Sir!—pray Sir, explain your meaning—
Go prate to those, that may endure ye—
To me this rudeness!—I'll assure ye!—

U

Then off she glided, like a swallow,
As saying—you guess where to follow.

To such as know the party set,
'Tis needless to declare they met;
The parson's barn, as authors mention,
Confess'd the fair had apprehension.
Her honour there secure from stain,
She held all further trifling vain,
No more affected to be coy,
But rush'd, licentious, on the joy.

Hist, love! the male companion cry'd,
Retire a while; I fear we're spy'd.
Nor was the caution vain; he saw
A turtle, rustling in the straw,
While o'er her callow brood she hung,
And fondly thus address'd her young.

Ye tender objects of my care!
Peace, peace, ye little helpless pair!
Anon he comes, your gentle sire,
And brings you all your hearts require.
For us, his infants, and his bride,
For us with only love to guide,
Our lord assumes an eagle's speed,
And like a lion, dares to bleed.
Nor yet by wint'ry skies confin'd,
He mounts upon the rudest wind,
From danger tears the vital spoil,
And with affection sweetens toil.

Ah cease, too vent'rous! cease to dare,
In thine, our dearer safety spare!
From him, ye cruel falcons, stray,
And turn, ye fowlers, far away!

Should I survive to see the day,
That tears me from myself away,
That cancels all that heav'n could give,
The life, by which alone I live,
Alas, how more than lost were I,
Who, in the thought, already die!

Ye pow'rs, whom men, and birds obey,
Great rulers of your creatures, say,
Why mourning comes, by bliss convey'd,
And ev'n the sweets of love allay'd?
Where grows enjoyment, tall, and fair,
Around it twines entangling care;
While fear for what our souls possess,
Enervates every pow'r to bless;
Yet friendship forms the bliss above,
And life! what art thou, without love?

Our hero, who had heard apart,
Felt something moving in his heart,
But quickly, with disdain, suppress'd
The virtue, rising in his breast;
And first he feign'd to laugh aloud,
And next, approaching, smil'd and bow'd.

Madam, you must not think me rude;
Good manners never can intrude;
I vow I come through pure good nature—
Upon my soul a charming creature!
Are these the comforts of a wife?
This careful, cloister'd, moping life?
No doubt, that odious thing call'd duty,
Is a sweet province for a beauty.
Thou pretty ignorance! thy will
Is measur'd to thy want of skill;
That good old-fashion'd dame, thy mother,
Has taught thy infant years no other.

The greatest ill in the creation,
Is sure the want of education.

But think ye?—tell me without feigning;
Have all these charms no farther meaning?
Dame nature, if you don't forget her,
Might teach your ladyship much better.
For shame, reject this mean employment,
Enter the world, and taste enjoyment;
Where time by circling bliss we measure;
Beauty was form'd alone for pleasure:
Come, prove the blessing, follow me,
Be wise, be happy, and be free.

Kind Sir, reply'd our matron chaste,
Your zeal seems pretty much in haste;
I own, the fondness to be bless'd
Is a deep thirst in every breast;
Of blessings too I have my store,
Yet quarrel not, should heav'n give more;
Then prove the change to be expedient,
And think me, Sir, your most obedient.

Here turning, as to one inferior,
Our gallant spoke, and smil'd superior.
Methinks, to quit your boasted station
Requires a world of hesitation;
Where brats, and bonds are held a blessing,
The case, I doubt, is past redressing.
Why, child, suppose the joys I mention,
Were the mere fruits of my invention,
You've cause sufficient for your carriage,
In flying from the nurse of marriage;
That fly decoy, when vary'd snares,
That takes your widgeons in by pairs;
Alike to husband, and to wife,
The cure of love, and bane of life;
The only method of forecasting,
To make misfortune firm, and lasting;
The sin, by heav'n's peculiar sentence,
Unpardon'd through a life's repentance.
It is the double snake, that weds
A common tail to diff'rent heads,
That lead the carcass still astray,
By dragging each a diff'rent way.
Of all the ills that may attend me,
From marriage, mighty gods, defend me!

Give me frank nature's wild demesne,
And boundless tract of air serene,
Where fancy, ever wing'd for change,
Delights to sport, delights to range;
There, liberty! to thee is owing
Whate'er of bliss is worth bestowing;
Delights, still vary'd, and divine,
Sweet goddesses of the hills! are thine.

What say you now, you pretty pink you?
Have I, for once, spoke reason, think you?
You take me now for no romancer—
Come, never study for an answer;
Away, cast every care behind ye,
And fly where joy alone shall find ye.

Soft yet, return'd our female fencer,
A question more, or so—and then, Sir.
You've rally'd me with sense exceeding,
With much fine wit, and better breeding;
But pray, Sir, how do you contrive it?
Do those of your world never wive it?
“No, no.” How then? “Why, dare I tell,
“What does the business full as well.”

Do you ne'er love? "An hour at leisure."
Have you no friendships? "Yes, for pleasure."
No care for little ones? "We get 'em,
"The rest the mothers mind, and let 'em."

Thou wretch, rejoin'd the kindling dove,
Quite lost to life, as lost to love!
Whene'er misfortune comes, how just!
And come misfortune surely must;
In the dread season of dismay,
In that, your hour of trial, say,
Who then shall prop your sinking heart?
Who bear affliction's weightier part?

Say, when the black-brow'd welkin bends,
And winter's gloomy form impends,
To mourning turns all transient cheer,
And blasts the melancholy year;
For times, at no persuasion, stay,
Nor vice can find perpetual May;
Then where's that tongue, by folly fed,
That soul of pertness, whither fled?

All shrunk within thy lonely nest,
Forlorn, abandon'd, and unblest;
No friends, by cordial bonds ally'd,
Shall seek thy cold, unsocial side;
No chirping prattlers, to delight
Shall turn the long-enduring night;
No bride her words of balm impart,
And warm thee at her constant heart.

Freedom, restrain'd by reason's force,
Is as the sun's unvarying course,
Benignly active, sweetly bright,
Affording warmth, affording light;
But torn from virtue's sacred rules,
Becomes a comet, gaz'd by fools;
Foreboding cares, and storms, and strife,
And fraught with all the plagues of life.

Thou fool! by union every creature
Subsists, through universal nature;
And this, to beings void of mind,
Is wedlock, of a meaner kind.

While womb'd in space, primæval clay
A yet unfashion'd embryo lay,
The source of endless good above
Shot down his spark of kindling love
Touch'd by the all-enliv'ning flame,
Then motion first exulting came;
Each atom sought its separate class,
Through many a fair enamour'd mass;
Love cast the central charm around,
And with eternal nuptials bound.
Then form, and order o'er the sky,
First train'd their bridal pomp on high;
The sun display'd his orb to sight,
And burnt with hymeneal light.

Hence nature's virgin womb conceiv'd,
And with the genial burden heav'd;
Forth came the oak, her first-born heir,
And scal'd the breathing steep of air;
Then infant stems, of various use,
Imbib'd her soft, maternal juice;
The flow'rs, in early bloom disclos'd,
Upon her fragrant breast repos'd;
Within her warm embraces grew
A race of endless form, and hue;
Then pour'd her lesser offspring round,
And fondly cloth'd their parent ground.

Nor here alone the virtue reign'd,
By matter's cumb'ring form detain'd;
But thence, subliming, and refin'd,
Aspir'd, and reach'd its kindred mind.
Caught in the fond, celestial fire,
The mind perceiv'd unknown desire,
And now with kind effusion flow'd,
And now with cordial ardours glow'd,
Beheld the sympathetic fair,
And lov'd its own resemblance there;
On all with circling radiance shone,
But cent'ring, fix'd on one alone;
There clasp'd the heaven-appointed wife,
And doubled every joy of life.

Here ever blessing, ever blest'd,
Resides this beauty of the breast;
As from his palace, here the god
Still beams effulgent bliss abroad;
Here gems his own eternal round,
The ring, by which the world is bound,
Here bids his seat of empire grow,
And builds his little heav'n below.

The bridal partners thus ally'd,
And thus in sweet accordance ty'd,
One body, heart and spirit live;
Enrich'd by every joy they give;
Like echo, from her vocal hold,
Return'd in music twenty fold;
Their union firm, and undecay'd,
Nor time can shake, nor pow'r invade;
But as the stem, and scion stand,
Ingrafted by a skilful hand,
They check the tempest's wint'ry rage,
And bloom and strengthen into age;
A thousand amities unknown,
And pow'rs, perceiv'd by love alone,
Endearing looks, and chaste desire,
Fan, and support the mutual fire,
Whose flame, perpetual, as refin'd,
Is fed by an immortal mind.

Nor yet the nuptial faction ends,
Like Nile it opens, and descends,
Which, by apparent windings led,
We trace to its celestial head.
The fire, first springing from above,
Becomes the source of life, and love,
And gives his filial heir to flow,
In fondness down on sons below:
Thus roll'd in one continu'd tide,
To time's extremest verge they glide,
While kindred streams, on either hand,
Branch forth in blessings o'er the land.

Thee, wretch! no lisping babe shall name,
No late-returning brother claim,
No kinsman on thy road rejoice,
No sister greet thy ent'ring voice,
With partial eyes no parents see,
And blest'd their years restor'd in thee.

In age rejected, or declin'd,
An alien, ev'n among thy kind,
The partner of thy scorn'd embrace
Shall play the wanton in thy face,
Each spark unplume thy little pride,
All friendship fly thy faithless side,
Thy name shall like thy carcass rot,
In sickness spurn'd, in death forgot.

All-giving pow'r! great source of life!
O hear the parent! hear the wife!
That life, thou lendest from above,
Though little, make it large in love.
O bid my feeling heart expand
To every claim, on every hand;
To those, from whom my days I drew,
To these, in whom those days renew;
To all my kin, however wide,
In cordial warmth, as blood ally'd;
To friends, with steely fetters twin'd,
And to the cruel not unkind!

But chief, the lord of my desire,
My life, myself, my soul, my fire,
Friends, children, all that wish can claim,
Chaste passion clasp, and rapture name;
O spare him, spare him, gracious pow'r!
O give him to my latest hour!
Let me my length of life employ,
To give my sole enjoyment joy;
His love, let mutual love excite,
Turn all my cares to his delight,
And every needless blessing spare,
Wherein my darling wants a share.

When he with graceful action wooes,
And sweetly bills, and fondly cooes;
Ah! deck me, to his eyes alone,
With charms attractive as his own;
And in my circling wings care's d,
Give all the lover to my breast.
Then in our chaste, connubial bed,
My bosom pillow'd for his head,
His eyes with blissful slumbers close,
And watch, with me, my lord's repose,
Your peace around his temples twine,
And love him with a love like mine.

And, for I know his gen'rous flame,
Beyond what'er my sex can claim,
Me too to your protection take,
And spare me for my husband's sake.
Let one unruffled calm delight
The loving, and belov'd unite;
One pure desire, our bosoms warm,
One will direct, one wish inform;
Through life, one mutual aid sustain,
In death, one peaceful grave contain.

While, swelling with the darling theme,
Her accents pour'd an endless stream,
The well-known wings a sound impart,
That reach'd her ear, and touch'd her heart!
Quick dropp'd the music of her tongue,
And forth, with eager joy, she sprung.
As swift her ent'ring consort flew,
And plum'd, and kindled at the view;
Their wings their souls embracing meet,
Their hearts with answering measure beat;
Half lost in sacred sweets, and blest
With raptures felt, but ne'er express'd.

Strait to her humble roof she led
The partner of her spotless bed;
Her young, a flutt'ring pair, arise,
Their welcome sparkling in their eyes;
Transported, to their fire they bound,
And hang with speechless action round.
In pleasure wrapt, the parents stand,
And see their little wings expand;

The fire, his life-sustaining prize
To each expecting bill applies,
There fondly pours the wheaten spoil,
With transport giv'n, though won with toil;
While, all collected at the sight,
And silent through supreme delight,
The fair high heav'n of bliss beguiles,
And on her lord, and infants smiles.

The sparrow, whose attention hung
Upon the dove's enchanting tongue,
Of all his little flights disarm'd,
And from himself, by virtue, charm'd,
When now he saw, what only seem'd,
A fact, so late a fable deem'd,
His soul to envy he resign'd,
His hours of folly to the wind,
In secret wish'd a turtle too,
And sighing to himself, withdrew.

FABLE XVI.

THE FEMALE SEDUCERS.

'Tis said of widow, maid, and wife,
That honour is a woman's life;
Unhappy sex! who only claim
A being, in the breath of fame;
Which, tainted, not the quick'ning gales
That sweep Sabæa's spicy vales,
Nor all the healing sweets restore,
That breathe along Arabia's shore.

The traveller, if he chance to stray,
May turn uncensur'd to his way;
Polluted streams again are pure,
And deepest wounds admit a cure;
But woman's redemption knows,
The wounds of honour never close.

Though distant every hand to guide,
Nor skill'd on life's tempestuous tide,
If once her feeble bark recede,
Or deviate from the course decreed,
In vain she seeks the friendless shore;
Her swifter folly flies before;
The circling ports against her close,
And shut the wanderer from repose;
Till, by conflicting waves oppress'd,
Her found'ring pinnacle sinks to rest.

Are there no off'rings to atone
For but a single error? None!
Though woman is avow'd, of old,
No daughter of celestial mould,
Her temp'ring not without alloy,
And form'd but of the finer clay,
We challenge from the mortal dame
The strength angelic natures claim;
Nay more; for sacred stories tell,
That ev'n immortal angels fell.

Whatever fills the reeking sphere
Of humid earth, and ambient air,
With varying elements endued,
Was form'd to fall, and rise renew'd.

The stars no fix'd duration know,
Wide oceans ebb, again to flow,
The moon repletes her waning face,
All-beauteous, from her late disgrace,
And suns, that mourn approaching night,
Refulgent rise with new-born light.

In vain may death, and time subdue,
While nature mints her race anew,
And holds some vital spark apart,
Like virtue, hid in every heart;
'Tis hence reviving warmth is seen,
To clothe a naked world in green.
No longer barr'd by winter's cold,
Again the gates of life unfold;
Again each insect tries his wing,
And lifts fresh pinions on the spring;
Again from every latent root
The bladed stem, and tendril shoot,
Exhaling incense to the skies,
Again to perish, and to rise.

And must weak woman then disown
The change, to which a world is prone?
In one meridian brightness shine,
And ne'er, like ev'ning suns, decline?
Resolv'd and firm alone?—Is this
What we demand of woman?—Yes.

But should the spark of vestal fire
In some unguarded hour expire,
Or should the nightly thief invade
Hesperia's chaste, and sacred shade,
Of all the blooming spoil possess'd,
The dragon honour charm'd to rest,
Shall virtue's flame no more return?
No more with virgin splendour burn?
No more the ravag'd garden blow
With spring's succeeding blossom?—No.
Pity may mourn, but not restore,
And woman falls, to rise no more.

WITHIN this sublunary sphere,
A country lies—no matter where;
The clime may readily be found
By all, who tread poetic ground.
A stream call'd life, across it glides,
And equally the land divides;
And here, of vice the province lies,
And there, the hills of virtue rise.

Upon a mountain's airy stand,
Whose summit look'd to either land,
An ancient pair their dwelling chose,
As well for prospect, as repose:
For mutual faith they long were fam'd,
And temp'rance, and religion, nam'd.

A num'rous progeny divine
Confess'd the honours of their line;
But in a little daughter fair,
Was center'd more than half their care;
For heav'n to gratulate her birth,
Gave signs of future joy to earth;
White was the robe this infant wore,
And chastity the name she bore.

As now the maid in stature grew,
(A flow'r just op'ning to the view)
Oft through her native lawns she stray'd,
And wrestling with the lambskins play'd;
Her looks diffusive sweets bequeath'd,
The breeze grew purer as she breath'd,
The morn her radiant blush assum'd,
The spring with earlier fragrance bloom'd,
And nature, yearly, took delight,
Like her, to dress the world in white.

But when her rising form was seen
To reach the crisis of fifteen,
Her parents up the mountain's head,
With anxious step their darling led;
By turns they snatch'd her to their breast,
And thus the fears of age express'd.

O joyful cause of many a care!
O daughter, too divinely fair!
Yon world, on this important day,
Demands thee to a dangerous way;
A painful journey, all must go,
Whose doubtful period none can know,
Whose due direction who can find,
Where reason's mute, and sense is blind?
Ah, what unequal leaders these,
Through such a wide, perplexing maze!
Then mark the warnings of the wise,
And learn what love, and years advise.

Far to the right thy prospect bend,
Where yonder tow'ring hills ascend;
Lo, there the arduous paths in view,
Which virtue, and her sons pursue!
With toil o'er less'ning earth they rise,
And gain, and gain upon the skies.
Narrow's the way her children tread,
No walk, for pleasure smoothly spread,
But rough, and difficult, and steep,
Painful to climb, and hard to keep.

Fruits immature those lands dispense,
A food indelicate to sense,
Of taste unpleasant; yet from those
Pure health, with cheerful vigour flows,
And strength, unfeeling of decay,
Throughout the long, laborious way.

Hence, as they scale that heav'nly road,
Each limb is lighten'd of its load;
From earth refining still they go,
And leave the mortal weight below;
Then spreads the strait, the doubtful clears,
And smooth the rugged path appears;
For custom turns fatigue to ease,
And, taught by virtue, pain can please.

At length, the toilsome journey o'er,
And near the bright, celestial shore,
A gulf, black, fearful, and profound,
Appears, of either world the bound,
Through darkness, leading up to light:
Sense backward shrinks, and shuns the sight;
For there the transitory train,
Of time, and form, and care, and pain,
And matter's gross encumb'ring mass,
Man's late associates, cannot pass,
But sinking, quit th' immortal charge,
And leave the wond'ring soul at large;
Lightly she wings her obvious way,
And mingles with eternal day.

Thither, O! thither wing thy speed.
Though pleasure charm, or pain impede!
To such th' all-bounteous pow'r has giv'n,
For present earth, a future heav'n;
For trivial loss, unmeasur'd gain,
And endless bliss, for transient pain.

Then fear, ah! fear to turn thy sight,
Where yonder flow'ry fields invite;
Wide on the left the path-way bends,
And with pernicious ease descends,

There sweet, to sense, and fair to show;
New-planted Edens seem to blow,
Trees, that delicious poison bear,
For death is vegetable there.

Hence is the frame of health unbrac'd,
Each sinew slack'ning at the taste;
The soul to passion yields her throne,
And sees with organs not her own;
While, like the slumb'rer in the night,
Pleas'd with the shadowy dream of light,
Before her alienated eyes
The scenes of fairy-land arise;
The puppet world's amusing show,
Dipt in the gaily colour'd bow;
Scepters, and wreaths, and glitt'ring things,
The toys of infants, and of kings,
That tempt, along the baneful plain,
The idly wise, and lightly vain,
Till verging on the gulfy shore,
Sudden they sink, and rise no more.

But list to what thy fates declare;
Though thou art woman, frail as fair,
If once thy sliding foot should stray,
Once quit yon heav'n-appointed way,
For thee, lost maid, for thee alone,
Nor pray'rs shall plead, nor tears atone;
Reproach, scorn, infamy, and hate,
On thy returning steps shall wait,
Thy form be loath'd by every eye,
And every foot thy presence fly.

Thus arm'd with words of potent sound,
Like guardian angels plac'd around,
A charm, by truth divinely cast,
Forward our young advent'rer pass'd.
Forth from her sacred eye-lids sent,
Like morn, fore-running radiance went,
While honour, hand-maid, late assign'd,
Upheld her lucid train behind.

Awe-struck, the much admiring crowd
Before the virgin vision bow'd,
Gaz'd with an ever-new delight,
And caught fresh virtues at the sight:
For not of earth's unequal frame
They deem'd the heav'n-compounded dame,
If matter, sure the most refin'd,
High wrought, and temper'd into mind,
Some darling daughter of the day,
And body'd by her native ray.

Where'er she passes, thousands bend,
And thousands, where she moves, attend;
Her ways observant eyes confess,
Her steps pursuing praises bless;
While to the elevated maid
Oblations, as to heav'n, are paid.

'Twas on an ever-blithsome day,
The jovial birth of rosy May,
When genial warmth, no more suppress'd,
New-melts the frost in every breast,
The cheek with secret flushing dies,
And looks kind things from chastest eyes;
The sun with healthier visage glows,
Aside his clouded kerchief throws,
And dances up th' ethereal plain,
Where late he us'd to climb with pain,
While nature, as from bonds set free,
Springs out, and gives a loose to glee,

And now, for momentary rest,
The nymph her travell'd step repress'd,
Just turn'd to view the stage attain'd,
And glory'd in the height she gain'd.

Out-stretch'd before her wide survey,
The realms of sweet perdition lay,
And pity touch'd her soul with woe,
To see a world so lost below;
When strait the breeze began to breathe
Airs, gently wafted from beneath,
That bore commission'd witchcraft thence,
And reach'd her sympathy of sense;
No sounds of discord, that disclose
A people sunk, and lost in woes,
But as of present good possess'd,
The very triumph of the bless'd;
The maid in wrapt attention hung,
While thus approaching Sirens sung.

Hither, fairest, hither haste,
Brightest beauty, come and taste
What the pow'rs of bliss unfold,
Joys, too mighty to be told;
Taste what ecstasies they give,
Dying raptures taste and live.

In thy lap, disdaining measure,
Nature empties all her treasure,
Soft desires, that sweetly languish,
Fierce delights, that rise to anguish;
Fairest, dost thou yet delay?
Brightest beauty, come away.

List not, when the froward chide,
Sons of pedantry, and pride,
Snarlers, to whose feeble sense
April sunshine is offence;
Age and envy will advise
Ev'n against the joy they prize.

Come, in pleasure's balmy bowl
Slake the thirstings of thy soul,
Till thy raptur'd pow'rs are fainting
With enjoyment, past the painting;
Fairest, dost thou yet delay?
Brightest beauty, come away.

So sung the Sirens, as of yore,
Upon the false Ausonian shore;
And, O! for that preventing chain,
That bound Ulysses on the main,
That so our fair-one might withstand
The covert ruin, now at hand.

The song her charm'd attention drew,
When now the tempters stood in view;
Curiosity with prying eyes,
And hands of busy, bold emprise;
Like Hermes, feather'd were her feet,
And, like forerunning fancy, fleet.
By search untaught, by toil untir'd,
To novelty she still aspir'd,
Tasteless of every good possess'd,
And but in expectation bless'd.

With her, associate, pleasure came,
Gay pleasure, frolic-loving dame,
Her mien, all swimming in delight,
Her beauties half reveal'd to sight;
Loose flow'd her garments from the ground,
And caught the kissing winds around.
As erst Medusa's looks were known
To turn beholders into stone,

A dire reversion here they felt,
And in the eye of pleasure melt.
Her glance with sweet persuasion charm'd,
Unnerv'd the strong, the steel'd disarm'd;
No safety ev'n the flying find,
Who vent'rous, look but once behind.

Thus was the much-admiring maid,
While distant, more than half betray'd:
With smiles, and adulation bland,
They join'd her side, and seiz'd her hand:
Their touch envenom'd sweets instill'd,
Her frame with new pulsations thrill'd,
While half consenting, half denying,
Reluctant now, and now complying,
Amidst a war of hopes, and fears,
Of trembling wishes, smiling tears,
Still down, and down, the winning pair
Compell'd the struggling, yielding fair.

As when some stately vessel, bound
To blest Arabia's distant ground,
Borne from her courses, haply lights
Where Barca's flow'ry clime invites,
Conceal'd around whose treach'rous land,
Lurk'd the dire rock, and dangerous sand;
The pilot warns with sail and oar,
To shun the much-suspected shore,
In vain; the tide, too subtly strong,
Still bears the wrestling bark along,
Till found'ring, she resigns to fate,
And sinks o'erwhelm'd, with all her freight.

So, baffling every bar to sin,
And heaven's own pilot, plac'd within,
Along the devious, smooth descent,
With pow'rs increasing as they went,
The dames, accusom'd to subdue,
As with a rapid current drew,
And o'er the fatal bounds convey'd
The lost, the long-reluctant maid.

Here stop, ye fair-ones, and beware,
Nor send your fond affections there;
Yet, yet your darling, now deplor'd,
May turn, to you, and heav'n, restor'd;
Till then, with weeping honour wait,
The servant of her better fate;
With honour, left upon the shore,
Her friend, and handmaid now no more;
Nor, with the guilty world, upbraid
The fortunes of a wretch, betray'd;
But o'er her failing cast a veil,
Rememb'ring, you yourselves are frail.

And now, from all-inquiring light
Fast fled the conscious shades of night;
The damsel, from a short repose,
Confounded at her plight, arose.

As when, with slumb'rous weight oppress'd,
Some wealthy miser sinks to rest,
Where felons eye the glitt'ring prey,
And steal his hoard of joys away;
He, borne where golden Indus streams,
Of pearl, and quarry'd di'mond dreams,
Like Midas, turns the glebe to ore,
And stands all wrapt amidst his store,
But wakens, naked, and despoil'd
Of that, for which his years had toil'd.

So far'd the nymph, her treasure flown,
And turn'd, like Niobe, to stone;

Within, without, obscure, and void,
She felt all ravag'd, all destroy'd.
And, O thou curs'd, insidious coast!
Are these the blessings thou canst boast?
These, virtue! these the joys they find,
Who leave thy heaven-topt hills behind?
Shade me, ye pines, ye caverns, hide,
Ye mountains, cover me, she cry'd!

Her trumpet slander rais'd on high,
And told the tidings to the sky;
Contempt discharg'd a living dart,
A side-long viper to her heart;
Reproach breath'd poisons o'er her face,
And soil'd, and blasted every grace;
Officious shame, her handmaid new,
Still turn'd the mirror to her view;
While those, in crimes the deepest dy'd,
Approach'd, to whiten at her side,
And every lewd, insulting dame
Upon her folly rose to fame.

What should she do? attempt once more
To gain the late-deserted shore?
So trusting, back the mourner flew,
As fast the train of fiends pursue.

Again the farther shore's attain'd,
Again the land of virtue gain'd;
But echo gathers in the wind,
And shows her instant foes behind.
Amaz'd, with headlong speed she tends,
Where late she left a host of friends:
Alas! those shrinking friends decline,
Nor longer own that form divine;
With fear they mark the following cry,
And from the lonely trembler fly,
Or backward drive her on the coast,
Where peace was wreck'd, and honour lost.

From earth thus hoping aid in vain,
To heav'n not daring to complain,
No truce by hostile clamour giv'n,
And from the face of friendship driv'n,
The nymph sunk prostrate on the ground,
With all her weight of woes around.

Enthron'd within a circling sky,
Upon a mount o'er mountains high,
All radiant fate, as in a shrine,
Virtue, first effluence divine;
Far, far above the scenes of woe,
That shut this cloud-wrapt world below;
Superior goddess, essence bright,
Beauty of uncreated light,
Whom should mortality survey,
As doom'd upon a certain day,
The breath of frailty must expire,
The world dissolve in living fire,
The gems of heav'n, and solar flame
Be quench'd by her eternal beam,
And nature, quick'ning in her eye,
To rise a new-born phoenix, die.

Hence, unreveal'd to mortal view,
A veil around her form she threw,
Which three sad sisters of the shade,
Pain, care, and melancholy, made.

Through this her all-inquiring eye,
Attentive from her station high,
Beheld, abandon'd to despair,
The ruins of her fav'rite fair;

And with a voice, whose awful sound
Appal'd the guilty world around,
Bid the tumultuous winds be still;
To numbers bow'd each list'ning hill,
Uncurl'd the surging of the main,
And smooth'd the thorny bed of pain;
The golden harp of heav'n she strung,
And thus the tuneful goddess sung.

Lovely penitent, arise,
Come, and claim thy kindred skies;
Come, thy sister-angels say,
Thou hast wept thy stains away.

Let experience now decide,
'Twixt the good and evil try'd;
In the smooth, enchanted ground,
Say, unfold the treasures found.

Structures, rais'd by morning dreams,
Sands, that trip the flitting streams,
Down, that anchors on the air,
Clouds, that paint their changes there.

Seas, that smoothly dimpling lie,
While the storm impends on high,
Showing, in an obvious glass,
Joys, that in possession pass;

Transient, fickle, light, and gay,
Flatt'ring, only to betray;
What, alas, can life contain!
Life, like all its circles, vain!

Will the stork, intending rest,
On the billow build her nest?
Will the bee demand his store
From the bleak, and bladeless shore?

Man alone, intent to stray,
Ever turns from wisdom's way,
Lays up wealth in foreign land,
Sows the sea, and plows the sand.

Soon this elemental mass,
Soon th' encumb'ring world shall pass,
Form be wrapt in wasting fire,
Time be spent, and life expire.

Then, ye boasted works of men,
Where is your asylum then?
Sons of pleasure, sons of care,
Tell me, mortals, tell me where?
Gone, like traces on the deep,
Like a scepter, grasp'd in sleep,
Dews, exhal'd from morning glades,
Melting snows, and gliding shades.

Pass the world, and what's behind?
Virtue's gold, by fire refin'd;
From an universe deprav'd,
From the wreck of nature sav'd.
Like the life-supporting grain,
Fruit of patience, and of pain,
On the swain's autumnal day,
Winnow'd from the chaff away.

Little trembler, fear no more,
Thou hast plenteous crops in store,
Seed, by genial sorrows sown,
More than all thy scorers own.

What though hostile earth despise,
Heav'n beholds with gentler eyes;
Heav'n thy friendless steps shall guide,
Chear thy hours, and guard thy side.
When the fatal tramp shall sound,
When th' immortals pour around,

Heav'n shall thy return attest,
Hail'd by myriads of the bless'd.

Little native of the skies,
Lovely penitent, arise,
Calm thy bosom, clear thy brow,
Virtue is thy sister now.

More delightful are my woes,
Than the rapture pleasure knows;
Richer far the weeds I bring,
Than the robes that grace a king.

On my wars, of shortest date,
Crowns of endless triumph wait;
On my cares, a period bless'd;
On my toils, eternal rest.

Come, with virtue at thy side,
Come, be every bar defy'd,
Till we gain our native shore,
Sister, come, and turn no more.

FABLE XVII.

LOVE AND VANITY.

THE breezy morning breath'd perfume,
The wak'ning flow'rs unveil'd their bloom,
Up with the sun, from short repose,
Gay health and lusty labour rose,
The milkmaid carol'd at her pail,
And shepherds whistled o'er the dale:
When Love, who led a rural life,
Remote from bustle, state, and strife,
Forth from his thatch'd-roof cottage stray'd,
And stroll'd along the dewy glade.

A nymph, who lightly tript it by,
To quick attention turn'd his eye;
He mark'd the gesture of the fair,
Her self-sufficient grace and air,
Her steps, that mincing meant to please,
Her study'd negligence and ease;
And, curious to inquire what meant
This thing of prettiness and paint,
Approaching spoke, and bow'd observant;
The Lady, slightly,—Sir, your servant.

Such beauty in so rude a place!
Fair-one, you do the country grace;
At court, no doubt, the public care,
But love has small acquaintance there.

Yes, Sir, reply'd the flatt'ring dame,
This form confesses whence it came;
But dear variety, you know,
Can make us pride and pomp forego.
My name is Vanity. I sway
The utmost islands of the sea;
Within my court all honour centers,
I raise the meanest soul that enters,
Endow with latent gifts and graces,
And model fools for posts and places.

As vanity appoints at pleasure,
The world receives its weight and measure;
Hence all the grand concerns of life,
Joys, cares, plagues, passions, peace and strife.

Reflect how far my pow'r prevails,
When I step in where nature fails,
And every breach of sense repairing,
Am bounteous still, where heav'n is sparing.

But chief in all their arts and airs,
Their playing, painting, pouts, and pray'rs,

Their various habits and complexions,
Fits, frolics, foibles, and perfections,
Their robing, curling, and adorning,
From noon to night, from night to morning,
From fix to fixty, sick, or sound,
I rule the female world around.

Hold there a moment, Cupid cry'd,
Nor boast dominion quite so wide;
Was there no province to invade,
But that by love, and meekness sway'd?
All other empire I resign,
But be the sphere of beauty mine.

For in the downy lawn of rest,
That opens on a woman's breast,
Attended by my peaceful train,
I choose to live, and choose to reign.

Far-sighted faith I bring along,
And truth, above an army strong,
And chastity, of icy mould,
Within the burning tropics cold,
And lowliness, to whose mild brow
The pow'r and pride of nations bow,
And modesty, with downcast eye,
That lends the morn her virgin dye,
And innocence, array'd in light,
And honour, as a tow'r upright;
With sweetly winning graces, more
Than poets ever dreamt of yore,
In unaffected conduct free,
All smiling sisters, three times three,
And rosy peace, the cherub blest'd,
That nightly sings us all to rest.

Hence, from the bud of nature's prime,
From the first step of infant time,
Woman, the world's appointed light,
Has skirted every shade with white;
Has stood for imitation high,
To every heart, and every eye;
From ancient deeds of fair renown,
Has brought her bright memorials down;
To time affix'd perpetual youth,
And form'd each tale of love and truth.

Upon a new Promethean plan,
She moulds the essence of a man,
Tempers his mass, his genius fires,
And, as a better soul, inspires.

The rude she softens, warms the cold,
Exalts the meek, and checks the bold,
Calls sloth from his supine repose,
Within the coward's bosom glows,
Of pride unplumes the lofty crest,
Bids bashful merit stand confess'd,
And like coarse metal from the mines,
Collects, irradiates, and refines.

The gentle science she imparts,
All manners smooths, informs all hearts;
From her sweet influence are felt,
Passions that please, and thoughts that melt;
To stormy rage she bids controul,
And sinks serenely on the soul;
Softens Deucalion's flinty race,
And tunes the warring world to peace.

Thus arm'd to all that's light and vain,
And freed from thy fantastic chain,
She fills the sphere by heav'n assign'd,
And rul'd by me, o'er-rules mankind.

He spoke. The nymph impatient stood.
And laughing, thus her speech renew'd.

And pray Sir, may I be so bold,
To hope your pretty tale is told?
And next demand, without a cavil,
What new Utopia do you travel?
Upon my word, these highflown fancies
Show depth of learning—in romances.
Why, what unfashion'd stuff you tell us,
Of buckram dames, and tiptoe fellows!
Go, child; and when you're grown maturer,
You'll shoot your next opinion surer.

O such a pretty knack at painting!
And all for soft'ning, and for fainting!
Guess now, who can, a single feature,
Through the whole piece of female nature!
Then mark! my looser hand may fit
The lines, too coarse for love to hit.

'Tis said that woman, prone to changing,
Through all the rounds of folly ranging,
On life's uncertain ocean riding,
No reason, rule, nor rudder guiding,
Is like the comet's wand'ring light,
Eccentric, ominous, and bright,
Trackless, and shifting as the wind,
A sea, whose fathom none can find,
A moon, still changing, and revolving,
A riddle, past all human solving,
A bliss, a plague, a heav'n, a hell,
A—something, which no man can tell.

Now learn a secret from a friend,
But keep your counsel, and attend.

Though in their tempers thought so distant,
Nor with their sex nor selves consistent,
'Tis but the diff'rence of a name,
And every woman is the same.
For as the world, however vary'd,
And through unnumber'd changes carry'd,
Of elemental modes and forms,
Clouds, meteors, colours, calms, and storms,
Though in a thousand suits array'd,
Is of one subject matter made;
So, Sir, a woman's constitution,
The world's enigma, finds solution,
And let her form be what you will,
I am the subject essence still.

With the first spark of female sense,
The speck of being, I commence,
Within the womb make fresh advances,
And dictate future qualms and fancies;
Thence in the growing form expand,
With childhood travel hand in hand,
And give a taste to all their joys,
In gewgaws, rattles, pomp, and noise.

And now, familiar, and unaw'd,
I send the flutt'ring soul abroad;
Prais'd for her shape, her face, her mien,
The little goddess, and the queen
Takes at her infant shrine oblation,
And drinks sweet draughts of adulation.

Now blooming, tall, erect, and fair,
To dress becomes her darling care;
The realms of beauty then I bound,
I swell the hoop's enchanted round,
Shrink in the waist's descending size,
Heav'd in the snowy bosom, rise,

High on the floating lappet sail,
Or curl'd in tresses, kiss the gale.
Then to her glass I lead the fair,
And show the lively idol there,
Where, struck as by divine emotion,
She bows with most sincere devotion,
And numb'ring ev'ry beauty o'er,
In secret bids the world adore.

Then all for parking and parading,
Coquetting, dancing, masquerading,
For balls, plays, courts, and crowds what passion!
And churches, sometimes—if the fashion;
For woman's sense of right and wrong,
Is rul'd by the almighty throng;
Still turns to each meander tame,
And swims the straw of every stream.
Her soul intrinsic worth rejects,
Accomplish'd only in defects,
Such excellence is her ambition,
Folly, her wisest acquisition,
And ev'n from pity and disdain,
She'll cull some reason to be vain.

Thus, Sir, from every form and feature,
The wealth and wants of female nature,
And ev'n from vice which you'd admire,
I gather fewel to my fire,
And on the very base of shame
Erect my monument of fame.

Let me another truth attempt,
Of which your godship has not dreamt.

Those shining virtues which you muster,
Whence think you they derive their lustre?
From native honour and devotion?

O yes, a mighty likely notion!

Trust me, from titled dames to spinners,
'Tis I make saints, whoe'er make sinners;
'Tis I instruct them to withdraw,
And hold presumptuous man in awe;
For female worth as I inspire,
In just degrees still mounts the higher,
And virtue so extremely nice,
Demands long toil and mighty price;
Like Samson's pillars, fix'd elate,
I bear the sex's tottering state:
Sap these, and in a moment's space,
Down sinks the fabric to its base.

Alike from titles and from toys,
I spring, the fount of female joys;
In every widow, wife, and miss,
The sole artificer of bliss.
For them each tropic I explore;
I cleave the sand of every shore;
To them uniting Indias sail,
Sabæa breathes her farthest gale;
For them the bullion I refine,
Dig sense and virtue from the mine,
And from the bowels of invention,
Spin out the various arts you mention.

Nor bliss alone my pow'rs bestow,
They hold the sov'reign balm of woe;
Beyond the Stoic's boasted art,
I sooth the heavings of the heart;
To pain give splendour and relief,
And gild the pallid face of grief.

Alike the palace, and the plain
Admit the glories of my reign;

Through every age, in every nation,
Taste, talents, tempers, state, and station,
Whate'er a woman says, I say;
Whate'er a woman spends, I pay;
Alike I fill, and empty bags,
Flutter in finery and rags,
With light coquets through folly range,
And with the prude disdain to change.

And now you'd think, 'twixt you and I,
That things were ripe for a reply—
But soft, and while I'm in the mood,
Kindly permit me to conclude,
Their utmost mazes to unravel,
And touch the farthest step they travel.

When every pleasure's run a-ground,
And folly tir'd through many a round;
The nymph, conceiving discontent hence,
May ripen to an hour's repentance,
And vapours, shed in pious moisture,
Dismiss her to a church or cloyster;
Then on I lead her with devotion
Conspicuous in her dress and motion,
Inspire the heav'nly breathing air,
Roll up the lucid eye in pray'r,
Soften the voice, and in the face
Look melting harmony, and grace.

Thus far extends my friendly pow'r,
Nor quits her in her latest hour;
The couch of decent pain I spread,
In form recline her languid head,
Her thoughts I methodize in death,
And part not, with her parting breath;
Then do I set, in order bright,
A length of funeral pomp to fight,
The glitt'ring tapers, and attire,
The plumes, that whiten o'er her bier;
And last, presenting to her eye
Angelic fineries on high,
To scenes of painted bliss I waft her,
And form the heav'n she hopes hereafter.

In truth, rejoin'd love's gentle god,
You've gone a tedious length of road,
And strange, in all the toilsome way,
No house of kind refreshment lay,
No nymph, whose virtues might have tempted
To hold her from her sex exempted.

For one, we'll never quarrel, man;
Take her, and keep her, if you can;
And pleas'd I yield to your petition,
Since every fair, by such permission,
Will hold herself the one selected,
And so my system stands protected.

O, deaf to virtue, deaf to glory,
To truths divinely vouch'd in story!
The godhead in his zeal return'd,
And kindling at her malice burn'd.
Then sweatly rais'd his voice, and told
Of heav'nly nymphs, rever'd of old;
Hypsipile, who sav'd her fire;
And Portia's love, approv'd by fire,
Alike Penelope was quoted,
Nor laurell'd Daphne pass unnoted,
Nor Laodamia's fatal garter,
Nor sam'd Lucretia, honour's martyr,
Alceste's voluntary steel,
And Catherine, smiling on the wheel

But who can hope to plant conviction
Where cavil grows on contradiction?
Some she evades or disavows,
Demurs to all, and none allows;
A kind of ancient things call'd fables!
And thus the goddess turn'd the tables.

Now both in argument grew high,
And choler flash'd from either eye;
Nor wonder each refus'd to yield
The conquest of so fair a field.

When happily arriv'd in view
A goddess, whom our grandames knew,
Of aspect grave, and sober gait,
Majestic, awful, and sedate,
As heav'n's autumnal eve serene,
When not a cloud o'ercasts the scene,
Once prudence call'd, a matron fam'd,
And in old Rome, Cornelia nam'd.

Quick at a venture, both agree
To leave their strife to her decree.

And now by each the facts were stated,
In form and manner as related;
The case was short. They crav'd opinion,
Which held o'er females chief dominion?
When thus the goddess, answering mild,
First shook her gracious head, and smil'd.

Alas, how willing to comply,
Yet how unfit a judge am I!
In times of golden date, 'tis true,
I shar'd the fickle sex with you,
But from their presence long precluded,
Or held as one, whose form intruded,
Full fifty annual suns can tell,
Prudence has bid the sex farewell.

In this dilemma what to do,
Or who to think of, neither knew;
For both, still bias'd in opinion,
And arrogant of sole dominion,
Were forc'd to hold the case compounded,
Or leave the quarrel where they found it.

When in the nick, a rural fair,
Of inexperience'd gait, and air,

Who ne'er had cross'd the neighb'ring lake,
Nor seen the world beyond a wake,
With cambric coif, and kerchief clean,
Tript lightly by them o'er the green.

Now, now! cry'd love's triumphant child,
And at approaching conquest smil'd,
If vanity will once be guided,
Our diff'rence may be soon decided:
Behold yon wench; a fit occasion
To try your force of gay persuasion.
Go you, while I retire aloof,
Go, put those boasted pow'rs to proof;
And if your prevalence of art
Transcends my yet unerring dart,
I give the fav'rite contest o'er,
And ne'er will boast my empire more.

At once, so said, and so consented;
And well our goddess seem'd contented;
Nor pausing, made a moment's stand,
But tript, and took the girl in hand.

Meanwhile the godhead, unalarm'd,
As one to each occasion arm'd,
Forth from his quiver cull'd a dart,
That erst had wounded many a heart;
Then, bending, drew it to the head;
The bow-string twang'd, the arrow fled,
And, to her secret soul address'd,
Transfix'd the whiteness of her breast.

But here the dame, whose guardian care
Had to a moment watch'd the fair,
At once her pocket mirror drew,
And held the wonder full in view;
As quickly, rang'd in order bright,
A thousand beauties rush to fight;
A world of charms, till now unknown,
A world, reveal'd to her alone:
Enraptur'd stands the love-sick maid,
Suspended o'er the darling shade,
Here only fixes to admire,
And centres every fond desire.

MISCELLANEOUS POEMS.

A HYMN TO POVERTY.

O POVERTY! thou source of human art,
Thou great inspirer of the poet's song!
In vain Apollo dictates, and the nine
Attend in vain, unless thy mighty hand
Direct the tuneful lyre. Without thy aid
The canvas breathes no longer. Music's charms,
Uninfluenc'd by thee, forget to please:
Thou giv'st the organ sound; by thee the flute
Breathes harmony; the tuneful viol owns
Thy pow'rful touch. The warbling voice is thine:
Thou gav'st to Nicolini every grace,

And every charm to Farinelli's song:
By thee the lawyer pleads. The soldier's arm
Is nerv'd by thee. Thy pow'r the gownman feels,

And, urg'd by thee, unfolds heav'n's mystic truths,
The haughty fair, that swells with proud disdain,
And smiles at mischiefs, which her eyes have made.
Thou humblest to submit and bless mankind.

Hail, pow'r omnipotent! me uninvok'd
Thou deign'st to visit, far, alas! unfit
To bear thy awful presence. O, retire!
At distance let me view thee; lest too nigh,
I sink beneath the terrors of thy face!

THE LOVER AND THE FRIEND.

O thou, for whom my lyre I string,
Of whom I speak, and think, and sing!
Thou constant object of my joys,
Whose sweetness every wish employs!
Thou dearest of thy sex attend,
And hear the Lover and the Friend.

Fear not the poet's flatt'ring strain;
No idle praise my verse shall stain;
The lowly numbers shall impart
The faithful dictates of my heart,
Nor humble modesty offend,
And part the Lover from the Friend.

Not distant is the cruel day,
That tears me from my hopes away;
Then frown not, fairest, if I try
To steal the moisture from your eye,
Or force your heart a sigh to send,
To mourn the Lover and the Friend.

No perfect joy my life e'er knew,
But what arose from love and you;
Nor can I fear another pain
Than your unkindness, or disdain;
Then let your looks their pity lend,
To cheer the Lover and the Friend.

Whole years I strove against the flame,
And suffer'd ills, that want a name:
Yet still the painful secret kept,
And to myself in silence wept;
Till grown unable to contend,
I own'd the Lover and the Friend.

I saw you still. Your gen'rous heart
In all my sorrows bore a part;
Yet while your eyes with pity glow'd,
No words of hope your tongue bestow'd,
But mildly bid me cease to blend
The name of Lover with the Friend.

Sick with desire, and mad with pain,
I seek for happiness in vain:
Thou lovely maid, to thee I cry,
Heal me with kindness, or I die!
From sad despair my soul defend,
And fix the Lover and the Friend.

Curs'd be all wealth that can destroy
My utmost hope of earthly joy!
Thy gifts, O fortune! I resign,
Let her and poverty be mine!
And every year that life shall lend,
Shall bless the Lover and the Friend.

In vain, alas! in vain I strive
To keep a dying hope alive;
The last sad remedy remains,
'Tis absence that must heal my pains,
Thy image from my bosom rend,
And force the Lover from the Friend.

Vain thought! though seas between us roll,
Thy love is rooted in my soul;
The vital blood that warms my heart
With thy idea must depart,
And death's decisive stroke must end
At once the Lover and the Friend.

SONGS, &c.

SONG I.

Thus I said to my heart, in a pet th' other day,
I had rather be hang'd than go moping this way;
No throbbings, no wishes your moments employ,
But you sleep in my breast without motion or joy.
When Cloe perplex'd me 'twas sweeter by half,
And at Thais's wiles I could oftentimes laugh;
Your burnings and aching I strove not to cure,
Though one was a jilt, and the other a whore.

When I walk'd up the Mall, or stroll'd through the street, [beat,
Not a petticoat brush'd me, but then you could
Or if bang went the hoop against corner or post,
In the magical round you were sure to be lost.

But now if a nymph goes as naked as Eve,
Like Adam, unfallen, you never perceive;
Or the seat of delight if the tippet should hide,
You tempt not my fingers to draw it aside.

Is it caution, or dread, or the frost of old age,
That inclines you with beauty no more to engage?

Tell me quickly the cause, for it makes me quite
mad,
In the summer's gay season to see you so sad.

Have a care, quoth my heart, how you tempt me
to stray; [way:
He that hunts down a woman must run a d—d
Like a hare she can wind, or hold out with the fox,
And, secure in the chase, her pursuers she mocks.

For Cloe I burn'd with an innocent flame,
And beat to the music that breath'd out her name;
Three summers flew over the castles I built,
And beheld me a fool, and my goddess a jilt.

Next Thais, the wanton, my wishes employ'd,
And the kind one repair'd what the cruel destroy'd:
Like Shadrach, I liv'd in a furnace of fire,
But, unlike him, was scorch'd, and compell'd to retire.

Recruited once more, I forgot all my pain,
And was jilted, and burnt, and bedevil'd again;

Not a petticoat-fring'd, or the heel of a shoe,
 Ever pass'd you by day-light, but at it I flew.
 Thus jilted, and wounded, and burnt to a coal,
 For rest I retreated again to be whole;
 But your eyes, ever open to lead me astray,
 Have beheld a new face, and command me away.
 But remember, in whatever flames I may burn,
 'Twill be folly to ask for, or wish my return;
 Neither Thais nor Cloe again shall enflame,
 But a nymph more provoking than all you can name.

This said, with a bound from my bosom he flew;
 O, Phillis! these eyes saw him posting to you;
 Enslav'd by your wit, he grows fond of his chain,
 And vows I shall never possess him again.

SONG II.

Collin.

Be still, O ye winds, and attentive, ye swains,
 'Tis Phebe invites, and replies to my strains;
 The sun never rose on, search all the world through,
 A shepherd so blest, or a fair one so true.

Phebe.

Glide softly ye streams, O ye nymphs round me throng,
 'Tis Collin commands, and attends to my song;
 Search all the world over, you never can find
 A maiden so blest, or a shepherd so kind.

Both.

'Tis love, like the sun, that gives light to the year,
 The sweetest of blessings that life can endear;
 Our pleasures it brightens, drives sorrow away,
 Gives joy to the night, and enlivens the day.

Collin.

With Phebe beside me, the seasons how gay!
 Then winter's bleak months seem as pleasant as May;
 The summer's gay verdure springs still as she treads,
 And linnets and nightingales sing through the meads.

Phebe.

When Collin is absent 'tis winter all round,
 How faint is the sunshine, how barren the ground!
 Instead of the linnet and nightingale's song,
 I hear the hoarse raven croak all the day long.

Both.

'Tis love, like the sun, &c.

Collin.

O'er hill, dale, and valley, my Phebe and I
 Together will wander, and love shall be by:
 Her Collin shall guard her safe all the long day,
 And Phebe at night all his pains shall repay.

Phebe.

By moonlight, when shadows glide over the plain,
 His kisses shall cheer me, his arm shall sustain;
 The dark haunted grove I can trace without fear,
 Or sleep in a church-yard, if Collin is near.

Both.

'Tis love, like the sun, &c.

Collin.

Ye shepherds, that wanton it over the plain,
 How fleeting your transports, how lasting your pain!
 Inconstancy shun, and reward the kind she,
 And learn to be happy of Phebe and me.

Phebe.

Ye nymphs, who the pleasures of love never try'd,
 Attend to my strains, and take me for your guide;
 Your hearts keep from pride and inconstancy free,
 And learn to be happy of Collin and me.

Both.

'Tis love, like the sun, that gives light to the year,
 The sweetest of blessings that life can endear;
 Our pleasures it brightens, drives sorrow away,
 Gives joy to the night, and enlivens the day.

SONG III.

As Phillis the gay, at the break of the day,
 Went forth to the meadows a maying,
 A clown lay asleep by a river so deep,
 That round in meanders was straying.

His bosom was bare, and for whiteness so rare,
 Her heart it was gone without warning,
 With cheeks of such hue, that the rose wet with dew,
 Ne'er look'd half so fresh in a morning.

She cull'd the new hay, and down by him she lay,
 Her wishes too warm for disguising;
 She play'd with his eyes, till he wak'd in surprise,
 And blush'd like the sun at his rising.

She sung him a song, as he leant on his prong,
 And rested her arm on his shoulder;
 She press'd his coy cheek to her bosom so sleek,
 And taught his two arms to enfold her.

The rustic grown kind, by a kiss told his mind,
 And call'd her his dear and his blessing:
 Together they stray'd, and sung, frolic'd, and play'd,
 And what they did more there's no guessing.

SONG IV.

He.

Let rakes for pleasure range the town,
 Or misers doat on golden guineas,
 Let plenty smile, or fortune frown,
 The sweets of love are mine and Jenny's.

She.

Let wanton maids indulge desire,
 How soon the fleeting pleasure gone is!
 The joys of virtue never tire,
 And such shall still be mine and Johnny's.

Both.

Together let us sport and play,
 And live in pleasure where no sin is;
 The priest shall tie the knot to-day,
 And wedlock's bands make Johnny Jenny's.

He.

Let roving swains young hearts invade,
 The pleasure ends in shame and folly;
 So Willy woo'd, and then betray'd
 The poor, believing, simple Molly.

She.

So Lucy lov'd, and lightly toy'd,
 And laugh'd at harmless maids who marry;
 But now she finds her shepherd cloy'd,
 And chides too late her faithless Harry.

Both.

But we'll together sport and play,
And live in pleasure where no sin is;
The priest shall tie the knot to-day,
And wedlock's bands make Johnny Jenny's.

He.

By cooling streams our flocks we'll feed,
And leave deceit to knaves and ninnies;
Or fondly stray where love shall lead,
And every joy be mine and Jenny's.

She.

Let guilt the faithless bosom fright,
The constant heart is always bonny;
Content, and peace, and sweet delight,
And love, shall live with me and Johnny.

Both.

Together still we'll sport and play,
And live in pleasure where no sin is;
The priest shall tie the knot to-day,
And wedlock's bands make Johnny Jenny's.

SONG V.

STAND round, my brave boys, with heart and with voice,
And all in full chorus agree;
We'll fight for our king, and as loyally sing,
And let the world know we'll be free.

Chorus.

The rebels shall fly, as with shouts we draw nigh,
And echo shall victory ring;
Then safe from alarms, we'll rest on our arms,
And chorus it, long live the king!
Then commerce once more shall bring wealth to our shore,
And plenty and peace bless the isle;
The peasant shall quaff off his bowl with a laugh,
And reap the sweet fruits of his toil.

Chorus.

The rebels, &c.
Kind love shall repay the fatigues of the day,
And melt us to softer alarms;
Coy Phillis shall burn at her soldier's return,
And bless the brave youth in her arms.

Chorus.

The rebels shall fly, as with shouts we draw nigh,
And echo shall victory ring;
Then safe from alarms, we'll rest on our arms,
And chorus it, long live the king!

SONG VI.

To make the wife kind, and to keep the house still,
You must be of her mind, let her say what she will;

In all that she does you must give her her way,
For tell her she's wrong, and you lead her astray.

Chorus.

Then, husbands, take care, of suspicion beware,
Your wives may be true, if you fancy they are;
With confidence trust them, and be not such elves,
As to make by your jealousy horns for yourselves.
Abroad all the day if she chooses to roam,
Seem pleas'd with her absence, she'll sigh to come
home;

The man she likes best, and longs most to get at,
Be sure to commend, and she'll hate him for that.

Chorus.

Then, husbands, &c.
What virtue she has, you may safely oppose,
Whatever her follies are, praise her for those;
Applaud all her schemes that she lays for a man,
For accuse her of vice, and she'll sin if she can.

Chorus.

Then, husbands, take care, of suspicion beware,
Your wives may be true, if you fancy they are;
With confidence trust them, and be not such elves,
As to make by your jealousy horns for yourselves.

SONG VII.

Damon.

HARK, hark, o'er the plains how the merry bells ring,
Asleep while my charmer is laid!
The village is up, and the day on the wing,
And Phillis may yet die a maid.

Phillis.

'Tis hardly yet day, and I cannot away,
O Damon! I'm young and afraid;
To-morrow, my dear, I'll to church without fear,
But let me to-night lie a maid.

Damon.

The bride-maids are met, and mamma's on the fret,
All, all my coy Phillis upbraid;
Come upon the door, and deny me no more,
Nor cry to live longer a maid.

Phillis.

Dear shepherd, forbear, and to-morrow, I swear,
To-morrow I'll not be afraid;
I'll open the door, and deny you no more,
Nor cry to live longer a maid.

Damon.

No, no, Phillis, no, on that bosom of snow
To-night shall your shepherd be laid;
By morning my dear shall be eas'd of her fear,
Nor grieve she's no longer a maid.

Phillis.

Then open the door, 'twas unbolted before,
His bliss silly Damon delay'd;
To church let us go, and if there I say no,
O then let me die an old maid!

SONG VIII.

THAT Jenny's my friend, my delight, and my pride,

I always have boasted, and seek not to hide;
I dwell on her praises wherever I go,
They say I'm in love, but I answer no, no.

At ev'ning oft times with what pleasure I see
A note from her hand, "I'll be with you at tea!"
My heart how it bounds, when I hear her below!
But say not 'tis love, for I answer no, no.

She sings me a song, and I echo each strain,
Again I cry, Jenny! sweet Jenny, again!
I kiss her soft lips, and if there I could grow,
And fear I'm in love, though I answer no, no.

She tells me her faults, as she sits on my knee,
I chide her, and swear she's an angel to me :
My shoulder she taps, and still bids me think so ;
Who knows but she loves, though she tells me
no, no ?

Yet such is my temper, so dull am I grown,
I ask not her heart, but would conquer my own :
Her bosom's soft peace shall I seek to o'erthrow,
And wish to persuade, while I answer no, no ?

From beauty, and wit, and good humour, ah ! why
Should prudence advise, and compel me to fly ?
Thy bounties, O fortune ! make haste to bestow,
And let me deserve her, or still I say no.

SONG IX.

You tell me I'm handsome, I know not how true,
And easy, and chatty, and good humour'd too ;
That my lips are as red as the rose-bud in June,
And my voice, like the nightingale's, sweetly in tune :

All this has been told me by twenty before,
But he that would win me, must flatter me more.
If beauty from virtue receive no supply,
Or prattle from prudence, how wanting am I !
My ease and good humour short raptures will bring, [spring.
And my voice, like the nightingale's, know but a
For charms such as these, then, your praises give o'er,

To love me for life, you must love me for more.
Then talk to me not of a shape or an air,
For Cloe, the wanton, can rival me there :
'Tis virtue alone that makes beauty look gay,
And brightens good humour, as sunshine the day ;
For that if you love me, your flame shall be true,
And I, in my turn, may be taught to love too.

SONG X.

How blest has my time been, what days have I
known,
Since wedlock's soft bondage made Jesse my own !
So joyful my heart is, so easy my chain,
That freedom is tasteless, and roving a pain.

Through walks, grown with woodbines, as often
we stray,

Around us our boys and girls frolic and play ;
How pleasing their sport is the wanton ones see,
And borrow their looks from my Jesse and me.

To try her sweet temper sometimes am I seen
In revels all day with the nymphs of the green ;
Though painful my absence, my doubts she beguiles,

And meets me at night with compliance and smiles.

What though on her cheek the rose loses its hue,
Her ease and good-humour bloom all the year through ;

Time still as he flies brings increase to her truth,
And gives to her mind what he steals from her youth.

Ye shepherds so gay, who make love to ensnare,
And cheat with false vows the too credulous fair,

In search of true pleasure how vainly you roam !
To hold it for life, you must find it at home.

SONG XI.

HARK ! hark ! 'tis a voice from the tomb

Come, Lucy, it cries, come away ;

The grave of thy Colin has room,
To rest thee beside his cold clay.

I come, my dear shepherd, I come ;
Ye friends and companions, adieu ;

I haste to my Colin's dark home,
To die on his bosom so true.

All mournful the midnight bell rung,
When Lucy, sad Lucy arose ;

And forth to the green-turf she sprung,
Where Colin's pale ashes repose.

All wet with the night's chilling dew,
Her bosom embrac'd the cold ground,

While stormy winds over her blew,
And night ravens croak'd all around.

How long, my lov'd Colin, she cry'd,
How long must thy Lucy complain ?

How long shall the grave my love hide ?
How long ere it join us again ?

For thee thy fond shepherdess liv'd,
With thee o'er the world would she fly,

For thee has she sorrow'd and griev'd,
For thee would she lie down and die.

Alas ! what avails it how dear
Thy Lucy was once to her swain !

Her face like the lily so fair,
And eyes that gave light to the plain !

The shepherd that lov'd her is gone,
That face and those eyes charm no more,

And Lucy forgot and alone,
To death shall her Colin deplore.

While thus she lay sunk in despair,
And mourn'd to the echoes around,

Inflam'd all at once grew the air,
And thunder shook dreadful the ground :

I hear the kind call, and obey,
Oh, Colin, receive me, she cry'd !

Then breathing a groan o'er his clay,
She hung on his tomb-stone and dy'd.

SONG XII.

For a shape and a bloom, and an air and a mien,
Myrtilla was brightest of all the gay green ;

But artfully wild, and affectedly coy,
Those her beauties invited, her pride would destroy.

By the flocks as she stray'd with the nymphs of the
vale,

Not a shepherd but woo'd her to hear her soft tale ;
Though fatal the passion, she laugh'd at the swain,

And return'd with neglect, what she heard with disdain.

But beauty has wings, and too hastily flies,
And love unrewarded, soon sickens and dies.

The nymph cur'd by time of her folly and pride,
Now sighs in her turn for the bliss she denied.

No longer she frolics it wide o'er the plain,
To kill with her coyness the languishing swain;
So humbled her pride is, so softened her mind,
That, though courted by none, she to all would be kind.

SONG XIII.

WHEN Damon languish'd at my feet,
And I believ'd him true,
The moments of delight how sweet!
But ah! how swift they flew!
The sunny hill, the flow'ry vale,
The garden and the grove,
Have echo'd to his ardent tale,
And vows of endless love.

The conquest gain'd, he left his prize
He left her to complain;
To talk of joy with weeping eyes,
And measure time by pain.
But heaven will take the mourner's part,
In pity to despair;
And the last sigh that rends the heart,
Shall waft the spirit there.

THE NUN;

A CANTATA.

Recitative.

Or Constance holy legends tell,
The softest sister of the cell;
None sent to heav'n so sweet a cry,
Or roll'd at morn so bright an eye.
No wanton taint her bosom knew,
Her hours in heav'nly vision flew,
Her knees were worn with midnight pray'rs,
And thus she breath'd divinest airs.

AIR.

In hallow'd walks and awful cells,
Secluded from the light and vain,
The chaste ey'd maid with virtue dwells,
And solitude, and silence reign.

The wanton's voice is heard not here,
To heav'n the sacred pile belongs;
Each wall returns the whisper'd pray'r,
And echoes but to holy songs.

RECITATIVE.

Alas, that pamper'd monks should dare
Intrude where fainted vestals are!
Ah, Francis! Francis! well I weet
Thole holy looks are all deceit.
With shame the muse prolongs her tale,
The Priest was young, the Nun was frail,
Devotion faulted on her tongue,
Love tun'd her voice, and thus she sung.

AIR.

Alas, how deluded was I,
To fancy delights as I did!
With maidens at midnight to sigh,
And love the sweet passion, forbid!
O, father! my follies forgive,
And still to absolve me be nigh;
Your lessons have taught me to live,
Come teach me, O! teach me to die!

To her arms in a rapture he sprung,
Her bosom, half naked, met his;
Transported in silence she hung,
And melted away at each kiss.
Ah, father! expiring, she cry'd,
With rapture I yield up my breath!
Ah, daughter! he fondly reply'd,
The righteous find comfort in death.

S O L O M O N,

A SERENATA:

Set to Music by Dr. Boyce.

PART I.

CHORUS.

BENOLD, Jerusalem, thy king,
Whose praises all the nations sing!
To Solomon the Lord has giv'n
All arts and wisdom under heav'n:
For him the tuneful virgin throng
Of Zion's daughters swell the song:
While young and old their voices raise,
And wake the echoes with his praise.

RECITATIVE.

SHE. From the mountains, lo! he comes,
Breathing from his lips perfumes;
While zephyrs on his garments play,
And sweets through all the air convey.

AIR.

Tell me, lovely shepherd, where
Thou feed'st at noon thy fleecy care!
Direct me to the sweet retreat,
That guards thee from the mid-day heat:
Left by the flocks I lonely stray,
Without a guide, and lose my way:
Where rest at noon, thy bleating care,
Gentle shepherd, tell me where?

AIR.

HE. Fairest of the virgin throng,
Dost thou seek thy swain's abode?
See yon fertile vale along

The new-worn path the flocks have trod:
Pursue the prints their feet have made,
And they shall guide thee to the shade.

RECITATIVE.

SHE. As the rich apple on whose boughs
Ripe fruit with streaky beauty glows,
Excels the trees that shade the grove,
So shines, among his sex, my love.

AIR.

Beneath his ample shade I lay,
Defended from the sultry day;
His cooling fruit my thirst assuag'd,
And quench'd the fires that in me rag'd;
Till sated with the luscious taste,
I rose and blest the sweet repast.

RECITATIVE.

HE. Who quits the lily's fleecy white,
To fix on meaner flow'rs the sight?
Or leaves the rose's stem untorn,
To crop the blossom from the thorn?
Unrival'd thus thy beauties are;
So shines my love among the fair.

AIR.
 Balmy sweetness, ever flowing,
 From her dropping lips distils;
 Flowers on her cheeks are blowing,
 And her voice with music thrills.
 Zephyrs o'er the spices flying,
 Wafting sweets from every tree,
 Sick'ning sense with odours cloying,
 Breathe not half so sweet as she.

RECITATIVE.

SHE. Let not my prince his slave despise,
 Or pass me with unheeding eyes.
 Because the sun's discolouring rays
 Have chas'd the lily from my face,
 My envious sisters saw my bloom,
 And drove me from my mother's home;
 Unshelter'd all the scorching day
 They made me in their vineyard stay.

AIR.

Ah simple me! my own, more dear;
 My own, alas! was not my care:
 Invading love the fences broke,
 And tore the clusters from the stock,
 With eager grasp the fruit destroy'd,
 Nor rested till the ravage cloy'd.

AIR.

He. Fair and comely is my love,
 And softer than the blue-ey'd dove;
 Down her neck the wanton locks
 Bound like the kids on Gilead's rocks;
 Her teeth like flocks in beauty seem,
 New shorn, and dropping from the stream;
 Her glowing lips by far outvie
 The plaited threads of scarlet dye;
 Whene'er she speaks the accents wound,
 And music floats upon the sound.

RECITATIVE.

SHE. Forbear, O charming swain; forbear!
 Thy voice enchants my list'ning ear;
 And while I gaze my bosom glows,
 My flutt'ring heart with love o'erflows,
 The shades of night hang o'er my eyes,
 And every sense within me dies.

AIR.

O fill with cooling juice the bowl!
 Assuage the fever in my soul!
 With copious draughts my thirst remove,
 And sooth the heart that's sick of love.

PART II.

RECITATIVE.

He. The cheerful spring begins to-day,
 Arise, my fair one, come away!

RECITATIVE.

SHE. Sweet music steals along the air—
 Hark!—my beloved's voice I hear!

AIR.

He. Arise, my fair, and come away,
 The cheerful spring begins to-day:
 Bleak winter's gone with all his train
 Of chilling frosts, and dropping rain.
 Amidst the verdure of the mead
 The primrose lifts her velvet head:
 The warbling birds, the woods among,
 Salute the season with a song:

VOL. X.

The cooing turtle in the grove
 Renews his tender tale of love:
 The vines their infant tendrils shoot:
 The fig-tree bends with early fruit:
 All welcome in the genial ray:
 Arise, my fair, and come away!

CHORUS.

All welcome in the genial ray,
 Arise, O fair one, come away!

DUET.

Together let us range the fields,
 Impearled with the morning dew;
 Or view the fruits the vineyard yields,
 Or the apple's clust'ring bough:
 There in close-embower'd shades,
 Impervious to the noon-tide ray,
 By tinkling rills, on rosy beds,
 We'll love the sultry hours away.

RECITATIVE.

He. How lovely art thou to the sight,
 For pleasure form'd, and sweet delight!
 Tall as the palm-tree is thy shape,
 Thy breasts are like the clust'ring grape!

AIR.

Let me, love, thy bole ascending,
 On the swelling clusters feed:
 With my grasp the vine-tree bending,
 In my close embrace shall bleed.
 Stay me with delicious kisses
 From thy honey-dropping mouth;
 Sweeter than the summer breezes
 Blowing from the genial south.

RECITATIVE.

SHE. O that a sister's specious name
 Conceal'd from prying eyes my flame!
 Uncensur'd then I'd own my love,
 And chastest virgins should approve:
 Then fearless to my mother's bed
 My seeming brother would I lead:
 Soft transports should the hours employ,
 And the deceit should crown the joy.

AIR.

Soft! I adjure you by the fawns,
 That bound across the flow'ry lawns,
 Ye virgins, that ye lightly move,
 Nor with your whispers wake my love!

RECITATIVE.

He. My fair's a garden of delight,
 Enclos'd and hid from vulgar sight;
 Where streams from bubbling fountains stray,
 And roses deck the verdant way.

AIR.

Softly arise, O southern breeze!
 And kindly fan the blooming trees;
 Upon my spicy garden blow,
 That sweets from every part may flow.

CHORUS.

Ye southern breezes gently blow,
 That sweets from every part may flow.

PART III.

AIR.

He. Arise, my fair; the doors unfold,
 Receive me, shivering with the cold.

X

RECITATIVE.

She. My heart amidst my slumbers wakes,
And tells me my beloved speaks.

AIR.

He. Arise, my fair, the doors unfold,
Receive me, shivering with the cold :
The chill drops hang upon my head,
And night's cold dews my cheeks o'erspread :
Receive me dropping to thy breast,
And lull me in thy arms to rest.

RECITATIVE.

She. Obedient to thy voice I hie ;
The willing doors wide open fly.

AIR.

Ah ! whither, whither art thou gone ?
Where is my lovely wand'rer flown ?
Ye blooming virgins, as you rove,
If chance you meet my straying love,
I charge you tell him how I mourn,
And pant and die for his return.

CHORUS OF VIRGINS.

Who is thy love, O charming maid !
That from thy arms so late has stray'd ?
Say what distinguish'd charms adorn,
And finish out his radiant form ?

AIR.

She. On his face the vernal rose,
Blended with the lily, glows ;
His locks are as the raven black,
In ringlets waving down his back ;
His eyes with milder beauties beam
Than billing doves beside the stream ;
His youthful cheeks are beds of flow'rs,
Enripen'd by refreshing show'rs ;
His lips are of the rose's hue,
Dropping with a fragrant dew ;
Tall as the cedar he appears,
And as erect his form he bears.
This, O ye virgins, is the swain,
Whose absence causes all my pain.

RECITATIVE.

He. Sweet nymph, whom ruddier charms adorn,
Than open with the rosy morn ;
Fair as the moon's unclouded light,
And as the sun in splendour bright ;
Thy beauties dazzle from afar,
Like glitt'ring arms that gild the war.

RECITATIVE.

She. O take me ! stamp me on thy breast !
Deep let the image be imprest !
For love, like armed death, is strong,
Rudely he drags his slaves along :
If once to jealousy he turns,
With never-dying rage he burns.

DUET.

Thou soft invader of the soul !
O love, who shall thy pow'r controul !
To quench thy fires whole rivers drain,
Thy burning heat shall still remain.
In vain we trace the globe to try
If pow'rful gold thy joys can buy :
The treasures of the world will prove
Too poor a bribe to purchase love.

CHORUS.

In vain we trace the globe to try
If pow'rful gold thy joys can buy :

The treasures of the world will prove
Too poor a bribe to purchase love.

PROLOGUE TO GIL BLAS,

Spoken by Mr. Woodward, in the Character of a Critic, with a Catcall in his Hand.

ARE you all ready ? Here's your music ! here * !
Author, sneak off, we'll tickle you, my dear.
The fellow stopp'd me in a hellish fright—
Pray, Sir, says he, must I be damn'd to-night ?
Damn'd ! surely, friend—Don't hope for our compliance,
Zounds, Sir !—a second play's downright defiance.
Though once, poor rogue, we pitied your condition,
Here's the true recipe—for repetition.
Well, Sir, says he, e'en as you please, so then
I'll never trouble you with plays again.
But harkee poet !—won't you though ? says I.
'Pon honour.—Then we'll damn you, let me die.
Sha'n't we, my Bucks ? Let's take him at his word—

Damn him—or by my soul he'll write a third.
The man wants money, I suppose—but mind ye—
Tell him you've left your charity behind ye.
A pretty plea, his wants to our regard !
As if we Bloods had bowels for a bard !
Besides, what men of spirit now a-days
Come to give sober judgments of new plays ?
It argues some good nature to be quiet—
Good nature ! Ay—but then we lose a riot.
The scribbling fool may beg and make a fuss,
'Tis death to him—What then ?—'Tis sport to us.
Don't mind me though—for all my fun and jokes,
The bard may find us Bloods good-natur'd folks ;
Not crabbed critics—foes to rising merit—
Write but with fire—and we'll applaud with spirit—

Our author aims at no dishonest ends,
He knows no enemies, and boasts some friends ;
He takes no methods down your throat to cram it ;
So if you like it, save it ; if not—damn it.

AN ELEGY †.

Written among the Ruins of a Nobleman's Seat in Cornwall.

AMIDST these venerable drear remains
Of ancient grandeur, musing sad I stray ;
Around a melancholy silence reigns,
That prompts me to indulge the plaintive lay.
Here liv'd Eugenio, born of noble race,
Aloft his mansion rose ; around were seen
Extensive gardens, deck'd with every grace,
Ponds, walks, and groves, through all the seasons green.

Ah, where is now its boasted beauty fled !
Proud turrets that once glitter'd in the sky,
And broken columns in confusion spread,
A rude mishapen heap of ruins lie.

Of splendid rooms no traces here are found :
How are these tottering walls by time defac'd !

* Blowing his catcall

† From the "Poetical Calendar" for August 1763.

Shagg'd with vile thorn, with twining ivy bound,
Once hung with tapestry, with paintings grac'd!

In ancient times, perhaps, where now I tread,
Licentious riot crown'd the midnight bowl,
Her dainties luxury pour'd, and beauty spread
Her artful snares to captivate the soul.

Or here, attended by a chosen train
Of innocent delight, true grandeur dwelt,
Diffusing blessings o'er the distant plain,
Health, joy, and happiness, by thousands felt.

Around now solitude unjoyous reigns,
No gay-gilt chariot hither marks the way,
No more with cheerful hopes the needy swains
At the once bounteous gate their visits pay.

Where too is now the garden's beauty fled,
Which every clime was ransack'd to supply?
O'er the drear spot see desolation spread,
And the dismantled walls in ruins lie!

Dead are the trees that once with nicest care
Arrang'd, from opening blossoms shed perfume,
And thick with fruitage stood, the pendent pear,
The ruddy-colour'd peach, and glossy plumb.

Extinct is all the family of flowers:
In vain I seek the arbour's cool retreat,
Where ancient friends in converse pass'd the hours,
Defended from the raging dog-star's heat.

Along the terrass-walks are straggling seen
The prickly bramble, and the noisome weed,
Beneath whose covert crawls the toad obscene,
And snakes and adders unmolested breed.

The groves, where pleasure walk'd her rounds,
decay,

The mead untill'd a barren aspect wears;
And where the sprightly fawn was wont to play,
O'ergrown with heath, a dreary waste appears.

In yonder wide-extended vale below,
Where osiers spread, a pond capacious stood;
From far by art the stream was taught to flow,
Whose liquid stores supplied th' unfailing flood.

Oft here the silent angler took his place,
Intent to captivate the scaly fry—
But perish'd now are all the numerous race,
Dumb is the fountain, and the channel dry.

Here then, ye great! behold th' uncertain state
Of earthly grandeur—beauty, strength, and power,

Alike are subject to the stroke of fate,
And flourish but the glory of an hour.

Virtue alone no dissolution fears,
Still permanent, though ages roll away;
Who builds on her immortal basis, rears
A superstructure time can ne'er decay.

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR.

For hence, ye visionary chattering souls,
Ye fancy'd nymphs, that haunt the Ocean shores;
Your birth was from uncertain bottom born,
Your lives proceeding fictions are and errors;
Ye come, ye go, ye pass, ye change, ye fly,
Ye change your shape, ye change your name, ye die;
Ye change your shape, ye change your name, ye die;
Ye change your shape, ye change your name, ye die;
Ye change your shape, ye change your name, ye die;
Ye change your shape, ye change your name, ye die;

Ye fancy'd nymphs, that haunt the Grecian shades;
Your birth who from conceiving fiction drew,
Yourselfes producing fictions as untrue :
But come, superior Muse ! divinely bright,
Daughter of Heaven, whose offspring still are light;
Oh condescend ' celestial sacred guest,

THE LIFE OF BOYSE.

SAMUEL BOYSE was born in Dublin, in 1708. His father, the Rev. Joseph Boyse, was pastor of a congregation of Protestant dissenters in Woodstreet, and had for his coadjutor the Rev. Thomas Emlyn, so well known for his writings and sufferings. He was one of the sixteen children of Matthew Boyse of Leeds in Yorkshire. He was considered as a learned, pious, and useful divine; he was an assiduous preacher; and his credit was such as procured him general esteem. He had a principal share in promoting the act of toleration in Ireland. He concurred in the orthodox persecution of the excellent Emlyn, yet he was the only one of the Dublin dissenting ministers who visited him in prison, and it was in consequence of his solicitations that the fine was mitigated. He died in 1728. The same year his works were published in 2 vols. folio. He is chiefly distinguished, as a writer, by his controversy with Archbishop King, concerning the office of a scriptural bishop.

Young Boyse received the rudiments of his education at a private school in Dublin. At eighteen years of age, he was sent to the University of Glasgow, probably with a design of being educated for the ministry. His indolence and dissipation, however, soon rendered this design abortive. He had not been a year at Glasgow, before he unfortunately fell in love with Miss Atchison, the daughter of a tradesman in that city; and imprudently interrupted his studies, by marrying her before he had entered into his twentieth year.

The natural extravagance of his temper soon exposed him to the inconveniencies of indigence: and as he had now the additional charge of a family, the scantiness of his finances obliged him to remove with his wife, who also carried her sister with her, to Dublin; where he expected assistance and support from his father; who, notwithstanding the imprudence of his conduct, received him with paternal kindness.

His conduct in this dependent state, was the very reverse of what it should have been. He directed his studies to no useful pursuit, by which he might have supported himself and family, but gave himself up to abject trifling and dissipation; which drew many heavy expences upon his father, who was supported by the subscriptions of his congregation, and an estate which he possessed of four-score pounds a-year, in Yorkshire. The behaviour of his wife also, was not commendable; her levity and extravagance contributed to accelerate his ruin. The good man was obliged to sell his estate, to pay his son's debts; and when he lay in his last sickness, he was entirely supported by presents from his congregation, and buried at their expence.

Being deprived, by his father's death, of any farther prospect of support from him, he repaired to Edinburgh, where his poetical genius raised him many friends, and some patrons of considerable eminence.

In 1731, he published, by subscription, a volume of Poems on several occasions, in 8vo; to which was subjoined a translation of the Tablature of Cebes, and a Letter upon Liberty, inserted in the "Dublin Journal," 1727. In the list of subscribers, which is numerous and respectable, are the names of Tickell, Philips, and Brooke.

He acquired a great reputation by this publication, which he dedicated to the Countess of Eglington, a lady of great accomplishments, both of body and mind; who was a patroness of men of wit, and very much distinguished Boyse while he resided in Scotland.

He also wrote an elegy on the death of the Viscountess Stormont; which he intitled, The Tears of the Muses; because the deceased lady was a woman of taste in the sciences, and a great admirer of poetry.

Lord Stormont was so much pleased with this mark of respect paid to the memory of his lady, that he ordered a very handsome present to be given to Boyse, by his agent at Edinburgh.

But though his writings had procured him some celebrity in that city, yet his person was very little known there, and especially among persons of fashion and figure; for he was rather of an unsocial turn, and had but few acquaintances. It was, therefore, some time before he could be found out: and he would have reaped no benefit from Lord Stormont's generosity, if an advertisement had not been inserted in one of the Edinburgh newspapers, desiring the author of the Tears of the Muses to call at the house of the agent.

One of his most intimate and respectable acquaintances in Edinburgh, was a Mr. Stewart, a merchant or bookseller, who had two beautiful and accomplished daughters, to whom he addressed some poems, under the names of Hilaria and Clarissa, inserted in the the second volume of his poems, published in 1738.

The notice which Lady Eglinton and Lord Stormont took of Boyse, was the means of recommending him to the patronage of the Duchess of Gordon, who was a lady of literary taste, and cultivated a correspondence with some of the most eminent poets then living.

She was so desirous to raise Boyse above necessity, that she employed her interest in procuring the promise of a place for him; and accordingly gave him a letter, which he was next day to deliver to one of the Commissioners of the Customs at Edinburgh. But it unluckily happened that he was then some miles distant from the city; and the morning on which he was to have ridden to town with her Grace's letter of recommendation, proved to be rainy. This trivial circumstance was sufficient to discourage Boyse, who was never accustomed to look beyond the present moment; he declined going to town, on account of the rainy weather; and while he let slip the opportunity, the place was bestowed upon another; which the Commissioner declared he kept for some time vacant, in expectation of seeing a person recommended by the Duchess of Gordon.

Such imprudence and such indolence, were naturally productive of indigence and distress; and at length, having defeated all the kind intentions of his patrons towards him, he fell into contempt and poverty, which obliged him to quit Edinburgh, as his creditors began to solicit the payment of their debts in a manner too importunate to be easily resisted.

Having resolved to go to London, he communicated his design to the Duchess of Gordon; who still retaining a high opinion of his poetical abilities, gave him a recommendatory letter to Pope, and obtained another for him to Lord Chancellor King. Lord Stormont also recommended him to his brother the Solicitor-General, afterwards Earl of Mansfield, and other persons of rank and fashion.

Upon his arrival in London, he repaired to Twickenham, in order to deliver the Duchess of Gordon's letter to Pope; but not finding him at home, he never gave himself the trouble to repeat his visit. He did, however, as he said himself, wait upon the Lord Chancellor; by whom he was well received, and with whom he occasionally dined: but the truth of this was questioned by his friends; for he was always averse to the company of persons of rank and figure, among whom he had not spirit enough to support a share in the conversation.

It indeed appears, that his imprudent conduct prevented his deriving any advantage from the recommendations which he brought with him from Scotland; so that he was soon reduced to a state of great indigence; from which he attempted no means of extricating himself, but by writing mendicant letters.

He frequently applied for assistance to some of the more eminent Dissenters; from whom he received many benefactions, in consequence of the respect which they paid to the memory of his father. But the pecuniary supplies which he received were soon dissipated; for he was not only indolent and imprudent, but luxurious and extravagant.

He had no taste for any thing elegant, and yet was to the last degree expensive. Often when he had received half-a-guinea, in consequence of a supplicatory letter, he would go into a tavern, order a supper to be prepared, drink of the richest wines, and spend all the money that had just been given him in charity, without having any one to participate the luxury with him, and while his wife and child were starving at home.

This is an instance of base selfishness, which was perhaps never practised by the most sensual epicure, except, with some variation of circumstances, by Savage, whom Boyse resembled as well in his genius as in his vices and poverty.

All his friends were at length wearied out with his perpetual applications. About the year 1740, he had brought himself to such a state of wretchedness, that he had not any clothes in which he could appear abroad, and therefore was wholly confined at home for some weeks, procuring, in the mean time, some scanty subsistence, by writing verses for Mr. Cave, the proprietor of the "Gentleman's Magazine;" who paid him by the hundred lines; which, after a while, he wanted to make what is called the long hundred.

"He had not," says Shiels, from whom this account is chiefly taken, "a shirt, a coat, or any kind of apparel to put on, the sheets in which he lay were carried to the pawn-broker's, and he was obliged to be confined to bed with no other covering than a blanket. Whoever had seen him in his study, must have thought the object singular enough. He sat up in bed with the blanket wrapped about him, through which he had cut a hole large enough to admit his arm, and placing the paper upon his knee, scribbled in the best manner he could, the verses he was obliged to make. For the future, wherever his distresses so pressed as to induce him to dispose of his shirt, he fell upon an artificial method of supplying one. He cut some white paper in slips, which he tied round his wrists, and in the same manner supplied his neck. In this plight he frequently appeared abroad, with the additional inconvenience of want of breeches."

His connection with Mr. Cave, naturally made him acquainted with Dr. Johnson; who informed Mr. Nichols, that he once collected a sum of money to redeem his clothes, which he had pawned; and which, in two days after, were pawned again. Mr. Nichols relates, from the same respectable authority, that Boyse translated well from the French; but if any one employed him, by the time one sheet of the work was done, he pawned the original. If the employer redeemed it, a second sheet would be completed, and the book again be pawned; and this perpetually.

From this period, he wrote many poems; but these, though excellent in their kind, were lost to the world, by being introduced with no advantage.

From an original letter, which, in July 1741, he sent to a friend, with some passages from his poem, called Deity, it appears to have been published about this time.

"I have no great reason to brag of the success of the poem, though the "Champion" early recommended it. Divine poetry is not the taste of the age; but I hope shall be the support of mine. It is the only subject I now take pleasure in. I have all last summer been employed by Mr. Cave, in French translations; a province highly agreeable to me, and the most profitable business stirring. I have been, since last September, almost constantly with Dr. Douglas, in the slavish work of index-making, alias word-catching, and am only now interrupted by his "Osteology," which takes up his whole attention. I have the prospect of having a new translation from the French, in a few days; but booksellers are so undistinguishing, and authors, or rather scribblers, so plenty, that learning, unless supported, bids fair to starve between them. I hope the best, as I begin to be a little known; and would endeavour, as far as I could, to support a good character in the literary way."

In 1742, his distresses brought him into a spunging-house, in Grocer's-alley in the Poultry; from whence he wrote the following letter to Mr. Cave (Sylvanus Urban), soliciting for assistance,

"Inscription for ST. LAZARUS' CAVE.

Hodie, teste cælo summo;
Sine pane, sine nummo,
Sorte positus infeste,
Scribo tibi dolens meste
Fame, bile tumet jecur
Urbane, mitte opem precor
Tibi enim cor humanum
Non a malis alienum;
Mihi mens nec male grata,
Pro a te favore data.

Ex gehenna debitoria,

Vulgo, Domo Spongiatoria. Alcaus.

"I am every moment," he adds, "threatened to be turned out here, because I have not money to pay for my bed two nights past, which is usually paid before hand; and I am loth to go into the Compter, till I can see if my affairs can possibly be made up. I hope, therefore, you will have the humanity to send me half-a-guinea for support, till I finish your papers in my hands. I humbly entreat your answer, having not tasted any thing since Tuesday evening I came here; and my coat will be taken off my back for the charge of the bed; so that I must go into prison naked, which is too shocking for me to think of."

How long he was in confinement, does not appear; however, he at length obtained his liberty: but his wants and his imprudence still continued; and he often had recourse to the meanest arts, in order to procure occasional benefactions.

In 1741, he wrote the Vision of Patience, an allegorical poem, to the memory of Mr. Alexander Cuming, unfortunately lost in the Northern Ocean, on his return from China, 1740.

Mr. Cuming was elder brother of his friend the late Dr. William Cuming of Dorchester, to whom he addressed an Ode on his going to France, in 1735.

In 1743, he published, without his name, an ode on the battle of Dettingen, intituled, Albion's Triumph.

In 1745, he was invited to Reading, by Mr. David Henry, the late worthy proprietor of the "Gentleman's Magazine," to compile an historical work, which was printed in that town, in 1747, in two vols. 8vo, under the following title: An Historical Review of the Transactions of Europe, from the commencement of the War with Spain in 1739, to the Insurrection in Scotland in 1745, with the proceedings in Parliament, and the most remarkable domestic occurrences during that period. To which is added, an Impartial History of the late Rebellion, interspersed with characters and memoirs, and illustrated with notes. This work is not destitute of merit, and contains much useful information respecting the history of that period.

It appears that Boyse was paid for this work at a very low rate.

"My salary," he writes a friend, in June 1746, "is wretchedly small (half-a-guinea a week), both for writing the history, and correcting the press." In the same letter, he affectingly laments the loss of his wife Emilia, who died while he was at Reading; and was buried at the expence of the parish. She is said by Shiels to have been also vicious and dissolute; but other accounts are more favourable, and probably more just. He afterwards describes his situation as "not wholly uncomfortable."

"I bless God I enjoy a greater degree of health than I have known for many years, and a serene melancholy, which I prefer to the most poignant sensations of pleasure I ever knew. All I sigh for is a settlement, with some degree of independence, for my last stage of life, that I may have the comfort of my poor dear girl to be near me, and close my eyes. I am now beginning the History of the Rebellion, a very difficult and invidious task. All the accounts I have yet seen, are either defective, confused, or heavy. I think myself, from my long residence in Scotland, not unqualified for the attempt; but I apprehend it is premature, by waiting a year or two, better materials would offer. I am about a translation (at my leisure hours) of an invaluable French work, intituled, "L'Histoire Universelle," by the late M. Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux. I propose only to give his dissertations on the ancient empires, viz. the Egyptian, Assyrian, Grecian, and Roman; which he has described with surprising conciseness, and with equal judgment and beauty. I design to inscribe it to Mr. Lyttleton, one of the Lords of the Treasury; one of the most amiable men I have ever known, and to whose uncommon goodness, if you knew my obligations, you would esteem him as much as he deserves."

After his return from Reading, his behaviour was more decent than it had been before, and some hopes were entertained of his reformation. He was employed by Mr. Sandby the bookseller, to translate Fenelon's Demonstration of the being of a God. He began now to support a better appearance than that to which he had lately been accustomed, and seemed to have some regard to his character. But while his circumstances were mending, and his irregular appetites losing ground, his health visibly declined. During his illness, he had the satisfaction to observe his Deity commended by two eminent writers, Fielding and Hervey. The latter, touched with the story of his misfortunes, and pleased with the design of his poem, deposited two guineas with a friend, to give him as his necessities required. Of this favour, Boyse expressed his grateful sense, in a letter to Hervey; which shows that he was neither in his last moments void of real religion, nor an elegant taste.

"For your tender admonition, and excellent advice, I am truly indebted to you, as they discover a generous and compassionate concern for my better part. I bless God I have reason to hope that great work is not to do; for of all the marks of infatuation I know amongst men, there can be none equal to that of trusting to a death-bed repentance.

"I do not pretend to vindicate my own conduct; nor can I ever forget the very Christian sense of my condition and misfortunes, which (notwithstanding all my misbehaviour) you have so pathetically expressed. The follies of my youth have furnished a plentiful harvest of reflection for my latter years. As I have been now for a long time in a manner buried from the world, so it has been my endeavour to spend that time in lamenting my past errors, and in pursuing a course of life void of offence towards God and man.

"I have learned to trust in God as my portion; to bless him for his fatherly corrections, which have been much gentler than my demerits; and by which I have been taught to know him and myself, his infinite mercy and goodness, my own ingratitude and unworthiness; so that I may truly say with the returning prodigal, 'Father, I have sinned against heaven and against thee, and am not worthy to be called thy son.'

"My health is in a very precarious state; and the greatest hopes of recovery I have (which are very small), arise from warm weather and the country air. I thank God I am absolutely resigned to his holy and blessed will. I have seen enough of the vanity and folly of earthly things, and how insufficient they are to satisfy the desires of an immortal soul. I am sensible of my own wretchedness and nothingness; and that my only hope of salvation is through that blessed Redeemer, who died to save lost sinners. This is my rock of hope against an approaching eternity."

From this letter, may be easily deduced his real character. Happy it would have been, had he sooner expressed these sentiments and principles! His mind, indeed, was often religiously disposed; he frequently talked upon that subject, and probably suffered a great deal from the remorse of his conscience. The early impressions of his good education, were never entirely obliterated; and his whole life was a continued struggle between his will and reason, as he was always violating his duty to the one, while he fell under the subjection of the other. In consequence of this war in his mind, he wrote a poem, called the Recantation.

After a lingering illness he died, in the month of May 1749, in obscure lodgings near Shoe-lane, in the 51st year of his age. He was buried at the expence of the parish.

Mr. Giles, a late collector of poems, says, he was informed by Mr. Sandby, that he was found dead in his bed, in a garret in White-Friars, with the pen in his hand, and in the act of writing.

Dr. Johnson assured Mr. Nichols, that the account of his death, by Mr. Sandby, is not true; it being supposed that, in a fit of intoxication, he was run over by a coach; at least, he was brought home in such a condition, as to make this probable, but too far gone to give the least account of the accident.

Mr. Francis Stewart, the son of a bookseller in Edinburgh, (probably the brother of Hilaria), and one of Dr. Johnson's amanuenses, who had been long intimately acquainted with Boyse, gives the following account of his death.

"Poor Mr. Boyse was one evening last winter attacked in Westminster by two or three soldiers; who not only robbed him, but used him so barbarously, that he never recovered the bruises he received; which might very probably induce the consumption of which he died.

"About nine months before his death, he married a cutler's widow, a native of Dublin, with whom he had no money; but she proved a very careful nurse to him during his lingering indisposition.

"She told me, that Mr. Boyse never imagined he was dying, as he always was talking of his recovery; but perhaps his design in this might be to comfort her; for one incident makes me think otherwise. About four or five weeks before he breathed his last, his wife went out in the morning, and was surprised to see a great deal of burnt papers upon the hearth, which he told her were old bills and accounts; but I suppose were his manuscripts, which he had resolved to destroy; for nothing of that kind could be found after his death. Though, from this circumstance, it may be inferred that he was apprehensive of death, yet I must own that he never intimated it to me; nor did he seem in the least desirous of any spiritual advice.

"For some months before his end, he had left off drinking all fermented liquors, except now and then a glass of wine, to support his spirits; and that he took very moderately.

"After his death, I endeavoured all I could to get him decently buried, by soliciting those Dissenters who were the friends of him and his father, to no purpose; for only Dr. Grosvenor, in Hoxton-square, a dissenting teacher, offered to join towards it. He had quite tried out those friends in his lifetime; and the general answer that I received was, "That such a contribution was of no service to him; for it was a matter of no importance how or where he was buried." As I found nothing could be done, our last resource was an application to the parish; nor was it without some difficulty, occasioned by the malice of his landlady, that we at last got him interred on the Saturday after he died. Three more of Dr. Johnson's amanuenses, and myself, attended the corpse to the grave. Such was the miserable end of poor Sam, who was obliged to be buried in the same charitable manner with his first wife; a burial of which he had often mentioned his abhorrence."

Another friend, in a letter to Mr. Nichols, gives the following supplementary narrative.

"I knew Mr. Boyse well, from the year 1732 to the time of his death; have often relieved his necessities, and frequently corresponded with him. I have preserved at least thirty pieces of his, and have in manuscript some of his poems that were never published. I never saw any thing in his wife's conduct that deserved censure. He published a second volume of poems, in 1738. He was a man of learning; when in company with those by whom he was not awed, an entertaining companion; but so irregular and inconsistent in his conduct, that it appeared as if he had been actuated by two different souls on different occasions."

"Boyse," says another friend, "was a man of no party whatever; even his private sentiments, and his public political creed, was influenced by his necessities. In regard to his person, he was of a middle size, of a thin habit, slovenly in his dress, which was increased by his necessities, very near-sighted, and his hearing imperfect. These circumstances added to his natural diffidence, and his not having been accustomed to appear in good company but as necessitous, and a mendicant, gave him an awkward, sheepish air, which by no means prejudiced strangers in his favour."

As Boyse depended for subsistence on his pen, it must be expected that his productions would be more numerous than excellent. His poetical pieces, if collected, would make six moderate volumes. Many of them are scattered in the "Gentleman's Magazine," marked with the letter T, and others are subscribed Alceus. Two volumes of his poems were collected together, and published in London; which, as they never had any great sale, are now difficult to be found. He was employed by Mr. Ogle to translate some of Chaucer's Tales into modern English, which he performed with great spirit. He received, it is said, at the rate of three pence a-line for his trouble. His liberal translation of Voltaire's three Epistles on Happiness, Freedom of Will, and Envy, is well executed. They were published in 1738, without his name; and as his clothes were then at the pawn-broker's, the manuscript was sold to Doddsley for two guineas.

An ode of his, in the manner of Spenser, intitled The Olive, was addressed to Sir Robert Walpole, which procured him a present of ten guineas. He also translated a poem from the High Dutch of Van Haren, in praise of peace, upon the conclusion of that made at Aix-la-Chapelle. His genius was not confined to poetry only; he had a taste for painting, music, and heraldry; with the latter of which he is said to have been well acquainted. Some of his friends advised him to turn his thoughts towards the drama, as that species of poetical composition is more lucrative than any other: and they thought him qualified for it: but he appears never to have attempted any thing of that kind.

The most celebrated of his performances was his poem called Deity; the third edition of which was printed in 1752. It has been frequently reprinted in the poetical miscellanies; and is now, with the Vision of Patience, and a few other pieces selected from the mass of his miscellaneous poetry, received, for the first time, into a collection of classical English poetry.

The subject of his Deity is the attributes of the Supreme Being; a theme the most noble and extensive, and capable of the highest poetical ornament. Though nothing short of the simple grandeur of David's lyre, or the exalted majesty of Milton's epic muse, can satisfy the mind on this hallowed theme, yet he may be reckoned among the most successful of those writers who have ventured to tread the hallowed ground of sacred poetry. The poem is without a plan, or any connection of parts, but it is executed, upon the whole, with great spirit and elegance, and bears marks of real genius. It abounds with beautiful and magnificent images, elevated sentiments, animated descriptions, and flowing lines; but the poetical diction is not throughout consistently supported, nor the harmony of the verse uniformly preserved. Several of the lines are flat and prosaic. The Vision of Patience exhibits, with similar inequalities of language, a tenderness of sentiment, a fertility of imagination, and a facility of expression, equal to the most successful imitations of Spenser.

The Ode to Dr. Cuming, is a pleasing and poetical performance, though it breathes not the ardour of spirit which lyric poetry requires. His Horace and Lydia, is a happy imitation of that celebrated dialogue. It was written on a slight temporary jarring between Boyse and his wife, whom he thought too much attached to Miss Atchison, her sister, a woman of an equivocal character.

His Epistle to Brooke, is truly penitentiary and poetical. Boyse and Brooke had been long acquainted, and visited each other frequently. While Brooke was composing his "Gustavus Vasa," Boyse by his irregularities, some how, gave offence to Brooke, who for some time declined his visits. Boyse, sensible of his fault (for no man's repentance was more poignant for the time, but it was brief and fleeting), addressed to Brooke this epistle; which, with a solemn promise of amendment, restored him to favour.

His Elegies are equally valuable, as effusions of poetry, and as monuments of gratitude and piety. The Anniversary Ode, to the memory of a Daughter, contains an affectionate tribute to the memory of his father. If his daughter's death is correctly dated in 1726, he must have been born before 1708, or married before he was eighteen; the age at which, it is said, he was sent to Glasgow.

The testimonies to his merits are few, but respectable. Fielding, in his "Tom Jones" (book vii. ch. 1.), gives a quotation from his Deity, which he styles "a very noble one;" and then adds: "It is taken from a poem called the Deity, published about nine years ago, and long since buried in oblivion; a proof that good books, no more than good men, do always survive the bad."

Hervey, in his "Meditations" (vol. ii. p. 239), calls it "a very beautiful, sublime, and instructive poem." And in his "Letters" (vol. i. p. 191), says, "It is a noble piece, quite poetical, truly evangelical, admirably fitted to delight and comfort the heart, to alarm and improve the reader."

Boyse himself said, that, upon the first publication of the Deity, a gentleman acquainted with Pope took occasion to ask him if he was not the author of it; to which Pope replied: "That he was not the author; but that there were many lines in it of which he should not be ashamed." This Boyse considered as a very great compliment.

Such are the testimonies in favour of this unfortunate poet; who was a melancholy instance of the wretchedness and disgrace which the most ingenious persons may bring upon themselves, by imprudence, indolence, and an indiscriminate indulgence of their appetites and passions. Had he employed the powers with which nature endowed him, in a manner suitable to the duties of reason and virtue, he might have been a happy and respectable man; instead of which, he was exposed to all the miseries of the most extreme indigence; nor could the eminent talents which he possessed rescue him from contempt.

The unhappy fate of Boyse will bring to the recollection of those who are but slightly acquainted with the lives of our English writers, many instances of men, of the brightest parts, whose lives, after an uninterrupted course of misery, have terminated under the pressure of want. Otway, Savage, Patten, and Chatterton, were admired, and at the same time neglected; praised, and at the same time starved.

"This relation," to use the forcible language of Dr. Johnson on a similar occasion, "will not be wholly without its use, if it remind those, who in confidence of superior capacities or attainments, disregard the common maxims of life, that nothing can supply the want of prudence; and that negligence and irregularity, long continued, will make knowledge useless, wit ridiculous, and genius contemptible."

THE WORKS OF BOYSE.

DEITY.

"Unde nil majus generatur ipso.
"Nec viget quidquam simile aut secundum."

HOR.

FROM earth's low prospects and deceitful aims,
From wealth's allurements, and ambition's dreams,
The lover's raptures, and the hero's views,
All the false joys mistaken man pursues,
The schemes of science, the delights of wine,
Or the more pleasing follies of the nine!
Recal, fond bard, thy long-enchanted sight,
Deluded with the visionary light!
A nobler theme demands thy sacred song,
A theme beyond or man's or angel's tongue!

But oh, alas! unhallow'd and profane,
How shalt thou dare to raise the heav'nly strain?
Do thou, who from the altar's living fire
Isaiah's tuneful lips did once inspire,
Come to my aid, celestial wisdom, come;
From my dark mind dispel the doubtful gloom:
My passions still, my purer breast inflame,
To sing that God from whom existence came;
Till heav'n and nature in the concert join,
And own the author of their birth divine.

I. Eternity.

WHENCE sprung this glorious frame? or whence arose

The various forms the universe compose?
From what Almighty cause, what mystic springs
Shall we derive the origin of things?
Sing, heav'nly Guide! whose all-efficient light
Drew dawning planets from the womb of night!
Since reason, by thy sacred dictates taught,
Adores a Pow'r beyond the reach of thought.

First Cause of causes! Sire supreme of birth!
Sole light of heav'n! acknowledg'd life of earth!
Whose word from nothing call'd this beauteous
whole,

This wide expanded All from pole to pole!
Who shall prescribe the boundary to Thee?
Or fix the era of eternity!

Should we, deceiv'd by error's sceptic glass,
Admit the thought absurd—that nothing was!
Thence would this wild, this false conclusion flow,
That nothing rais'd this beauteous all below!
When from disclosing darkness splendor breaks,
Associate atoms move, and matter speaks!

When non-existence bursts its close disguise,
How blind are mortals?—not to own the skies!

If one vast void eternal held its place,
Whence started time? or whence expanded space?
What gave the slumb'ring mass to feel a change?
Or bid consenting worlds harmonious range?
Could nothing link the universal chain?
No, 'tis impossible, absurd, and vain!

Here reason its eternal author finds,
The whole who regulates, unites, and binds,
Enlivens matter, and produces minds!
Inactive Chaos sleeps in dull repose,
Nor knowledge thence, nor free volition flows!
A nobler source those pow'rs ethereal show,
By which we think, design, reflect, and know;
These from a cause superior date their rise,
"Abstract in essence from material ties."

An origin immortal, as supreme,
From whose pure day, celestial rays! they came:
In whom all possible perfections shine,
Eternal, self-existent, and divine!

From this great spring of uncreated might!
This all-resplendent orb of vital light!
Whence all created beings take their rise,
Which beautify the earth, or paint the skies!
Profusely-wide the boundless blessings flow,
Which heav'n enrich, and gladden worlds below!
Which are no less, when properly defin'd,
Than emanations of th' Eternal Mind!

Hence triumphs truth beyond objection clear
(Let unbelief attend, and shrink with fear!)
That what for ever was—must surely be
Beyond commencement, and from period free;
Drawn from himself his native excellence,
His date eternal, and his space immense!
And all of whom that man can comprehend,
Is, that he ne'er begun, nor e'er shall end.

In him from whom existence boundless flows,
Let humble faith its sacred trust repose;
Assur'd, on his eternity depend,
"Eternal Father! and eternal Friend!"
Within that mystic circle safety seek,
No time can lessen, and no force can break;
And, lost in adoration, breathe his praise,
High Rock of ages, ancient Sire of days!

II. Unity.

Thus recognis'd, the spring of life and thought!
Eternal, self-deriv'd, and unbegot!

Approach, celestial muse, th' empyreal throne,
And awfully adore th' exalted One!
In nature pure, in place supremely free,
And happy in essential unity!
Bless'd in himself, had from his forming hand
No creatures sprung to hail his wide command;
Bless'd, had the sacred fountain ne'er run o'er,
A boundless sea of bliss that knows no shore!

Nor sense can two prime origins conceive,
Nor reason two eternal gods believe!
Could the wild Manichæan own that guide,
The good would triumph, and the ill subside!
Again would vanquish'd Arimanius bleed,
And darkness from prevailing light recede!

In diff'rent individuals we find
An evident disparity of mind;
Hence ductile thought a thousand changes gains,
And actions vary as the will ordains;
But should two beings, equally supreme,
Divided pow'r, and parted empire claim;
How soon would universal order cease!
How soon would discord harmony displace!
Eternal schemes maintain eternal fight,
Nor yield, supported by eternal might;
Where each would uncontroll'd his aim pursue,
The links dissolve, or the chain renew;
Matter from motion cross impressions take,
As serv'd each pow'r his rival's pow'r to break,
While neutral Chaos, from his deep recess,
Would view the never ending strife increase,
And bless the contest that secur'd his peace!
While new creations would opposing rise,
And elemental war deform the skies!
Around wild uproar and confusion hurl'd,
Eclipse the heav'ns, and waste the ruin'd world.

Two independent causes to admit,
Destroys religion, and debases wit;
The first by such an anarchy undone,
The last acknowledges its source but one.
As from the main the mountain rills are drawn,
That wind irriguous through the flow'ry lawn;
So mindful of their spring, one course they keep,
Exploring, till they find their native deep!

Exalted Pow'r! invisible, supreme,
Thou sov'reign, sole unutterable name!
As round thy throne thy flaming seraphs stand,
And touch the golden lyre with trembling hand;
Too weak thy pure effulgence to behold,
With their rich plumes their dazzled eyes infold;
Transported with the ardors of thy praise,
The holy, holy, holy, anthem raise!
To them, responsive, let creation sing,
Thee, indivisible eternal King!

III. Spirituality.

O SAY, celestial muse! whose purer birth
Disdains the low material ties of earth!
By what bright images shall be defin'd
The mystic nature of th' eternal Mind?
Or how shall thought the dazzling height explore,

Where all that reason can—is to adore!

That God's an immaterial essence pure,
Whom figure can't describe, nor parts immure;

Incapable of passions, impulse, fear,
In good pre-eminent, in truth severe:
Unmix'd his nature, and sublim'd his pow'rs,
From all the gross alloy that tempers ours;
In whose clear eye the bright angelic train
Appear suffus'd with imperfection's stain!
Impervious to the man's, or seraph's eye,
Beyond the ken of each exalted high;
Him would in vain material semblance feign,
Or figur'd shrines the boundless God contain;
Object of faith!—he shuns the view of sense,
Lost in the blaze of sightless excellence!
Most perfect, most intelligent, most wise,
In whom the sanctity of pureness lies;
In whose adjusting mind the whole is wrought,
Whose form is spirit! and whose essence thought!
Are truths inscrib'd by wisdom's brightest ray,
In characters that gild the face of day!

Reason confess'd, (howe'er we may dispute)
Fix'd boundary! discovers man from brute;
But dim to us, exerts its fainter ray,
Depress'd in matter, and ally'd to clay!
In forms superior kindles less confin'd,
Whose dress is ether, and whose substance mind;
Yet all from him, supreme of Causes, flow,
To him their pow'rs and their existence owe;
From the bright cherub of the noblest birth,
To the poor reasoning glow-worm plac'd on earth;

From matter then to spirit still ascend,
Through spirit still refining, higher tend;
Pursue, on knowledge bent, the pathless road,
Pierce through infinitude in quest of God!
Still from thy search, the centre still shall fly,
Approaching still—thou never shalt come nigh!
So its bright orb, th' aspiring flame would join,
But the vast distance mocks the fond design.

If he, Almighty! whose decree is fate,
Could, to display his pow'r, subvert his state;
Bid from his plastic hand a greater rise,
Produce a master! and resign his skies!
Impart his incommunicable flame,
The mystic number of th' eternal name!
Then might revolting reason's feeble ray,
Aspire to question God's all-perfect day!
Vain task! the clay in the directing hand,
The reason of its form might so demand,
As man presume to question his dispose,
From whom the pow'r, he thus abuses, flows.

Here point, fair muse! the worship God requires,
The soul inflam'd with chaste and holy fires!
Where love celestial warms the happy breast,
And from sincerity the thought's express'd;
Where genuine piety and truth refin'd,
Re-consecrate the temple of the mind;
With grateful flames the living altars glow,
And God descends to visit man below!

IV. Omnipresence.

THROUGH the unmeasurable tracts of space,
Go, muse divine! and present Godhead trace!
See where by place, uncircumscrib'd as time,
He reigns extended, and he shines sublime!

Should'st thou above the heav'n of heav'ns ascend,
 Couldst thou below the depth of depths descend;
 Could thy fond flight beyond the starry sphere,
 The radiant morning's lucid pinions bear!
 There should his brighter presence shine confess'd
 There his almighty arm thy course arrest!
 Could'st thou the thickest veil of night assume,
 Or think to hide thee in the central gloom!
 Yet there, all patent to his piercing sight,
 Darkness itself would kindle into light:
 Not the black mansions of the silent grave,
 Nor darker hell from her perception save;
 What pow'r, alas! thy footsteps can convey
 Beyond the reach of omnipresent day!

In his wide grasp, and comprehensive eye,
 Immediate, worlds on worlds unnumber'd lie:
 Systems enclos'd in his perception roll,
 Whose all-informing mind directs the whole:
 Lodg'd in his grasp, their certain ways they know;

Plac'd in that sight from whence can nothing go.
 On earth his footstool fix'd, in heav'n his seat;
 Enthron'd he dictates, and his word is fate.

Nor want his shining images below,
 In streams that murmur, or in winds that blow;
 His spirit broods along the boundless flood,
 Smiles in the plain, and whispers in the wood;
 Warms in the genial sun's enliv'ning ray,
 Breathes in the air, and beautifies the day!

Should man his great immensity deny,
 Man might as well usurp the vacant sky:
 For were he limited in date, or view,
 Thence were his attributes imperfect too;
 His knowledge, pow'r, his goodness all confin'd,
 And lost th' idea of a ruling Mind!

Feeble the trust, and comfortless the sense,
 Of a defective partial Providence!
 Boldly might then his arm injustice brave,
 Or innocence in vain his mercy crave;
 Dejected virtue lift its hopeless eye;
 And heavy sorrow vent the heartless sigh!
 An absent God no abler to defend,
 Protect, or punish, than an absent friend;
 Distant alike, our wants or griefs to know,
 To ease the anguish, or prevent the blow!
 If he, supreme Director, were not near,
 Vain were our hope, and empty were our fear;
 Unpunish'd vice would o'er the world prevail,
 And unrewarded virtue toil—to fail!
 The moral world a second chaos lie,
 And nature sicken to the thoughtful eye!

Even the weak embryo, ere to life it breaks,
 From his high pow'r its slender texture takes;
 While in his book the various parts inroll'd,
 Increasing, own eternal Wisdom's mould.

Nor views he only the material whole,
 But pierces thought, and penetrates the soul!
 Ere from the lips the vocal accents part,
 Or the faint purpose dawns within the heart!
 His steady eye the mental birth perceives,
 Ere yet to us the new idea lives!
 Knows what we say, ere yet the words proceed,
 And ere we form th' intention, marks the deed!

But conscience, fair vicegerent-light within,
 Asserts its author, and restores the scene!

VOL. X.

Points out the beauty of the govern'd plan,
 "And vindicates the ways of God to man."

Then sacred muse, by the vast prospect fir'd,
 From heav'n descended, as by heav'n inspir'd;
 His all-enlight'ning Omnipresence own,
 Whence first thou feels thy dwindling presence
 known;

His wide omniscience, justly grateful sing,
 Whence thy weak science prunes its callow wing!
 And bless th' eternal—all-informing soul,
 Whose sight pervades, whose knowledge fills the whole!

V. Immutability.

As the Eternal and Omniscient Mind,
 By laws not limited, nor bounds confin'd;
 Is always independent, always free,
 Hence shines confess'd immutability!
 Change, whether the spontaneous child of will,
 Or birth of force,—is imperfection still.
 But he, all-perfect, in himself contains
 Pow'r self-deriv'd, and from himself he reigns!
 If, alter'd by constraint, we could suppose,
 That God his fix'd stability should lose;
 How startles reason at a thought so strange!
 What pow'r can force Omnipotence to change?
 If from his own divine productive thought,
 Were the yet stranger alteration wrought;
 Could excellence supreme new rays acquire?
 Or strong perfection raise its glories higher?
 Absurd!—his high meridian brightness glows,
 Never decreases, never overflows!
 Knows no addition, yields to no decay,
 The blaze of incommunicable day!

Below, through different forms does matter range,

And life subsists from elemental change,
 Liquids condensing shapes terrestrial wear,
 Earth mounts in fire, and fire dissolves in air;
 While we, inquiring phantoms of a day,
 Inconstant as the shadows we survey!
 With them, along time's rapid current pass,
 And haste to mingle with the parent mass;
 But thou, Eternal Lord of life divine!
 In youth immortal shalt for ever shine!
 No change shall darken thy exalted name,
 From everlasting ages still the same!

If God, like man, his purpose could renew,
 His laws could vary, or his plans undo;
 Desponding faith would droop its cheerless wing,
 Religion deaden to a lifeless thing!
 Where could we, rational, repose our trust,
 But in a pow'r immutable as just?
 How judge of revelation's force divine,
 If truth unerring gave not the design;
 Where, as in nature's fair according plan,
 All smiles benevolent and good to man.

Plac'd in this narrow clouded spot below,
 We darkly see around, and darkly know!
 Religion lends the salutary beam,
 That guides our reason through the dubious gleam,
 Till sounds the hour, when he who rules the skies
 Shall bid the curtain of Omniscience rise!
 Shall dissipate the mists that veil our sight,
 And show his creatures—all his ways are right!

Y

Then when astonish'd nature feels its fate,
 And fetter'd time shall know his latest date!
 When earth shall in the mighty blaze expire,
 Heav'n melt with heat, and worlds dissolve in fire!
 The universal system shrink away,
 And ceasing orbs confess th' Almighty sway!
 Immortal he, amidst the wreck secure,
 Shall sit exalted permanently pure!
 As in the sacred bush shall shine the same,
 And from the ruin raise a fairer frame!

VI. Omnipotence.

FAR hence, ye visionary charming maids,
 Ye fancy'd nymphs that haunt the Grecian shades!
 Your birth, who from conceiving fiction drew,
 Yourself producing phantoms as untrue;
 But come, superior muse! divinely bright,
 Daughter of heav'n, whose offspring still are light;
 Oh condescend, celestial sacred guest!
 To purge my sight and animate my breast,
 While I presume Omnipotence to trace,
 And sing that pow'r who peopled boundless space!
 Thou present wert, when forth th' Almighty rode,

While Chaos trembled at the voice of God!
 Thou saw, when o'er th' immense his line he drew,
 When nothing from his word existence knew!
 His word, that wak'd to life the vast profound,
 While conscious light was kindled at the sound!
 Creation fair! surpris'd the angelic eyes,
 And sov'reign wisdom saw that all was wise!

Him, sole Almighty, nature's book displays,
 Distinct the page, and legible the rays!
 Let the wild sceptic his attention throw
 To the broad horizon, or earth below;
 He finds thy soft impression touch his breast,
 He feels the God, and owns him unconfess'd!
 Should the stray pilgrim, tir'd of sands and skies,
 In Libya's waste behold a palace rise,
 Would he believe the charm from atoms wrought?
 Go, atheist, hence, and mend thy juster thought!

What hand, Almighty Architect! but thine
 Could give the model of this vast design?
 What hand but thine adjust th' amazing whole?
 And bid consenting systems beauteous roll
 What hand but thine supply the solar light?
 Ever bestowing, yet for ever bright!
 What hand but thine the starry train array,
 Or give the moon to shed her borrow'd ray?
 What hand but thine the azure convex spread?
 What hand but thine compose the ocean's bed?
 To the vast main the sandy barrier throw,
 And with the feeble curb restrain the foe!
 What hand but thine the wint'ry flood assuage,
 Or stop the tempest in its wildest rage!

Thee infinite! what finite can explore?
 Imagination sinks beneath thy pow'r;
 Thee could the ablest of thy creatures know,
 Lost were thy unity, for he were thou!
 Yet present to all sense thy pow'r remains,
 Reveal'd in nature, nature's Author reigns!
 In vain would error from conviction fly,
 Thou ev'ry where art present to the eye!
 The sense how stupid, and the sight how blind,
 That fails this universal truth to find!

Go! all the sightless realms of space survey;
 Returning trace the planetary way!
 The sun, that in his central glory shines,
 While ev'ry planet round his orb inclines;
 Then at our intermediate globe repose,
 And view yon lunar satellite that glows!
 Or cast along the azure vault thy eye,
 When golden day enlightens all the sky;
 Around, behold earth's variegated scene,
 The mingling prospects, and the flow'ry green;
 The mountain brow, the long-extended wood,
 Or the rude rock that threatens o'er the flood!
 And say, are these the wild effects of chance?
 Oh, strange effect of reas'ning ignorance!

Nor pow'r alone confess'd in grandeur lies;
 The glittering planet, or the painted skies!
 Equal, the elephant's or emmet's dress,
 The wisdom of Omnipotence confess;
 Equal, the cumbrous whale's enormous mass,
 With the small insect in the crowded grass;
 The mite that gambols in its acid sea,
 In shape a porpus, though a speck to thee!
 Ev'n the blue down the purple plumb surrounds,
 A living world, thy failing sight confounds,
 To him a peopled habitation shows,
 Where millions taste the bounty God bestows!

Great Lord of life, whose all-controlling might,
 Through wide creation beams divinely bright,
 Nor only does thy pow'r in forming shine,
 But to annihilate, dread King! is thine.

Shouldst thou withdraw thy still-supporting hand,
 How languid nature would astonish'd stand!
 Thy frown the ancient realm of night restore,
 And raise a blank—where systems smil'd before!

See in corruption, all-surprising state,
 How struggling life eludes the stroke of fate;
 Shock'd at the scene, though sense averts its eye,
 Nor stops the wond'rous process to descry;
 Yet juster thought the mystic change pursues,
 And with delight Almighty wisdom views!
 The brute, the vegetable worlds surveys,
 Sees life subsisting ev'n from life's decays!
 Mark there, self-taught, the pensive reptile come,
 Spins his thin shroud, and living builds his tomb!
 With conscious care his former pleasures leave,
 And dress him for the bus'ness of the grave!
 Hence, pass'd the short-liv'd change, renew'd he springs,

Admires the skies, and tries his silken wings!
 With airy flight the insect roves abroad,
 And scorns the meaner earth he lately trod!

Thee, potent, let deliver'd Israel praise,
 And to thy name their grateful homage raise!
 Thee, potent God! let Egypt's land declare,
 That felt thy justice, awfully severe!
 How did thy frown benight the shadow'd land?
 Nature revers'd, how own thy high command?
 When jarring elements their use forgot,
 And the sun felt thy overcasting blot!
 When earth produc'd the pestilential brood,
 And the foul stream was crimson'd into blood!
 How deep the horrors of that awful night,
 How strong the terror, and how wild the fright!
 When o'er the land thy sword vindictive past,
 And men and infants breath'd at once their last,

How did thy arm thy favour'd tribes convey!
Thy light conducting point the patent way?
Obedient ocean to their march divide
The wat'ry wall distinct on either side;
While through the deep the long procession led,
And saw the wonders of the oozy bed!
Nor long they march'd, till black'ning in the rear,
The vengeful tyrant and his host appear!
Plunge down the steep, the waves thy nod obey,
And whelm the threat'ning storm beneath the sea!

Nor yet thy pow'r thy chosen train forsook,
When through Arabia's sands their way they took;
By day thy cloud was present to the sight,
Thy fiery pillar led the march by night;
Thy hand amidst the waste their table spread,
With feather'd viands, and with heav'nly bread:
When the dry wilderness no streams supply'd,
Gush'd from the yielding rock the vital tide!
What limits can Omnipotence confine?
What obstacles oppose thy arm divine?
Since stones and waves their settled laws forego,
Since seas can harden, and since rocks can flow!

On Sinai's top, the muse with ardent wing
The triumphs of Omnipotence would sing,
When o'er its airy brow thy cloud display'd,
Involv'd the nations in its awful shade!
When shrunk the earth from thy approaching face,
And the rock trembled to its rooted base;
Yet where thy majesty divine appear'd,
Where shone thy glory, and thy voice was heard;
Ev'n in the blaze of that tremendous day,
Idolatry its impious rites could pay!
Oh shame to thought!—Thy sacred throne invade,
And brave the bolt that linger'd round its head!

VII. Wisdom.

O THOU, who when th' Almighty form'd this all,
Upheld the scale, and weigh'd each balanc'd ball;
And as his hand completed each design,
Number'd the work, and fix'd the seal divine;
O wisdom infinite! creation's soul,
Whose rays diffuse new lustre o'er the whole,
What tongue shall make thy charms celestial
known?

What hand, fair goddess! paint thee but thy own?

What though in nature's universal store,
Appear the wonders of Almighty pow'r?
Pow'r unattended, terror would inspire,
Aw'd must we gaze, and comfortless admire.
But when fair wisdom joins in the design,
The beauty of the whole reveals divine!

Hence life acknowledges its glorious cause,
And matter owns its great Disposer's laws;
Hence in a thousand different models wrought,
Now fix'd to quiet, now ally'd to thought;
Hence flow the forms and properties of things,
Hence rises harmony, and order springs,
Else had the mass a shapeless chaos lay,
Nor ever felt the dawn of wisdom's day!

See, how associate round their central sun,
Their faithful rings the circling planets run;
Still equi-distant, never yet too near,
Exactly tracing their appointed sphere.
Mark how the moon our flying orb pursues,
While from the sun her monthly light renews;

Breathes her wide influence on the world below,
And bids the tides alternate ebb and flow.
View how in course the constant seasons rise,
Deform the earth, or beautify the skies:
First spring advancing, with her flow'ry train,
Next summer's hand that spreads the sylvan scene,
Then autumn with her yellow harvests crown'd,
And trembling winter close the annual round.
The vegetable tribes observant trace,
From the tall cedar to the creeping grass:
The chain of animated beings scale,
From the small reptile to th' enormous whale,
From the strong eagle stooping through the skies,
To the low insect that escapes thy eyes!
And see, if see thou canst, in ev'ry frame,
Eternal Wisdom shine confess'd the same:
As proper organs to the least assign'd,
As proper means to propagate the kind,
As just the structure, and as wise the plan,
As in this lord of all—debating man!

Hence, reas'ning creature, thy distinction find,
Nor longer to the ways of heav'n be blind.
Wisdom in outward beauty strikes the mind,
But outward beauty points a charm behind.
What gives the earth, the ambient air, or seas,
The plain, the river, or the wood to please?
Oh say, in whom does beauty's self reside,
The beautifier, or the beautify'd?
There dwells the Godhead in the bright disguise,
Beyond the ken of all created eyes!
His works our love, and our attention steal,
His works (surprising thought!) the Maker veil;
Too weak our sight to pierce the radiant cloud,
Where wisdom shines, in all her charms avow'd.

O gracious God, omnipotent and wise,
Unerring Lord, and ruler of the skies;
All-condescending to my feeble heart,
One beam of thy celestial light impart;
I seek not sordid wealth, or glitt'ring pow'r,
O grant me wisdom—and I ask no more!

VIII. Providence.

As from some level country's shelter'd ground,
With towns replete, with green enclosures bound,
Where the eye kept within the verdant maze,
But gets a transient vista as it strays;
The pilgrim to some rising summit tends,
Whence opens all the scene as he ascends:
So Providence the friendly height supplies,
Where all the charms of Deity surprise;
Here goodness, power, and wisdom all unite,
And dazzling glories whelm the ravish'd sight!

Almighty Cause 'tis thy preserving care,
That keeps thy works for ever fresh and fair!
The sun from thy superior radiance bright,
Eternal sheds his delegated light,
Lends to his sister orb inferior day,
And paints the silver moon's alternate ray:
Thy hand the waste of eating time renews,
Thou shedd'st the tepid morning's balmy dews;
When raging winds the blacken'd deep deform,
Thy spirit rides commission'd in the storm;
Bids at thy will the slack'ning tempest cease,
While the calm ocean smooths its ruffled face;

When light'nings through the air tremendous fly,
Or the blue plague is loosen'd to destroy,
Thy hand directs, or turns aside the stroke,
Thy word the fiend's commission can revoke;
When subterraneous fires the surface heave,
And towns are bury'd in the yawning grave;
Thou suffer'st not the mischief to prevail,
Thy sov'reign touch the recent wound can heal.
To Zembla's rocks thou send'st the cheerful gleam;

O'er Libya's sands thou pour'st the cooling stream;
Thy watchful Providence o'er all intends,
Thy works obey their great Creator's ends.

When man too long the paths of vice pursu'd,
Thy hand prepar'd the universal flood;
Gracious to Noah gave the timely sign,
To save a remnant from the wrath divine!
One shining waste the globe terrestrial lay,
And the ark heav'd along the troubled sea;
Thou bad'st the deep his ancient bed explore,
The clouds their wat'ry deluge pour'd no more!
The skies were clear'd—the mountain tops were seen,

The dove pacific brought the olive-green.
On Arrarat the happy patriarch toft,
Found the recover'd world his hopes had lost;
There his fond eyes review'd the pleasing scene,
The earth all verdant, and the air serene!
Its precious freight the guardian ark display'd,
While Noah grateful adoration paid!
Beholding in the many-tinctur'd bow,
The promise of a safer world below.

When wild ambition rear'd its impious head,
And rising Babel heav'n with pride survey'd;
Thy word the mighty labour could confound,
And leave the mass to moulder with the ground.

From thee all human actions take their springs,
The rise of empires, and the fall of kings!
See the vast theatre of time display'd,
While o'er the scene succeeding heroes tread!
With pomp the shining images succeed,
What leaders triumph! and what monarchs bleed!
Perform the parts thy Providence assign'd,
Their pride, their passions to thy ends inclin'd:
A while they glitter in the face of day,
Then at thy nod the phantoms pass away;
No traces left of all the busy scene,

But that remembrance says—The things have been!

“But (questions doubt) whence sickly nature
“The ague-fits her face so oft reveals? [feels “Whence earthquakes heave the earth's astonish'd “breast? [feels?

“Whence tempests rage? or yellow plagues in-“Whence draws rank Afric her empoison'd store?
“Or liquid fires explosive Ætna pour?”

Go, sceptic mole! demand th' Eternal Cause,
The secret of his all-preserving laws?
The depths of wisdom infinite explore,
And ask thy Maker—why he knows no more?

Thy error still in moral things as great,
As vain to cavil at the ways of fate.
To ask why prosp'rous vice so oft succeeds,
Why suffers innocence, or virtue bleeds!
Why monsters, nature must with blushes own,
By crimes grow pow'rful, and disgrace a throne!

Why saints and sages, mark'd in ev'ry age,
Perish the victims of tyrannic rage;
Why Socrates for truth and freedom fell,
Or Nero reign'd the delegate of hell:
In vain by reason is the maze pursu'd,
Of ill triumphant, and afflicted good.
Fix'd to the hold, so might the sailor aim
To judge the pilot, and the steerage blame;
As we direct to God what should belong,
Or say that sov'reign wisdom governs wrong.

Nor always vice does uncorrected go,
Nor virtue unrewarded pass below!
Oft sacred justice lifts her awful head,
And dooms the tyrant and th' usurper dead;
Oft Providence, more friendly than severe,
Arrests the hero in his wild career;
Directs the fever, poniard, or the ball,
By which an Ammon, Charles, or Cæsar fall:
Or when the cursed Borgias brew the cup
For merit, bids the monsters drink it up;
On violence oft retorts the cruel spear,
Or setters cunning in its crafty snare:
Relieves the innocent, exalts the just,
And lays the proud oppressor in the dust!

But fast as time's swift pinions can convey,
Hastens the pomp of that tremendous day,
When to the view of all created eyes,
God's high tribunal shall majestic rise,
When the loud trumpet shall assemble round
The dead, reviving at the piercing sound!
Where men and angels shall to audit come,
And millions yet unborn receive their doom!
Then shall fair Providence, to all display'd,
Appear divinely bright without a shade;
In light triumphant, all her acts be shown,
And blushing doubt eternal wisdom own!

Meanwhile, thou great Intelligence supreme,
Sov'reign Director of this mighty frame,
Whose watchful hand, and all-observing ken,
Fashions the hearts, and views the ways of men,
Whether thy hand the plenteous table spread,
Or measure sparingly the daily bread;
Whether or wealth or honours gild the scene,
Or wants deform, and wasting anguish stain;
On thee let truth and virtue firm rely,
Bless'd in the care of thy approving eye!
Know that thy Providence, their constant friend,
Through life shall guard them, and in death attend;
With everlasting arms their cause embrace,
And crown the paths of piety with peace.

IX. Goodness.

Ye seraphs, who God's throne encircling still,
With holy zeal your golden censers fill;
Ye flaming ministers to distant lands,
Who bear, obsequious, his divine commands;
Ye cherubs who compose the sacred choir,
Attuning to the voice th' angelic lyre!
Or ye fair natives of the heav'nly plain,
Who once were mortal—now a happier train!
Who spend in peaceful love your joyful hours,
In blissful meads and amaranthine bow'rs,
Oh lend one spark of your celestial fire,
Oh deign my glowing bosom to inspire,

And aid the muse's unexperienc'd wing,
While goodness, theme divine, she soars to sing!

Though all thy attributes divinely fair,
Thy full perfection, glorious God! declare;
Yet if one beams superior to the rest,
Oh let thy goodness fairest be confess'd:
As shines the moon amidst her starry train,
As breathes the rose amongst the flow'ry scene,
As the mild dove her silver plumes displays,
So sheds thy mercy its distinguish'd rays.

This led, Creator mild, thy gracious hand,
When formless Chaos heard thy high command;
When pleas'd, thy eye thy matchless works re-
view'd,

And goodness, placid, spoke that all was good!

Nor only does in heav'n thy goodness shine;
Delighted nature feels its warmth divine;
The vital sun's illuminating beam,
The silver crescent, and the starry gleam;
As day and night, alternate they command,
Proclaim that truth to ev'ry distant land.

See smiling nature, with thy treasures fair,
Confess thy bounty and parental care;
Renew'd by thee, the faithful seasons rise,
And earth with plenty all her sons supplies.
The generous lion and the brinded boar,
As nightly through the forest walks they roar,
From thee, Almighty Maker, seek their prey,
Nor from thy hand unsated go away:
To thee for meat the callow ravens cry,
Supported by thy all-preserving eye:
From thee, the feather'd natives of the plain,
Or those who range the field, or plough the main,

Receive with constant course th' appointed food,
And taste the cup of universal good;
Thy hand thou open'st, million'd myriads live;
Thou frown'st, they faint;—thou smil'st, and they revive!

On virtue's acre, as on rapine's stores,
See heav'n impartial, deal the fruitful show'rs!
"Life's common blessings all her children share,"
Tread the same earth, and breathe a gen'ral air!
Without distinction, boundless blessings fall,
And goodness, like the sun, enlightens all!

Oh man, degenerate man! offend no more;
Go, learn of brutes thy Maker to adore!
Shall these, through ev'ry tribe, his bounty own,
Of all his works ungrateful thou alone!
Deaf when the tuneful voice of mercy cries,
And blind, when sov'reign goodness charms the eyes!

Mark how the wretch his awful name blasphemes,
His pity spares,—his clemency reclaims!
Observe his patience with the guilty strive,
And bid the criminal repent and live:
Recal the fugitive with gentle eye,
Beseech the obstinate, he would not die!

Amazing tenderness—amazing most,
The soul on whom such mercy should be lost!

But would'st thou view the rays of goodness join,

In one strong point of radiance all divine!
Behold, celestial muse! yon eastern light;
To Bethl'hem's plain, adoring, bend thy sight!

Hear the glad message to the shepherds giv'n,
"Good-will on earth to man, and peace in
"heav'n."

Attend the swains, pursue the starry road,
And hail to earth the Saviour and the God!

Redemption! oh thou beauteous mystic plan!
Thou salutary source of life to man!

What tongue can speak thy comprehensive grace?
What thought thy depths unfathomable trace?

When lost in sin our ruin'd nature lay,
When awful justice claim'd her righteous pay!

See the mild Saviour bend his pitying eye,
And stop the light'ning just prepar'd to fly!

(O strange effect of unexampled love!)
View him descend the heav'nly throne above;

Patient, the ills of mortal life endure,
Calm, though revil'd, and innocent, though poor!

Uncertain his abode, and coarse his food,
His life one fair continued scene of good:

For us sustain the wrath to man decreed,
The victim of eternal justice bleed!

Look! to the cross the Lord of life is ty'd,
They pierce his hands, and wound his sacred side!

See God expires! our forfeit to atone,
While nature trembles at his parting groan!

Advance, thou hopeless mortal, steel'd in guilt,
Behold, and if thou can'st, forbear to melt!

Shall Jesus die thy freedom to regain,
And wilt thou drag the voluntary chain?

Wilt thou refuse thy kind assent to give,
When dying he looks down to bid thee live!

Perverse, wilt thou reject the proffer'd good,
Bought with his life, and streaming in his blood?

Whose virtue can thy deepest crimes efface,
Re-heal thy nature, and confirm thy peace!

Can all the errors of thy life atone,
And raise thee from a rebel, to a son!

O blest Redeemer, from thy sacred throne,
Where saints and angels sing thy triumphs won!
(Where, from the grave thou rais'd thy glorious
head,

Chain'd to thy car the pow'rs infernal led)
From that exalted height of bliss supreme,

Look down on those who bear thy sacred name;
Restore their ways, inspire them by thy grace,

Thy laws to follow, and thy steps to trace;
Thy bright example to thy doctrine join,

And by their morals prove their faith divine!
Nor only to thy church confine thy ray,

O'er the glad world thy healing light display;
Fair Sun of Righteousness! in beauty rise,

And clear the mists that cloud the mental skies!
To Judah's remnant, now a scatter'd train,

Oh great Messiah! show thy promis'd reign;
O'er earth as wide, thy saving warmth diffuse,

As spreads the ambient air, or falling dews,
And haste the time when, vanquish'd by thy pow'r,

Death shall expire, and sin defile no more!

X. Recitade.

Hence distant far, ye sons of earth profane,
The loose, ambitious, covetous, or vain;

Ye worms of pow'r! ye minion'd slaves of state,
The wanton vulgar, and the sordid great!

But come, ye purer souls, from dross refin'd,
The blameless heart and uncorrupted mind!
Let your chaste hands the holy altars raise,
Fresh incense bring, and light the glowing blaze;
Your grateful voices aid the muse to sing
The spotless justice of th' Almighty King!

As only rectitude divine he knows,
As truth and sanctity his thought compose;
So these the dictates which th' Eternal Mind
To reasonable beings has assign'd;
These has his care on ev'ry mind impress'd,
The conscious seals the hand of heav'n attest!
When man, perverse, for wrong forsakes the right,
He still attentive keeps the fault in sight;
Demands the strict atonement should be made,
And claims the forfeit on th' offender's head!

But doubt demands — "Why man dispos'd this " way?"

"Why left the dang'rous choice to go astray?"

"If heav'n that made him did the fault foresee,

"Thence follows, heav'n is more to blame than
" he."

No—had to good the heart alone inclin'd,
What toil, what prize had virtue been assign'd?
From obstacles her noblest triumphs flow,
Her spirits languish, when she finds no foe!
Man might perhaps have so been happy still,
Happy, without the privilege of will,
And just, because his hands were ty'd from ill!
O wond'rous scheme to mend th' Almighty plan,
By sinking all the dignity of man!

Yet turn thy eyes, vain sceptic, own thy pride,
And view thy happiness and choice ally'd;
See virtue from herself her bliss derive,
A bliss beyond the pow'r of thrones to give;
See vice of empire and of wealth possess'd,
Pine at the heart, and feel herself unblest;
And say, were yet no farther marks assign'd,
Is man ungrateful? or is heav'n unkind?

"Yes, all the woes from heav'n permissive fall,
"The wretch adopts—the wretch improves them
" all."

From his wild lust, or his oppressive deed,
Rapes, battles, murders, sacrilege proceed;
His wild ambition thins the peopled earth,
Or from his avarice, famine takes her birth;
Had nature giv'n the hero wings to fly,
His pride would lead him to attempt the sky!
To angels make the pigmy's folly known,
And draw ev'n pity from th' eternal throne.

Yet while on earth triumphant vice prevails,
Celestial Justice balances her scales,
With eye unbiass'd all the scene surveys,
With hand impartial, ev'ry crime she weighs;
Oft close pursuing at his trembling heels,
The man of blood her awful presence feels;
Oft from her arm, amidst the blaze of state,
The regal tyrant, with success elate,
Is forc'd to leap the precipice of fate!

Or if the villain pass unpunish'd here,
'Tis but to make the future stroke severe;
For soon or late, eternal Justice pays
Mankind the just desert of all their ways.

'Tis in that awful all-disclosing day!
When high Omniscience shall her books display;

When justice shall present her strict account,
While conscience shall attest the due amount;
That all who feel, condemn'd, the dreadful rod,
Shall own that righteous are the ways of God!

Oh then while penitence can fate disarm,
While ling'ring justice yet withholds its arm;
While heav'nly patience grants the precious time,
Let the lost sinner think him of his crime;
Immediate, to the seat of mercy fly,
Nor wait to-morrow—lest to-night he die!

But tremble, all ye sins of blackest birth,
Ye giants, that deform the face of earth;
Tremble, ye sons of aggravated guilt,
And ere too late, let sorrow learn to melt;
Remorseless murder! drop thy hand severe,
And bathe thy bloody weapon with a tear;
Go, lust impure! converse with friendly light,
Forsake the mansions of defiling night;

Quit, dark hypocrisy, thy thin disguise,
Nor think to cheat the notice of the skies!
Unsocial avarice, thy grasp forego,
And bid the u'seful treasure learn to flow!
Restore, injustice, the defrauded gain!

Oppression, bend to ease the captive's chain,
Ere awful Justice strike the fatal blow,
And drive you to the realms of night below!

But doubt resumes,— "If justice has decreed
" The punishment proportion'd to the deed;
" Eternal misery seems too severe,
" Too dread a weight for wretched man to bear!
" Too harsh—that endless torments should re-
" pay

"The crimes of life,—the errors of a day!"
In vain our reason would presumptuous pry;
Heav'n's counsels are beyond conception high;
In vain would thought his measur'd justice scan!
His ways, how different from the ways of man!
Too deep for thee, his secrets are to know,
Inquire not, but more wisely shun the woe;
Warn'd by his threat'nings, to his laws attend,
And learn to make Omnipotence thy friend!

Our weaker laws, to gain the purpos'd ends,
Oft pass the bounds the lawgiver intends;
Oft partial pow'r, to serve its own design,
Warps from the text, exceeding reason's line;
Strikes, biass'd, at the person, not the deed,
And sees the guiltless unprotected bleed!

But God alone, with unimpassion'd sight,
Surveys the nice barrier of wrong and right;
And while, subservient, as his will ordains,
Obedient nature yields the present means;
While neither force nor passions guide his views,
Ev'n evil works the purpose he pursues!
That bitter spring, the source of human pain!
Heal'd by his touch does mineral health contain;
And dark affliction, at his potent rod,
Withdraws its cloud, and brightens into good.

Thus human justice—(far as man can go)
For private safety strikes the dubious blow;
But rectitude divine, with nobler soul,
Consults each individual in the whole!
Directs the issues of each moral strife,
And sees creation struggle into life!

And you, ye happier souls! who in his ways
Observant walk, and sing his daily praise!

Ye righteous few! whose calm unruffled breasts,
 No fears can darken, and no guilt infects,
 To whom his gracious promises extend,
 In whom they centre, and in whom shall end,
 Which (blest'd on that foundation sure who build)
 Shall with eternal justice be fulfill'd:
 Ye sons of life to whose glad hope is giv'n
 The bright reversion of approaching heav'n,
 With grateful hearts his glorious praise recite,
 Whose love from darkness call'd you out to light;
 So let your piety reflective shine,
 As men may thence confess his truth divine!
 And when this mortal veil, as soon it must,
 Shall drop, returning to its native dust;
 The work of life with approbation done,
 Receive from God your bright immortal crown!

XI. Glory.

BUT oh! advent'rous muse, restrain thy flight,
 Dare not the blaze of uncreated light!
 Before whose glorious throne, with dread surprise,
 Th' adoring seraph veils his dazzled eyes;
 Whose pure effulgence, radiant to excess,
 No colours can describe, or words express!
 All the fair beauties, all the lucid stores,
 Which o'er thy works thy hand resplendent pours;
 Feeble, thy brighter glories to display,
 Pale as the moon before the solar ray!

See on his throne the gaudy Persian plac'd,
 In all the pomp of the luxuriant east!
 While mingling gems a borrow'd day unfold,
 And the rich purple waves emboss'd with gold;
 Yet mark this scene of painted grandeur yield
 To the fair lily that adorns the field!
 Obscur'd, behold that fainter lily lies,
 By the rich bird's inimitable dyes;
 Yet these survey, confounded and outdone,
 By the superior lustre of the sun;
 That sun himself withdraws his lessen'd beam
 From thee, the glorious author of his frame!

Transcendent Pow'r! sole arbiter of fate!
 How great thy glory! and thy bliss how great!
 To view from thy exalted throne above,
 (Eternal source of light, and life, and love!)
 Unnumber'd creatures draw their smiling birth,
 To bless the heav'ns, or beautify the earth;
 While systems roll, obedient to thy view,
 And worlds rejoice—which Newton never knew.

Then raise the song, the gen'ral anthem raise,
 And swell the concert of eternal praise!
 Assist ye orbs that form this boundless whole,
 Which in the womb of space unnumber'd roll;
 Ye planets who compose our lesser scheme,
 And bend, concertive, round the solar frame;
 Thou eye of nature! whose extensive ray
 With endless charms adorns the face of day;
 Consenting raise th' harmonious joyful sound,
 And bear his praises through the vast profound:
 His praise, ye winds that fan the cheerful air,
 Swift as they pass along your pinions bear!
 His praise let ocean through her realms display,
 Far as her circling billows can convey!
 His praise ye misty vapours wide diffuse,
 In rains descending, or in milder dews;

His praises whisper, ye majestic trees,
 As your tops rustle to the gentle breeze!
 His praise around, ye flow'ry tribes, exhale,
 Far as your sweets embalm the spicy gale!
 His praise, ye dimpled streams, to earth reveal,
 As pleas'd ye murmur through the flow'ry vale.
 His praise, ye feather'd choirs distinguish'd sing
 As to your notes the vocal forests ring!
 His praise proclaim, ye monsters of the deep,
 Who in the vast abyss your revels keep!
 Or ye fair natives of our earthly scene,
 Who range the wilds, or haunt the pasture green!
 Nor thou, vain lord of earth, with careless ear,
 The universal hymn of worship hear!
 But ardent in the sacred chorus join,
 Thy soul transported with the task divine!
 While by his works th' Almighty is confess'd,
 Supremely glorious and supremely blest'd!

Great Lord of life! from whom this humble frame

Derives the pow'r to sing thy holy name,
 Forgives the lowly muse, whose artless lay
 Has dar'd thy sacred attributes survey
 Delighted oft through nature's beauteous field,
 Has she ador'd thy wisdom bright reveal'd;
 Oft have her wishes aim'd the secret song,
 But awful rev'rence still withheld her tongue,
 Yet as thy bounty lent the reas'ning beam,
 As feels my conscious breast thy vital flame,
 So, blest Creator, let thy servant pay
 His mite of gratitude this feeble way,
 Thy goodness own, thy Providence adore,
 And yield thee only—what was thine before.

THE VISION OF PATIENCE,

AN ALLEGORICAL POEM,

Sacred to the Memory of Mr Alexander Cuming, a Young Gentleman unfortunately lost in the Northern Ocean, on his Return from China, 1740.*

"Ne jaceat nullo, vel ne meliore sepulchro."

LUCAN, lib. viii,

'Twas on a summer's night I lay repos'd,
 In the kind arms of hospitable rest,
 When fancy to my waking thought disclos'd
 And deep the visionary scene impress:
 Close by my side, in robes of morning grey,
 A form celestial stood, or seem'd to stand;
 Intrans'd in admiration as I lay,
 She rais'd with aspect calm my feeble hand;
 And while through all my veins the tumult ran,
 With mild benignity she placid thus began 10

* Mr. A. Cuming was first supercargo of the Suecia, a Swedish East-India ship, which was wrecked on a rock about two miles east of the island of North Ronalds, the northernmost of the Orkney Islands, Nov. 18. 1740. Immediately on the ship's striking, Mr Cuming went off in the barge, accompanied by the surgeon and six of the boldest seamen, in order to discover what the island was, but were never more heard of. Thirty-one of the sailors were saved out of a hundred, the ship's complement.

"Patience my name—of Lachesis the child,
Nor art thou unacquainted with my voice;
By me afflicted virtue suffers mild,
And to th' eternal will submits its choice.
Behold, commission'd from the heavenly sphere,
I come to strengthen thy corrected sight;
To teach thee yet continued woes to bear,
And eye misfortune in a friendly light:
Nor thou my present summons disobey, 19
But cheerfully prepare to wait me on my way."

"Daughter of heaven (methought I straight re-ply'd),
Gladly by me thy summons is obey'd;
Content I follow thee, celestial guide,
Beneath thy sure protection undismay'd:
Oft in sharp perils and surrounding woes
Thy salutary presence have I found;
Then lead wherever thy direction shows,
To distant seas, or earth's remotest bound:
Ready am I to wait thy purpos'd flight,
Thine be the care to act the sovereign will aright."

Sudden, enfolded in a fleecy cloud, 31
Through yielding air we cut our rapid way,
While the pale moon a dubious light bestow'd,
Lands as we pass'd and intermingled sea:
Nor ceas'd our voyage, till the blushing dawn
Dispell'd the glimmering of the starry host;
And night's dark curtain by degrees withdrawn,
We found ourselves on Thulé's sky-girt coast:
Where Silence sits on her untroubled throne,
As if she left the world to live and reign alone.

Here no invading noise the goddess finds, 41
High as she sits o'er the surrounding deep;
But pleas'd she listens to the hollow winds,
Or the shrill mew, that lulls her evening-sleep;
Deep in a cleft-worn rock we found her laid,
Spangled the roof with many an artless gem:
Slowly she rose, and met us in the shade,
As half disturb'd that such intrusion came:
But at her sister's sight, with look discreet,
She better welcome gave, and pointed each a seat.

Wide from her grotto to the dazzled eye 51
A boundless prospect! lay the azure waste,
Lost in the sightless limit sea and sky;
By measurable distance faintly trac'd;
Whence now arising from his war'ry bed,
The sun emerging spread his golden ray;
When sweetly Patience rais'd her pensive head,
And thus the goddess said, or seem'd to say:

"Mark, mortal, with attention's deepest care,
The swift approaching scene the hands of Heaven prepare." 60

With look intent, across the shining void,
(An object to the weak beholder lost!)

Ver. 11. Patience, the first allegorical figure introduced, is here represented as the daughter of Necessity, or Lachesis, one of the three Destinies.

Ver. 38. Thulé is here taken for the Orkney Isles.

Ver. 39. Silence, the second allegorical person, and sister of Patience.

Just in the horizon dim a sail I spied,
As if she made some long-expected coast:
Kind to her wishes blew the western breeze,
As, swift advancing o'er the placid main
She shap'd her course, increasing by degrees,
Till nearer sense made all her beauties plain;
And show'd her on the yielding billows ride,
In all the gallant trim of ornamental pride! 79

Thus flew she onward with expanded sail,
A sight delightful to the pleasur'd eye!
Borne on the wings of the propitious gale,
Heedless, alas! of hidden danger nigh:
The joyful sailor, long on ocean tost,
Already thought his tedious sufferings o'er;
Already hail'd the hospitable coast,
And trod in thought along the friendly shore:
When, dreadful to behold!—disastrous shock!
Shipwreck'd, at once she struck on a wave-cover'd
rock! 80

O Heaven!—it was a piteous sight to view
The wild confusion suddenly took place!
The different gestures of the frighted crew!
The fear that mark'd each death-distracted face.
All one impassion'd scene of woe appear'd,
Some wildly rav'd, while others scarce could speak.

No order was observ'd, no reason heard,
For mortal paleness sat on every cheek!
I look'd at Patience, as she sat me nigh, 89
And wonder'd, as I look'd, to see her tearless eye!

Again I turn'd—when, o'er the vessel's side,
Distinct I saw a manly youth appear,
Launch the oar'd pinnace to the swelling tide,
Nor show'd his steady brow a guilty fear!
The sad remainder with a mournful hail
His just design and bold departure blest;
With lifted eye he spread the slender sail,
As if he trusted Heaven to guide the rest;
Swift o'er the main the bark retreating flew,
And the tall ship at once was taken from my view.

Immediate Patience from her seat arose, 101
And all abrupt the transient visit broke;
While Silence, pleas'd, return'd to her repose,
With air compos'd, for never word she spoke:
Again cloud-wafted we pursu'd our way
Westward, as gave the alter'd wind to ride.
When thus, methought, I heard the goddess say,
"Tis mine to wait yon boat that braves the tide,
For well, alas! too well I now foresee, [me."
Much need yon voyagers will quickly have for

Driven on the pinions of the eastern wind 111
O'er many a sea-girt isle and rocky coast,
We left bleak Shetland's shadowy hills behind,
To watch the little bark in ocean tost:
For now from sight of land diverted clear,
They drove uncertain o'er the pathless deep,

Ver. 113. The pinnace was probably driven into the great ocean that lies to the westward of the isles of Orkney and Shetland, where it perished.

Nor gave the adverse gale due course to steer,
Nor durst they the design'd direction keep:
The gathering tempest quickly rag'd so high,
The wave-encompass'd boat but faintly reach'd
my eye. 120

Yet could I mark, amidst the noisy waste,
The peaceful exit blameless virtue gave;
Calm sat the youth in the loud threatening blast,
And firm prepar'd him for his wat'ry grave.
One fond regard, his latest debt, he paid,
Eastward, to Caledonia's native shore;
And thus (methought) in dying accents said,
"Farewel my country!" he could say no more,
For the wild surge with rage devouring spread,
And whelm'd the hapless youth in ocean's liquid
bed. 130

Then Patience meek, as from my rending heart,
She heard deep utter'd the expressive sighs,
"Seest thou (she said) that youth's undaunted
part,
Who yonder ev'n in death unvanquish'd lies?
There view the blest effects from virtue flow,
The cow'rd from fate to shameful safety flies;
The truly valiant dares to meet the foe,
Nor shrinks from danger, but with honour dies:
For guilt of all defence disarms the slave,
But innocence in death supports the good and brave.

"Yet, ere yon setting sun his light renew, 141
Shalt thou behold the decent honours paid
To the pale corse now floating in thy view,
And see it in the earth lamented laid;
For though he dies from each expecting friend,
Whose vows were offer'd for his safe return,
The mournful stranger o'er his grave shall bend,
The blushing virgins weep around his urn!
Such privilege his spotless truth shall boast,
Though to your distant world in dark oblivion
lost!" 150

The tempest ceas'd—and all the sober night
Intent our course aerial we pursu'd;
Till as Aurora dawn'd with ruddy light,
An island we perceiv'd that stemm'd the flood;
No hills nor trees adorn'd the level soil,
Where bleating flocks a plenteous herbage found;
Low lay the prospect of the bleating isle,
With here and there a spot of tillage-ground:
By which the humble village stood descried,
Where never enter'd arts, or luxury, or pride! 160

O'er many a sea-green holm we wafted went,
Where undisturb'd the feather'd nations lay!
Till lighting on the plain with soft descent,
We saw a reverend form advance our way;
And now approaching with an easy pace,
The venerable sage before us stands;
White were his hairs, and cheerful was his face,
At once delights his aspect and commands:
I felt all care suspended at his view,
Whom better far than I his kindred goddess knew.

Ver. 157. The Faroe Isles, subject to Denmark.
See Bede's Description of them.

Of homespun ruffet was the garb he bore, 171
Girt with a velvet seal's divided skin;
Of woollen yarn the mittens which he wore,
To keep him from the breath of Boreas thin:
An easy path along the verdant ground
Soon to his hospitable cottage led,
Ere yet instructed I my error found,
Nor knew the cause my first emotion bred,
Till, as into his clean abode we went,
Kind Patience whisper'd me our host was call'd
Content. 180

Sweet was his earthen floor with rushes spread,
Sweet was each shell-wrought bowl and wooden dish,
Sweet was the quilt compos'd his healthy bed,
Nor wanted he for fowl or sun-dried fish,
And milk of sheep, and turf, a plenteous store,
Which lay beneath his comfortable roof;
No storms, no accidents, could make him poor,
He and his house I ween were weather-proof.
A batchelor he wond'ring, devoid of care, [fair.
Which made him now appear so healthy and so

Long time with Patience fair discourse he held,
(Oft had the goddess been his welcome guest)
Nor she the friendly intercourse repell'd,
But the good fire familiarly address'd:
Thus were we happily conversant set,
When from the neighbouring village rose a cry,
And drew our hasty steps where numbers met,
Like us, appear'd to know the reason—why?
Nor needed answer: on the sea-weed spray,
Too visible reply!—the wave-toss'd body lay. 200

How stood I shock'd, when in the semblant face
(By death unalter'd, or the cruel flood),
I could of Lycidas each feature trace,
Young Lycidas, the learned and the good!
"O Heaven (cried I) what sorrows will he feel,
Debar'd the promis'd hope of thy return?
Not all his skill the mental wound can heal,
Or cure a loss he must so justly mourn!
How will he weep, when in the ocean grave
He hears a brother lost he could have died to save!"

Here with observant eye, and look serene, 211
Thus check'd the good old man my plaintive speech;
"Best in submission piety is seen,
That lesson let thy kind conductress teach:
But lest the youth thy friend bewails should want
The rites departed merit ought to find,
Let these assembled natives kindly grant
The unpolluted grave, by Heaven assign'd:
A corpse that claim'd a due interment more,
Yet never wafted wave to Faroe's guiltless shore!"

He said—obedient to his just commands 221
The zealous youth the breathless body bear,
Some form the sepulchre with careful hands,
While round the virgins drop the artless tear.

Ver. 180. Content, the third allegorical figure introduced.

Such flowers as Nature grants the ruder clime,
Such flowers around with pious care they shed,
And sing the funeral dirge in Runic rhyme,
Allotted to the sage or warrior dead:
While as these fruitless honours are bestow'd,
Content with sober speech his purpose thus avow'd:

"What boots thee now, lost youth! that cross
the main, 231

Thou spread the daring sail from pole to pole,
Wealth to acquire, and knowledge to attain:
Knowledge, the nobler treasure of thy soul!
Beneath the scorching of the medial line,
On Afric's sand, and India's golden coast;
Virtue gave thee with native truth to shine,
Drest in each excellence that youth could boast,
And now she gives thee from the wave to rise,
And reach the safer port prepar'd thee in the skies.

"Yet take these honours, thy deserv'd reward!
Call this untroubled spot of earth thy own;
Here shall thy ashes find a due regard,
And annual sweets around thy grave be thrown.
Directing Heaven ordain'd thy early end
From fraud and guilt to save thy blameless
youth,

To show that death no terrors can attend,
Where piety resides and holy truth:
Here take thy rest within this hallow'd ground,
Till the last trump emit the dead awakening
sound!" 250

He ceas'd—attentive to the words he said,
In earth the natives place the honour'd clay;
With holy rites they cover up his head,
A spotless grave, where never mortal lay!
Charm'd with the simple manners of the isle,
I wish'd some further knowledge to receive;
Here could have dwelt with old Content awhile,
And learn'd of him the happiness to live!

When Patience from my side abruptly broke,
And, starting at the loss, I suddenly awoke! 260

JOB. CHAP. III.

TRANSLATED.

Thus Job began.—Curst be the fatal morn
In which distinguish'd wretchedness was born!
From the fair round of the revolving year
Perish that day! nor let the night appear,
In which this speck of entity began
To swell to misery, and promise man!
Let darkness stain it o'er, no friendly ray
Pierce through the gloom of that affrighted day!
But shades of terror o'er its circuit spread,
And fold it in the mantle of the dead!
O'er that curst night may double horrors dwell,
Such as enwrap the punishments of hell!
No cheerful sounds its solitude awake,
But such as fiends and tortur'd wretches make;
Such as may wound the soul, and shock the ear,
The groans of death, and howlings of despair!

Ver. 227. The inhabitants of all these northern isles observe the custom of singing over the dead.
Ver. 254. Virgin.

May all its stars with rays diminish'd show,
And though the dusky air obscurely glow!
No glimpse of hope the dreadful scene adorn,
Nor let it see the promise of a morn! —

Because it shut not up my mother's womb,
And join'd at once my cradle and my tomb:
Why dy'd I not? Why did preventive care
My destin'd life for future sorrows spare?
Then had I found that ease I seek in vain,
Nor known this load of unexampled pain!

O grave! thou refuge of the soul distressed!
When shall I sink into thy downy rest?
There kings and mighty ones neglected rot,
In their own mould'ring monuments forgot:
(Though once of grandeur and of pow'r possess'd,
And all the treasures of the shining east)
There men no longer vain distinctions boast,
In common dust the prince and slave are lost:
Low lies th' oppressor bound in lasting chains,
There of his rod the wretch no more complains!
There cease the wailings of the heart distressed,
And there the weary find eternal rest!

Why sparest thou, O Lord! a life like mine?
While with incessant prayers for death I pine:
Why is that blessing given to wealth and pride?
But to the wretch, distressed like me, deny'd.
While o'er my head thy awful terrors brood,
Beset my path, and mingle with my food.
In vain my cries and groans continual rise,
In vain my tears I pour, and waste my sighs:
While all my fears upon my soul are come,
By thee forsaken, hopeless and undone!

VERSES

Sacred to the memory of the Reverend

MR. JOHN ANDERSON*,

MINISTER AT GLASGOW, OB. ANNO 1711.

SHALL streaming tears a nation's eyes o'erflow,
And not a muse partake the general woe?
Shall we be dumb because he speaks no more,
Who charm'd attentive multitudes before.
Clos'd are those eyes, and silent is that tongue
Where sparkled zeal and mild instruction hung.
By nature form'd to shine in ev'ry scene,
To charm th' ambitious, or allure the vain:
Early he learn'd the prospect to despise
And make his nobler choice his kindred skies:
For this himself and rising hopes resign'd,
To live to heav'n, and live for human kind;
Hard trial to the mind, could ought controul
A Roman virtue in a Christian soul?

Oh could the muse his generous labours say!
To justify the debt of tears we pay;
No streams of grief should be immoderate thought,
Excess of sorrow is an honest fault.

His widow'd flock best know his pious care,
Taught by his words and guarded by his prayer;
No more shall in his eyes his ardour shine,
No longer from his lips flow truths divine.

* Author of "A Dialogue on the Common-prayer Book," 4to 1711, "Letters upon Presbyteries," &c.
8vo. 1720, and grandfather of the learned and ingenious John Anderson, F. R. S. Professor of Natural Philosophy in the University of Glasgow.

How wont the willing crowd to gather round,
Hang on his lips, and catch th' enchanting sound;
While in such terms his thoughts he still express
The love of virtue rose in every breast
And ev'ry heart its secret faults confess.
Then with what ease the tumult would he calm,
And to the wounds he search'd apply the balm!
So first their danger to mankind he taught,
Then, like some guardian angel, comfort brought.
Nor had his speech alone such wond'rous pow'r,
Though wond'rous that—but still his life was more;
Where all the charms of virtue were display'd;
And taught the world even more than all he said;
Where all was open, unreserv'd and fair,
A generous bosom, and a heart sincere,
So firm to truth, to reason so resign'd,
At once impartial, and at once so kind, [mend,
That scarce we knew which most we should com-
The free reprover, or the tender friend:
Such were the pastors that in ancient days,
Reclaim'd mankind, and led in virtue's ways,
Such Asia boasted, and such Rome of old,
E'er souls were barter'd for unrighteous gold;
Such great Erasmus, gentle Cranmer shone,
And such a man, O Glasgow! late thy own:
Whose life like theirs, in generous labours past,
Was still the same and lovely to the last.

So in calm ev'nings and unclouded skies
Not less resplendent in his fall than rise;
The westering sun into the main declines,
Bright and more bright, and as he sets he shines!

WRITTEN

IN MR. WATTS'S HOME LYRICE.

HERE let th' attentive reader learn
On heavenly wings to rise;
And all-contemplative discern
The wonders of the skies!

Compassion kind, and boundless love,
Here seem divinely bright:
And mercy like the silver dove
Allures the ravish'd sight.

Thy soul, great Watts! forsakes the earth,
And scorns the glittering toy:
While conscious of her higher birth
She seeks immortal joy.

Thy melting numbers touch the soul,
And kind devotion warm;
Each jarring thought with ease controul,
And bless us while they charm.

O happy whose seraphic mind,
Such heights sublime can rise!
Can leave the lessening world behind,
And mingle with the skies

But happier far shall be thy fate,
When death shall break the chain;
And set thee loose to bliss complete,
To joys that know no pain.

There shalt thou thy immortal lyre,
In songs of praise employ!
And feel the sacred task inspire
Thy breast with endless joy.

VERSES

OCCASIONED BY THE DEATH OF MR. M—S—

At Glasgow, May 28. 1730.

INSCRIBED TO MR. A — S —.

WHILE thy torn heart with varied woe is prest,
And all the friend lies bleeding in thy breast:
Forgive the muse who would our loss deplore,
And mourn with thee—that Marcus is no more!

The cruel tyrant whose resistless rage
Alike employs itself on youth and age;
Smiles at our tear—and as our grief runs high,
Points Marcus out; and bids us learn to die!
Shows all the op'ning virtues of the youth,
His native goodness, modesty, and truth:
What early worth just blasted in its bloom!
How many graces shrowded in the tomb!
See Caledonia weeping o'er the urn!
As if she seem'd her fav'rite son to mourn;
Oft for her sake he read th' historic page,
And trac'd the mazes of remotest age;
Earlier asserter of her glorious cause,
Fond of her freedom, zealous for her laws:
Great liberty inspir'd his honest breast,
And his dear country all his soul possess'd:
In youth a patriot—steady to the right,
In manners humane, and in arts polite.
His heart all-generous, candid, and serene,
Sweet as his look, engaging as his mien:
To friendship faithful, to misfortune kind,
His life a lovely copy of his mind.

So near perfection in his early day,
Why should we weep to see him snatch'd away?
To see him reach at once th' immortal prize,
And rise triumphant to his native skies.
Behold th' exalted youth with smiles survey,
The fond mistaken debt of grief we pay!
Behold him seated on the blissful shore,
Hear from afar the noisy tempest roar!
Safe from the taint of a corrupted age,
From vicious manners, and from party-rage.
No passions there his purer bosom move:
But harmony divine, and peace, and love;
Such as on earth were wont to sooth his breast,
The pleasing foretaste of his heav'nly rest.

See him point out the path he left in view,
And bid his friends the noble race pursue!
Display the fair example to their eyes,
And bid them live like him—like him to rise!

So the bright all-enlivening orb of light,
When he withdraws himself from mortal sight;
With fairer glories shines in milder skies,
And sets to us, for better worlds to rise!

Thou dear departed friend! if greatly blest,
One meaner thought can touch thy peaceful breast,
Look on a heart, by passions rent like mine,
That weeping waits to mingle joys with thine!
Fir'd by the flight—that struggles to be free,
And join society with heav'n and thee.

TO MR. THOMSON,

UPON HIS TRAGEDY OF SOPHONISBA.

FORGIVE the muse, that with unpractis'd string,
And fond ambition dares thy praise to sing;

Pleas'd who beholds thy tow'ring genius rise,
And sees thy merit shine in southern skies.

When nature first inspir'd thy early strain,
To paint the beauties of the flow'ry plain;
The charming page I read with soft delight,
And every lively landskip charm'd my sight:
Now led by thee, while I again explore,
New patriots rising on a barbarous shore;
A beauteous breast that glows with love of fame,
A female Cato, with a softer name!
My ravish'd heart exults in being free,
And burns with love of sacred liberty!

Let Rome the blessing arrogate no more,
The goddess reigns upon a distant shore;
And there in all her native charms confest,
She fires immortal Saphonisba's breast:
Great Carthage rises from oblivion's womb,
By thee reviv'd, she quits her awful tomb;
And emulates again her haughty rival Rome.

So when great Titian rose, immortal man!
With rural scenes his pencil first began;
Employ'd all-genial nature's laws to trace,
And copy from her ever-blooming face;
Here paint the precipice and falling flood,
There strike the vale—or mark the distant wood;
Till rising in his skill by just degrees,
He form'd th' idea of th' historic piece;
Where some great hero boldly he design'd,
And touch'd th' exalted passions of the mind:
Of art with nature such the generous strife,
That all the speaking canvas swell'd with life!
So strong the figures strike the ravish'd eye,
We quite forget the hand that gives the joy!
Till by reflection warm'd, we feel those joys,
Still from one great original arise;
Who follows nature charms without design,
Who follows her like you—like you must shine.

TO MRS. OLDFIELD,

ON HER ACTING CLEOPATRA.

OFT has my soul with strong compassion strove,
To think of Antony's ill-fated love;
To see him shrink before th' ambitious boy,
Fame, life, and honour, given for transient joy!
Thus once I thought—but now my error see,
And the lost hero stands absolv'd by thee.

Had Cleopatra's charms like Oldfield's shone!
Had she the tuneful magic of thy tongue!
Well might the Roman of his softness boast,
And think that love aton'd for empire lost:
Well might he from the glorious war remove,
And barter crowns and provinces for love!
For oh! who would not make the fate his own?
And wish to be so gloriously undone!

ANNIVERSARY ODE,

SACRED TO THE MEMORY OF A DAUGHTER.

Ob. An. 1726.

BEGIN my muse, and strike the lyre,
Let grief the melting notes inspire!
And sadly consecrate the day,
That snatch'd my soul's delight away!

When first the beauteous infant maid,
The early seeds of sense display'd,
With her dear prattle sooth'd my cares,
And charm'd my fond transported ears.

How did her op'ning bloom arise!
And as it struck my ravish'd eyes,
Oft promis'd to my years increase,
A store of innocence and peace.

But soon, too soon, these flattering joys,
Fate's interposing hand destroys;
And lost in death's all-gloomy shade,
The dear delusive vision fled.

So does the early-budding rose,
Its blushing fragrancy disclose,
Allure the touch, and smell, and sight,
And yield each sense a soft delight.

Till some rash foe its pride invade,
And ravish'd from its native bed,
Its odour and its hue decay,
And all its beauties fade away.

Thus were my dreams of comfort crost,
And with the fav'rite virgin lost;
And all my schemes of bliss to come,
Enclos'd within her early tomb!

Thence clouds of new afflictions rise,
And brooding o'er the darken'd skies;
With their sad melancholy shade,
The horizon of life o'erspread.

While o'er the young Sabina's urn,
Thus with paternal grief I mourn:
Around my soul new sorrows break,
And leave my woes no room to speak.—

On Atticus' delightful age,
Fate next employed his cruel rage;
With ease dissolv'd life's feeble chain,
And freed the suff'ring saint from pain.

O ever honour'd sacred name!
If in the bright immortal train
One thought of earth can touch thy rest,
Look down on this afflicted breast.

Teach me, like thee, through life to steer,
Patient and calm my lot to bear;
Teach me thy heav'nly steps to trace,
And reach like thee the realms of peace!

ODE TO MR. WILLIAM CUMING,

ON HIS GOING TO FRANCE, AUGUST 31. 1735.

“ ——— Finibus [Gallicis]
“ Reddes incolumem precor,
“ Et serves animæ dimidium meæ!”

O BLOW serene! ye soft Etesian gales,
Curl the gay main, and fill the swelling sails!
The guardian vessel through the deep attend:
Shine every favourable planet bright,
To guide the prosp'rous navigation right,
And bear to Gallia's shore my happy friend!

Thence to Lutetia's walls, a pleasing way,
 Through scenes by nature dress'd profusely gay!
 Auspicious fortune still his passage guide;
 Till safe arriv'd he views the wond'rous town,
 Which all agree unprejudic'd to own
 At once fair Europe's envy and its pride!
 There while his thoughts explore th' amazing plan
 Of pow'r divine—the microcosm of man;
 From every danger shield his spotless youth
 With manly strength his growing virtue arm,
 To break the force of every firen charm,
 And keep untainted all his native truth.
 When views of pomp or bright processions rise,
 When Louvre or Versailles enchants the eyes,
 The grand assembly or the royal train!
 Oh liberty! thy faithful prospect lend,
 To Britain's isle his calm reflection bend,
 And say, that slav'ry makes the splendour mean.

When artful beauty lays the secret snare,
 Instruct him, friendly goddess, to beware,
 Defend him from each captivating art!
 For there fair Venus holds her sov'reign court,
 There all her wanton sportive loves resort,
 And in a thousand forms surprise the heart.

Yet, goddess! let him, as intent he sees
 That airy nation's native skill to please,
 Shun the reflection of the mimic glass!
 Of all the Britons I have ever seen,
 Who ap'd the graces of the Gallic mien,
 Scarce one but chronicled himself an ass.

Yet that politeness of the truest kind,
 Which both adorns and cultivates the mind,
 This let his careful study borrow thence!
 Manners from hence new ornament receive,
 To knowledge this does double lustre give,
 And travel finishes the man of sense.

Sometimes from crowds retir'd if chance he strays,
 Where Seine along th' Elysian meadows plays,
 Let some kind genius whisper in his ear,
 How many vows for his success are paid,
 How many for his safe return are made,
 How many think his absence tedious here.

But oh, too harsh, my friend! these precepts flow,
 The specious coverings of my secret woe,
 While fortune's partial favour I accuse:
 Who, when my sorrows needed most a friend,
 Was pleas'd in thee the precious gift to send,
 Malicious bounty! but bestow'd to lose.

Oh no, forgive, the sacred tie I wrong!
 Where virtue binds, the mutual union strong.
 Distance, misfortune, time, and fate defies;
 From pole to pole, from Ganges to the Thame,
 Immortal friendship spreads th' etherial flame
 For ages still the same, and never dies!

HORACE AND LYDIA,

BOOK III. ODE IX. IMITATED.

Alexis.

WHILE, Phyllis, transported I lay in your arms,
 And, possess'd of your fondness, was blest'd in your charms,
 On wealth and ambition with scorn I look'd down,
 Nor envy'd great Lewis that bauble, his crown.

Phyllis.

While faithful with me you delighted at home,
 As happy was I, as the Pope is at Rome:
 But now new acquaintance your fancy mislead,
 And Peter's folk * never are out of your head.

Alexis.

The charge I submit to—I own they're my friends,
 Their agreeable converse fair virtue commends.
 With their sense and good humour my woes I relieve,
 And with them for an age I unweary'd could live.

Phyllis.

Miranda's fine voice and good humour for me,
 My comrade she is, and my comrade shall be!
 In spite of all scandal, I'll live with her still,
 And let the world censure, or say what it will.

Alexis.

But what if, dear Phyllis, this diff'rence should end,
 Suppose, for your sake, I abandon'd my friend,
 And, in spite of my judgment, too bias'd my view,
 Relinquish'd the world to be bury'd with you.

Phyllis.

Though Miranda's still constantly pleasing and
 gay,
 Though her notes far exceed all the music of May,
 And though you, like old ocean, look muddy and sour,
 Our ancient alliance I'll gladly restore, [more.
 And resolve that till death we will differ no

Alexis.

No, Phyllis, though kind, that concession won't take,
 I ne'er can consent our joint friends to forsake,
 Who in making of treaties forget their allies,
 Will never be reckon'd or honest or wise.

Phyllis.

Then be judg'd by the rule you've so gravely laid down,
 Nor hope that Miranda my heart shall disown.
 With her, gentle heav'n, grant me freedom to rove,
 While friendship shall pay me the interest of love.

Alexis.

Beware, charming Phyllis, a fatal mistake,
 Where interest's the motive, there friendship is weak.
 'Tis virtue alone can establish the tie, [we die.
 Through life still unbroken, which holds when
 The taste may be modish, yet ne'er can last long,
 To lose an old lover, to hear a new song.

* By "Peter's folk," is meant the hospitable and agreeable family of a Mr. Stewart, a merchant in Edinburgh; who had two amiable daughters, to whom Boyse addressed some poems.

If novelty charms you, delighted in change,
From pleasure to pleasure, oh long may you range!
For me, from henceforth on some quieter shore,
Where fortune and love shall disturb me no more,
I'll seek in retirement the noblest of joys,
'Tis time must discover the truth of each choice.

EPISTLE TO HENRY BROOKE, ESQ.

THOUGH 'midst the cruel storm of passion tost,
I view the shore, and sigh for safety lost,
While every distant hope of good is gone,
And left by thee! 'tis joy to be undone,
Oh read the thought where no design has part,
The last faint purpose of my wretched heart;
Long had between us (in a moment torn)
The holy band of friendship's faith been worn:
I claim'd the bliss, so happy once was I,
Dear to your breast, and cherish'd in your eye:
Now lost the privilege, shall one short day
Snatch all the labour of our lives away?
But oh, I err! I am not what I seem,
Friendship can ne'er subsist without esteem;
Death were my choice, if heaven my choice ap-
prov'd,
More easy than to lose the friend I lov'd:
Happy in this, that to your better care
I gave a friend, will never lose his share,
Whose truth will still increase, the longer known,
Whose faith, whose goodness, are so like your own:

Forget, I bless you,—if this wish succeeds,
Then live Gustavus, though Arvida bleeds

ON THE EXTRAORDINARY EXECUTION

OF CAPT. JOHN PORTEOUS, SEPT. 7. 1736.

“ ——— Nec lex est justior ulla,

“ Quam necis artifices arte perire sua.”

“ By their own arts, 'tis righteously decreed,

“ The dire artificers of death shall bleed.”

PORTEOUS! thou strong example, timely given,
How sovereigns should employ the power of heaven;

Thy wanton hands a sanguine deluge spread,
Thy country's equal voice pronounc'd thee dead:
But tools like thee were thought such useful things,
That sordid greatness mov'd all secret springs;
In vain the great applied, the court repriev'd,
Eternal Justice thought too long you liv'd:
Mercy grew vain; when such a crime grew slight,
'Twas time the people should assert their right.
Yet let the muse the just encomium draw,
Self-injur'd, how they kept the sight of law,
The gentleness, denied their fellows, gave,
And left thee time to arm thee for the grave:
Let none behold thy exit with regret,
You died, the noblest way, a public debt:
May the auspicious omen rise in you,
And villains (screen'd however) meet their due!

Come, Spenser, awful genius, come along,
Mix with the music of th' ærial throng ;
O' reath a pensive stillness through my breast,
While balmy breezes pant the leaves among,
And sweetly sooth my passions into rest,
Hint purest thoughts in purest colours drest ;
Even such as angels prompt in golden dreams,
To holy hermits high in raptures blest,
His bosom burning with celestial beams ;
No less the raptures of my summer day,
If Spenser deign with me to moralize the lay.

THE LIFE OF THOMPSON.

OF the personal history of THOMPSON, the present writer is sorry that the intelligence which his inquiries have obtained, is so scanty, that he must give his life to the world much more briefly than his qualifications deserve. A few detached dates and notices, less ample and satisfactory than the inscription on a common grave-stone, collected chiefly from his writings, compose the slender memorials of his life.

William Thompson, was second son of the Rev. Francis Thompson, B. D. Senior Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, and thirty-two years vicar of Brough in Westmoreland.

Of the time and place of his birth there are no memorials. But it is probable, he was born at Brough, about 1712. His mother was first married to Joseph Fisher, M. A. Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, Vicar of Brough, and Arch-deacon of Carlisle, by whom she had no children. His father died August 31. 1735, aged 70. His mother died October 25. 1737, aged 65.

After passing through the usual course of elementary learning in the country, he was sent to the University of Oxford, and entered at Queen's College, where he afterwards became a Fellow.

Early in life, he discovered a propensity to poetry, and wrote, as he himself informs us, Six Pastorals, in 1734.

His early conceptions of love, of friendship, and of virtue, were very warm and elevated, and prompted a variety of poetical effusions, amatory, sentimental, and serious.

In his retirement in Westmoreland, on the banks of his native Eden, which "first heard the Doric reeds" of the unfortunate Pattison, and the amiable Langhorne, he wrote his Stella, five Amores, Elegiarum tres Libri, in 1736.

These Pastorals and Love Elegies, written when the young poet's soul was high-tuned to the tender emotions of nature, without any design of printing them, have not been collected into his works.

In 1736, he wrote an Epithalamium on the Royal Nuptials, as a college exercise, which procured him considerable reputation.

He took the degree of Master of Arts, February 26. 1738; and entering into orders, was presented to the rectory of South Weston and Hampton-Pyle, in Oxfordshire.

About this time, on his recovery from the small-pox, he wrote his poem called Sickness; which was published in 1746, and very favourably received by the polite and religious world.

Not long after, he published his Hymn to May, in the manner of Spenser, which completely established his poetical reputation.

In 1751, he was a candidate for the poetry professorship at Oxford; but did not succeed in his application.

Soon after, he published Gratitude, a Poem, on the Countess of Pomfret's benefactions to the University of Oxford, which has eluded the inquiries of the present writer.

In 1757, he published, by subscription, a collection of his Poems on Several Occasions, and Gondibert and Birtba, a tragedy, with a dedication to the Countess of Northumberland. In a short advertisement, he informs the reader, "that the greater part of the poems were written when the author was very young, and without any design of printing them, which," he says, "is only mentioned with hopes to procure the reader's pardon for the imperfection of some, and the lightness of others. Yet

Non ego mordaci distinxī carmine quemquam
Nulla venenato litera mista joco est."

OVID.

"The tragedy," he adds, "was likewise chiefly composed when the author was an under-graduate in the University, as an innocent relaxation from those severer and more useful studies; for which the College, where he had the benefit of his education, is so deservedly distinguished. I have caused it (with all its juvenile imperfections on its head) to be printed as it was first written, and have even added the original motto, that it might be all of a piece"

This seems to be the language of unaffected modesty; some of the earlier little pieces might probably have admitted of some improvements, if he had judged it proper to retouch them afterwards: but, as a spirit of ingenuousness is manifest throughout his sentiments, he has probably given his most private productions, as they were first conceived and written; upon which supposition, there appears very little reprehensible in them, and not a little, for their quantity, that may be justly commended.

"The poem called Sickness," he says, "was republished at the request of several of my subscribers; to which, without regarding the additional expence, I very readily agreed. I have made some alterations, which, in the divisions of the books, I hope will be thought improvements."

He survived this publication several years, and intended to republish "Browne's Britannia's Pastorals," upon which he left some short notes, inserted in T. Davies's edition, 1772; but the present writer has not been able to discover when he died.

This is all that is known of Thompson, an amiable and ingenious poet, whose writings seem not hitherto to have received so much attention as they deserve.

His Poems on Several Occasions, with the omission of a few trifling songs, and his Garden Inscriptions, published in the "Poetical Calendar" for August 1763, are now, for the first time, received into a collection of classical English poetry. The reader may perhaps wish, for the sake of his reputation, that some more of his lighter pieces had been omitted. The majority of them are, however, worthy of him.

As a poet, his compositions are characterized by fertility of invention, splendour of imagination, tenderness of sentiment, facility of expression, and harmony of numbers. He is of the school of Spenser and Milton; but he imitates the former more than the latter. He seems to have been an enthusiastic admirer, and an attentive observer of the charms of nature, as his compositions abound in minute rural imagery, and picturesque description. His faults are those of his master. Rich in native stores, he sometimes employs traditionary imagery, and hereditary similes. His descriptions are sometimes puerile and extravagant, and sometimes overwrought, and lost in a profusion of colours.

His capital performance is Sickness, a poem, in five books, in blank verse. In this work, boldness of personification, energy of language, sublimity of sentiment, pathetic representation, and the most exquisite beauties of poetry, are ennobled with Christian and moral truths. Almost every line glows with devotion, rises into the most exalted apprehensions of the Creator, and is animated with the most lively faith in the all-sufficient mediation of the Redeemer of mankind. In the first book, which bears only the general title of Sickness, after proposing his subject, he thus reflects on the levity of some of his earlier poetical amusements.

———Too long the muse,
Ah! much too long, a libertine diffus'd,
On Pleasure's rosy lap, has idly breath'd
Love-sighing elegies, and pastoral strains,
The soft seducers of our youthful hours,
Soothing away the vigour of the mind,
And energy of virtue. But farewell,
Ye myrtle walks, ye lily-mantled meads
Of Paphos, and the fount of Acidale.

The second book is called the Palace of Disease. This palace is very poetically imagined and executed, and the malignant power inhabiting it is very correspondently pourtrayed. He thus describes one of her six attendant furies, the small-pox, whose severe infection occasioned the poem.

The last, so turpid to the view, affrights
Her neighbour hags. Happy herself is blind,
Or madness would ensue, so bloated black,
So loathsome to each sense, the sight or smell,
Such foul corruption on this side the grave,
Variola yclep'd; ragged and rough,
Her couch perplex'd with thorns. What heavy scenes
Hang o'er my head, to feel the theme is mine!

In the third book, called the Progress of Sickness, after a succession of dreams of different complexions, which are very poetically enumerated and contrasted, on waking affrighted from the imaginary blast of Astolpho's horn, in "Orlando Furioso;" he thus energetically exclaims:

Pain empties all her vials on my head,
And sleeps me o'er and o'er. Th' envenom'd shirt
Of Hercules enwraps my burning limbs
With dragon's blood: I rave and roar like him,
Writhing in agony. Devouring fires
Eat up the marrow frying in my bones.
O whether, whether shall I turn for aid!

The metaphorical display of friendship at the close of this book is warm and delicate.

Friendship's
—— a holy fire,
Where honour beams on honour, truths on truths,
Bright as the eyes of angels, and as pure.
An altar whence two gentle loving hearts
Mount to the skies in one conspiring blaze,
And spotless union——

The fourth book is called the Recovery. In this, Mercy sends Hygeia or Health, to the well of life, in which he ingeniously feigns the angel who descended into the pool of Bethesda, to have previously moistened his wings. His surprise at the first return of sight, and his succeeding exultation on it, are finely expressed.

I thank thee Sleep!—Heav'ns! is the day restor'd
To my desiring eyes? Their lids, unglew'd,
Admit the long-lost light, now streaming in
Painfully clear!—O check the rapid gleam
With shading silk, till the weak visual orb,
Stronger and stronger, dares imbibe the sun,
Nor, wat'ring, twinkle at unfolded day.

Sight, all-expressive! Though the feeling sense
Thrills from Ianthe's hand; at Handel's lyre
Tingles the ear; though smell from blossom'd beams
Arabian spirit gathers; and the draught,
Sparkling from Burgundy's exalted vines,
Streams nectar on the palate; yet, O sight!
Weak their sensations, when compar'd with thee.

The last book, styled the Thanksgiving, is replete with much devout and animated gratitude. The following parody of a very poetical passage in the "Psalms," is well executed.

——For me (who late
A neighbour of the worms) when I forget
The wonders of thy goodness ray'd on me,
And cease to celebrate with matin harp
Or vesper song, thy plenitude of love,
And healing mercy; may the nightly Pow'r,
Which whispers on my slumbers, cease to breathe
Her modulating impulse through my soul;

Untun'd, unhallow'd! Discord, string my lyre,
 Idly, my finger, press the fretted gold,
 Rebellious to the dictates of my hand,
 When indolent, to swell the notes for thee,
 FATHER of heav'n and earth!—

The Hymn to May, is a professed imitation of Spenser; and without ostentatious praise, it is but just to observe, that in opulence of imagery, brilliancy of colouring, distinctness and propriety of attribute, and harmony of numbers, it challenges every modern production, and rivals, if not surpasses every thing of the kind, even in Spenser, from whom he caught his inspiration. The diction is florid and luxuriant, and the sentiments rapturous and tender in the highest degree. He gives a loose to the luxuriance of his imagination, and indulges himself in every extravagance that poetry allows. The exuberance of his diction invests his thoughts with splendour, through which, perhaps, they are not always easily discerned. Spenser being not less celebrated for his description of the beauties of nature, than for his dress and portraiture of allegorical personages, Thompson has thus charmingly delineated and arrayed his poetical May.

She comes!—A filken camus, emerald-green,
 Gracefully loose, adown her shoulders flows,
 (Fit to enfold the limbs of Paphos' queen)
 And with the labours of the needle glows,
 Purpled by nature's hand! The amorous air
 And musky western breezes fast repair,
 Her mantle proud to swell, and wanton with her hair.

Her hair (but rather threads of light it seems)
 With the gay honours of the spring entwin'd,
 Copious, unbound, in nectar'd ringlets streams,
 Floats glitt'ring on the sun, and scents the wind,
 Love-sick with odours!—Now to order roll'd,
 It melts upon her bosom's dainty mould,
 Or, curling round her waist, disparts its wavy gold.

Young circling roses, blushing round them throw
 The sweet abundance of their purple rays,
 And lilies dipt in fragrance, freshly blow,
 With blended beauties, in her angel face.
 The humid radiance beaming from her eyes,
 The air and seas illumines, the earth and skies,
 And open, where she smiles, the sweets of Paradise.

On zephyr's wing the laughing goddess view
 Distilling balm. She cleaves the buxom air,
 Attended by the silver-footed dew,
 The ravages of winter to repair.
 She gives her naked bosom to the gales,
 Her naked bosom down the ether sails;
 Her bosom breathes delight; her breath the spring exhales.

In stanzas 47, 48, 49, 50, and 51, the supposition of Venus being born in this month, and celebrating her birth-day near Acidahus, a fountain in Boeotia, is happily imagined, and expressed with that softness of sentiment which he professes to have indulged in this poem, though with an avowal of the purest intention. The stanzas 19, 20, 21, &c. show him a great master in the descriptive. The Nativity, a college exercise, and the Epithalamium on the royal nuptials, are also fine imitations of Spenser. In the Nativity, the lines beginning, Hark, the jolly pipe and rural lay, and ending, Hell groan'd through all her dens, and grim death dropp'd down dead, are remarkably fine. The verses on Pope's Works are agreeably various and spirited. Those especially on his translation of "Homer," are exquisitely animated. The Epistle to the Author of Leonidas, The fall of Corefus and Callirhoe, from Pausanias; and the Magi, a Sacred Eclogue are all masterly. The lines in the Eclogue in which the sages are introduced paying their adoration to the infant Saviour, are eminently beautiful. His Epitaph on both his parents, comprise two most worthy characters pourtrayed by filial poetry. The verses Written on the Holy Bible, in his grave religious character, have an original air. The Garden Inscriptions, prove him no languid admirer, but a fervent worshipper of the excellencies of his favourites, particularly Spenser, Milton, Thomson, and Young. The eulogy is sometimes overcharged; yet the overflowing fulness with which he measures out to others, springs from a most amiable source. It is the very contrast of narrow self-love, of envy and detraction, and entitles him to the most liberal regard from every lover of candour and benevolence.

His Love verses are, for the most part, tender and unaffected; dictated by his own feelings, when the passion is quite new, romantically sweet, and, perhaps, at the utmost purity which is compatible with desire.

His two Latin odes on Winter and Summer, rank with the best compositions of our English writers, who have cultivated Latin poetry with success. Poetical versions, by Mr. Tattersal, fellow of Trinity-College, Cambridge, were published along with the originals; which I believe," says he, "will be thought the best verses in the collection: they are finished in so easy and masterly a manner, that I must own, that I had rather have been the author of them than of the originals themselves."

His tragedy of Gondibert and Birtba, taken from Davenant's poem of "Gondibert," seems very little adapted to the stage, being much more poetical than dramatic. The sentiments are warm and elevated; but seem rather such as he had collected from an acquaintance with the illustrious dead, than from being "hackneyed in the ways of men," as he appears more delighted with what Syphax malignantly calls the "extravagance of virtue," than experienced in a knowledge of the world, and the ordinary conduct of mankind.

THE WORKS OF THOMPSON.

SICKNESS, A POEM: IN FIVE BOOKS.

The Lord comfort him, when he lieth sick upon his bed; make thou all his bed in his sickness.

Psalms.

BOOK I.

THE ARGUMENT.

SUBJECT proposed. The folly of employing poetry on wanton or trifling subjects. Invocation of Urania. Reflections on the instability of life itself: Frailness of youth, beauty, and health. The suddenness and first attacks of a distemper, in particular of the small-pox. Moral and religious observations resulting from sickness.

Of days with pain acquainted, and of nights
Unconscious of the healing balms of sleep,
That burn in restless agonies away;
Of sickness, and its family of woes,
The fellest enemies of life, I sing,
Horizon'd close in darkness. While I touch
The ebony instrument, of solemn tone,
Pluck'd from the cypress' melancholy boughs,
Which, deep'ning, shade the house of mourning,
groans 9

And hollow wailings, through the damps of night,
Responsive wound the ear. The sprightly pow'rs
Of musical enchantment wave their wings,
And seek the fragrant groves and purple fields,
Where pleasure rolls her honey-trickling streams,
Of blooming health and laughter-dimpled joy.

Me other scenes than laughing joy, and health
High-blooming, purple-living fields and groves,
Fragrant with spring, invite. Too long the muse,
Ah! much too long, a libertine, diffus'd
On pleasure's rosy lap, has idly breath'd 20
Love-sighing elegies, and pastoral strains,
The soft seducers of our youthful hours,
Soothing away the vigour of the mind,
And energy of virtue. But farewell
Ye myrtle walks, ye lily-mantled meads
Of Paphos, and the fount of Acidale,
Where oft in summer, Grecian fables tell,
The daughters of Eurynome and Jove,
Thalia and her sister-graces, cool
Their glowing features, at the noontide hour, 30
Farewel!—But come, Urania, from thy bow'rs
Of everlasting day; O condescend
To lead thy votary (with rapt'rous zeal Adoring nature's God, the great Three-One!)

To Salem, where the shepherd-monarch wak'd
The sacred breath of melody, and swell'd
His harp, to angels kindred notes attun'd,
With music worthy heaven! O bathe my breast,
With praises burning, in the morning dews,
Which sparkle, Sion, on thy holy hill. 40

The prophets, eagle-ey'd, celestial maid,
Those poets of the sky! were taught to chaunt
The glories of Messiah's reign by thee!
Kindled by thee, the eastern pages flame
With light'ning, and with thunder shake the soul;
While from the whirlwind God's all-glorious voice
Bursts on the tingling ears of Job: the writ
Of Moses, meek in spirit, but his thoughts
Lofty as heav'n's blue arch. My humble hopes
Aspire but to the alpha of his song; 50
Where, roll'd in ashes, digging for a grave,
More earnest than the covetous for gold
Or hidden treasures, crust'd o'er with boils,
And roaring in the bitterness of soul,
And heart-sick pain, the man of Uz complains.
Themes correspondent to thy servant's theme.

I sing to you, ye sons of men! of dust
Say rather: What is man, who proudly lifts
His brow audacious, as confronting Heav'n,
And tramples with disdain his mother earth, 60
But moulded clay? an animated heap
Of dust, that shortly shall to dust return?

We dream of shadows, when we talk of life,
Of Pelops' shoulder, of Pythagoras' thigh,
Of Surlius's saints, and Ovid's gods;
Mere tales to cheat our children with to rest;
And, when the tale is told, they sink to sleep,
Death's image! so inane is mortal man!
Man's but a vapour, toss'd by every wind,

The child of smoke, which in a moment flies, 70
And, sinking into nothing, disappears.
Man's a brisk bubble, floating on the waves
Of wide eternity: He dances now
Gay-gilded by the sun (though empty, proud;)
Phantastically fine! and now he drops
In a broad sheet of waters deep involv'd,
And gives his place to others. O, ye sons
Of vanity, remember, and be wise!

Man is a flow'r, which, in the morning, fair
As day-spring, swelling from its slender stem, 80
In virgin-modesty, and sweet reserve,
Lays out its blushing beauties to the day,
As Gideon's fleece, full with the dews of heav'n.
But if some ruder gale, or nipping wind,
Disastrous blow too hard, it weeping mourns
In robes of darkness; it reclines its head
In languid softness; withers every grace;
And, ere the ev'ning-star the west inflames,
It falls into the portion of those weeds
Which with a careless hand we cast away— 90
Ye thoughtless fair ones, moralize my song!

Thy pulse beats music; thou art high in health;
The rather tremble. When the least we fear,
When folly lulls us on her couch of down,
And wine, and lutes, and odours, fill the sense
With their soft affluence of bewitching joys;
When years of rapture in thy fancy glow
To entertain thy youth; a sudden burst
Of thunder from the smallest cloud of fate, 99
Small as the prophet's hand, destroys, confounds,
And lays thy visionary hopes in dust.

By my example taught, examples teach
Much more than precepts, learn to know thy end.

The day was Valentine's: when lovers wounds
Afresh begin to bleed, and sighs to warm
The chilly rigour of relenting skies:
Sacred the day to innocence and mirth,
The festival of youth! in seeming health
(As custom bids) I hail'd the year's fair morn,
And with its earliest purple braid my brows, 110
The violet or primrose breathing sweets
New to the sense. Ianthe by my side,
More lovely than the season! rais'd her voice,
Observant of his rites, in festal lays,
And thus address'd the patron of the spring:

"Hail, Valentine! at thy approach benign,
Profuse of gems, the bosom of the earth
Her fragrant stores unfolds: the fields rejoice,
And, in the infancy of plenty, smile: 119
The vallies laugh and sing: the woods, alive,
Sprout into floating verdure, to embow'r
Those happy lovers who record thy praise.

Hail, Valentine! at thy approach benign,
Inhaling genial raptures from the sun,
The plummy nations swell the song of joy,
Thy soaring choiristers! The lark, the thrush,
And all th' aerial people, from the wren
And linnet to the eagle, feel the stings
Of amorous delight, and sing thy praise.

Hail, Valentine! at thy approach benign, 130
Quick o'er the soft'ning soul the gentle gales
Of spring, awaking bliss, instinctive move
The ardent youth to breathe the sighs of faith
Into the virgin's heart; who, sick of love,

With equal fires, and purity of truth,
Consenting, blushes while she chaunts thy praise."

So sung Ianthe: to my heart I prest
Her spotless sweetness: when (with wonder hear!)
Though she shone smiling by, the torpid pow'rs
Of heaviness weigh'd down my beamless eyes, 140
And prest'd them into night. The dews of death
Hung clammy on my forehead, like the damps
Of midnight sepulchres; which silent op'd
By weeping widows, or by friendship's hand,
Yawn hideous on the moon, and blast the stars
With pestilential reek. My head is torn
With pangs insufferable, pulsive starts,
And pungent aches, griding through the brain,
To madness hurrying the tormented sense,
And hate of being.—Poor Ianthe wept 150

In bitterness, and took me by the hand
Compassionately kind: "Alas! she cry'd,
What sudden change is this? (Again she wept.)
Say, can Ianthe prove the source of pain
To Thamalin? forbid it, gracious Heav'n!"
No, beauteous innocence! As soon the rose
Shall poison with its balm; as soon the dove
Become a white dissembler, and the stream
With lulling murmurs, creeping through the grove,
Offend the shepherd's slumber.—Scarce my tongue
These fault'ring accents stammer'd, down I sink,
And a lethargic stupor sleeps my sense 162

In dull oblivion: till returning pain,
Too faithful monitor! and dire disease,
Bid me remember pleasure is a dream,
That health has eagle's wings, nor tarries long.

New horrors rise. For in my pricking veins
I feel the forked flame: the rapid flood
Of throbbing life, excursive from the laws
Of sober nature and harmonious health, 170
Boils in tumultuary eddies round
Its bursting channels. Parching thirst, anon,
Drinks up the vital maze, as Simois dry,
Or Xanthus, by the arm-ignipotent,
With a red torrent of involving flames
Exhausted; when Achilles with their floods
Wag'd more than mortal war: the god of fire
Wide o'er the waters pour'd th' inundant blaze,
The shrinking waters to the bottom boil,
And hiss in ruin, O! ye rivers, roll 180
Your cooling crystal o'er my burning breast,
For Ætna rages here! Ye snows, descend;
Bind me in icy chains, ye northern winds,
And mitigate the furies of the fire!

Good Heav'n! what hoards of unrepented guilt
Have drawn this vengeance down, have rais'd this fiend

To lash me with his flames? But, O! forgive
My rashness, that dares blame thy just decrees.
It is thy rod: I kiss it with my heart
As well as lips: like Aaron's may it bloom 190
With fruits of goodness; not, like Moses' turn
A serpent; or to tempt me to accuse
The kind oppression of thy righteous hand,
Or sting me to despair.—Affliction, hail!
Thou school of virtue! open wide thy gates,
Thy gates of ebony! Yet, O! correct
Thy servant but with judgment, not in wrath,
But with thy mercy, Lord! thy stripes will heal.

Thus, without heresy, afflictions prove
 A purgatory; save us as by fire: 200
 And purifying off the dross of sin,
 Like old Elijah's chariot, rap the soul,
 On wings of meditation, to the skies.
 In health we have no time to visit truth:
 Health's the disease of morals: few in health
 Turn o'er the volumes which will make us wise.
 What are ye now, ye tuneful triflers! once
 The eager solace of my easy hours,
 Ye dear deluders or of Greece or Rome,
 Anacreon, Horace, Virgil, Homer, what? 210
 The gay, the bright, the sober, the sublime?
 And ye of softer strain, ye amorous fools,
 Correctly indolent, and sweetly vain,
 Tibullus, Ovid, and the female verse
 Of her, who, plunging from Leucadia's heights,
 Extinguish'd with her life her hopeless fires,
 Or rose a swan, as love-struck fancy deem'd
 Who would not, in these hours of wisdom, give
 A vatican of wits for one Saint Paul? 219
 Dare Tully, with the golden mouth of Greece,
 With Chrysostom in rhet'ric-thunder join
 Advent'rous now? as soon the feeble sound,
 Salmoeneus, of thy brazen bridge contends
 With Jove's ethereal peal, and bursting roar
 Fulminous, rending earth, o'erturning air,
 And shaking heav'n. Or shall the pointed pen

Of Corduba, with hostile labour bend
 Its sentences obscure against the force
 Of Hierom's noble fire? as soon the moon, 229
 With blunted horn, dares pour her pallid beam
 Against the boundless majesty of day,
 The sun's refulgent throne, when high in noon
 He kindles up the earth to light and joy.
 My best instructor, sickness, shuts the eye
 From vanity; she draws the curtains round
 The couch, nor gives admittance to the world:
 But to Harpocrates consigns the door,
 And, silent, whispers me, that "life is vain."
 If life be vain on what shall man depend?
 Depend on virtue. Virtue is a rock 240
 Which stands for ever; braves the frowning flood,
 And rears its awful brow, direct, to heaven.
 Though virtue save not from the grave, she gives
 Her votaries to the stars; she plucks the sting
 From the grim king of terrors; smooths the bed
 Of anguish, and bids death, though dreadful, smile.
 Death smiles on virtue: And his visage, black,
 Yet comely seems. A Christian scorns the bounds
 Where limited creation said to time, 249
 "Here I have end." Rapt'rous, he looks beyond
 Or time or space; he triumphs o'er decay;
 And fills eternity: the next to God!

* Seneca was born at Corduba in Spain.

NOTES AND ALLUSIONS TO BOOK I.

Ver. 8. Thus Horace:

Barbiton hic Paries habebit. Lib. iii. Ode 26.

And, a greater than Horace in lyric poetry, the royal Psalmist, represents the same image:

As for our harps we hanged them up, upon the trees that are therein. Psal. cxxxvii. 2.

Ver. 26. Paphos, a city of Cyprus; formerly dedicated to Venus.

Acidale, a fountain in Orchomenus, a city of Bœotia, where the graces were supposed to bathe themselves. The genealogy of the graces is very diversly related. But Hesiod says, they were the offspring of Jupiter and Eurynome. Theog.

Ver. 47. The book of Job is ascribed to various authors, and amongst the rest to Moses. I am proud to observe, that Dr. Young has strengthened this opinion in his notes to his admirable poem on Job. Most of the arguments on each side of the question may be found in Pole's Synopsis Critic. in the beginning of his notes on the book of Job; and in Mr S. Wesley's curious dissertation on the same subject.

Ver. 63.

Σκιάς αναρ ανδρωντοι.

Pind. Pitb. Ode 8.

Sophocles has much the same thought in his Ajax; and, to dignify the sentiment, he puts it into the mouth of Ulysses:

Ορο γαρ ημεις υδιν οντας αλλο πλην
 Ειδωλ' οσοι πικ ζωμεν, η κυφην σκιας.

The Scholiast observes, that he borrowed the sentiment from Pindar.

Ver. 63. The poets feign that Tantalus served up his son Pelops to the table of the gods: They reunited the fragments, and formed his shoulder, which was lost, of ivory. Ovid. Met. Lib. vi.

— Humeroque Pelops insignis eburno.

Virg. Georg. iii.

I shall add this beautiful passage from Tibullus:

— Carmina ni sint,

Ex humero Pelopis non nituisset ebur.

Lib. i. Eleg. 4.

Ver. 64. This is told with so much humour by Mr. Addison, in one of his finest works, that I rather choose to give an authority from him, than any of the ancients. "The next man astonished the whole table with his appearance; He was slow, solemn, and silent, in his behaviour, and wore a raiment curiously wrought with hieroglyphics. As he came into the middle of the room, he threw back the skirt of it, and discovered a golden thigh. Socrates, at the sight of it, declared against keeping company with any who were not made of flesh and blood; and therefore desired Diogenes the Laertian to lead him to the apartment allotted the fabulous heroes, and worthies of dubious existence," &c.

The Table of Fame, Tatler, Vol. II. No. 81.

Ver. 65. Surius writ the voluminous legend of the Romish saints, in six volumes in folio. Dr.

Donne, in his satires, has given him this character :

——— outlie either
Jovius, or Surlus, or both together. Sat. 4.

Ver. 112. Sickness being a subject so disagreeable, in itself, to human nature, it was thought necessary, as fable is the soul of poetry, to relieve the imagination with the following, and some other episodes. For to describe the anguish of a distemper without a mixture of some more pleasing incidents, would, no doubt, disgust every good-natured and tender reader.

Ver. 223. Salmoneus king of Elis, a province in the Peloponnesus. He was so arrogant as to affect being thought a god : for which end he built a bridge of brass, by driving over which in his chariot, he endeavoured to make himself be believed the thunderer. But Jupiter, enraged at his impiety, struck him dead with a real thunder-bolt.

Vidi crudeles dantem Salmonea pœnas,
Dum flammæ Jovis et sonitus imitatur Olympi—
Demens qui nimbos, et non imitabile fulmen
Ære et cornipedum cursu imitatur equorum.
Virg. Æn. Lib. 4.

Ver. 237. Harpocrates, the god of silence amongst the Egyptians.

Si quicquam tacite commissum est fido ab amico,
Me unum esse invenies illorum jure sacratum,
Corneli, et factum esse puta Harpocratem.
Catull.

Hence Erasmus, Lib. Adag. tells us, that reddere Harpocratem, is the same as, mutum reddere. So Catullus in another place :

Patrum reddidit Harpocratem.

Ovid describes him in the same manner, without taking notice of his name, amongst the attendants of Isis :

Quique premit vocem, digitoque silentia suadet.
Metam. Lib. ix.

This description entirely agrees with the several medals and statues of Harpocrates, which the learned antiquary Giss. Cuperus exhibits in his laborious dissertation on that subject, printed with Monumenta Antiqua.

But upon another account likewise, Harpocrates may justly be appointed to attend upon the sick ; for he is numbered amongst the salutary gods, who assisted in extreme dangers, as appears from Artemidorus, Oneir. l. ii. c. 44. where, after having mentioned Serapis, Isis, Anubis, and Harpocrates, he goes on thus : “ Semper enim servatores crediti sunt hi dii, eorum qui per omnia exercitati sunt, et ad extremum periculum pervenerunt,” &c. Kircher also, in his Oedip. Egypt. p. 2. vol. ii. p. 315. amongst others to the same purpose, has these remarkable words :

“ Reverebantur Egypti, præter cætera numina maximè Isin et Osirin, ac horum sive Harpocratem, tanquam Iatricos genios.”

THE PALACE OF DISEASE.

Diseases dire, of which a monstrous crew
Before thee shall appear.

Milton.

BOOK II.

THE ARGUMENT.

REFLECTIONS. Invocation of the genius of Spenser. Apostrophe to the Duchess of Somerset. The palace of disease. War. Intemperance. Melancholy. Fever. Consumption. Small pox. Complaint on the death of Lord Beauchamp.

DEATH was not man's inheritance, but life
Immortal, but a paradise of bliss,
Unfading beauty, and eternal spring,
(The cloudless blaze of innocence's reign) :
The gifts of God's right hand ! till monstrous sin,
The motly child of Satan and of hell,
Invited dire disease into the world,
And her distorted brood of ugly shapes,
Echidna's brood ! and fix'd their curs'd abode
On earth, invisible to human sight, IC
The portion and the scourge of mortal man.

Yet though to human sight invisible,
If she, whom I implore, Urania deign,
With Euphrasy to purge away the mists
Which, humid, dim the mirror of the mind ;
(As Venus gave Æneas to behold
The angry gods with flame o'erwhelming Troy,
Neptune and Pallas), not in vain, I'll sing
The mystic terrors of this gloomy reign :
And, led by her, with dangerous courage press 20
Through dreary paths, and haunts, by mortal foot
Rare visited ; unless by thee, I ween,

Father of fancy, of descriptive verse,
And shadowy beings, gentle Edmund, hight,
Spenser! the sweetest of the tuneful throng,
Or recent, or of *eld. Creative bard,
Thy springs unlock, expand thy fairy scenes,
Thy unexhausted stores of fancy spread,
And with thy images enrich my song.

Come † Hertford! with the muse, awhile, vouchsafe

30

(The softer virtues melting in thy breast,
The tender graces glowing in thy form)
Vouchsafe in all the beauty of distress,
To take a silent walk among the tombs:
There lend a charm to sorrow, smooth her brow,
And sparkle through her tears, in shining woe.
As when the ‡ dove (thy emblem, matchless dame!

For beauty, innocence, and truth are thine),
Spread all its colours o'er the boundless deep
(Empereal radiance quivering round the gloom),
Chaos reform'd, and bade distraction smile!

41

Deep in a desert vale, a palace frowns
Sublimely mournful: to the eye it seems
The mansion of despair, or ancient night.
The graces of the season's never knew
To shed their bounty here, or smiling, blest,
With hospitable foot, its bleak domain,
Uncultivated. Nor the various robe
Of flushing spring, with purple gay, invests
Its blighted plains; nor summer's radiant hand
Profusive, scatters o'er its baleful fields
The rich abundance of her glorious days;
And golden autumn here forgets to reign.

50

Here only hemlock, and whatever weeds
Medea gather'd, or Canidia brew'd,
Wet with Avernus' waves, or Pontus yields,
Or Colchos, or Thessalia, taint the winds,
And choke the ground unhallow'd. But the soil
Refuses to embrace the kindly seeds
Of healing vegetation, sage, and rue,
Dittany, and amello, blooming still
In Virgil's rural page. The bitter yew,
The church-yard's shade! and cypress' wither'd arms

60

In formidable ranks surround its courts
With umbrage dun; administ'ring a roof
To birds of ominous portent; the bat,
The raven boding death, the screaming owl
Of heavy wing, while serpents, rustling, hiss,
And croaking toads the odious concert aid.

The peevish east, the rheumy south, the north
Pregnant with storms, are all the winds that blow:
While, distant far, the pure Etesian gales,
And western breezes fan the spicy beds
Of Araby the blest, or shake their balm
O'er fair Britannia's plains, and wake her flow'rs.
Eternal damps, and deadly humours, drawn
In pois'nous exhalations from the deep,
Conglomerated into solid night,

* Old.

† be present Duchess of Somerset.

‡ The Platonists suppose that Love, or the celestial Venus (of whom the dove is likewise an emblem) created the world out of Chaos.

And darkness, almost to be felt, forbid
The sun, with cheerful beams, to purge the air,
But roll their suffocating horrors round
Incessant, banishing the blooming train
Of health, and joy, for ever, from the dome.

81

In sad magnificence the palace rears
Its mouldering columns; from thy quarries, Nile,
Of sable marble, and Egyptian mines
Embowell'd. Nor Corinthian pillars, gay
With foliag'd capitals and figur'd frize,
Nor feminine Ionique, nor, though grave,
The fluted Doric, and the Tuscan plain,
In just proportions rise: but Gothic, rude,
Irreconcil'd in ruinous design:
Save in the centre, in relieveo high,
And swelling emblematically bold,
In gold the apple rose*, "whose mortal taste
" Brought death into the world, and all our
" woe."

90

Malignantly delighted, dire disease
Surveys the glittering pest, and grimly smiles
With hellish glee. Beneath, totters her throne,
Of jarring elements; earth, water, fire;
Where hot and cold, and moist and dry, maintain

100

Unnatural war. Shapeless her frightful form,
(A chaos of distemper'd limbs in one)
Huge as Megæra, cruel as the grave,
Her eyes, two comets; and her breath, a storm.
High in her wither'd arms, she wields her rod,
With adders curl'd, and dropping gore; and points

To the dead walls, besmear'd with cursed tales
Of plagues red-spotted, of blue pestilence,
Walking in darkness; havoc at their heels;
Lean famine, gnawing in despite her arm:
Whatever Egypt, Athens, or Messine,
Constantinople, Troynovant, Marseilles,
Or Cairo felt, or Spagnolet could paint.
A sickly taper, glimmering feeble rays
Across the gloom, makes horror visible,
And punishes, while it informs, the eye.

110

A thousand and ten thousand monstrous shapes
Compose the group; the execrable crew
Which Michael, in vision strange, disclos'd
To Adam, in the Lazar-house of woe;
A colony from hell. The knotted gout,
The bloated dropsy, and the racking stone,
Rolling her eyes in anguish; lepra foul,
Strangling angina; ephialtic starts;
Unnerv'd paralysis; with moist catarrhs;
Pleuritis bending o'er its side in pain;
Vertigo; murderous apoplexy, proud
With the late spoils of Clayton's honour'd life:
Clayton the good, the courteous, the humane;
Tenacious of his purpose, and his word
Firm as the fabled throne of Grecian Jove.
Be just, O memory! again recal
Those looks illumin'd by his honest heart,
That open freedom, and that cheerful ease,
The bounteous emanations of his soul:
His British honour, Christian charity,
And mild benevolence for human kind.

120

131

* Milton's Paradise Lost, Book I.

From every quarter, lamentations loud,
 And sighs resound, and rueful peals of groans 140
 Roll echoing round the vaulted dens, and screams
 Dolorous, wrested from the heart of pain,
 And brain-sick agony. Around her throne
 Six favourite furies, next herself accurst,
 Their dismal mansions keep; in order each
 As most destructive. In the foremost rank,
 Of polish'd steel, with armour blood-distain'd,
 Helmets, and spears, and shields, and coats of mail,
 With iron stiff, or tin, or brass, or gold,
 Swells a triumphal arch; beneath grim war 150
 Shakes her red arm: for war is a disease,
 The fellest of the fell! Why will mankind,
 Why will they, when so many plagues involve
 This habitable globe (the curse of sin),
 Invent new desolations to cut off
 The Christian race? At least in Christian climes
 Let olives shade your mountains, and let peace
 Stream her white banner o'er us, blest from war,
 And laurels only deck your poets brows.
 Or, if the fiery metal in your blood, 160
 And thirst of human life your bosom sting,
 Too savage! let the fury loose of war,
 And bid the battle rage against the breasts
 Of Asian infidels: redeem the tow'rs
 Where David sung, the Son of David bled;
 And warm new Tassos with the epic flame.
 Right opposite to war a gorgeous throne
 With jewels flaming, and emboss'd with gold,
 And various sculpture, strikes the wond'ring eye
 With jovial scenes (amid destruction gay), 170
 Of instruments of mirth, the harp, the lute,
 Of costly viands, of delicious wines,
 And flow'ry wreaths to bind the careless brow
 Of youth or age; as youth or age demand
 The pleasing ruin from th' enchantress, vile
 Intemperance: than Circe subtler far;
 Only subdu'd by wisdom; fairer far
 Than young Armida, whose bewitching charms
 Rinaldo fetter'd in her rosy chains;
 Till by Ubaldo held, his diamond shield 180
 Blaz'd on his mind the virtues of his race,
 And quick dissolv'd her wanton mists away.
 See, from her throne slow-moving, she extends
 A poison'd goblet! fly the beauteous bane:
 The adder's tooth, the tiger's hungry fang,
 Are harmless to her smiles; her smiles are death.
 Beneath the foamy lustre of the bowl,
 Which sparkles men to madness, lurks a snake
 Of mortal sting: fly: if you taste the wine,
 Machaon swears that moly cannot cure. 190
 Though innocent and fair her looks, she holds
 A lawless commerce with her sister pests,
 And doubly whets their darts: away—and live.
 Next, in a low-brow'd cave, a little hell,
 A pensive hag, moping in darkness, sits
 Dolefully sad: her eyes (so deadly dull!)
 Stare from their stonied sockets, widely wild;
 For ever bent on rusty knives and ropes;
 On poignards, bowls of poison, daggers red
 With clotted gore. A raven by her side 200
 Eternal croaks; her only mate despair;
 Who, scowling in a night of clouds, presents
 A thousand burning hells, and damned souls,

And lakes of stormy fire, to mad the brain
 Moon-strucken. Melancholy is her name;
 Britannia's bitter bane. Thou gracious pow'r,
 (Whose judgments and whose mercies who can tell!)
 With bars of steel, with hills of adamant,
 Crush down the footy fiend; nor let her blast
 The sacred light of Heav'n's all-cheering face, 210
 Nor fright from Albion's isle the angel hope.

Fewer the fourth: adust as Afric wilds,
 Chain'd to a bed of burning brass: her eyes
 Like roving meteors blaze, nor ever close
 Their wakeful lids: she turns, but turns in vain
 Through nights of misery. Attendant thirst
 Grasps hard an empty bowl, and shrivell'd strives
 To drench her parched throat. Not louder groans
 From Phalaris's bull, as fame reports,
 Tormented with distressful din the air, 220
 And drew the tender tear from pity's eye.

Consumption near; a joyless meagre wight,
 Panting for breath, and shrinking into shade
 Eludes the grasp: thin as th' embodied air,
 Which, erst, deceiv'd Ixion's void embrace,
 Ambitious of a goddess! scarce her legs
 Feeble she drags, with wheezing labour on,
 And motion slow: a willow wand directs
 Her tottering steps, and marks her for the grave.

The last so turpid to the view, affrights 230
 Her neighbour hags. Happy herself is blind,
 Or madness would ensue; so bloated black,
 So loathsome to each sense, the sight or smell,
 Such foul corruption on this side the grave;
 Variola yclep'd, ragged and rough, [scenes
 Her couch perplex'd with thorns.—What heavy
 Hang o'er my heart to feel the theme is mine!
 But Providence commands; His will be done!
 She rushes through my blood; she burns along,
 And riots on my life!—Have mercy, Heav'n!—
 Variola, what art thou? whence proceeds 240
 This virulence, which all but we escape?

Thou nauseous enemy to human kind;
 In man, and man alone, thy mystic seeds,
 Quiet, and in their secret windings hid,
 Lie unprolific! till infection rouse
 Her pois'nous particles, of proper size,
 Figure, and measure, to exert their pow'r
 Of impregnation; atoms subtle, barb'd,
 Infrangible, and active to destroy; 250
 By geometric or mechanic rules
 Yet undiscover'd: quick the leaven runs,
 Destructive of the solids, spirits, blood
 Of mortal man, and agitates the whole
 In general conflagration and misrule.

As when the flinty seeds of fire embrace
 Some fit materials, stubble, furze or straw,
 The crackling blaze ascends: the rapid flood
 Of ruddy flames, impetuous o'er its prey, 259
 Rolls its broad course, and half the field devours.

As adders deaf to beauty, wit, and youth,
 How many living lyres, by thee unstrung,
 E'er half their tunes are ended, cease to charm
 Th' admiring world? So ceas'd the matchless
 name,

By Cowley honour'd, by Roscommon lov'd,
 Orinda: blooming Killigrew's soft lay:
 And manly Oldham's pointed vigour, curs'd

By the gor'd sons of Loyola and Rome,
And he who Phædra sung, in buskin'd pomp,
Mad with incestuous fires, ingenious Smith : 270
Oxonia's sons ! And, O, our recent grief !
Shall * Beauchamp die, forgotten by the muse,
Or are the muses with their Hertford dumb !
Where are ye ? weeping o'er thy learned Rhine,
Bononia, fatal to our hopes ! or else
By Kennet's chalky wave, with tresses torn,
Or rude, and wildly floating to the winds,
Mute, on the hoary willows hang the lyre,
Neglected ? or in rural Percy-lodge, 279
Where innocence and he walk'd hand in hand,
The Cypress crop, or weave the laurel-bough
To grace his honour'd grave ! Ye lilies, rise
Immaculate ; ye roses, sweet as morn ;
Less sweet and less immaculate than he.

His op'ning flow'r of beauty softly smil'd,
And, sparkling in the liquid dew of youth,
Adorn'd the blessed light ! with blossoms fair,
Untainted ; in the rank Italian soil
From blemish pure. The virgins stole a sigh,
The matrons lifted up their wond'ring eyes, 290
And bless'd the English angel as he pass'd,
Rejoicing in his rays ! Why did we trust
A plant so lovely to their envious skies,
Unmercifully bright with savage beams ?
His were the arts of Italy before,
Courting, and courted by the classic muse.
He travell'd not to learn, but to reform,
And with his fair example mend mankind.

Why need I name (for distant nations know,
Hesperia knows ; O would Hesperia sing ! 300
As Maro erst, and late Marino rais'd
The blooming Beauchamps of the former times,
Marcellus and Adonis to the stars,
On wings of soaring fire ! so would she sing !)
His uncorrupted heart ; his honour clear
As summer suns, effulging forth his soul
In every word and look : his reason's ray
By folly vanity, or vice unstain'd,
Shining at once with purity and strength,
With English honesty, and Attic fire : 310

* Lord Beauchamp, only son of the Earl of Hertford, died at Bologna, of the small-pox, Sept. 11. 1744, aged 19.

His tenderness of spirit, high-inform'd
With wide benevolence, and candid zeal
For learning, liberty, religion, truth ;
The patriot-glories burning in his breast,
His king and country's undivided friend !
Each public virtue, and each private grace ;
The Seymour dignity, the Percy flame ;
All, all—Ere twenty autumns roll'd away
Their golden plenty. Further still ! behold
His animated bloom ; his flush of health ; 320
The blood exulting with the balmy tide
Of vernal life ! so fresh for pleasure form'd
By nature and the graces : yet his youth
So temperately warm, so chaste cool,
Ev'n Seraphims might look into his mind,
Might look, nor turn away their holy eyes !

Th' unutterable essence of good heav'n,
That breath of God, that energy divine
Which gives us to be wise, and just, and pure,
Full on his bosom pour'd the living stream, 330
Illum'd, inspir'd, and sanctify'd his soul !

And are these wonders vanish'd ? are those eyes,
Where ardent truth, and melting mildness, shone,
Clos'd in a foreign land ? no more to bless
A father, mother, friend ! no more to charm
A longing people ? O, lamented youth !
Since fate and gloomy night thy beauties veil'd
With shade mysterious, and eclips'd thy beams,
How many Somersets are lost in thee ? 339

Yet only lost to earth !—For trust the muse,
(His virtues rather trust) she saw him rise,
She saw him smile along the tissu'd clouds,
In colours rich embroider'd by the sun,
Engirt with cherub wings, and kindred forms,
Children of light, the spotless youth of heav'n ?
They hail their blest companion, gain'd so soon
A partner of their joys ! and crown with stars,
Almost as fair the radiance of his brows,
Ev'n where the angel host, with tongues of fire,
Chaunt to their glittering harps th' Almighty's
praise, 350

And, in a burning circle, shout around
The jasper-throne, he mingles flames with them ;
He springs into the centre of the choir,
And drinking in the spirit most divine,
He sings as sweet, and glows as bright as they.

NOTES AND ALLUSIONS ON BOOK II.

Ver. 14. Eyebright. This herb was unknown to the ancients ; at least, it is not mentioned by them. It is of extraordinary service to the eye, curing most of its distempers.

Ver. 24. The date of our English poetry may with great justice begin with Spenser. It is true, Chaucer, Gower, and Ludgate, were masters of uncommon beauties, considering the age they lived in; and have described the humours, passions, &c. with great discernment. Yet none of them seem to have been half so well acquainted with the very life and being of poetry, invention, painting, and design, as Spenser. Chaucer was the best before him; but then he borrowed most of his poems, either from the ancients, or from Boccace, Petrarch, or the Provençal writers, &c. Thus his Troilus and Cressida, the largest of his works, was taken from Lollius; and the Romaunt of the Rose was translated from the French of John de Meun, an Englishman, who flourished in the reign of Richard II.; and so of the rest. As for those who followed him, such as Heywood, Scogan, Skelton, &c. they seem to be wholly ignorant of either numbers, language, propriety, or even decency itself. I must be understood to except the Earl of Surrey, Sir Thomas Wyatt, Sir Philip Sidney, several pieces in the Mirror of Magistrates, and a few parts of Mr. G. Gascoigne's and Turbervill's works.

Ver. 55. Medea, notorious for her incantations in Ovid, &c. as Canidia in Horace.

Ver. 56. Pontus, Colchos, and Thessalia, well known for producing noxious and pois'nous herbs and plants.

Has herbas, atque hæc Ponto mihi lecta venena,
Ipse dedit Mæris; nascuntur plurima Ponto.

Virg. Ecl. 8.

Besides there grows a flow'r in marshy ground,
Its name amellus, easy to be found:

A mighty spring works in its root, and cleaves
The sprouting stalk, and shows itself in leaves.

The leaves inclining to a darker blue, &c.

Though a crusade may seem very romantic (and perhaps it is so), yet it has been applauded by the greatest writers of different ages; by Æneas Sylvius, by Bessarion, by Naugerius, &c. who have each writ orations upon that subject. And here I cannot help observing, that Casimire and Jac. Baldé, the two most celebrated of the modern lyric poets, have writ several of their finest odes to animate the Christian princes to such a design; and that Tasso has adorned the expedition of Godfrey of Bullogin with the most beautiful and perfect poem since the Æneis (for I prefer Milton to Virgil himself.)

Ver. 178. See Tasso's Il Godfredo, cant. iv. stan. 29, &c. cant. xiv. stan. 68. cant. xvi. stan. 29.

Ver. 190. Machaon celebrated in Homer; but here used, in general, for any physician. So Ovid: Firma valent per se, nullumque Machaonæ quarunt.

And Martial:

Quid tibi cum medicis? dimitte Machaonæ omnes.

Ver. 219. Amongst several instruments of torment that Phalaris caused to be contrived, there was a bull of brass, in which people being cast, and a fire placed under it, they bellowed like oxen. Perillus the artist, demanding a great reward for his invention, was put in it himself to try the first experiment. Upon which Pliny makes this good-natured reflection: "Perillum nemo laudat, sæviorem Phalaride tyranno, qui taurum fecit, mugitus hominis pollicitus, igne subdito, et primus eum expertus cruciatum justiore sævitia," &c.

seems to have been paid by that people to our great Milton in his travels, as we learn by this epigram of a learned Italian nobleman, in the 2d volume of Milton's poetical works :

Ut mens, forma, decor, facies, mos, si pietas sic,

Nipt in the bloom of beauty, wit, and youth,

A worm to them ! and to their light a shade,
Ungilded with one beam, which melted down
The tear fast trickling o'er their honour'd tombs :
We all must die ! Our every pulse that beats,
Beats toward eternity, and tolls our doom. 10

Fate reigns in all the portions of the year.
The fruits of autumn feed us for disease ;
The winter's raw inclemencies bestow
Disease on death ; while spring, to strew our herse,
Kindly unbosoms, weeping in their dews,
Her flow'ry race ! and summer (kinder still)
With the green turf and brambles binds our graves.

But am I wake ? or in Ovidian realms,
And Circè holds the glass ? What odious change,
What metamorphose strikes the dubious eye ? 20
Ah ! whither is retir'd the scarlet wave,
Mantling with health, which floated through the check, [where

From the strong summer-beam imbib'd ? And
The vernal lily's softly-blended bloom ?
The forehead roughens to the wond'ring hand.
Wide o'er the human-field, the body, spreads
Contagious war, and lays its beauties waste.
As once thy breathing harvest, Cadmus, sprung,
Sudden, a serpent-brood ! an armed crop
Of growing chiefs, and fought themselves to death.
One black-incrusted bark of gory boils, 31
One undistinguish'd blister, from the foal
Of the foot sore, to the head's forer crown.

Job's punishment ! With patience like his own,
O may I exercise my wounded soul,
And cast myself upon his healing hand,
Who bruifeth at his will, and maketh whole !

Ah, too, the lustre of the eyes is fled !
Heavy and dull, their orbs neglect to roll,
In motionless distortion stiff and fix'd ; 40
Till by the trembling hand of watchful age
(A weeping matron, timorous to affright,
And piously fallacious in her care,
Pretending light offensive, and the sun)
Clos'd ; and, perhaps, for ever ! ne'er again
To open on the sphere, to drink the day,
Or (worse !) behold Ianthe's face divine,
And wonder o'er her charms.—But yet forbear,
O dare not murmur ! 'tis heav'n's high behest
Though darkness through the chambers of the grave 50
This dust pursue, and death's sad shade involve,
E'er long, the Filial-light himself shall shine ;
(The stars are dust to him, the sun a shade)
These very eyes, these tunics of flesh,
Even though by worms destroy'd, shall see my God,
And, seeing, ne'er remember darkness more,
Environ'd with eternity of day.

Though, at their visual entrance, quite shut out
External forms, forbidden, mount the winds,
Retire to chaos, or with night commix ; 60
Yet, fancy's mimic work, ten thousand shapes,
Antic and wild, rush sweeping o'er my dreams,
Irregular and new ; as pain or ease
The spirits teach to flow, and in the brain
Direction diverse hold : Gentle and bright
As hermits, sleeping in their mossy cells,
Lull'd by the fall of waters ! by the rills
From Heliconian cliffs devolv'd ; or where
Thy ancient river Kishon, sacred stream !
Soft murmurs on their slumbers : peace within,
And conscience ; ev'n to ecstasy sublim'd 71
And beatific vision. Sudden, black,
And horrible as murderers ; or hags,
Their lease of years spun out, and bloody bond

Full-flashing on their eyes; the gulf, beneath,
Mad'ning with gloomy fires; and heav'n, behind,
With all her golden valves for ever clos'd.

Now in Elysium lapp'd, and lovely scenes,
Where honeysuckles rove, and eglantines,
Narcissus, jess'min, pinks, profusely wild, 80
In every scented gale Arabia breathe:

As blissful Eden fair; the morning-work
Of Heav'n, and Milton's theme! where innocence
Smil'd, and improv'd the prospect.—Now, anon,
By Isis' favourite flood supinely laid,
In tuneful indolence, behold the bards
(Harps in each hand, and laurel on each brow)
A band of demigods, august to sight,
In venerable order sweetly rise, 89

(The muses sparkling round them) who have trod
In meaasur'd pace its banks, forever green,
Enamell'd from their feet! harmonious notes,
Warbled to Doric reeds, to Lesbian lyres,
Or Phrygian minstrelsy, steal on the ear
Enamour'd with variety: and loud

The trumpets shrilling clangours fill the sky
With silver melody—Now, happier still!
Round thy Italic cloisters, musing flow,
Or in sweet converse with thy letter'd sons,
Philosophers, and poets, and divines, 100
Enjoy the sacred walk, delighted, * Queen's!
Where Addison and Tickell lay inspir'd,
Inebriated from the classic springs,

And tun'd to various-sounding harps the song,
Sublime, or tender, humourous, or grave,
Quaffing the muses' nectar to their fill.
Where Smith in hoary reverence presides,
(Crown'd with the snow of virtue for the skies)
With graceful gravity, and gentle sway;
With perfect peace encircled and esteem. 110

Whose mild and bright benevolence of soul,
By reason cool, and by religion warm,
And generous passion for the college-weal,
More than a muse inspire.—Momentary bliss!
For sudden rapt, the midnight howl of wolves,
The dragon's yell, the lion's roar, astound
My trembling ear. Ha! down a burning mount
I plunge deep, deep: sure Vulcan's shop is here—
Hark, how the anvils thunder round the dens
Flammivorous! What? are those chains to bind
This skeleton! the cyclops must be mad: 121

Those bolts of steel, those adamantine links
Demand Typhæus' strength to burst.—Away—
Venus and Mars—beware.—In giddy whirls
I ride the blast, and tow'ring through the storm
Enjoy the palace of the morn. The sun
Relinquish the reins of Phlegon to my hands:
His mane waves fire: he scorches me to dust:
Avaunt, thou fiend! I'll hurl thee down the deep
Of heav'n, with bolted thunder, and enwrap 130
With forked light'ning.—Now staggering I reel,
By murderers pursu'd: my faithless feet
Scarce shift their pace: or down rushing amain,
I cease to recollect my steps, and roll
Passive on earth.—Sure, 'twas Astolpho's horn
Pour'd on my ear th' annoying blast: at which,
Rogero trembled, Bradamant grew pale,

And into air dissolv'd th' enchanted dome.

Now starting from this wilderness of dreams,
I wake from fancy'd into real woe, 140
Pain empties all her vials on my head,
And steeps me o'er and o'er. Th' envenom'd shirt

Of Hercules enwraps my burning limbs
With dragon's blood: I rave and roar like him,
Writhing in agony. Devouring fires
Eat up the marrow, frying in my bones.

O whither, whither shall I turn for aid?—
Methinks a seraph whispers in my ears,
Pouring ambrosia on them, "Turn to God;
So peace shall be thy pillow, ease thy bed, 150
And night of sorrow brighten into noon.

Let the young cherub patience, bright-ey'd hope,
And rosy finger'd pray'r, combining hold
A sure dominion in thy purpos'd mind,
Unconquer'd by affliction."—I receive
The mandate as from Heav'n itself.—Expand
Thyself, my soul, and let them enter in.

Come, smiling angel, patience, from thy seat;
Whether the widow's cot, or hermit's cell,
By fasting strong, and potent from distress; 160
Or midnight-student's taper-glimmering roof,
Unwearied with revolving tedious tomes,
O come, thou Panacea of the mind!

The manna of the soul! to every taste
Grateful alike: the universal balm
To sickness, pain, and misery below.
She comes! she comes! she dissipates the gloom;
My eyes she opens, and new scenes unfolds
(Like Moses' bush, though burning, not consum'd)
Scenes full of splendour, miracle, and God. 170

Behold, my soul, the martyr-army, who
With holy blood the violence of fire
Quench'd, and with ling'ring constancy fatigu'd
The persecuting flame: or nobly stop'd
The lion's mouth, and triumph'd in his jaws.
Hark, how the virgin white-rob'd tender train
Chaunt hallelujah to the rack; as dear
And pleasing to the ear of God, as hymns
Of angels on the resurrection-morn,
When all the host of heaven hosanna sing! 180

Yet further; lift thy eyes upon the cross,
A bleeding Saviour view, a dying God!
Earth trembles, rend the rocks, creation groans:
The sun, asham'd, extinguishes the day:
All nature suffers with her suffering Lord.

Amidst this war of elements, serene,
And as the sun-shine brow of patience, calm,
He dies without a groan, and smiles in death.
Shall martyrs, virgins, nay, thy Saviour bleed
To teach thee patience? and yet bleed in vain?
Forbid it, reason; and forbid it, Heav'n. 190
No; suffer: and, in suffering, rejoice.
Patience endureth all, and hopeth all.

Hope is her daughter then. Let hope distil
Her cordial-spirit, as Hybla-honey sweet,
And healing as the drops of Gilead-balm.
Cease to repine, as those who have no hope;
Nor let despair approach thy darkest hour.
Despair! that triple death! th' imperial plague!
Th' exterminating angel of th' accurst, 300
And sole disease of which the damn'd are sick,

* Queen's College in Oxford.

Kindling a fever hotter than their hell—
O pluck me from despair, white-handed hope!
O interpose thy spear and silver shield
Betwixt my bosom and the fiend! detrude
This impious monster to primeval hell;
To its own dark domain but light my soul,
Imp'd with thy glittering wings, to scenes of joy,
To health and life; for health and life are thine:
And fire imagination with the skies. 210

But whence this confidence of hope? in thee,
And in thy blood, my Jesus! (bow, O earth!
Heav'n bends beneath the name, and all its sons,
The hierarchy! drop low the prostrate knee,
And sink, in humble wise, upon the stars.)
Yes, on thy blood and name my hope depends.—
My hope? nay, worlds on worlds depend on
thee;

Live in thy death, from thy sepulchre rise.
Thy influential vigour reinspirer 219
This feeble frame; dispels the shade of death;
And bids me throw myself on God in prayer.

A Christian soul is God's beloved house;
And pray'r the incense which perfumes the soul:
Let armies then of supplications rise,
Besiege the golden gates of heav'n, and force;
With holy violence, a blessing down
In living streams. If Hezekiah's pray'r
The sun arrested in his prone career,
And bade the shadow ten degrees return
On Ahaz' dial, whirling back the day: 230

Pour out thyself, my soul! with fervent zeal,
With overflowing ardour, and with faith
Unwav'ring. To assist me, and to swell
My fainting spirits to sublime desires,
Wou'd † Taylor from his starry throne descend,
How fear wou'd brighten! by his sacred aid,
To live were happiness, and gain to die.—
No: let him still adorn his starry throne,
Well-merited by labours so divine:

For, lo! the Man of God, and friend of man, 240
Theron, the purest breast, and warmest heart,
Flies on the wings of charity and love
To join me in the saving task, and raise
My weaker pow'rs with his abundant zeal;
Pure, sweet, and glowing as the incens'd fires,
Of Solomon, thy golden-altar, fann'd
By wings of cherubims into a flame;
Till on the skies the aromatic gale
In pyramids of fragrance softly stole,
A grateful offering to the throne of grace. 250

Still, though I feel these succours from the skies,
In operation mighty! still remain
Inferior aids behind: terrestrial stores
Medicinal: the instruments of God,
For God created the physician! God
Himself on earth, our great Physician! spread
O'er sick and weak, shadowing, his healing wings:
Each miracle a cure!—before disease,
Offspring of sin, infested human-kind,
In Paradise, the vegetable seeds 260
Sprung from their Maker's hand, invigorate strong
With med'cine. He foresaw our future ills;
Foreseeing, he provided ample cure;

Fossils, and simples: Solomon, thy theme,
Nature's historian; wisest of the wise!
Though Paradise be lost, the tree of life
In med'cine blooms; then pluck its healing fruits,
And with thanksgiving eat and, eating, live.

Ev'n pagan wisdom bade her sons adore,
As one, the God of physic and the day, 270
Fountain of vegetation and of life,
Apollo, ever blooming, ever young,
And from his art immortal! thus, of yore,
The prime of human race from heav'n deduc'd
The bright original of physic's pow'r:
And, nor unjustly, deem'd that he who sav'd
Millions from death, himself shou'd never die.

An instrument of various pipes and tubes,
Veins, arteries, and sinews, organiz'd, 279
Man, when in healthy tune, harmonious wakes
The breath of melody, in vocal praise,
Delighting earth and heav'n! discordant, oft,
As accident, or time, or fate prevail,
This human-organ scarce the bellows heaves
Of vital-respiration; or in pain,
With pauses sad: what art divine shall tune
To order and refit this shatter'd frame?
What fingers touch into a voice again?
Or music reinspire? who, but the race
Of Pæan? who but physic's saving sons? 290
A Ratcliff, Frewin, Metcalf, or a friend?—
But something yet, beyond the kindly skill
Of Pæan's sons, disease, like mine, demands
Nepenthe to the soul, as well as life.

O for a mother's watchful tenderness,
And father's venerable care!—but * they,
In life immortal, gather endless joys,
Reward of charity, of innocence,
Of pleasing manners, and a life unblam'd!
The tears of poverty and friendship oft 300
Their modest tombs bedew, where Eden's flood,
(Ituna 'clep'd by bards of old renown,
Purpled with Saxon and with British blood)
Laves the sweet vale, that first my prattling muse
Provok'd to numbers, broken as the ruins
Of Roman towers which deck its lofty banks,
And shine more beauteous by decay.—But hark!
What music glads my ear? 'tis Theron's voice,
Theron a father, mother; both, a friend!—
Pain flies before his animating touch: 310

The gentle pressure of his cordial hand,
A burning mountain from my bosom heaves!
What wonders, sacred friendship, flow from thee!
One period from a friend enlivens more,
Than all Hippocrates and Galen's tombs,
Than all the med'cines they unfold. I feel Myself renew'd! not only health, but youth,
Rolls the brisk tide, and sparkles at my heart.
As the live-atoms of Campanian wines
Dance in the virgin crystal, and o'erlook 320
With glorifying foam, the nectar'd brim;
Smiling, and lending smiles to social wit,
The jocund hearth, and hospitable board.

Friendship is a religion, from the first,
The second-best: it points, like that, to heav'n,
And almost antedates on earth its bliss.

But vice and folly never friendship knew;
 Whilst wisdom grows by friendship still more wise.
 Her fetters are a strong defence; her chains
 A robe of glory; Ophir gold her bands; 330
 And he who wears them, wears a crown of joy.

Friendship's the steel, which struck, emits the sparks
 Of candour, peace, benevolence, and zeal;

Spreading their glowing seeds.—A holy fire
 Where honour beams on honour, truth on truth;
 Bright as the eyes of angels and as pure.
 An altar whence two gentle-loving hearts
 Mount to the skies in one conspiring blaze
 And spotless union. 'Tis the nectar-stream
 Which feeds and elevates seraphic love— 340
 Health is disease, life death, without a friend.

NOTES AND ALLUSIONS TO BOOK III.

Ver. 28. Cadmus is reported by the poets to have slain a monstrous serpent in Bœotia, at the command of Minerva; and sowed its teeth in a field, which produced an host of armed soldiers; who, fighting, slew one other. See Ovid. Met. l. iii. Suidas, Pausanias, &c. It is said, that he sowed serpents teeth, and that soldiers in armour sprung up from them; because, as Bochart observes, in the Phœnician language, to express men armed with brazen darts and spears of brass, they made use of words, which might be translated, "armed with the teeth of a serpent."

Ver. 61. The following lines upon delirious dreams may appear very extravagant to a reader, who never experienced the disorders which sickness causes in the brain; but the author thinks that he has rather softened than exaggerated the real description, as he found them operate on his own imagination at that time.

Ver. 68. Sir G. Wheeler, in his voyages, has given a very beautiful description of an hermitage on the borders of Mount Helicon, belonging to the convent of Saint Luke the hermit, not the Evangelist, called Stiriotes, from his dwelling in those deserts. See Wheeler's Journey into Greece, Fol. B. iv. P. 325.

Ver. 93. Those different instruments are designed to express the several parts of poetry, to which they were adapted, viz. pastoral, ode, heroic, &c.

Ver. 119. See Hom. Iliad, B. xviii. Virg. Æn. B. viii.

Ver. 135.

A horn, in which if he do once but blow,
 The noise thereof shall trouble men so sore,
 That all both stout and faint shall fly therefro,
 So strange a noise was never heard before.

Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, translated by Sir John Harrington, B. xv. Stan. 10.

With this horn Astolpho affrighted the Amazons. See B. xx Stan. 60, &c. and even Rogero, Bradamant, &c. in dissolving the enchanted palace, B. xxii. Stan. 18, &c. Drives away the harpies from Senapo, B. xxxiii. Stan. 114, &c.

Ver. 301.

—Eden, though but small,
 Yet often stain'd with blood of many a band
 Of Scots and English both, that tined on his strand.

Spenser's Faery Queen, B. iv. Can. 11.

Ver. 327. It was an observation of Socrates, that wicked men cannot be friends either amongst themselves or with good men.

Xenoph. Memorab. l. ii.

THE RECOVERY.

Thou hast delivered my soul from death, and my feet from falling, that I may walk before God in the light of the living. Psalms.

BOOK IV.

THE ARGUMENT.

REFLECTIONS. Sickness at the worst. Hopes of recovery cast on Heaven alone. Prospect of futurity at this juncture. Guardian Angel's hymn to Mercy. Description of her. She sends Hygeia to the well of life; both described. Her descent. The effects. Abatement of the distemper. Apostrophe to sleep. Recovery of sight; and pleasure flowing from thence. Health by degrees restored. Comparison between sickness and health in regard to the body and mind.

SWIFT too, thy tale is told: a sound, a name,
 No more than Lucian, Butler, or Scarron.

Fantastic humour drop'd the feeling sense,
 Fier empire less'ning by his fall. The shades

Of frolic Rabelais, and him of Spain,
 Madrid's facetious glory, join his ghost;
 Triumvirate of laughter!—Mirth is mad;
 The loudest languishing into a sigh:
 And laughter shakes itself into decay.

"Lord! what is man?" the prophet well might ask;

We all may ask, "Lord! what is mortal man?"
 So changeable his being, with himself
 Dissimilar; the rainbow of an hour!
 A change of colours, transient through his life,
 Brightens or languishes;—then fades to air.
 Ev'n e'er an artful spider spins a line
 Of metaphysic texture, man's thin thread
 Of life is broken: how analogous
 Their parallel of lines! flight, subtle, vain.

Man, in a little hour's contracted round
 Perplexes reason: now to triumph swell'd,
 To joyous exultations, to a blaze
 Of ecstasy; and now depress'd again,
 And drooping into scenes of death and woe.

That sudden flow of spirits, bright and strong,
 Which play'd in sprightly sallies round my heart;
 Was it a gleam, forewarning me from heav'n,
 Of quick-approaching fate? As tapers mount
 Expiring into wide-diffusive flame,

Give one broad glare, into the socket sink,
 And sinking disappear.—It must be so!—

The soul, prophetic of its voy'ge, descry'd
 The blissful shore, exulting on the wing,
 In a glad flutter: then, o'erwhelm'd with joy,
 She warn'd her old companion of her flight,
 (The feeble tenement of mould'ring clay)
 Who sadden'd at their parting—Yes,—I feel
 Thy leaden hand, O death! it presses hard,
 It weighs the faculties of motion down,
 Inactive as the foot of a dull rock,
 And drags me to thy dusty chains: the wheels
 Of life are fast'ned to the grave, nor whirl,
 Longer, the fiery chariot on. The war,
 The struggle for eternity begins.

Eternity! illimitable, vast,
 Incomprehensible! For heav'n and hell,
 Within her universal womb, profound,
 Are center'd.—Sleep or death are on my heart:
 Swims heavily my brain:—My senses reel.

What scenes disclose themselves! What fields of joy!

What rivers of delight! What golden bow'rs!
 Sweetly oppress'd with beatific views,
 I hear angelic instruments, I see
 Primeval ardours, and essential forms;
 The sons of light, but of created light,
 All energy, the diligence of God!
 Might I but join them! Lend your glitt'ring wings,

Waft me, O quickly waft me to yon crown,
 Bright with the flaming roses of the zone
 Sidereal: Gracious, they beck'ning, smile,
 They smile me to the skies! Hope leads the way:
 Mounting I spring to seize!—What fury shakes
 Her fiery sword, and intercepts the stars?
 Ha! Amartia? Conscience, conscience sends
 Her griesly form, to blast me at my end.
 Behold! she points to burning rocks, to waves

Sulphureous, molten lead, and boiling gulfs,
 Tempestuous with everlasting fire.—

'Tis horrible!—O save me from myself!—

O save me, Jesu!—Ha! a burst of light

Blends with the empyreum's azure tide,

While faith, triumphant, swells the trump of God,

And shouting, "Where's thy victory, O grave?"

And where, O death, thy sting?" I see her spread

Her saving banner o'er my soul (the cross!)

And call it to its peers. Thick crowds of day,

Immaculate, involve me in their streams,

And bathe my spirit, whiten'd for the sky.

While on this isthmus of my fate I lie,

Jutting into eternity's wide sea,

And leaning on this habitable globe,

The verge of either world! dubious of life,

Dubious, alike, of death; to mercy thus,

Inspirited with supplicating zeal,

My guardian angel rais'd his potent pray'r.

(For angels minister to man, intent

On offices of gentleness and love.)

"Hear, Mercy! sweetest daughter of the skies;

Thou loveliest image of thy Father's face,

Thou blessed fount, whence grace and goodness

flow,

Auspicious, hear! extend thy helping arm,

With pitying readiness, with willing aid,

O lift thy servant from the vale of death,

Now grovelling in the dust, into the fields

Of comfort, and the pastures green of health.

Hear, Mercy, sweetest daughter of the skies!

If e'er thy servant to the poor his soul

Drew out, and taught the fatherless to sing;

If e'er by pity warm'd, and not by pride,

He cloth'd the naked, and the hungry fed;

If e'er distress, and misery, forelorn,

Deceiv'd his cheek, and stole his untaught tear,

An humble drop of thy celestial dew!

Hear, Mercy, sweetest daughter of the skies.

Sprung from the bosom of eternal bliss,

Thy goodness reaches farther than the grave;

And near the gates of hell extends thy sway,

Omnipotent! All, save the cursed crew

Infernal, and the black rebellious host

Of Lucifer, within thy sweet domain

Feed on ambrosia, and may hope the stars.

Hear, Mercy, sweetest daughter of the skies.

By thee, the great Physician from the bed

Of darkness call'd the sick, the blind, the lame;

He burst the grave's relentless bars by thee,

And spoke the dead to life and bloom again.

His miracles, thy work; their glory, thine:

Then, O thou dearest attribute of God!

Thy saving health to this thy servant lend!

Hear, Mercy, sweetest daughter of the skies!"

Inclin'd upon a dewy-skirted cloud

Purpled with light, and dropping fatness down,

Plenty and bliss on man, with looks as mild

As ev'ning suns (when flowry-footed May

Leads on the jocund hours, when love himself

Flutters in green) effusing heart-felt joy

Abundant, Mercy shone with sober grace,

And majesty at once with sweetness mix'd

Ineffable. A rainbow o'er her head,

The covenant of God, betok'ning peace

'Twixt Heaven and earth, its florid arch display'd,
High bended by th' Almighty's glorious hand;
The languish of the dove upon her eyes
In placid radiance melted, from the throne
Of grace infus'd, and fed with light: her smiles
Expansive cheer'd the undetermin'd tracks
Of all creation, from th' ethereal cope,
August with moving fires, down to the shades
Infernal, and the reign of darkness drear.
Ev'n men refine to angels from her gaze, 140
Gracious, invigorating, full of heav'n!

This daughter of the Lamb, to fervent pray'rs
And intercession, opens her ready ear,
Compassionate; and to Hygeia thus:
"Hygeia, hie thee to the well of life;
There dip thy fingers; touch his head and breast;
Three drops into his mouth infuse, unseen,
Save by the eye of faith: he yonder lies—
Descend, and take the ev'ning's western wing."

She said, Hygeia bow'd; and bowing, fill'd 150
The circumambient air with od'rous streams,
Pure essence of ambrosia! Not the breath
Of Lebanon, from cedar alleys blown,
Of Lebanon, with aromatic gales.
Luxuriant, spikenard, aloes, myrrh and balm;
Nor the wise eastern monarch's garden vy'd
In fragrance, when his fair Circassian spouse,
Enamour'd, call'd upon the south to fan
Its beds of spices, and her bosom cool, 159
Panting with languishment and love-sick fires.

Forth from th' eternal throne the well of life,
Pouring its crystal, laves the streets of God,
(Where sickness never comes, nor age, nor pain)
Fast-trickling o'er the pebble-gems. Beneath
Unfading Amarant and Asphodel,
A mirror spreads its many-colour'd round,
Mosaic work, inlaid by hands divine
In glist'ring rows, illuminating each,
Each shading: beryl, topaz, chalcedon,
Em'erald and amethyst. Whatever hues 170
The light reflects, celestial quarries yield,
Or melt into the vernant-showry bow,
Profusive, vary here in mingling beams.
Collected thus the waters, dimpling, end
Their soft-progressive lapse. The cherubs hence
Immortal vigour quaff and bliss unblam'd.
Nor only flow for you, ye sons of light,
The streams of comfort and of life, but flow
To heal the nations. Wonderful to tell,
The aged they renew, the dead revive, 180
And more, the festers of the wounded soul,
Corrupted, black, to pristine white relume
And saint-like innocence. The mystic dove
Broods, purifying o'er them, with his wings.
The angel, who Bethesda's troubled pool
Stirr'd, first his pinions with these vital drops
Sprinkled; then pour'd himself into the flood,
Instilling health and nutriment divine,
Its waves to quicken, and exalt its pow'rs.

Here lights Hygeia, ardent to fulfil 190
Mercy's behest. The bloom of Paradise
Liv'd on her youthful cheek, and glow'd the spring.
The deep carnations in the eastern skies,
When ruddy morning walks along the hills,
Illustriously red, in purple dews,

Are languid to her blushes; for she blush'd
As through the op'ning file of winged flames,
Bounding, she light'ned, and her sapphire eyes
With modest lustre bright, improving heav'n,
Cast sweetly round, and bow'd to her compeers,
An angel amid angels. Light she sprung 201
Along th' empyreal road: Her locks distill'd
Salubrious spirit on the stars. Full soon
She pass'd the gate of pearl, and down the sky,
Precipitant, upon the ev'ning wing
Cleaves the live ether, and with healthy balm
Impregnates, and fecundity of sweets.

Conscious of her approach, the wanton birds,
Instinctive, carol forth, in livelier lays,
And merrier melody, their grateful hymn, 210
Brisk-flutt'ring to the breeze. Eftsoons the hills,
Beneath the gambols of the lamb and kid,
Of petulant delight, the circling maze
(Brush'd off its dews) betray. All nature smiles,
With double day delighted. Chief on man
The goddess ray'd herself: He, wond'ring, feels
His heart in driving tumults vig'rous, leap,
And gushing ecstasy: bursts out his tongue
In laud, and unpremeditated song,
Obedient to the music in his veins. 220

Thus, when at first, the instantaneous light
Sprung from the voice of God, and, vivid, threw
Its golden mantle round the rising ball,
The cumb'rous mass, shot through with vital warmth

And plastic energy, to motion roll'd
The drowsy elements, and active rule:
Sudden the morning stars, together, sang,
And shouted all the sons of God for joy.

Enters Hygeia, and her task performs,
With healing fingers touch'd my breast and head;
Three drops into my mouth infus'd, unseen, 231
Save by the eye of faith: Then reascends.

As snow in Salmon, at the tepid touch
Of southern gales, by soft degrees, dissolves
Trickling, yet flow, away; and loosen'd frosts
The genial impress feel of vernal suns,
Relenting to the ray; my torpid limbs
The healing virtue of Hygeia's hand
And salutary influence perceive,
Instant to wander through the whole. My heart
Begins to melt, o'er-running into joy, 241
Late froze with agony. Kind tumults seize
My spirits, conscious of returning health,
And dire disease abating from the cells
And mazy haunts of life. The judging leech
Approves the symptoms, and my hope allows.

The hostile humours cease to bubble o'er
Their big-distended channels; quiet now
And sinking into peace. The organs heave
Kindlier with life: And nature's fabric near 250
To dissolution shatter'd, and its mould
To dust dissolv'd, though not its pristine strength
(The lusty vigour of its healthy prime)
Yet gentle force recovers; to maintain
Against the tyrant-death's batt'ring assaults,
The fort of life.—But darkness, present still,
And absent sweet repose, best med'cine, sleep,
Forbid my heart the full carouse of joy.

"Soft pow'r of slumbers, dewy-feather'd sleep,

Kind nurse of nature ! whither art thou fled, 260
 A stranger to my senses, weary'd out
 With pain, and aching for thy presence ? Come,
 O come ! embrace me in thy liquid arms ;
 Exert thy drowsy virtue, wrap my limbs
 In downy indolence, and bathe in balm,
 Fast-flowing from th' abundance of thy horn,
 With nourishment replete, and richer stor'd
 Than Amalthea's ; who (so poets feign)
 With honey and with milk supply'd a god,
 And fed the thunderer. Indulgent quit 270
 Thy couch of poppies ! steal thyself on me,
 (In rory mists suffus'd and clouds of gold)
 On me, thou mildest cordial of the world ?

The shield his pillow, in the tented field,
 By thee, the soldier, bred in iron war,
 Forgets the mimic thunders of the day,
 Nor envies luxury her bed of down.
 Rock'd by the blast, and cabbin'd in the storm,
 The sailor hugs thee to the doddering mast,
 Of shipwreck negligent, while thou art kind. 280
 The captive's freedom, thou ! the labourer's hire ;
 The beggar's store ; the miser's better gold ;
 The health of sickness ; and the youth of age !
 At thy approach the wrinkled front of care
 Subsides into the smooth expanse of smiles.
 And, stranger far ! the monarch, crown'd by thee,
 Beneath his weight of glory gains repose.

What guilt is mine, that I alone am wake,
 Ev'n though my eyes are seal'd, am wake alone ?
 Ah seal'd, but not by thee ! The world is dumb ;
 Exhal'd by air, an awful silence rules, 290
 Still as thy brother's reign, or foot of time ;
 Ev'n nightingales are mute, and lovers rest,
 Steep'd in thy influence, and cease to sigh,
 Or only sigh in slumbers. Fifteen nights
 The moon has walk'd in glory o'er the sky ;
 As oft the sun has shone her from the sphere,
 Since, gentle sleep, I felt thy cordial dew.
 Then listen to my moaning ; nor delay
 To sooth me with thy softness ; to o'ershade 300
 Thy suppliant with thy pinions : or at least,
 Lightly to touch my temples with thy wand.

So, full and frequent, may the crimson fields
 With poppies blush, nor feel a Tarquin's hand.
 So may the west wind's sigh, th' murm'ring brook,
 The melody of birds, Ianthe's lute,
 And music of the spheres, be all the sounds
 That dare intrude on thy devoted hour.
 Nor Boreas bluster, nor the thunder roar,
 Nor screech-owl flap his wing, nor spirit yell, 310
 As 'neath the trembling of the moon he walks,
 Within the circle of thy still domain.
 He comes ! he comes ! the reconciling pow'r
 Of pain, vexation, care, and anguish comes !
 He hovers in the lazy air :—He melts,
 With honey heaviness, my senses down.

—I thank thee sleep !—Heav'n's ! is the day
 restor'd
 To my desiring eyes ? their lids, unglew'd,
 Admit the long-lost light, now streaming in
 Painfully clear !—O check the rapid gleam 320
 With shading silk, 'till the weak visual orb,
 Stronger and stronger, dares imbibe the sun,
 Nor, wat'ring, twinkles at unfolded day,

As, where, in Lapland, night collects her reign,
 Oppressive, over half the rounded year
 Uninterrupted with one struggling beam ;
 Young Orra-Moor, in furry spoils enroll'd,
 Shagged and warm, first spies th' imperfect blush
 Of op'ning light, exulting ; scarce her eyes
 The lustre bear, though faint ; but, wid'ning fast
 Th' unbounded tide of splendour covers, fair, 330
 Th' expanded hemisphere ; and fills her sight
 With gladness, while her heart, warm-leaping, burns.

Sight, all-expressive ! though the feeling sense
 Thrills from Ianthe's hand ; at Handel's lyre
 Tingles the ear ; though smell from blossom'd beans

Arabian spirit gathers ; and the draught,
 Sparkling from Burgundy's exalted vines,
 Streams nectar on the palate : Yet, O fight !
 Weak their sensations, when compar'd with thee.
 Without thee, nature lies unmeaning gloom. 340
 Whatever smiles on earth, or shines in heav'n,
 From star of Venus to Adonis flow'r ;
 Whatever spring can promise ; summer warm
 To rich maturity ; gay autumn roll
 Into the lap of plenty, or her horn ;
 Winter's majestic horrors ;—all are thine.
 All varying in order's pleasing round,
 In regular confusion grateful all !

And now progressive health, with kind repair,
 My fever-weaken'd joints and languid limbs 350
 New brace. Live vigour and auxiliar'd nerves
 Sinew the freshen'd frame in bands of steel.
 As in the trial of the furnace ore,
 From baser dregs refin'd, and drossy scum,
 Flames more resurgent, and admits the stamp
 Of majesty to dignify the gold,
 Cæsar or George ! the human body, thus,
 Enamel'd, not deform'd, from sickness' rage
 More manly features borrows, and a grace 360
 Severe, yet worthier of its sovereign form.
 The patriarch of Uz, son of the morn,
 Envy'd of Lucifer, by fores and blanes
 Sharply improv'd, to fairer honours rose ;
 Less his beginning blest than latter end.
 How late a tortur'd lump of baleful pain,
 The soul immerg'd in one inactive mass
 Of breathing blanes, each elegance of sense,
 Each intellectual spark and fiery seed
 Of reason, mem'ry, judgment, taste, and wit, 370
 Extinct and smother'd in unwieldy clay
 Scarce animated : and (O blessing !) now
 I seem to tread the winds ; to overtake
 The empty eagle in her early chase,
 Or nimble-trembling dove, from preyful beak,
 In many a rapid, many a cautious round,
 Wheeling precipitant : I leave behind,
 Exulting o'er its aromatic hills,
 The bounding Beher-roe. The poet's mind,
 (Effluence essential of heat and light !) 380
 Not mounts a loftier wing, when fancy leads
 The glitt'ring track, and points him to the skies,
 Excursive : He empyreal air inhales,
 Earth fading from his flight ! triumphant soars.
 Amid the pomp of planetary worlds,
 Ranging infinitude, beyond the stretch

Of Newton's ken, reformer of the spheres,
And, gaining on the heav'ns, enjoys his home !
The winter of disease all pass'd away,
The spring of health, in bloomy pride, calls forth
Embosom'd bliss, of rosy-winged praise 391
The rising incense, the impassion'd glance

Of gratitude, the pant of honour, quick
With emulating zeal ; the florid wish
For sacred happiness, and cordial glow
From conscious virtue felt : all the sweet train
Of vernal solitude's refining walks,
Best gift of Heav'n, and source of nameless joys !

NOTES AND ALLUSIONS ON BOOK IV.

Ver. 55. Light is the first-born of all creatures, and it is commonly observed, that the angels were created at the same period of time. St. Austin thinks them meant under fiat lux, "let there be light:" De civitate Dei, l. xi. c. 9. This indeed is only conjectural, and we have no article of the Apostles' creed which directs upon any considerations of angels; because perhaps it exceeds the faculties of men to understand their nature, and it may not conduce much to our practical edification to know them. Yet, however, this observation may serve to illustrate that beautiful passage in the book of Job: When "the morning-stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy."

Ver. 182. White has been accounted in all ages the peculiar tincture of innocence, and white vestments worn by persons delegated for sacred offices, &c. When our Saviour was transfigured before his disciples, his raiment became shining, "exceeding white as snow," Mark, ix. 3. When he ascended into heaven, the angels descended in "white apparel," Acts i. 10. "And to the spouse of the Lamb was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white, which is the righteousness of the saints," Rev. xix. 8. 14. Hence the custom of the primitive church of clothing the persons baptized in white garments.

Inde parens sacro ducens de fonte sacerdos
Infantes, niveo corpore, mente, habitu.
Paulinus, Epist. xii.

The heathens paid likewise a great regard to white :

Color albus præcipuè Deo charus est.
Cicero de Leg. Lib. ii.

— Ante aras stat veste sacerdos
Effulgens nivea. Silius Ital. Lib. iii.

Delius hic longè candenti veste sacerdos
Occurrit. Valerius Flacc. Lib. ii.

And not only the priests, but likewise those who attended at the sacrifices and paid their devotions to their gods :

Cernite fulgentes ut eat facer agnus ad aras,
Tinctaque post oleâ candida turba comas.
Tibull. Lib. ii. Eleg. i.

And Ovid :

Linguis candida turba favet. Fast. Lib. ii.

I shall only add one passage from Plautus :

— Ergo æquius vos erat
Candidatas venire, hostiataeque ad hoc Fanum. Rudens. Act. i. Sc. 5.

Ver. 230. Hygeia here performs her office in the very manner she was ordered by Mercy. I have, after the manner of Homer, used the same expressions over again, as when she received the mandate. The father of poetry constantly makes his envoys observe this practice, as a mark of decency and respect.

Ver. 268. Amalthea the daughter of Melissus King of Crete, and nurse of Jupiter, who fed him with goat's milk and honey. But this story is differently related. See Strabo, l. x. Diodor. Sicul. l. iv. c. 5. and Ovid. Fast. l. v. It is very remarkable, that the translation of the Septuagint uses the expression Amalthea's horn, for the name of Job's third daughter, Keren-happuc (so called from her beauty), alluding to a Grecian fable invented long after, Job ch. the last, ver. 14. The same translation likewise mentions Arachne in the ninetieth Psalm, and 9th verse, which image is left out in all our late versions. A Christian poet, therefore, may surely be excused for using the word Ambrosia, &c. or drawing metaphors or comparisons from the Pagan mythology in a serious composition; which is the practice of Milton and some of the best poets. The fault only is, when the poet weaves the heathen fables with the Jewish and Christian truths. As when Sannazarius introduces the furies, Cerberus, &c. into his poem (which is otherwise a very fine one) De partu Virginis. And likewise when Camoens blends the adventures of Bacchus with the miracles of Christ, &c. in his Lusiad. But this is by the by.

THE THANKSGIVING.

The grave cannot praise Thee; death cannot celebrate Thee.—The living, the living, he shall praise Thee, as I do this day.

Isaiab.

BOOK V.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE effects which the restoration of health ought to have in the solitudes of spring. Rural prospect. Excursion to the battle at Tournay. Reflections on the abuses of modern poetry. Hymn to the ever-blessed and glorious Trinity: 1st, To God the Father, as Creator and Preserver: 2dly, To God the Son, as Mediator and Redeemer: 3dly, To God the Holy Ghost, as Sanctifier and Comforter. Conclusion.

COME, contemplation! therefore, from thy haunts,
From Spenser's tomb, (with reverent steps and flow
Oft visited by me; certès, by all,
Touch'd by the muse :) from Richmond's-green retreats,
Where * Nature's bard the seasons on his page
Stole from the year's rich hand: or Welwyn
groves,
Where Young, the friend of virtue and of man,
Sows with poetic stars the nightly song,
To Phœbus dear as his own day! and drowns
The nightingale's complaint in sadder strains 10
And sweeter elegance of woe, O come!
Now ev'ning mildly still and softer suns
(While every breeze is flowing balm) invite
To taste the fragrant spirit of the spring
Salubrious; from mead or hawthorn-hedge
Aromatiz'd, and pregnant with delight
No less than health. And what a prospect round
Swells greenly grateful on the cherish'd eye!
A universal blush! a waste of sweets!
How live the flow'rs, and, as the zephyrs blow,
Wave a soft lustre on their parent-sun, 21
And thank him with their odours for his beams;
Mild image of himself! reflected fair,
By faintness fair, and amiably mild!
Hark! how the airy echoes talk along
With undulating answer, soft or loud,
The mocking semblance of the imag'd voice,
Babbling itinerant from wood to hill,
From hill to dale, and wake their sisters round,
'To multiply delight upon the ear. 30
As float the clouds, romantic fancy pours
The magazines of Proteus forth, and builds
Huge castles in the air; while vessels sail
Spacious, along the fluid element:
And dragons burn in gold, with azure stains
Speckled: Ten thousand inconsistent shapes
Shift on the eye, and through the welkin roll.

* Mr. James Thomson.

Here tufted hills! there shining villas rise,
Circling; and temples, solemn, fill the mind
With beauty, splendour, and religious awe! 40
Peace o'er the plains expands her snowy wing,
Dove-ey'd; and buxom plenty laughs around!
Far different objects mortify the eye
Along thy borders, Sheldt: (with William's tears
Ennobled, tears from brave humanity
And royal pity drawn! nor of his blood
Less prodigal!) instead of herbag'd plains,
Of fields with golden plenty waving wide,
Of lowing vallies, and of fleecy hills:
What magazines of death! what flaming swords
Destruction brandish; what a burnish'd glare 51
Of horror wanders round; what carnage vile
Of dubitable limbs; what groaning piles
Of dying warriors on th' ensanguin'd earth
(Ev'n sons of Britain, chiefs of high renown)
Gro'ling in dust, and with unmartial fires
Sheer blasted! O 'tis pitiful to fight!
It smites the honest brain and heart! The cloud, Belch'd from the brazen throat of war, would hide,
Industrious, the ruin which it spreads, 60
As if asham'd of massacre—But hark!—
What dire explosion tears th' embowel'd sky,
And rumbles from th' infernal caves? The roar
Of Ætna's troubled caverns, when she heaves
Trinacria from her marble pillars, fix'd
On the foundations of the solid earth,
And Thetis' bellows from her distant dens,
O'erwhelm the ear!—A mine with deadly stores
Infuriate, burst; and a whole squadron'd host 69
Whirl'd through the riven air. A human show'r
With smouldry smoke enroll'd and wrapt in fire,
To cover earth with desolation drear!—
Curst be the man, the monk, the son of hell,
The triple Moloch! whose mechanic brain,
Maliciously inventive, from its forge,
Of cruel steel, the sulphur seeds of wrath
Flash'd on the world, and taught us how to kill;
To hurl the blazing ruin, to disgorge

A a iiij

From smoking bras the ragged instruments
 Of fate, in thunder, on the mangled files 80
 Of gallant foes :---the cowardice of hell !
 And, what the barb'rous nations never knew,
 (Though nourish'd by the tigers, and their tongues
 Red with the gore of lions) to involve
 The holy temples, the religious fanes,
 To hallelujahs sacred and to peace,
 With dreadless fires. Shudd'ring the angels weep
 At man's impiety, and seek the skies :
 They weep ! while man, courageous in his guilt,
 Smiles at the infant writhing on his spear ; 90
 The hoary head pollutes the flinty streets
 With scanty blood ; and virgins pray in vain.
 Blush, blush ! or own Deucalion for thy fire.

Yet should rebellion, bursting from the caves
 Of Erebus, uprear her Hydra form,
 To poison, liberty, thy light divine ;
 If she, audacious, stalk in open day,
 And hiss against the throne by heav'n's own
 hand

Establish'd, and religion heav'n-reform'd,
 Britannia ! rescue earth from such a bane : 100
 Exert thy ancient spirit ; urge thyself
 Into the bowels of the glowing war,
 Sweep her from day to multiply the fiends,
 And scare the damn'd !---and thou ! the God of hosts,

Supreme the Lord of lords, and King of kings !
 Thy people, thy anointed with thy shield
 Cover and shade ; unbare thy righteous arm,
 And save us in the hollow of thy hand !
 Michaël send, as erst against the host
 Of Lucifer, and let his sword be drunk 110
 With rebel-blood. The battle is thy own ;
 When virtue, liberty, religion call :
 Thine is the victory : the glory thine !

Turn, contemplation, from this savage scene
 Of violence and waste : my swimming eyes
 Have lost the beauties of the vernal view !

Sweet are the beauties of the vernal view !
 And yet devotion wafts to nobler themes,
 And lifts the soul to heav'n ! for who, untouch'd,
 With mental adoration, feeling laud, 120
 Beholds this living-vegetable whole,
 This universal witness of a God !

Though silent, yet convincing, uncontrol'd,
 Which meets the sense, and triumphs in the soul ?
 Let me, by Isaac's wife example fir'd,
 When meditation led him through the fields,
 Sweetly in pious musings lost, adore
 My God ! for meditation is too poor,
 Below the sacrifice of Christian hearts :
 Plato cou'd meditate ; a Christian, more : 130
 Christians, from meditation, soar to pray'r.

Methinks I hear, reprov'd by modern wit,
 Or rather pagan : " though ideal sounds
 Soft-wafted on the zephyr's fancy'd wing,
 Steal tuneful soothing on the easy ear,
 New from Ilissus' gilded mists exhal'd ;
 Though gently o'er the academic groves,
 The magic echoes of unbodied thoughts
 Roll their light billows through th' unwounded
 air,

In mildest undulations ! yet a * priest, 140
 Tasteless and peevish, with his jargon shrill,
 Scorns Academus ; though its flow'rs bestow
 On Hybla nectar, purer than her own,
 From Plato's honey-dropping tongue distill'd
 In copious streams, devolving o'er the sense
 Its sweet regalement ! " Philodemus, yes : (Though learn'd Lycæum's cloisters lead the mind

Attentive on, as far as nature leads ;
 And Plato, for a heathen, nobler dreams
 Than dream some modern poets) : yes, a priest, 150
 A priest dares tell you, Salem's hallow'd walks,
 And that illumin'd mountain, where a God,
 The God of my salvation, and I hope
 Of thine, unutterable beauty beam'd,
 (Though shaded from excess of deity,
 Too fierce for mortal-aching eyes to prove
 The rush of glory) me, desirous, draw
 From Athen's owls, to Jordan's mythic dove.
 Thou sing of nature, and the moral charms
 Gild with thy painted muse : my fingers lift 160
 The lyre to God ! Jehovah ! Eloim !
 Truth is my leader ; only fancy, thine :
 Sweet Farinelli of enervate song) !
 I quit the myrtle, for a starry crown.

And know, if sickness shed her bluish plagues
 From fog, or fen, or town-infected damps,
 (And, sure I'd pity thee) among thy veins :
 Then, then no Platonist ! thy inmost soul
 Will thank me for this preaching ; nor disdain
 To breath itself in pray'r, as low as mine ; 170
 From God begin, with God conclude the song ;
 Thus glorifying with a Christian zeal.

Father of heav'n and earth ! coeval Son !
 And co-existing Spirit ! Trinal-One !
 Mysterious Deity ; invisible ;
 Indefinite, and Omnipresent God,
 Inhabiting eternity ! shall dust,
 Shall ashes, dare presume to sing of thee ?
 O for a David's heart, and tongue of fire
 To rival angels in my praise and zeal ! 180
 Yet love immense, and gratitude, with awe
 Religious mix'd, shall elevate the hymn,
 My heart enkindle, and inspire my tongue.

Father-Creator ! who beholds thy works,
 But catches inspiration ! thou the earth
 On nothing hung, and balanc'd in the void
 With a magnetic force, and central poise.
 Ocean of brightness thou ! thy grand behest
 Flung on thy orb, the sun, a sparkling drop,
 To light the stars, and seed their silver urns 190
 With unexhausted flame ; to bid them shine
 Eternal in their courses, o'er the blue
 Which mantles night, and woo us to repose
 With roscid radiance. They harmonious roll,
 In majesty of motion, solemn, loud,
 The universal hallelujah : sphere,
 In lucid order, quiring sweet to sphere,
 Deep-felt and loftier than a seraph's song ;
 The symphony of well-according worlds ! 199

* The very expressions of one of our disciples of Socrates.

But man, thy beam, thy breath, thy image, shines
The crown, the glory, and the lord of all;
Of all below the stars! a plant, from heav'n
Traduc'd, to spread the riches of its bloom
O'er earth, and water'd with ethereal dews;
Incorruptible aliment! the birds
Warble among his boughs; the cattle, safe,
Pasture within his shade; and earth beneath
Th' imperial umbrage of his branches smiles.
The smiling earth, the spangled spheres, and man
Their great Creator praise! but praise how long, 210

Unless by thy Almighty arm upheld,
Preserver infinite? by thee unless
Upheld, the earth wou'd from her basis reel;
The spheres forego their courses (off their orbs
The silver softness melted into shade),
Obscurely dissonant; and mortal man
(Void of thy fostering fires) his stately form
To dust be moulder'd: chaos wou'd resume
Her ancient anarchy; confusion, rule;
And darkness swallow all. In thee we live, 220
In thee we move: our beings in thy chain,
Linkt to eternity, fasten on thee,
The pillar of our souls! for me, (how late
A neighbour of the worm)! when I forget
The wonders of thy goodness ray'd on me,
And cease to celebrate, with matin-harp
Or vesper-song, thy plenitude of love,
And healing mercy; may the nightly pow'r,
Which whispers on my slumbers, cease to breathe
Her modulating impulse through my soul; 230
Untun'd, unhallow'd! discord, string my lyre,
Idly, my finger, presses the fretted gold,
Rebellious to the dictates of my hand,
When indolent, to swell the notes for thee,
Father of heav'n and earth!—Coeval Son!
(His word, his essence, his effulgence pure!)
Not less thy filial likeness I adore,
Nor from thy Father's glory aught disjoin,
Redeemer! Mediator! from the birth
Of uncreated time, thy Father's wrath 240
(Sprung from Omniscience)! to appease, for man,
Upright as yet, to mediate, mercy wak'd
Unbounded love in thee; unbounded love
Contracted to the measure of a span
Immensity of Godhead, and thy crown
Rest from thy faded brow. Listen, O earth!
And wonder, O ye heav'ns! shall he, whose feet
Are cloth'd with stars, (the glory of his head
For who can tell)? whose looks divine illumine
The dazzl'd eyes of cherubs, and the youth 250
Of saints with everlasting bloom renew:
Shall he, whose vital smiles with splendor fill
The circuits of creation, and sustain
Th' abodes of all existence, from the depths
Of hell beneath, above heav'n's highest orb,
With life, and health, and joy! shall he, to God
Dear as his eye and heart, engraven there
Deep from eternity; alone belov'd,
Alone begotten! say, shall he become
A man of grief---for man? nay more his foe, 260
Rebellious next the fiends?--astonishment
Had chain'd my tongue to silence, if the pow'rs
Of tenderest pity and of warmest love

Provok'd not pensive measures, sadder strains
Of elegiac sorrow, with the theme
Mournfully varying. Take, my soul redeem'd!
O take the moaning dove's dew-dropping wing,
Fly, fly to Solyma! and melt thy woe
To Cedron's murmurs. Thence, extend thy flight
To Golgotha's accursed tree. Behold! 270 Clouds roll'd on clouds of wrath (the blackest wrath

Of an offended God)! his beauties shade;
But shade not long: it soon in drops dissolves,
Sweet to the soul as manna to the taste,
As pride of summer-flow'r to sight or smell!
Behind this shadowing cloud, this mystic gloom,
The Sharon rose, dy'd in the blood of heav'n,
The lilly of the valley, white from stain,
Bows the fair head, in loveliness declines,
And, sweetly languishing, it droops and dies. 280
But darkness veils the sun: a curtain draw
Before the passion; beyond wonder great,
Great beyond silence!---(Awe-struck pause awhile---)

And heavy as the burden of our sins!---
'Tis finish'd!---Change the lyre, the numbers change;

Let holy anthem-airs inspire the hymn.
Glory in heav'n! redemption to mankind,
And peace on earth! dominion! blessing! praise!
Thanksgiving pow'r! salvation to our God!
Salvation to our God, and to the Lamb! 290
And, co-existing Spirit! thou, whose breath
My voice informs, shall it be mute to thee,
Eternal Paraclete? in order, last,
Equal in glory to Omnipotence
The first, as to the second; and from both Proceeding; (O inexplicable name!)
Mystical link of the unnumber'd Three!
To learning, night; to faith, the noon-tide day.
Soul of the universe! thy wisdom, first,
The rage compos'd of warring * elements, 300
(The subject of a nobler future song)
Yon all-surrounding heav'ns with crystal orbs
Garnish'd, and living gems, in goodly ranks
And disciplin'd array; dividing night
From day, their ordinances 'stablish'd sure.
Moving the waters saw thee o'er their face;
O God, the waters saw thee, and, afraid,
Into their channels shrunk, (capricious bed
Of liquid element)! and own'd their bounds
Impassable, as that eternal gulf 310
'Twixt bliss and woe.---The Prince of peace thy beams

Largely imbib'd, when, dovelike, o'er his head,
Fast by the banks of Jordan's sacred stream,
Thy mantling wings diffus'd their heav'nly hues;
And Abba glorify'd his only Son,
Well pleased. From thy tongues of cloven fire
Kindled, the nations burn'd in flaming zeal,
And unextinguish'd charity, dispers'd
And glowing as the summer blaze at noon. 319
The rushing winds on all their wings convey'd
Thy doctrine, strong to shake the guilty soul;
As erst the dome, low-stooping to its base,

* The Elements. A poem: in four books.

Before thy mighty presence learn'd to bend.
 Thou, from the morning womb, upon our souls,
 Barren and dry, thy sanctifying dew
 Abroad in silent softness sheds: the dew
 Of love unspotted, uncorrupted joy,
 Obedient goodness, temperance subdu'd,
 Unshaken faith, and meekness without guile.
 Hence flow the odours out, our pray'rs perfume,
 Like incense, rising fragrant on the throne, 331
 From golden vials pour'd by elder hands!
 Extinct thy influential radiance sin,
 Incumbent on the soul, as black as hell,
 Holds godless anarchy: by thee refin'd,
 Incens'd, sublim'd, and sanctify'd, the soul
 Invites the Holiest (O abyss of love!)
 To choose a temple, purer than the sun,
 Incorruptible, formed not by hands, 339
 Where best he loves to dwell.—Thou all my bed,

Most holy Comforter! in sickness smooth'd,
 And violet buds and roses without thorn Shower'd round the couch. From darkness and the vale
 Of shadowy death, to pastures fair, and streams
 Of comfort, thy refreshing right hand led
 My wearied soul, and bath'd in health and joy!
 To light restor'd, and the sweet breath of heav'n,
 Beneath thy olive boughs, in plenteous flow,
 The golden oil effusing on my head,
 Of gladness, let me ever sit and sing, 350
 Thy numerous Godhead sparkling in my soul,
 Thyself instilling praises, by thy ear
 Not unapprov'd! For wisdom's steady ray
 Th' enlight'ning gift of tongues, the sacred fires
 Of poetry are thine, united Three!
 Father of heav'n and earth! coeval Son!
 And coexisting Spirit! Trinal One!

NOTES AND ALLUSIONS ON BOOK V.

Ver. 44. This was written at the time of the siege of Tournay.

Ver. 130. Far be it from me to speak with disrespect of this Pagan philosopher. For my part, I could almost declare my admiration of Plato's beautiful descriptions; &c. in the words of B. Johnson on Shakspeare: "To justify (says he) my own candour, I honour his memory (on this side idolatry) as much as any." See his Discoveries, vol. ii. fol. of his works, p. 98.

I only here would observe how falsely, not to say impiously, some modern writers seem to take pains to recommend Plato's ideal morality, in opposition to the glorious doctrines so fully revealed in the holy scriptures.

Ver. 146. Alluding to Q. Sæctanus's admirable satires; who introduces much such another character under this name. The true author, as we are informed by Monf. Blainville in his curious travels, is Monf. Sergardi, one of the finest and politest gentlemen of Rome; by Philodemus, he means one Gravina, an atheistical pretender to philosophy, the Greek language, &c. He thus makes him boast of himself, as if he drew the principles of his system from Socrates.

Nos etenim (puto jam nosti) docti sumus, et quos Socraticâ cœpi tractandos molliter arte
 Sordibus emergunt vulgi, totâque probantur Urbe.

See Q. Sæctani Satyr, 4to. vol. i. sat. i. lib. i. v. 108, &c.

Ver. 299. The Heathens frequently give the appellation of Soul or Spirit to God.

Thus Virgil:

Cœlum et terram camposque liquentes,
 Lucentemque globum lunæ, Titaniaque astra
 Spiritus intus agit.

That he means God by Spirit, appears from another place.

Deum ire per omnes
 Terrasque tractusque maris cœlumque profundum.
 And Zeno's opinion is very remarkable;

Θεὸς ἐστὶ πνεῦμα διηκόν δι' ὅλην τὴν κόσμῳ.

See Lactantius, B. vii. c. 3. and Diogenes Laertius in the life of Zeno.

Ver. 306. Cicero tells us that it was Thales's opinion that God was the Spirit which created all things from the water. Thales aquam dixit esse initium rerum, Deum autem esse mentem quæ ex aqua cuncta fingeret. De Nat. Deor. l. i.

Ver. 323. The very Heathens imagined a commotion in nature at the presence of the Deity.

Vibratus ab æthere fulgor
 Cum sonitu venit, ruere omnia visa repente.
Æneis, lib. 8.

And in another place, Virgil:

Vix ea fatus eram, tremere omnia visa repente
 Liminaque laurusque Dei, totusque moveri
 Mons circum.
Æneis, lib. 3.

So likewise Statius:

Mirabur cur templa mihi tremuere Dianæ.
Theb. lib. 4.

And Seneca:

Imo mugit è fundo solum,
 Tonat dies serenus, ac totis domus
 Ut fracta tectis crepuit.
Thyestes, Act. 2.

Ver. 324. Psalm cx. 3. This is a noble metaphor to express the beauties and graces of the Holy Spirit. So that "from the womb of the morning" in the Psalmist, signifies this: From the heavenly light of the gospel, which is the wing or beam whereby the Sun of Righteousness revealeth himself, and breaketh out upon the world, the people shall adorn themselves from the first forming of Christ in them, with the dew of grace, and the gifts and emanations of the Holy Ghost; which are love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance. Gal. v. 22, &c. When the Spirit of Christ bloweth thus upon us, and the dews of grace are poured into our hearts, then the spices flow out, which arise from the holy duties and spiritual infusions mentioned above.

Ver. 332. Rev. v. 8. The four and twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, having every one of them harps and golden vials full of odours, which are the prayers of the saints; that is, the prayers of good men are as grateful to God as incense from the tabernacle. So David, Ps. xiv. 2. "Let my prayer be directed to thee as incense."

Ver. 348. Alluding to the two olive branches in Zechariah, ch. iv. ver. 11. and 12. which empty the golden oil out of themselves. Amongst other expositions of which words, Junius and Tarnovius interpret them to mean the various gifts and effusions of the Holy Spirit, which are by Christ derived upon the church. For Christ is called the Messiah, on account of his being anointed with the "oil of gladness," Ps. xiv. 8. And St. John, speaking thus of the Holy Ghost: "Ye have an unction from the Holy One," 1 John ii. 20. "The anointing which ye received from him abideth in you," John ii. 27.

To conclude; a recovery from the small-pox, a few years ago, gave occasion to the preceding poem. I only at first (in gratitude to the great Physician of souls and bodies) designed to have published this hymn to the Trinity upon a recovery from sickness. But the subject being very extensive, and capable of admitting serious reflections on the frail state of humanity, I expatiated farther upon it. It cannot be supposed that I should treat upon sickness in a medicinal, but only in a descriptive, a moral, and religious manner: the versification is varied accordingly; the descriptive parts being more poetical, the moral more plain, and the religious, for the most part, drawn from the holy scriptures. I have just taken such notice of the progress of the small-pox, as may give the reader some small idea of it, without offending his imagination. These few notes are not intended for the learned reader, but added to assist those who may not be so well acquainted with the classical and other allusions. I do not remember to have seen any other poem on the same subject to lead me on the way, and therefore, it is to be hoped, the good-natured reader will more readily excuse its blemishes.

I have here added, by way of conclusion to the notes, a short hymn, written (when very young) in the great epidemical cold in 1732.

A HYMN IN SICKNESS.

O LORD! to thee I lift my soul,
To thee direct my eyes,
While fate in every vapour rolls,
And sick'ning nature sighs.

Ev'n air, the vehicle of life,
The soft recess of breath,
Is made the harbinger of fate,
And poison'd dart of death.

No gentle strains relieve my ears:
But hark! the passing toll,
In a long sadly-solemn knell,
Alarms anew my soul.

No lovely prospect meets my eye,
But melancholy fear,
Attended with the hollow pomp
Of sickness and despair.

My sins wide-saring in my face,
In ghastly guise alarm;
The pleasing sins of wanton youth,
In many a fatal charm.

I sink beneath their black approach:
My God! thy mercy lend;
Let hope her healing wings diffuse;
O snatch me from the fiend!

I feel, I feel thy saving health:
New raptures fill my heart:
A shining train of bliss succeeds;
The gloomy scenes depart.

Though straining coughs this mortal frame
To dissolution bring,
Yet dreary death in vain affrights
And points in vain his sting:

If gracious Heaven at that sad hour
Its guardian arm extend;
If angels watch my parting soul,
And save me at my end.

O Lord, or let me live or die,
Thy holy will be done!
But let me live alone to thee,
And die in thee alone.

AN HYMN TO MAY.

Nunc formosissimus annus. VIRGIL.

PREFACE.

As Spenser is the most descriptive and florid of all our English writers, I attempted to imitate his manner, in the following vernal poem. I have been very sparing of the antiquated words, which are too frequent in most of the imitations of this author; however, I have introduced a few here and there, which are explained at the bottom of each page where they occur. Shakspeare is the poet of nature, in adapting the affections and passions to his characters; and Spenser in describing her delightful scenes and rural beauties. His lines are most musically sweet, and his descriptions most delicately abundant, even to a wantonness of painting; but still it is the music and painting of nature. We find no ambitious ornaments or epigrammatical turns in his writings, but a beautiful simplicity; which pleases far above the glitter of pointed wit. I endeavoured to avoid the affectation of the one, without any hopes of attaining the graces of the other kind of writing.

Te sequor, O nostræ gentis decus! inque tuis nunc
Fixa pedum pono pressis vestigia signis:
Non ita certandi cupidus, quam propter amorem
Quod te imitari aveo: Quid enim contendat hirundo Cycnis?—
Lucretius.

A modern writer has, I know, objected against running the verse into alternate and stanza: But Mr. Prior's authority is sufficient for me, who observes that it allows a greater variety, and still preserves the dignity of the verse. As I professed myself in this canto to take Spenser for my model, I chose the stanza; which I think adds both a sweetness and solemnity at the same time, to subjects of this rural and flowery nature. The most descriptive of our old poets have always used it from Chaucer down to Fairfax, and even long after him. I followed Fletcher's measure in his Purple Island; a poem printed at Cambridge in twelve cantos in quarto, scarce heard of in this age, yet the best in the allegorical way (next to the Faery Queen) in the English language. The Alexandrine line, I think, is peculiarly graceful at the end, and is an improvement on Shakspeare's Venus and Adonis. After all, Spenser's hymns will excuse me for using this measure; and Scaliger, in the third book of his Poetics, tells us (from Dydimus) that the hymns of the Athenians were sung to the lyre, the pipe, or some musical instrument: And this, of all other kinds of verse, is certainly lyrical. But enough of the stanza: For (as Sir William Davenant observes in his admirable preface to Gondibert) numbers in verse, like distinct kinds of music, are composed to the uncertain and different taste of several ears. I hope I have no apology to make for describing the beauties, the pleasures, and the loves of the season, in too tender or too florid a manner. The nature of the subject required a luxuriousness of versification, and a softness of sentiment; but they are pure and chaste at the same time, otherwise this canto had neither been ever written or offered to the public. If the sentiments and verse be florid and tender, I shall excuse myself in the words of Virgil (though not in his sense)

THE ARGUMENT.

SUBJECT proposed. Invocation of May. Description of her: Her operations on nature. Bounty recommended; in particular at this season. Vernal apostrophe. Love the ruling passion in May. The celebration of Venus her birth-day in this month. Rural retirement in spring. Conclusion.

ETHEREAL daughter of the lusty Spring,
And sweet Favonius, ever gentle May!
Shall I, unblam'd, presume of thee to sing,
And with thy living colours gild my lay?
Thy genial spirit mantles in my brain;
My numbers languish in a softer vein:
I pant, too emulous, to flow in Spenser's strain.

Say, mild Aurora of the blooming year,
With storms when winter blackens nature's face;
When whirling winds the howling forest tear,
And shake the solid mountains from their base:
Say, what refulgent chambers of the sky
Veil thy beloved glories from the eye,
For which the nations pine, and earth's fair children die?

Where * Leda's twins, forth from their diamond
tow'r,
Alternate o'er the night their beams divide;
In light embosom'd, happy, and secure
From winter rage, thou choos'est to abide.

* Castor and Pollux.

Blest residence! For, there, as poet's tell,
† The power's of poetry and wisdom dwell;
Apollo wakes the arts; the muses strike the shell.

‡ Certes o'er Rhedicyna's laurell'd mead,
(For ever spread, ye laurels, green and new)!
The brother stars their gracious nurture shed,
And secrete blessings of poetic dew.
They bathe their horses in the learned flood,
With flame recruited for the ethereal road,
And deem fair Ili's swans || fair as their fa-
god.

No sooner April, trimm'd with garlands § gay,
Rains fragrance o'er the world, and kindly show'rs;
But, in the eastern pride of beauty, May,
To gladden earth, forsakes her heav'nly bow'rs,

† The Gemini are supposed to preside over learned men. See Pontanus in his beautiful poem called Urania. Lib. 2. de Geminis.

‡ Surely, certainly. Ibid.—Rhedicyna, &c. Oxford.

|| Jupiter deceived Leda in the shape of a swan, as she was bathing herself in the river Eurotas.

§ Garlands.

Restoring nature from her palsy'd state.
April, retire; ne * longer nature wait;
Soon may she issue from the morning's golden gate.

Come, bounteous May! in fulness of thy might,
Lead briskly on the mirth-infusing hours,
All-recent from the bosom of delight,
With nectar nurtur'd; and involv'd in flow'rs:
By spring's sweet blush, by nature's teeming womb;
By Hebe's dimply smile, by Flora's bloom;
By Venus' self (for Venus' self demands thee) come!

By the warm sigh in dewy even-tide,
Of melting maidens in the woodbine groves,
To pity loosen'd, soften'd down from pride;
By billing turtles, and by cooing doves;
By the youth's plainings stealing on the air,
(For youths will plain, though yielding be the fair)
Hither to bless the maidens and the youths repair.

With dew bespangled, by the hawthorn buds,
With freshness breathing, by the daisy'd plains,
By the mix'd music of the warbling woods,
And jovial † roundelays of nymphs and swains;
In thy full energy, and rich array,
Delight of earth and heaven! O blessed May!
From heav'n descend to earth: on earth vouchsafe to stay.

She comes!—A silken ‡ camus, em'ral'd-green,
Gracefully loose, adown her shoulders flows,
(Fit to enfold the limbs of Paphos' queen)
And with the labours of the needle glows,
¶ Purled by nature's hand! The amorous air
And musky western breezes fast repair, [hair.
Her mantle proud to swell, and wanton with her

Her hair (but rather threads of light it seems)
With the gay honours of the spring entwin'd,
Copious, unbound, in nectar'd ringlets streams,
Floats glitt'ring on the sun, and scents the wind,
Love-sick with odours!—Now to order roll'd,
It melts upon her bosom's dainty mould,
Or, curling round her waste, disparts its wavy gold.

Young circling roses, blushing round them throw
The sweet abundance of their purple rays,
And lilies, dipp'd in fragrance, freshly blow,
With blended beauties in her angel face.
The humid radiance beaming from her eyes
The air and seas illumines, the earth and skies;
And open, where she smiles, the sweets of Paradise.

On zephyr's wing the laughing goddess view,
Distilling balm. She cleaves the buxom air,
Attended by the silver-footed dew,
The ravages of winter to repair.
She gives her naked bosom to the gales,
Her naked bosom down the ether sails;
Her bosom breathes delight; her breath the spring
exhales.

All as the Phoenix in Arabian skies,
New burnish'd from his spicy funeral pyres,

At large, in roseal * undulation flies;
His plumage dazzles and the gazer tires:
Around their king the plummy nations wait,
Attend his triumph, and augment his state:
He tow'ring, claps his wings, and wins th' ethereal height.

So round this phoenix of the gawdy year
A thousand, nay, ten thousand sports and smiles,
Fluttering in gold, along the hemisphere,
Her praises chaunt: her praises glad the isles.
Conscious of her approach (to deck her bow'rs)
Earth from her fruitful lap and bosom pours
A waste of springing sweets, and voluntary flow'rs.

† Narcissus fair, in snowy velvet gown'd;
Ah foolish! still to love the fountain-brim:
‡ Sweet hyacinth, by Phœbus || erst bemoan'd;
And tulip, flaring in her powder'd trim.
Whate'er, § Armida, in thy gardens blew;
Whate'er the sun inhales, or sips the dew;
Whate'er compose the chaplet on Ianthes' brow.
He who ¶ undaz'd can wander o'er her face,
May gain upon the solar blaze at noon!—
What more than female sweetness and a grace
Peculiar! save, Ianthe, thine alone,
Ineffable effusion of the day!
So very much the same, that lovers say,
May is Ianthe; or the dear Ianthe May.

So far as doth the harbinger of day
The lesser lamps of night in  shewn excel;
So far in sweetness and in beauty May
Above all other months doth bear the bell
So far as May doth other months exceed,
So far in virtue and in †† goodlihead,
Above all other nymphs Ianthe bears the ‡‡ mead.
Welcome! as to a youthful poet, wine,
To fire his fancy and enlarge his soul:
He weaves the laurel-chaplet with the vine,
And grows immortal as he drains the bowl.
Welcome! as beauty to the lovesick swain,
For which he long had sigh'd, but sigh'd in vain;
He darts into her arms; quick vanishes his pain.

* Pliny tells us, Lib. II. that the phoenix is about the bigness of an eagle: The feathers round the neck shining like gold, the body of a purple colour, the tail blue, with feathers resembling roses. See Claudian's fine poem on that subject, and Marcellus Donatus, who has a short dissertation on the phoenix, in his Observation. on Tacitus. Annal. Lib. 6. Westley on Job, and Sir Thomas Brown's Vulgar Errors.

fountain, fell in love with himself, and pining away was changed into a flower which bears his name. See Ovid's Metamorphoses, lib. 3.

‡ Beloved and turned into a flower by Apollo. See the story in Ovid, Met lib. 10. There is likewise a curious dialogue in Lucian betwixt Mercury and Apollo on this subject. Servius, in his notes on Virgil's second Bucolic takes the hyacinth to be the vacinium of the Latins, bearing some similitude with the name.

The drowzy elements, arouz'd by thee,
Roll to harmonious measures, active all!
Earth, water, air, and fire, with feeling glee,
Exult to celebrate thy festival.
Fire glows intenser; softer blows the air;
More smooth the waters flow; earth smiles more
fair:
Earth, water, air, and fire, thy glad'ning impulse share.

What boundless tides of splendour o'er the skies,
O'erflowing brightness! stream their golden rays!

Heav'n's azure kindles with the varying dyes,
Reflects the glory, and returns the blaze.
Air whitens; wide the tracts of ether been
With colours damask'd rich, and goodly sheen,
And all above is blue, and all below is green.

At thy approach, the wild waves' loud uproar
And foamy surges of the mad'ning main,
Forget to heave their mountains to the shore;
Diffus'd into the level of the plain.
For thee, the Halcyon builds her summer's nest;
For thee, the ocean smooths her troubled breast,
Gay from thy placid smiles, in thy own purple drest.

Have ye not seen, in gentle even tide,
When Jupiter the earth hath richly shower'd,
Striding the clouds, a bow * dispredden wide
As if with light inwove, and gayly flower'd
With bright variety of blending dyes?
White, purple, yellow melt along the skies,
Alternate colours sink, alternate colours rise.

The earths embroidery then have ye ey'd,
And smile of blossoms, yellow, purple, white;
Their vernal-tinctur'd leaves, luxurious, dy'd
In Flora's liv'ry, painted by the light.
Lights' painted children in the breezes play,
Lay out their dewy bosoms to the ray,
Their soft enamel spread, and beautify the day.

From the wide altar of the foodful earth
The flow'rs, the herbs, the plants, their incense
roll;

The orchards swell the ruby-tinctur'd birth;
The vermil gardens breathe the spicy soul.
Grateful to May, the nectar-spirit flies,
The wafted clouds of lavish'd odours rise,
The zephyr's balmy burthen, worthy of the skies.

The bee, the golden daughter of the spring,
From mead to mead, in wanton labour, roves,
And loads its little thigh, or gilds its wing
With all the essence of the flushing groves:
Extracts the aromatic soul of flow'rs,
And, humming in delight, its waxen bow'rs
Fills with the luscious spoils, and lives ambrosial hours.

Touch'd by thee, May, the flocks and lusty droves
That low in pastures, or on mountains bleat,
Revive their frolics and renew their loves,
Stung to the marrow with a generous heat.

* Spread.

The stately courser, bounding o'er the plain,
Shakes to the winds the honours of his mane, (High-arch'd his neck) and, snuffing, hopes the dappled train.

The æreal songsters sooth the list'ning groves:
The mellow thrush, the * ouzle sweetly shrill,
And little linnet celebrate their loves
In hawthorn valley, or on tufted hill;
The soaring lark, the lowly nightingale,
A thorn her pillow, trills her doleful tale,
And melancholy music dies along the dale.

This gay exuberance of gorgeous spring,
The gilded mountain, and the herbag'd vale,
The woods that blossom, and the birds that sing,
The murmuring fountain and the breathing dale:
The dale, the fountains, birds and woods delight,
The vales, the mountains and the spring invite,
Yet unadorn'd by May, no longer charm the sight.

When nature laughs around, shall man alone,
Thy image, hang (ah me!) the sickly head?
When nature sings, shall nature's glory groan,
And languish for the pittance poor of bread!
O may the man that shall his image scorn,
Alive, be ground with hunger, most forlorn,
Die † unanell'd, and dead, by dogs and kites be torn.

Curs'd may he be (as if he were not so).
Nay doubly curs'd be such a breast of steel,
Which never melted at another's woe,
Nor tenderness of bowels knew to feel.
His heart is black as hell, in flowing store
Who hears the needy crying at his door,
Who hears them cry, ‡ ne reck; but suffers them

But blest, O more than doubly blest be he!
Let honour crown him and eternal rest,
Whose bosom, the sweet fount of charity,
Flows out to § nurse innocence distressed.
His ear is open to the widow's cries,
His hand the orphan's cheek of sorrow dries;
Like mercy's self he looks on want with pity's
eyes.

In this blest season, pregnant with delight,
|| Ne may the boading owl with screeches wound
The solemn silence of the quiet night,
Ne croaking raven, with unhallow'd sound,
Ne damned ghost ¶ affray with deadly yell

To pale the stars, till Hesper shine it back to hell.

Ne witches rifle gibbets, by the moon,

Now let the trumpet's martial thunders sleep;

 ries) to be like ghosts of deceased persons: but our traditional accounts are very different in respect to the nature of fairies. Shakspeare's Midsummers Night's Dream, Dryden's Faery Tale and a celebrated Old Ballad, are majestical pieces in their kind.

Here Venus revels, here maintains her court
In light festivity and gladsome game:
The young and gay, in frolic troops resort,
Withouten censure and withouten blame.
In pleasure steep'd, and dancing in delight,
Night steals upon the day, the day on night:
Each knight, his lady loves; each lady loves her knight.

Where lives the man (if such a man there be)
In idle wilderness or desert drear,
To beauty's sacred pow'r an enemy?
Let foul fiends ‡ harrow him; I'll drop no tear.
I deem that § carl, by beauty's pow'r unmov'd,
Hated of Heav'n, of none but hell approv'd.
O may he never love, O never be belov'd!

Hard is his heart, unmelted by thee, May!
Unconscious of love's nectar-tickling sting,
And, unrelenting, cold to beauty's ray;
Beauty the mother and the child of spring!
Beauty and wit declare the sexes even;
Beauty to woman, wit to man is given; [Heav'n.
Neither the slime of earth, but each the fire of

Alliance sweet! let beauty, wit approve,
As flow'rs to sunshine ope the ready breast:
Wit beauty loves, and nothing else can love:
The best alone is grateful to the best.

§ A clown.

Perfection has no other parallel!
Can light with darkness, doves with ravens dwell?
As soon, * perdie, shall heav'n communion hold with hell.

I sing to you, who love alone for love:
For gold the beauteous fools (O fools before)!
Can win; though brighter wit shall never move:
But folly is to wit the certain cure.
Curs'd be the men (or be they young or old),
Curs'd be the women, who themselves have sold
To the detested bed for lucre base of gold.

Not Julia such: she higher honour deem'd
To languish in the Sulmo poet's arms,
Than, by the potentates of earth esteem'd,
To give to sceptres and to crowns her charms.
Not Laura such: in sweet Vaucluse's vale
She list'ned to her Petrarch's amorous tale.
But did poor † Colin Clout o'er Rosalind prevail?

Howe'er that be; in ‡ Acidalian shade,
Embracing Julia, Ovid melts the day:
No dreams of banishment his loves invade;
Encircled in eternity of May.
Here Petrarch with his Laura, soft reclin'd
On violets, gives sorrow to the wind:
And Colin Clout pipes to the yielding Rosalind.

Pipe on, thou sweetest of th' Arcadian train,
That e'er with tuneful breath inform'd the quill:
Pipe on, of lovers the most loving swain!
Of bliss and melody O take thy fill.
Ne envy I, if dear Ianthe smile,
Though low my numbers, and though rude my style;

Ne quit for Acidale, fair Albion's happy isle.

Come then, Ianthe! milder than the spring,
And grateful as the rosy month of May,
O come; the birds the hymn of nature sing,
Inchanting wild, from every bush and spray:

* An old word for asserting any thing.

† Spenser.

‡ These three celebrated poets and lovers were all of them unhappy in their amours. Ovid was banished on account of his passion for Julia. Death deprived Petrarch of his beloved Laura very early; as he himself tells us in his account of his own life: These are his words, "Amore acerrimo, sed unico et honesto, in Adolescentia laboravi, et diutius laborassem, nisi jam tepescerem ignem mors acerba, sed utilis, extinxisset." See his works. Basil, Fel. Tom. I. Yet others say, she married another person; which is scarce probable, since Petrarch lamented her death for ten years afterwards, as appears from Sonetto 313, with a most uncommon ardour of passion. Thomasinus in his curious book, called Petrarcha Redivivus, has given us two prints of Laura, with an account of her family, their loves, and his sweet retirement in Vaucluse. As for Spenser, we may conclude that his love for Rosalinda proved unsuccessful, from his pathetic complaints, in several of his poems, of her cruelty. The author, therefore, thought it only a poetical kind of justice, to reward them in this imaginary retreat of lovers, for the misfortunes they really suffered here, on account of their passion.

Swell the green gems and teem along the vine,
A fragrant promise of the future wine,
The spirits to exalt, the genius to refine!

Let us our steps direct where Father Thames.
In silver windings draws his humid train,
And pours, where'er he rolls his naval stream,
Pomp on the city, plenty o'er the plain.
Or by the banks of Isis shall we stray,
(Ah why so long from Isis banks away)!
Where thousand damsels dance, and thousand shepherds play.

Or choose you rather Theron's calm retreat,
Embosom'd, Surrey, in thy verdant vale,
At once the muses and the graces seat!
There gently listen to my faithful tale.
Along the dew-bright parterres let us rove,
Or taste the odours of the mazy-grove: [love.
Hark how the turtles coo: I languish too with

Amid the pleasaunce of Arcadian scenes,
Love steals his silent arrows on my breast;
Nor falls of water, nor enamell'd greens,
Can sooth my anguish, or invite to rest.
You, dear Ianthe, you alone impart
Balm to my wounds, and cordial to my smart:
The apple of my eye, the life-blood of my heart.

With line of silk, with hook of barbed steel,
Beneath this oaken umbrage let us lay,
And from the water's crystal bosom steal
Upon the grassy bank the finny prey:
The perch, with purple speckled manifold;
The eel, in silver labyrinth self roll'd, [gold.
And carp, all-burnish'd o'er with drops of scaly.

Or shall the meads invite, with Iris hues
And nature's pencil gay diversify'd,
(For now the sun has lick'd away the dews)
Fair-flushing and bedeck'd like virgin bride?
Thither (for they invite us), we'll repair,
Collect and weave (whate'er is sweet and fair)
A posy for thy breast, a garland for thy hair.

Fair is the lily, clad in balmy snow;
Sweet is the rose, of spring the smiling eye;
Nipt by the winds, their heads the lilies bow;
Cropt by the hand, the roses fade and die.
Though now in pride of youth and beauty drest,
O think, Ianthe, cruel time lays waste
The roses of the cheek, the lilies of the breast.

Weep not; but, rather taught by this, improve
The present freshness of thy springing prime:
Bestow thy graces on the god of love,
Too precious for the wither'd arms of time.
In chaste endearments, innocently gay,
Ianthe! now, now love thy spring away;
Ere cold October blasts despoil the bloom of May.

Now up the chalky mazes of yon hill,
With grateful diligence, we wind our way;
What op'ning scenes our ravish'd senses fill,
And, wide, their rural luxury display! [spires,
Woods, dales, and flocks, and herds, and cots and Villa's of learned clerks, and gentle squires;
The villa of a friend the eye-sight never tires.

VOL. X.

If e'er to thee and Venus, May, I strung [veins
The gladsome lyre, when * livelood swell'd my
And Eden's nymphs and Isis damsels sung
In tender † elegy, and ‡ pastoral-strains;
Collect and shed thyself on Theron's bow'r's,
O green his gardens, O perfume his flow'rs,
O bless his morning walks and sooth his ev'ning
hours.

Long, Theron, with thy Annabell enjoy
The walks of nature, still to vir-ue kind,
For sacred solitude can never cloy;
The wisdom of an uncorrupted mind!
O very long may Hymen's golden chain
To earth confine you and the rural reign;
Then soar, at length, to heaven! nor pray, O
muse, in vain.

Where'er the muses haunt, or poets muse,
In solitary silence sweetly tir'd,
Unloose thy bosom, May! thy stores effuse,
Thy vernal stores, by poets most desir'd,
Of living fountain, of the woodbind shade,
Of Philomela, warbling from the glade.
Thy bounty, in his verse, shall certes be repay'd.

On Twit'nam bow'rs (Aonian-Twit'nam bow'rs)!
Thy softest plenitude of beauties shed,
Thick as the winter stars, or summer flow'rs;
§ Albè the tuneful master (ah!) be dead.
To Colin next he taught my youth to sing,
My reed to warble, to resound my string:
The king of shepherd's he, of poet's he the king.

Hail, happy scenes, where joy wou'd choose to dwell;

Hail, golden days, which Saturn deems his own;
Hail music, which the muses || scant excel;
Hail flowrets, not unworthy Venus' crown.
Ye linnets, larks, ye thrushes, nightingales;
Ye hills, ye plains, ye groves, ye streams, ye vales,
Ye ever happy scenes! all you, your poet hails.

All hail to thee, O May! the crown of all!
The recompence and glory of my song:
Ne small the recompence, ne glory small,
If gentle ladies, and the tuneful-throng,
With lovers-myrtle, and with poet's-bay
Fairly ¶ bedight, approve the simple lay,
And think on Thomalin whene'er they hail thee,
May!

EPITHALAMIUM

On the Royal Nuptials, in May 1736.

For on the liquid crystal gaily flew
A painted * gondelay, bedecked fair
With gold and purple, gorgeous to the view !
While loud approving shouts divide the air,
" Hail, happy future bride of Albion's worthy
" heir."

† Eftoons the father of the silver flood,
The noble Thames, his azure head uprais'd,
And shook his dewy locks, worthy a God !
A lambent glory round his temples blaz'd,
On which the Naiads all with wonder gaz'd.
So sparkle Thetis purple-trembling streams,
When Phœbus, for his golden car yprais'd,
Strikes the calm surface with his morning beams.
And sprinkles spangles round, and the wide blue inflames.

The wanton Naiads, Doris' daughters all,
Range in a ring : Pherusa, blooming-fair,
Cymodoce dove-ey'd, with Florimal. [hair,
Sweet-smelling flowrets deck'd their long green
And Erato, to love to Venus dear,
Galene drest in smiles and lily-white.
And Phao, with her snowy bosom bare,
All these, and more than these, a dainty fight !
In daunce and merriment and sweet ‡ belgards delight.

Around the bark they daunce, wherein their sat
A lady fresh and fair, ah ! such a one,
So fresh and fair, so amiably great,
So goodly-gracious seem'd as never none.
And like thy sweet-beam'd planet, Venus, shone.
They much admire, O very much her face,
Her shape, her breast for love a downy throne !
Her beauty's glorious shine, her every grace ;
An angel she appear'd, at least of angel race.

Her Thamis (on his golden urn he lean'd)
Saluted with this Hymeneal song,
And hail'd her safe. Full silent was the wind,
The river glided gently-soft along,
§ Ne whispered the breeze the leaves among,
Ne love-learn'd Philomel out-trill'd her lay ;
A stillness on the waves attentive hung,
A brighter gladness blest the face of day,
All nature gan to smile, her smiles diffus'd the May.

" Ah sacred ship, to Albion wafting good,

Oh Frederick ! oh, ¶ certes, blessed wight,

On the soft bosom of the yielding sea,
Where'er thou wind, or to the spicy shore
Of Araby the blest, or Indias bay,
Where diamonds kindle, and the golden ore
Flames into purity, to deck Augusta more !

Augusta, fairest princess under sky,
Welcome to Albion's renowned land,
Albion well known to thy great ancestry,
Made dearer far to thee by Hymen's band,
The band of love, of honour and command !
Deign to receive the nation's public voice,
Of heartiness unfeign'd, who gleeful stand
In meet array, and thus express their joys
In peals of loud acclaim, and mirth's confused noise.

With warmer raptures, and more passionate,
Though hard to be ! the Royal Youth, I trow
Shall thee embrace : him tenfold fires elate,
And sacred passions in his bosom glow,
Which from thy picture erst began to flow.
For thee he burns, for thee he sighs and prays,
Pours out his soul to thee, nor rest can know ;
But dreams of thee long, livelong nights and days,
By beauty led through all love's rosy thorny ways

To heal his pains soft music does divide
Most heavenly melody in soothing strains ;
Nor heavenly melody, nor aught beside,
Save thee, ah dearest dread can heal his pains ;
Thy form too deeply in his breast remains.
So ever and anon he chides the gales,
That slowly seem to brush the liquid plains ;
Oh ! fly on all the wings of heav'n, ye sails,
Oh fly ! he cries ; and lo ! a lover's pray'r prevails.

Now cease thy sighs. She comes, (oh blessed day) !
She comes, by all the loves and graces drest,
In proud humility. See, Hymen play,
With saffron robe and flame embroider'd vest,
(Such colours * likerly suit Hymen best)
And Cupid catches rosy wafts of air
To stretch the sails and fan the royal guest.
Nor chastity, meek-ey'd, is wanting there,
For she, and modesty, sweet blushing, guide the steer.

Not Venus, queen of beauty and of bliss
So goodly shone, when † erst the goddess sprung
From ocean's sparkling foam, sweet nakedness !
A thousand smiles and loves upon her hung,
And all the gods for joy and wonder sung.
The waves so proud the beamy burden bore
Exulting. she, around her odours flung,
And bade the billows laugh and cease to roar ;
They gladly her obey, and gently kiss the shore.

So fair she looks, nay fairer could it be ;
Did never mortal man such charms behold
In bow'r or hall. Spring waits upon her eye ;
Lo ! Flora has her richest stores out-roll'd
Of variable flow'rs and blooming gold.

* Surely. † Formerly.

he meadows smile, the birds renew their love,
And throw themselves in pairs the young and old;
All nature glows where'er her glances move,
And beauty paints each field, and music fills each grove.

But who is yon, each other youth excelling
As much as orient gold surmounteth brass?
Sure honour in his visage chose her dwelling,
And sacred truth, * perdie, adorns his face;
Such goodlihead and humbleness never was.
Blest be the sight! full well whose looks I kenn,
Where joyaunce sits and ever-smiling grace;
Frederick! 'tis he! the first and best of men,
Our dearling prince to meet Augusta † well-be-
seen.

And lo! what medled passions in him move,
He gazes—wonders—(great is beauty's pow'r)!
And, sweetly lost in ecstasy and love,
His eyes her whole, his lips her lips devour,
Which Venus had besprent with nectar-show'r.
Her slippery charms allow his eyes no rest,
But thousand arrows, nay ten thousand pour
Into his wounded and transported breast;
Sure none like her is fair, sure none like him is blest!

O blessed youth! receive thy ‡ bonnibel,
Eternal fount of virtue, love, and grace!
O kneel to all the gods and pray to all,
Who sparkle so divinely in her face,
And with celestial fires her bosom blest.
So shines Aurora in her rich attire,
When she Hyperion would fain carefs:
Gaze all the host of stars, and all admire,
Then twinkle in their urns, and into night retire.

O blessed maid! receive thy § belamour,
With glee receive him and o'erflowing heart:
Ne in high monarch's court, ne lady's bow'r,
A youth so form'd by nature and by art,
Conspiring both, ere cherish'd Cupid's dart.
So Phæbus, lusty bridegroom of the sky,
With native splendours shine on every part;
From east to west his pointed glories fly,
He warmeth every heart, he dazzleth every eye."

Here Themis ended. Now the goodly train
Of all the Naiads, in most comely wise,
A present make of myrtle-girland green,
Entrail'd with flow'rets and with rare device.
The graces eke, with laughter swelling eyes,
A rosy chaplet, steep'd in nectar bring,
(The roses gather'd in the morning skies)
Then, joining with the Naiads, form a ring,
And round them deftly daunce, and round them blithely sing.

"As roses and as myrtles kindly weave
Their sweets in one, much sweeter as they blend;
Emblem of marriage-love! So you receive
Sweets interchang'd, and to each other lend;
Then, in a blest perfume to heav'n, ascend,

And mingle with the gods! While here below,
New myrtles, roses new, withouten end,
From your luxurious stock full plenteous grow,
And with their parent-sweets, and parent beauty
glow."

Next Albion's genius came, bedite in gold,
An oaken chaplet nodded on his head;
The crown he held was glorious to behold,
And royally he taught his feet to tread.
Soon as he spy'd the prince's goodlihead,
He pointed to the crown, and rais'd his voice
To hail the royal pair and blest their bed;
The jolly chorus catch the grateful noise,
Echo the woods and vales, and heav'n and earth
rejoice:

Next liberty, the fairest nymph on ground;
The flowing plenty of her golden hair
Diffusing lavishly ambrosia round;
Her hands a flow'ry cornucopia bear,
Which scatters joy and pleasure through the air.

Then, blessing both, for her defenders chose,
And spread her glories in a purple cloud:

BEAUTY AND MUSIC.

AN ODE.

AIR I.

O SOFTLY sigh into the flute,
While dear Ianthe breathes the love-sick lay:
Now teach the melancholy lute
In tender trills to melt the notes away,
Melodious in decay!—
But hark, she louder, louder sings,
Sink, boldly sink into the streams:
Shake, O shake the numerous wire,
Fire the blood, the spirits fire
With musical thunder and burning desire!

AIR II.

Our souls divided with a fond surprise!
Dissolve in woe;
With rapture glow;
Fall with her notes; or with her bosom rise;
Rais'd with hopes; with fears deprest;
Sweetly tortur'd sweetly blest;
Sav'd by her voice, and vanquish'd by her eyes,

RECITATIVE.

The god of love, to her strains
Leaves his Acidalian plains,
And, as th' harmonious charmer sings,
In triumph points his darts and waves his wings.
Th' harmonious charmer paus'd to see
A list'ning wondering deity;
While silence softly chain'd her tongue,
The god responsive rais'd the song,
In strains like these, if strains can be
Rais'd to the raptures of a deity,
The raptures of a wond'ring deity!

AIR III.

Beauty, sacred beauty sing,
Flowing from the wond'rous spring
Of uncreated and primeval light!
Beauty, sacred beauty sing,
Spoke into being in his high abode,
And next his own eternal essence bright!

AIR IV.

With beauty music join,
The breath of heav'n
To mortals given
To swell their bliss to bliss divine!
With beauty music join.

CHORUS.

Beauty, silent harmony!
Softly stealing through the eye
Smiles into the breast a dart.
Music, fine-proportion'd sounds!
Pours balm upon the lover's wounds
Through the ear into the heart.

RECITATIVE.

Thus once Cecilia (tuneful Dryden sings),
To fire with sacred rage her soul,
Touch'd into voice the sprightly strings,
And bade the silver tides of music roll,
An angel, list'ning to her lyre,
To lift the modulations higher,

Apply'd the aiding graces of his tongue;
And while the virgin play'd, the seraph sung.

AIR V.

Sweetest mortal, to befriend thee,
Angels from their quires attend thee,
Angels leave their thrones to hear
Music with devotion glowing,
Music heavenly joys bestowing,
Worthy a seraphic ear!

RECITATIVE.

Again she trembles o'er the silver strings,
The silver strings, exulting to her hand,
Obey the sweet command,
And thus again the angel sings.
(While silence wav'd her downy wings around,
And gladness smil'd along the purple skies;
All nature soft'ned at their flows of sound,
And bright'ned at the radiance of their eyes.)

AIR VI.

Harmony, the soul refining!
Beauty, sense, and virtue, joining
In a form and mind like thine,
Nobly raise a mortal creature
To a more exalted nature;
We alone are more divine!

RECITATIVE.

Rapt'rous thus the angel sung,
Manna melting from his tongue,
Attemper'd to Cecilia's golden lyre:
The blended pow'rs of harmony
Trembled up the willing sky,
And mingled with the seraph's flaming quire.

CHORUS.

How sweet the music, how divine,
When heaven and earth in consort join!
O sweet the music! O divine!

AIR VII.

Skill'd the softest notes to sing,
Skill'd to wake the sweetest string,
Dear Ianthe both supplies:
Thee, Cecilia, thee we find
In her form and in her mind,
The angel in her voice and eyes!

CHORUS.

Happy, O beyond expressing!
He who tastes th' immortal blessing
Dear Ianthe may bestow!
Beauty, in its pride, possessing,
Ever loving and caressing,
Music moving,
Bliss improving!—
He'll enjoy a heav'n below!
Happy he, beyond expressing!

THE DESPAIRING MAIDEN.

WITHIN an unfrequented grove,
As late I laid alone,
A tender maid in deep distress,
At distance, made her moan.
She cropt the blue-ey'd violet,
Bedew'd with many a tear;
And ever and anon her sighs
Stole sadly on my ear.

" Ah faithless man! how could he leave
 So fond and true a maid?
 Can so much innocence and truth
 Deserve to be betray'd?
 Alas, my mother! (if the dead
 Can hear their children groan)
 What ills your helpless orphan feels,
 To sorrow left alone.
 To sorrow left by him I lov'd;
 Ah perjur'd and ingrate!—
 Ye virgins, learn the wiles of men,
 And learn to shun my fate.
 For whom do I these flourets crop,
 For whom this chaplet twine?
 Say, shall they glow on Damon's brow,
 Or fade away on mine?
 But he the blooming wreath will scorn,
 Who scorn'd my virgin-bloom:
 And me—alas! they suit not me,
 Unless to deck my tomb.
 How oft the dear perfidious youth
 Invok'd each pow'r above!
 How oft he languish'd at my feet,
 And vow'd eternal love!
 How sweet the minutes danc'd away,
 All melted in delight!
 With him each summer-day was short,
 And short each winter-night.
 'Twas more than bliss I felt:—and now
 Alas! 'tis more than pain.—

Ye soft, ye rosy hours of love,
 Return—return again.
 Ah no!—Let blackness shade the night,
 When first he breath'd his vows:
 The scene of pleasure then—but, ah!
 The source of all my woes.
 How could I think so sweet a tongue
 Could e'er consent to lie?—
 'Twas easy to deceive a maid
 So soft and young as I.
 And yet he lays the fault on me
 (Where none could e'er be laid,
 Unless my loving him too well),
 And calls me perjur'd maid.
 The nymphs, who envious saw my charms,
 Rejoice to see my woe,
 And taunting cry, " why did you leave
 The youth that lov'd you so?"
 But oh, believe me, lovely youth,
 Far dearer than my eye,
 I love you still, and still will love,
 Till oh, for you, I die!
 Ev'n though you hate, I doat to death;
 My death my truth shall prove.
 My latest pray'rs are pray'rs for you,
 And sighs are sighs of love."
 She ceas'd:—(while pity from the clouds
 Dissolv'd in silent show'rs:—)
 Then faintly " Damon!" cry'd:—and breath'd
 Her soul amid the flow'rs.

CORESUS AND CALLIRHOE; A TALE.

Veteres Renovamus Amores.

CATULLUS.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE following tale is related by Pausanias, in Achaicis, Græciæ, Lib. 7.; but instead of giving the original, or the Latin version by Romulus Amasæus (both which the learned reader may find in the edition published by Joach. Kuhnus in fol. Lipsiæ, 1696, p. 575.), I shall content myself with the translation of the story into English, as it is done from the Greek in the learned and ingenious travels of Sir G. Wheler: which book, upon many accounts, deserves to be reprinted, and made more common.

" Coreus, the priest of Bacchus, fell in love with a fair virgin of Calydon, called Callirhoe; who, the more she was courted, the more she despised the priest; so that neither his rich presents, vows, nor tears, could move her to the least compassion. This, at last, made the priest run in despair to the image of Bacchus for succour, imploring vengeance from him. Bacchus made it appear that he heard his prayers, by a disease he sent on the town; which seemed a kind of drunken madness; of which mad fit people died in abundance. Whereupon they sent deputies from Calydon to the oracle of Jupiter of Dodona, to know what they should do to be freed from that woeful malady. Answer was given, that Coreus must sacrifice Callirhoe, or some other person, that would dedicate himself in her stead, to appease the anger of Bacchus. The virgin, when she could no way obtain her life of her relations, was brought to the altar, adorned as victims used to be, to be sacrificed by her lover Coreus: Whose wonderful love, even at that present, so conquered all past thoughts of revenge, that instead of her he slew himself: The virgin also, relenting of her cruelty to him, went and slew herself at a fountain near the town; from thence called by her name, Callirhoe."

B b iij

Thus far Sir George Wheler. See his Journey into Greece, fol. book 4th, p. 292.
I shall only add, that the ancient customs, particularly of the Orgia, or Rites of Bacchus, and of the sacrifice, are alluded to, and carefully observed, in the several parts of this little poem.

HIGH in Achaia, splendid from afar,
A city flourish'd; Calydon its name,
Wash'd by Evenus' chalky flood; the feat
Of Meleager, from the slaughter'd boar
Glorious. A virgin here, amazing, shone,
Callirhoe the fair: her father's boast!
For, ah! she never knew a mother's smile;
Nor learn'd what happiness from marriage springs.
In flow'r of youth, and purer than the snow,
Which, with a silver circle, crown'd the head
Of the steep neighbour mountain; but averse
To Hymen's rites, the lovely foe of man.

O why will beauty, cruel to itself,
No less than others, violate the laws
Which nature dictates, and itself inspires!

A thousand lovers from th' Olenian hill,
From rough Pylene, and from Pleuron's tow'rs,
Their passion pleaded. But Corefus, chief,
The Calydonian priest of Bacchus, form'd
By Venus' self for love; in beauty's pride;
Young, bounteous, affable. What tender arts,
What winning carriage, and respectful suit,
Almost to zealous adoration swell'd,
Did he not practise? But in vain. And now
Drew near the Orgial festival, and rites
Lyæan. Poor Corefus, to approve
The wonders of his love and dear regard,
By scorn unquench'd, and growing by neglect
(In hopes to soften her, at least adorn),
Presented to this mureless of his peace
The ritual ornaments, by virgins worn
Upon the solemn feast. The ivy spear,
With winding green, and viny foliage gay,
Curl'd by his hand: a mitre for his head,
Curious aumail'd with imitated grapes,
Of blushing rubies form'd: the pall of lawn,
Flower'd with the conquests of the purple god:
The cista, silver; and the cymbals, gold:
And piny torch (O were it Hymen's) ting'd
With spicy gums, to feed the ready flame.

Open'd the festival---loose to the winds,
Dishevell'd, bare, the virgins give their necks
And wanton hair. Evæ! they mad'ning cry,
And shake their torches. Evæ! lo! rends
The air, and beats the echoing vault of heav'n,
The hills, the vales with lo! Evæ! ring.

The temple opens to the sacred throng;
When foremost enters, as in dress and charms,
Callirhoe, so in speed. Their lovers wait,
With burning expectation, to enfold
His beauteous mistress each. High on a throne
Corefus blaz'd in jewels and in gold,
More charming in himself. Quick with his eye
He catch'd Callirhoe, and, descending, clasp'd
With eager transport her reluctant waist.
A thousand vows he breath'd, and melting things
He spoke and look'd; but to the rocks and wind.
What cou'd he more? yes more he did: for what,
What can't a lover, like Corefus, do?
Neglectful of his dignity he sunk
(Still love disdains what dignity demands,

O'er Jupiter himself supreme) he sunk,
And trembled at her feet, with prostrate zeal,
As to his God. He dy'd upon her hand
With sighing languishment: he gaz'd his soul
At every ardent glance into her eyes;
Most eloquently silent! o'er his cheek
The gushing tears, in big, round drops, diffus'd
The dews of passion, and the brain's soft show'r,
Potent to warm the most obdurate breast,
Though cold as marble. Idle were his tears,
His glances, languishment, and prostrate zeal.

Disdainful---frowning: "Hence, (she cry'd)
nor dare

To interrupt my progress in the rites
With thy capricious rudeness. Shall the priest
The mysteries of Bacchus thus profane,
In his own temple too? and rather pay
To Venus his devotion, than his God?"
Then, haughty as away she turn'd, he grasp'd
Her knees; upon her garments flowing train
Shivering he hung: and with beseeching eyes,
Thus, from th' abundance of his heart, complain'd.

"If pity be no stranger to thy breast,
(As sure it should not to a breast like thine,
Soft as the swanny down!) relenting, hear;
In feelingness of spirit, mildly lend
Attention to the language of my heart,
Sick with o'erflowing tenderness and love,
I love thee with that innocence of truth,
That purity of passion, and desire
Unutterable, of bequeathing up
My heart, my life, my all into thy hands,
Into thy gentle custody---that all.
My heart, my life, are bitterness and weight
Of agony without thee. Since I first,
(By Bacchus' self I swear), beheld that face,
And nameless magic of those radiant eyes,
All the foundation of my peace gave way:
While hopes and fears rose up in bosom-war
To desolate the quiet of my days.
Thy dear idea was my fancy's dream;
It mingled with my blood; and in my veins
Throbb'd, undulating, as my life were stung.
I live but on the thought of thee; my breast
Bleeds in me, with distress to see thee frown.
O smile! by thy dead mother's reverend dust,
By all thy bowels are most fond of, smile,
And chase these heavy clouds of grief away.
I beg by Bacchus; for his sake be kind."

Here, interrupted by the swelling storm
Of passion labouring in his breast, his words
Gave way for sighs and tears to speak the rest.
She, in contemptuous derision, smil'd,
To which her frowns were innocent: and thus:
"Thy staggering pow'r, and thee I scorn alike;
Him I despise, for choosing thee his priest;
Thee, for thy arrogance, and courtship vile."
Indignant he, in wrathful mood (alarm'd
More at his God revil'd, than scorn for him)
First casting on the ground his mitred-crown,
With hands and eyes uplifted, ardent, pray'd;

" Offspring of Jove, Evæ Lyæus, hear !
 If e'er these hands with ivy wreaths thy brow
 Circled, and twining tendrils of the vine :
 If e'er my grateful tongue, big with thy praise,
 Evæ, Lyæus to Bacchus sung :
 If e'er thy servant on thy altars pour'd,
 Copious, the purple wave of offer'd wine,
 And, busy, fed the consecrated fire
 With fat of ass, or hog, or mountain-goat ;
 Devoutly lavish in the sacrifice :
 Avenge thy priest ; this cursed race destroy :
 Thy honours violated thus, avow ;
 Till they confess this staggering pow'r a God."

He pray'd.—Loud peals of thunder shook the fane :

The image, nodding, his petition seal'd ;
 And Bacchus gave the Caledonian race
 To madness, and unutterable woes.

The frantic crowd, as if with wine possest,
 And the strong spirit of the flaming grape,
 To and fro' reel, and stagger to and fro',
 In dithyrambic measures, wild, convolv'd.
 They toss their cymbals, and their torches shake,
 Shrieking, and tear their hair, and gash their flesh,
 And howl, and foam, and wheel the rapid dance
 In giddy maze : with fury then o'erborn,
 Enthusiastic, whirling in despair,
 Flat, drop down dead ; and heaps on heaps expire.

Amaz'd confounded at the raging pest,
 The venerable fathers, in debate,
 To speed inquiring deputies, resolv'd,
 To high Dodona's grove ; with vocal oaks
 Umbrageous, aged, vast, the struggling day
 Excluding : the prime oracle of Greece !

Obsequious, they haste : inquire : return :
 And thus the counsels of the god disclose.

" The rage of Bacchus for his injur'd priest,
 Corefus, by Callirhoe's scorn repuls'd,
 Your city wastes : and with funereal fires
 Your streets shall redden, formidably bright,
 Till by Corefus' hand the cruel maid
 A sacrifice be offer'd up : or one,
 Free, uncompell'd, embrace the destin'd steel,
 Devoted in her stead ; and bleed for her.
 So you'll appease the God ; the plague be stay'd."

They said. Staring affright, and dumb amaze
 The fathers seize : but chief, Æneüs, thee,
 Callirhoe's old miserable fire !
 Tenfold affliction to the grave weighs down
 Thy silver'd hairs. But fate and heav'n require.

Soon through the city spread the news, and soon
 Wounded Callirhoe's ear. Her spindle drops
 Neglected from her hand. Prone on the floor,
 She falls, she faints ; her breath, her colour fled :
 Pale, cold and pale. Till, by assisting care,
 The fragrant spirit hovers o'er her lips,
 And life returning streams in rosy gales ;
 Rekindled only to despair. She knew
 The virgins envy'd ; and the injur'd youth
 Stung with her scorn, wou'd wanton in her wounds,

Nor one, one offer up the willing breast
 A victim for her life. And now the crowd,
 Impatient of their miseries, besiege
 The marble portal ; burst the bolted gates ;

Demand Callirhoe ; furious to obey
 The oracle, and pacify the god.

What pangs, unhappy maid, thy bosom tear,
 Sleepless, and sad ? relenting now too late,
 Thy stubborn cruelty. Corefus' charms
 Blaze on thy mind ; his unexampled love,
 His every virtue rising to thy thought.
 Just in his fury, see the pointed steel Waves, circling o'er thy throbbing breast : He strikes ;

He riots in thy blood with dire delight ;
 Insatiate ! He gluts his heart of rage
 With thy warm gushing life ; and death enjoys,
 Redoubling wound on wound, and blow on blow.

Thus pass'd her hours. And now the dewy morn

The mountains tip'd with gold, and threaten'd day,
 Without the city gates, a fountain wells
 Its living waters, clear as shining glass :
 Haunt of the nymphs ! A cypress' aged arms
 Threw round a venerable gloom, and seem'd
 Itself a grove. An altar on the brink
 Convenient rose : for holy custom wills
 Each victim to be sprinkled with its streams,
 New from pollution, worthier of the god.
 Fierce for the sacrifice Corefus here
 Waited ; and, stimulated with revenge,
 He curs'd and chid the lazy-circling hours
 Too slow, as if injurious to his hate. [claim

But soon the gath'ring crowd and shouts pro-
 Callirhoe near. Her weeping damsels lead
 The destin'd offering, lovely in distress,
 And sparkling through her tears. A myrtle crown
 With roses glowing, and selected green,
 Th' ambrosial plenty of her golden hair
 Entwine : in looks, a Venus ; and a Grace
 In motion. Scarce the flow'rs of sixteen springs
 The fields had painted, since Æneüs first
 Fondled his babe, and blest her on his knee.
 Ev'n mountain clowns, who never pity knew,
 Relented, and the hardest heart wept blood,
 Subdu'd by beauty, though the fatal source
 Of all their misery. What tumults then
 Roll in thy breast, Corefus ! while thy hands
 The purifying waters on her head
 Pour'd trembling ; and the sacred knife unsheath'd !

Wiping the silver-streaming tears away,
 She with a look nor cheerful, nor dismay'd,
 But languishingly sweet, her ruby lips
 Soft op'ning, thus began : " Father and friends,
 Wound me not doubly with your tender grief ;
 I was not born alone for you. My life
 I gladly offer for my country's weal :
 'Tis glory thus to die. Receive my blood,
 Dear native soil ! O may it health restore
 And peace ; and Bacchus' wrath be now appeas'd !
 And thou, Corefus, whom I most have wrong'd,
 Look not so fiercely on me, while the steel
 My once-lov'd bosom lances ; drop a tear ;
 One sigh in mercy heave, and drop one tear,
 And I will thank thee for thy blow. For oh,
 I never hated thee ! but female pride,
 Our sex's curse forbade me to comply ;
 Too easy won !—Then pity me, Corefus ;
 O pity, and, if possible, forgive !"

He answer'd not: but, ardent, snatch'd the knife;
 And running o'er her beauties, strangely wild,
 With eyes which witness'd huge dismay and love,
 "Thus, thus I satisfy the gods!" he cry'd,
 And bury'd in his heart, in his own heart,
 The guilty blade. Then, reeling to her arms,
 He sunk, and groaning, "O Callirhoe!"—dy'd.
 Heav'n rings with shouts, "Was ever love like "this?"

Callirhoe shriek'd: and from the gaping wound,
 Quick as the lightning's wing, the reeking knife
 Wrench'd: In an agony of grief and love,
 Her bosom piercing, on his bosom fell,
 And sigh'd upon his lips her life away.
 Their blood uniting in a friendly stream,
 With bubbling purple stain'd the silver flood,
 Which to the fountain gave Callirhoe's name.

THE DESPAIRING LOVER.

WHEN gloomy November, to nature unkind,
 Both saddens the skies, and oppresses the mind,
 By beauty undone, a disconsolate swain
 Thus sigh'd his despair to the winds and the rain.

"In vain the wind blows, and in vain the rains

 For so fierce is the passion which Stella inspires,
 Not the ocean itself could extinguish its fires.

Why gaz'd ye, my eyes, with such aching delight,
 Till paradise open'd and swam in my sight:
 Yes, paradise open'd, and, oh! to my cost,
 The serpent I found, but the paradise lost.

Heav'n knows with what fondness her heart I address'd,

What passionate tenderness bled in my breast:
 Yet so far was my truth from engaging belief,
 That she frown'd at my vows, though she smil'd
 at my grief.

Sure never was love so ill-fated as mine; [sign?—

At her wit while he wonders to sink in her
 But yet, O my soul, to his friendship be just:
 Let him live on her charms;—I'll go down to the dust.

To the chambers of darkness I gladly will go,
 For the light without her is the colour of woe:
 Come, death, then relieve me, my life I resign,
 Since the arrows of love are less friendly than thine.

Ye virgins of Isis, the fair and the young,
 Whose praises so often have sweet'ned my tongue,
 In pity, when of my sad fate you shall hear,
 Oh, honour my grave with a rose and a tear!

Perhaps the dear beautiful cause of my doom
 May steal, by the star-light, and visit my tomb:
 My ghost, if one sigh shall but heave in her breast,
 Though restless without it, contented will rest.

TO THE AUTHOR OF LEONIDAS: A POEM.

AN EPISTLE.

WARM'D with thy verse, which liberty inspires,
 Which nature forms, and sacred reason fires,
 I pour a tributary lay. Receive
 The honest praise a friend may dare to give.

Most of our poets choose their early theme
 A flow'ry meadow, or a purling stream.
 Thy genius took a flight above the groves,
 The pipe neglected, and the rural loves;
 To godlike Newton's praises swell'd thy lyre,
 Play'd with the light, and grasp'd ethereal fire.
 So the young lyric-lark, on trembling wings,
 O'er meadows warbles, and to shepherds sings;
 The youthful eagle, born to nobler sway,
 Enjoys the sun, and boldly faces day.

Next brave Leonidas, with virtue warm'd,
 The child of heav'n and thee! our wonder charm'd:
 Our wonder and our silence best can tell
 How much he lov'd his Greece, how great he felt,
 His arm how dreadful, how compos'd his mien:
 Fierce as a god, and as a god serene.

Horrid with gold, and formidably bright,
 He lightens and he thunders through the fight;
 With bleeding hills he heaps the groaning plain,
 And crimson torrents mingle with the main.
 At last, collecting all his patriot-fires,
 In the full blaze of liberty expires.

If blest immortals bend their thoughts below,
 (And verse like thine may list'ning angels draw),

What new felt raptures through the hero roll,
 To find his deeds immortal as his soul!
 To shine above each patriot's honour'd name,
 Thron'd in thy verse, the temple of his fame!
 Rich as the pillars which support the skies,
 And bright with wit as heav'n with starry dyes:
 As virtue, firm; as liberty, sublime;
 A monument to mock the rage of time.

Did Homer, say, thy glowing breast inspire
 To sing the Spartan with Athenian fire?
 Or Homer's self revives again in thee:
 For Grecian chiefs and Grecian wit I see.
 His mighty spirit all thy genius guides,
 And o'er thy bosom roll his golden tides.

Blest is thy fancy, which durst first despise
 Gods in machines, and bullies from the skies.
 Nor Ariosto's fables fill thy page,
 Nor Tasso's points, but Virgil's sober rage.
 Pure-temper'd fires an equal light maintain,
 To warm the reason, not to scorch the brain.
 How soft, how strong, thy varied numbers move,
 Or swell'd to glory, or dissolv'd to love.
 Correct with ease, where all the Graces meet,
 Nervously plain, majestically sweet.
 The muses well thy sacrifice repay,
 Attendant warbling in each heavenly lay!

When Ariana grasps th' abhorred dart,
 Each lover bleeds, and feels it in his heart.
 Ah faithful pair! by misery improv'd:
 Who would not die to love as you have lov'd?
 Like Teribazus gladly I could die,
 To draw one tear from dear Ianthé's eye.

One sigh of hers would recompence my breath,
 Would sweeten pain, and sanctify my death.
 O might I, while her eyes inflict the wound,
 Or her soft late dissolves a plaintive sound,
 Might I, while she inhales my latest breath,
 Sink from her arms into the arms of death!
 Then rise (so pure a wish may be forgiven),
 O sweet transition, from her breast to heav'n!

Forgive this fond excursion of my woe;
 Forgive these tears, that will, rebellious, flow;
 Forgive these sighs, that will, unbidden, rise,
 Till death for ever close her from my eyes.
 But thou, blest youth, may thou for ever know
 The chaste endearment, and paternal glow:
 The still, the sacred, the melodious hour,
 The morning closet, and the evening bow'r.
 There, when thy muse shall let her eagle fly,
 And nobly lift a mortal to the sky,
 When all th' inspiring god dilates thy soul,
 And quick ideas kindle as they roll,
 Let British valour thy brave care engage,
 With British valour fire the glorious page.
 Bid Henry's honours in thy poem glow,
 On Edward's immortality bestow.
 Let Agincourt, let Cressy's well-fought plain
 Run purple in thy lines and bleed again;
 Britannia then, no more her sons shall mourn,
 Extinct, forgotten in the silent urn:
 Borne on the wings of verse their names shall rise,
 Dear to the earth, and grateful to the skies.
 Hail, poetry! whose life infusing lays
 Bid time roll back, and sleeping atoms raise;
 Dust into being wake, expand the tomb,
 Dead glory quicken, and restore lost bloom:
 As God, from mortals heighten to divine,
 And give us through eternity to shine!

Glover! thy mind, in various virtue wise,
 Each science claims, and makes each art thy prize.
 With Newton soars, familiar to the sky,
 Looks nature through, so keen thy mental eye,
 Or down descending on the globe below,
 Through humbler realms of knowledge loves to flow.

Promiscuous beauties dignify thy breast,
 By nature happy, as by study blest,
 Thou, wit's Columbus! from the epic throne
 New worlds descry'd, and made them all our own:
 Thou first through real nature dar'd explore,
 And waft her sacred treasures to our shore.

The merchant thus, by heav'nly wisdom led (Each kingdom noted, and each law survey'd),
 On Britain pours what'er can serve mankind,
 Adorn the body, or delight the mind.
 Spices which blow'd in Araby the blest,
 And breath'd a paradise around the east.
 Unclouded sapphires show their azure sky,
 Em'ralds with smiling green refresh the eye:
 Here bleeds the ruby, diamonds sparkle there,
 To tremble on the bosoms of our fair.
 Yet should the sun with tenfold lustre shine,
 Exalt with deeper dyes the flaming mine,
 Should softer breezes and more genial skies
 Bid sweeter spice, in blooming order, rise,
 Nor gems, nor spice, could nature know to name,
 Bright as thy wit, or fragrant as thy fame.

THE NATIVITY.

A COLLEGE-EXERCISE. 1736.

'Twas morn! the fields were sprinkled o'er with light,

The folds unpent sent out their flocks to feed:
 A shepherd boy (young Thomalin he * hight),
 With flying fingers dextly tun'd his reed;
 Where ancient Isis laves the muses' mead
 (Forever smile the mead and flow the stream)!
 He sung the birth of David's holy seed:
 Though low his voice, full lofty was his theme;
 † Wightly his senses all were rapt into a dream.

‡ Eftsoons he spy'd a grove, the season's pride,
 All in the centre of a pleasant glade,
 Where nature flourish'd like a virgin-bride;
 Mantled with green, with hyacinths inlay'd,
 And crystal rills o'er beds of lilies stray'd;
 The blue-ey'd violet and king-cup gay,
 And new blown roses, smiling sweetly red,
 Outglow'd the blushing infancy of day,
 While amorous west winds kist their fragrant souls away.

A rich pavilion rear'd within its height,
 The capitals and freezes gold entire,
 Glist'ning with carbuncles; a various light
 Wav'd tremulous, and set the eye on fire.
 A silken curtain, drawn on silver wire,
 And ting'd with colours of the summer sky,
 Flow'd round, and bade the ruder gales retire.
 Four forms attendant at the portals lie,
 The same Ezekiel saw with keen prophetic eye.

Unlike, O much unlike the strawy shed,
 Where Mary, queen of Heaven, in humblest § lay,
 Where || erst the infant God repos'd his head,
 And deign'd to dwell in tenement of clay;
 The clouded tabernacle of the day!
 The shepherd's dream was mystical, ¶ I ween,
 Isaiah on his bosom pour'd a ray,
 And painted to his eyes the gentle scene,
 Where lions dandled lambs; O peace, thy golden reign!

High-smiling in delight a lady fate.
 Young as the dawning morn, on iv'ry throne;
 Upon her looks the virgin-virtues wait,
 The virgin-virtues wait on her alone!
 Her sapphire eyes with gentle spirit shone:
 Fair bountyhead was open'd in her face,
 Of honour and of love the  paragon!
 A sweet regard and most auspicious grace
 Bespoke her lineage high: She was of David's race.

Upon her lap a lovely infant lay,
 And ken'd the mother by her smiling grace.
 His looks were radiant as the bloom of day,
 And angel sweetness purpled in his face.

To drink her manna and her smiles enjoy;
Young laughing angels "mercy, mercy," sung;
Heav'n echo'd "mercy" back, the spheres with
"mercy" rung.

Thus if the clouds, enroll'd with deadly food,
Forgot to thunder in the ethereal tow'rs,
But silently dissolve in kindly mood,
In fostering dew, and balm, and honey show'rs;
Laugh all the fields for joy, and all the bow'rs.
The shrubs and herbs fresh odours round them

Pop up their smiling heads the little flow'rs,
Warble the birds, exulting on the wing, [sing.
And all the wild-wood notes the genial blessings

High o'er his head was held a starry crown,
Emblem of royalty and princely might:
His priesthood was by golden mitre shown;
An eagle young, with ey'n most piercing bright,

But strangest was to see a bloody hand
Uprear a cross, the cross with blood † bedight:
Ten thousand angels, flutt'ring in a band,
Admir'd the mystic sign but could not understand.

Now dulcet symphonies, and voices meet,
Mellifluous stole upon the shepherd's ear,
Which swell'd so high, and di'd away so sweet,
As might have charm'd a seraph from his sphere.
Happy the swain that § mote such music hear!
Eftsoons a joyous fellowship was seen
Of ladies || gent, and beauties without ¶ peer,
As they a train of goddesses had been,
In manner of a mask, radiant along the green.

Faith led the van, her mantle dipt in blue,
Steady her ken, and gaining on the skies;
Obedient miracles around her flew:
She pray'd, and heav'n burst open on her eyes,
And golden valves roll'd back in wondrous wise:
And now some hill, with all its shaggy load
Of trees and flocks, unto the ocean  hies:
Now wings of cherubs, flaming all abroad,
Careering on the winds in fight upbear their God.

Next hope, the gayest daughter of the sky!

And flocks of sports and joys their temples crown'd,

Humility, in homely weeds array'd,
And by her, in a line, an asses colt she led.

But hark, the jolly pipe, and rural lay!
And see, the shepherd clad in mantle blue,
And shepherdess in russet kirtle gay,
Come dancing on the shepherd-lord to view,
And pay, in decent wise, obeysance due.
Sweet-smelling flow'rs the gentle votaries bring,
Primroses, violets, wet with morning dew,
The sweetest incense of the early spring;
A humble, yet I weet, a grateful offering.

Jocund to lead the way, with sparkling rays,
Danc'd a star-errant up the orient sky;
The new-born splendour streaming o'er the place,
Where Jesus lay in bright humility,
Seem'd a fix'd star unto the wond'ring eye:

And last, triumphant on a purple cloud,
 Fleecy with gold, a band of angels ride :
 They boldly sweep their lyres, and, hymning loud,
 The richest notes of harmony divide ;
 Scarce Thomalin the rapture could abide :
 And ever and anon the babe they eye,
 And through the fleshly veil the God descry'd,
 Shrill hallelujahs tremble up the sky :

 heav'n reply.

They ended : and all nature soon was chang'd !
 O'er diamond pebbles ran the liquid gold :
 And side by side the lamb and lion rang'd
 The flow'ry lawn. The serpent gently roll'd
 His glittering spires, and playful tongue outroll'd
 To lick the infant hand. Together fed
 The wolf and kid, together fought a fold.
 The roses blush'd with more celestial red ;
 Hell groan'd through all her dens ; and grim

THE LOVER.

SINCE Stella's charms, divinely fair,
 First pour'd their lustre on my heart,
 Ten thousand pangs my bosom tear,
 And ev'ry fibre feels the smart.
 If such the mournful moments prove,
 O who would give his heart to love !

I meet my bosom friends with pain,
 Though friendship us'd to warm my soul ;
 Wine's generous spirit flames in vain,
 I find no cordial in the bowl.
 If such the mournful moments prove,
 O who would give his heart to love !

Though nature's volume open lies,
 Which once with wonder I have read,
 No glories tremble from the skies,
 No beauties o'er the earth are spread.
 If such the mournful moments prove,
 O who would give his heart to love !

Ev'n poetry's ambrosial dew
 With joy no longer feed my mind,
 To beauty, music, and the muse,
 My soul is dumb, and deaf, and blind.
 Though such the mournful moments prove,
 Alas ! I give my heart to love.

But should the yielding virgin smile,
 Drest in the spotless marriage robe,
 I'd look upon this world as vile,
 The master of a richer globe.
 If such the rapt'rous moments prove,
 O let me give my heart to love !

The business of my future days,
 My every thought, my every pray'r,
 Shall be employ'd to sing her praise,
 Or sent to bounteous heav'n for her.
 If such the rapt'rous moments prove,
 O let me give my heart to love !

Poets shall wonder at my love,
 Painters shall crowd her face to see,
 And when they would the passions move,
 Shall copy her, and think of me.
 If such the rapt'rous moments prove,
 O let me give my heart to love.

Old age shall burn as bright as youth,
 No respite to our bliss be given :
 Then mingled in one flame of truth,
 We'll spurn at earth, and soar to heav'n,
 Since such the rapt'rous moments prove,
 We both will give our hearts to love.

THE LOVER'S NIGHT.

LULL'D in the arms of him she lov'd
 Lanthe sigh'd the kindest things :
 Her fond surrender he approv'd
 With smiles; and thus, enamour'd, sings.

"How sweet are lover's vows by night,
 Lap'd in a honeyfuckle grove!
 When Venus sheds her gentle light,
 And sooths the yielding soul to love.

Soft as the silent-footed dews
 That steal upon the starlight-hours;
 Warm as a love-sick poet's muse;
 And fragrant as the breath of flow'rs.

To hear our vows the moon grows pale,
 And pants Endymion's warmth to prove :
 While, emulous, the nightingale,
 Thick-warbling trills her lay of love.

The silver-sounding shining spheres,
 That animate the glowing skies,
 Nor charm so much, as thou, my ears,
 Nor bless so much, as thou, my eyes.

Thus let me clasp thee to my heart,
 Thus sink in softness on thy breast!
 No cares, shall haunt us; danger, part,
 For ever loving, ever blest.

Censorious envy dares not blame
 The passion which thy truth inspires:
 Ye stars, bear witness that my flame
 Is chaste as your eternal fires."

Love saw them (hid among the boughs)
 And heard him sing their mutual bliss!
 "Enjoy, cry'd he, lanthe's vows;
 But, oh!—I envy thee her kiss."

TO A FRIEND ON HIS MARRIAGE.

AN ODE.

Auspicious sprung the morning into light,
 By love selected from the golden tide
 Of time, illustrious with peculiar white,
 And mended from the blushes of the bride.

The muse observ'd the fond-approaching hour,
 And thus her Philo's gentle ear address'd.
 "Behold, descending from yon maiden tow'r
 The beauteous object of thy eyes and breast.

Fair issuing, down the hill I see her move,
 Like the sweet morn, in dews and blushes gay:
 You, like the bridegroom sun, her charms approve;
 And warm her dawning glories into day.

I own the radiant magic of her eyes,
 But more the graces of her soul admire;
 Those may lay traps for lovers, fops, and flies,
 But these the husband and the muse inspire.

A husband is a venerable name!
 O happy state, when heart is link'd to heart!
 Nor less the honour of the wedded dame:
 Sweet interchange! which only death can part.

O blest with gentle manners, graceful ease;
 Gay, yet not trifling; serious, yet not grave;
 Skillful, to charm the wits; the wise, to please;
 Though beauteous, humble; and though tender, brave.

Riches and honours wait on either name:
 But they in life are but the last desert:
 Your richer happiness and fairer fame,
 Shall be the good behaviour of the heart.

When such the wonders both of form and mind,
 What rapture fancy'd, reason will approve;
 By time your inclinations be refin'd;
 And youth, be spent in passion; age in love?"

Thus far the muse. When Hymen from the sky,
 The lovers in the band of concord ty'd;
 The Virtues and the Graces too were by,
 And Venus left her cestus with the bride.

TO DR. LINDEN,

ON HIS TREATISE ON CHALYBEATE WATERS.

WITH healing wings, intent on doing good,
 An angel visited Bethesda's flood;
 Quick as the morning ray, or ev'ning beam,
 Himself diffusing through the vital stream:
 The sick who drink, the impotent who lave,
 Dive from diseases, and deceive the grave.

Though miracles are ceas'd, yet all confess,
 Your work, and you, are—only something less.
 So much is to your worth and learning due,
 Bath is Bethesda; the good angel, you.

PARADISE REGAINED:

TO A FRIEND.

LORD of himself, and sole of humankind,
 In rectitude of reason Adam shone:
 Till the still-voice infus'd into his mind,
 "It is not good for man to be alone."

By God's own hand his Virgin-Eve was led.
 Now Paradise with fresher beauties glows:
 The conscious roses form a blushing bed:
 Consenting nature sooths them to repose.

A single is an inconsistent life:
 Completely blest, O friend! to thee is given,
 A sweet, a fair, a wife, a modest wife,
 The bloom of innocence, and blush of heav'n!

May Eden-life in bright succession flow,
 When all was happiness, for love was all:
 Her beauties will a Paradise bestow,
 And both your virtues guard you from a fall.

TO MISS ADDISON.

ON SEEING MR. ROWE'S MONUMENT IN WEST-MINSTER ABBEY.

Erected at the Expence of his Widow.

LATE an applauding people rear'd the stone
 To Shakspeare's honour, and alike, their own.
 A perfect whole, where part consents to part;
 The wonder he of nature, this of art.

And now a wife (ye wits, no more despise
The name of wife) bids Rowe in marble rise.
Smiling, he views her conjugal regard;
A nation's cost had been a less reward:
A nation's praise may vulgar spirits move,
Rowe more deserv'd and gain'd,—a spouſial love.

O Italy! thy injur'd marble keep
Deep in thy bowels, providently deep,
When fools wou'd force it over knaves to weep.
But when true wit and merit claim a ſhrine,
Pour forth thy ſtores and beggar every mine.
They claim them now: for virtue, ſenſe and wit
Have long been fled, and want thy ſuccours—yet:
They claim them now for one,—yes, one I ſee:—
Marble wou'd weep—if Addiſon be he.

O crown'd with all the glories of thy race,
The father's candour, and the mother's grace!
With Rowe, Charlotta! vie, in generous ſtrife,
And let the daughter emulate the wife.
Be juſtly pious; raiſe the honour'd ſtone,
And ſo—deſerve a Rowe, or—Addiſon!

THE MILKMAID.

'Twas at the cool and fragrant hour,
When ev'ning ſteals upon the ſky,
That Lucy ſought a woodbine grove,
And Colin taught the grove to ſigh;
The ſweeteſt damſel ſhe, on all the plains;
The ſoſteſt lover he, of all the ſwains.

He took her by the lily hand,
Which oft had made the milk look pale;
Her cheeks with modeſt roſes glow'd,
As thus he breath'd his tender tale:
The liſt'ning ſtreams awhile forgot to flow,
The doves to murmur, and the breeze to blow.

“O ſmile my love! thy dimply ſmiles
Shall lengthen on the ſetting ray:
Thus let us melt the hours in bliſs,
Thus ſweetly languish life away:
Thus ſigh our ſouls into each other's breaſt,
As true as turtles, and as turtles bleſt!

So may thy cows for ever crown
With floods of milk thy brimming pail;
So may thy cheeſe all cheeſe ſurpaſs,
So may thy butter never fail:
So may each village round this truth declare,
That Lucy is the faireſt of the fair.

Thy lips with ſtreams of honey flow,
And pouring ſwell with healing dew:
More ſweets are blended in thy breath,
Than all thy father's fields diſſuſe:
Though thouſand flow'rs adorn each blooming field,
Thy lovely cheeks more blooming beauties yield.

Too long my erring eyes had rov'd
On city dames in ſcarlet dreſt;
And ſcorn'd the charming village-maid,
With innocence and grogram bleſt:
Since Lucy's native graces fill'd my ſight,
The painted city dames no more delight,

The ſpeaking purple, when you bluſh,
Out-glows the ſcarlet's deepeſt dye;

No diamonds tremble on thy hair,
But brighter ſparkle in thy eye.
Trust me, the ſmiling apples of thy eyes,
Are tempting as were thoſe in Paradife.

The tuneful linnet's warbling notes,
Are grateful to the ſhepherd-ſwain;
To drooping plants, and thirſty fields
The ſilver drops of kindly rain;
To bloſſoms, dew, as bloſſoms to the bee;
And thou, my Lucy! only art to me.

But mark, my love! yon weſtern clouds:
With liquid gold they ſeem to burn:
The ev'ning ſtar will ſoon appear,
And overflow his ſilver urn.
Soft ſtillneſs now, and falling dew invite
To taſte the balmy bleſſings of the night.

Yet e'er we part, one boon I crave,
One tender boon! nor this deny:
O promiſe that you ſtill will love,
O promiſe this! or elſe I die:
Death elſe my only remedy muſt prove;
I'll ceaſe to live, whene'er you ceaſe to love.”

She ſigh'd and bluſh'd a ſweet conſent;
Joyous he thank'd her on his knee,
And warmly preſs'd her virgin-lip.—
Was ever youth ſo bleſt as he!—
The moon, to light the lovers homeward, roſe,
And Philomela lull'd them to repoſe.

THE HAPPY LIFE.

A book, a friend, a ſong, a glaſs,
A chaſte, yet laughter-loving laſs
To mortals various joys impart,
Inform the ſenſe, and warm the heart.

Thrice happy they, who careleſs laid
Beneath a kind-embow'ring ſhade,
With roſy wreaths their temples crown,
In roſy wine their ſorrows drown.

Mean while the Muſes wake the lyre,
The Graces modeſt mirth inſpire,
Good natur'd humour, harmleſs wit;
Well temper'd joys, nor grave, nor light.

Let ſacred Venus with her heir,
And dear Ianthe too be there.
Muſic and wine in concert move
With beauty, and refining love.

There Peace ſhall ſpread her dove like wing,
And bid her olives round us ſpring.
There Truth ſhall reign, a ſacred gueſt!
And Innocence, to crown the reſt.

Begone, ambition, riches, toys,
And ſplendid cares, and guilty joys.—
Give me a book, a friend, a glaſs,
And a chaſte, laughter-loving laſs.

THE BEE.

LEAVE, wanton bee, thoſe bloſſoms leave,
Thou buzzing harbinger of ſpring,

To Stella fly, and sweeter spoils
Shall load thy thigh, and gild thy wing.

Her cheeks, her lips with roses swell,
Not Paphian roses deeper glow;
And lilies o'er her bosom spread
Their spotless sweets, and balmy snow.

Then, grateful for the sacred dews,
Invite her, humming round, to rest;
Soft dreams may tune her soul to love,
Though coldness arm her waking breast.

But if she still obdurate prove,
O shoot thy sting.—The little smart
May teach her then to pity me
Transfix'd with love's and beauty's dart.

Ah no, forbear, to sting forbear;
Go, fly into thy hive again.
Much rather let me die for her,
Than she endure the least of pain.

Go fly into thy hive again,
With more than Hybla honey blest:
For Pope's sweet lips prepare the dew,
Or else for love a nectar feast.

THE MORNING LARK.

ANACREONTIC.

FEATHER'D lyric! warbling high,
Sweetly gaining on the sky,
Op'ning with thy matin lay
(Nature's hymn)! the eye of day,
Teach my soul, on early wing,
Thus to soar, and thus to sing.

While the bloom of orient light
Gilds thee in thy tuneful flight,
May the day spring from on high,
Seen by faith's religious eye,
Cheer me with his vital ray,
Promise of eternal day!

ANNA MARIA W*DF*RD*!

"Go Anna! (nature said) to Oxford go:
(Anna! the fairest form and mind below,
Blest with each gift of nature and of art
To charm the reason, or to fix the heart.)
Go with a sprightly wit and easy mien,
To prove the Graces four, the Muses ten.
I see the wits adore, the wise approve,
Ev'n sops themselves have almost sense to love.
When poets would describe a lip or eye,
They'll look on thee and lay their Ovids by.
I see a love sick youth, with passion fir'd,
Hang on thy charms, and gaze to be inspir'd.
With asking eyes explain his silent woes,
Glow as he looks, yet tremble as he glows:
Then drunk with beauty, with a warmer rage,
Pour thy soft graces through the tragic page.
He sighs;—he bleeds;—to twilight shades he flies:
Shakspeare he drops, and with his Otway dies.

* Written in a window at the Three Tuns Tavern,
Oxford, May 29. 1738.

This pomp of charms you owe to me alone,
The charms which scarce six thousand years have known.

That face, illumin'd softly by the mind;
That body, almost to a soul refin'd;
That sweetness, only to an angel giv'n;
That blush of innocence, and smile of heav'n!
I bade thy cheeks with morning purple glow;
I bade thy lips with nectar spirit flow;
I bade the diamond point thy azure eyes,
Turn'd the fine waist, and taught the breast to rise.
Whether thy silver tides of music roll,
Or pencil on the canvas strikes a soul,
Or curious needle pricks a band or heart,
At once a needle, and at once a dart!
All own that nature is alone thy art.
Why thus I form'd thy body and thy mind
With sumless graces, prodigally kind:
The reason was,—but you in time will know it;—
One is, but that's the least—to make a poet.

THE MAGI.

A SACRED ECLOGUE.

No more in beauty's praise my numbers more,
Nor melt away in dying falls of love:
A Child on earth, yet heaven's Eternal King,
The manger'd God, the Virgin's Son I sing.
Thou Fountain-good, with light my soul o'erflow,
With hallow'd ardour bid my bosom glow!
Fir'd at the promise of thy dawning ray,
The eastern sages found celestial day.

Drawn by a leading flame, with sweet surprise,
The infant Deity salutes their eyes.
The Heir-elect of Love his mother prest,
Smil'd in her arms, and wanton'd on her breast.
No jewels sparkle here, nor India's stores
The portals brighten or emblaze the doors.
But young ey'd seraphims around him glow,
And Mercy spreads her many colour'd bow!
Her bow, compos'd of new created light,
How sweetly lambent and how softly bright!
The sacred circle of embodied rays
The cradle crowns, and round his temples plays.
So shines the rainbow round th' eternal throne
To shade the Holy, Holy, Holy One.
By turns the ruby bleeds a beam, by turns,
Smiles the green emerald, and the topaz burns:
The various opal mingles every ray,
Fades into faintness, deepens into day:
Promiscuous lustre kindles half the skies,
Too slippery bright for keen seraphic eyes.
The venerable Three, low bending down,
Extend their offerings and the Godhead own.

MAG. I.

From eastern realms, where first the infant light
Springs into day and streaks the fading night,
To thee we bend, before the morning rise;
A purer morning trembles from thy eyes.

MAG. II.

In vain the sun with light his orb arrays,
Our sense to dazzle, and as God to blaze;
Through his transparent fallacy we see,
And own the sun is but a star to Thee.

MAG. III.

Thou spotless Essence of primeval light,
Thy vassals own, and wash thy Æthiops white.
Thy cloud of sable witnesses adorn
With the first roses of thy smiling morn.

MAG. I.

By bards foretold the ripen'd years are come,
Gods fall to dust and oracles are dumb.
Old ocean murmurs from his oozy bed,
"A maid has born a Son, and Pan is dead."

MAG. II.

The nymphs, their flow'r-inwoven tresses torn,
O'er fountains weep, in twilight thickets mourn.
Long, hollow groans, deep sobs, thick screeches fills
Each dreary valley, and each shaded hill.

MAG. III.

No more shall Memphian timbrels wake the
morn,
No more shall Hammon lift his gilded horn.
From hence in vain shall Belzebub rebel,
Anubis howls, and Moloch sinks to hell.

MAG. I.

Here lows a bull; a golden gleam adorns
The circling honours of his beamy horns.
He safely lows, nor fears the holy knife,
No sacrifice from hence shall drink his life.

MAG. II.

Ye gardens, blush with never fading flow'rs,
For ever smile ye meads, and blow ye bow'rs:
Bleat all ye hills, be whiten'd all ye plains;
O earth rejoice: th' Eternal Shepherd reigns.

MAG. III.

Ye lilies, dip your leaves in falling snow,
Ye roses, with the eastern scarlet glow,
To crown the God: ye angels haste to pour
Your rain of nectar, and your starry show'r.

MAG. I. Offers Gold.

The ore of India ripens into gold,
To gild thy courts, thy temple to infold.
Accept the emblematic gift; again
Saturnian years revolve a golden reign!

MAG. II. Offers Frankincense.

For thee Arabia's happy forests rise,
And clouds of odours sweetly stain the skies.
While fragrant wreaths of smoking incense roll,
Receive our pray'rs, the incense of the soul!

MAG. III. Offers Myrrh.

The weeping myrrh with balmy sorrow flows,
Thy cup to sweeten and to sooth thy woes:
So prophets sing; for (human and divine)
The Man was born to grieve, the God to shine.

MAG. I.

Smile Sacred Infant, smile: thy rosy breast
Excels the odours of the spicy east;
The burnish'd gold is dross before thy eye,
Thou God of sweetness, God of purity!

MAG. II.

Ye planets, unregarded walk the skies,
Your glories lessen as his glories rise;
His radiant word with gold the sun attires,
The moon illumines, and lights the starry fires.

MAG. III.

Hail, Lord of Nature, hail! To thee belong
My song, my life,—I give my life, my song:

Walk in thy light, adore thy day alone,
Confess thy love, and pour out all my own.

ON MR. POPE'S WORKS.

WRITTEN SOON AFTER HIS DEATH.

MAN not alone hath end: In measur'd time,
(So Heav'n has will'd) together with their snows,
The everlasting hills shall melt away:
This solid globe dissolve, as ductile wax
Before the breath of Vulcan, like a scroll
Shrivel th' unfolded curtains of the sky;
Thy planets, Newton, tumble from their spheres,
That lead harmonious on their mystic rounds:
The moon be perish'd from her bloody orb;
The sun himself, in liquid ruin, rush
And deluge with destroying flames the globe.—
Peace then, my soul nor grieve that Pope is dead.

If e'er the tuneful spirit, sweetly strong,
Spontaneous numbers, teeming in my breast,
Enkindle; O, at that exalting name,
Be favourable, be propitious now,
While in the gratitude of praise, I sing
The works and wonders of this man divine.

I tremble while I write.—His lisping muse
Surmounts the loftiest efforts of my age.
What wonder? when an infant, he apply'd
The loud * Papinian trumpet to his lips,
Fir'd by a sacred fury, and inspir'd
With all the god, in sounding numbers sung
"Fraternal rage, and guilty Thebes' alarms."

Sure at his birth (things not unknown of old)
The Graces round his cradle wove the dance,
And led the maze of harmony: the Nine,
Prophetic of his future honours, pour'd
Plenteous, upon his lips Castalian dew;
And Attic bees their golden store distill'd.
The soul of Homer, sliding from its star,
Where, radiant, over the poetic world
It rules and sheds its influence, for joy
Shouted, and bless'd the birth: the sacred choir
Of poets, born in elder, better times,
Enraptur'd, catch'd the elevating sound,
And roll'd the gladning news from sphere to sphere.

O listen to † Alexis' tender plaint!
How gently rural! without coarseness, plain;
How simple in his elegance of grief!
A shepherd, but no clown. His every lay
Sweet as the early pipe along the dale,
When hawthorns bud, or on the thymy brow.
When all the mountains bleat, and vallies sing,
Soft as the nightingale's harmonious woe,
In dewy even tide, when cowslips drop
Their sleepy heads, and languish in the breeze.

‡ Imperial Windsor! on thy brow august,
Superbly gay, exalt thy tow'ry head;
(Much prouder of his verse than of thy stars)
And bid thy forests dance, and nodding, wave
A verdant testimony of thy joy:
A native Orpheus warbling in thy shades.

* Translation of the first book of Statius's Thebais.
† Pastorals.

‡ Windsor Forest. Mr. Pope born there.

* Next, in the critic chair survey him thron'd,
Imperial in his art, prescribing laws
Clear from the knitted brow, and squinted sneer;
Learn'd, without pedantry; correctly bold,
And regularly easy. Gentle, now,
As rising incense, or descending dews,
The variegated echo of his theme:
Now, animated flame commands the soul
To glow with sacred wonder. Pointed wit
And keen discernment form the certain page.
Just, as the Stagyrite; as Horace, free;
As Fabian, clear; and as Petronius gay.

† But whence those peals of laughter shake the sides

Of decent mirth? Am I in Fairy-land?
Young, evanescent forms, before my eyes,
Or skim, or seem to skim; thin essences
Of fluid light, sylphs, sylphids, elves and gnomes;
Genii of Rosieruce, and ladies' gods!—
And lo, in shining trails, Belinda's hair,
Bespangling with dishevel'd beams the skies,
Flames o'er the night. Behind, a satyr grins
And, jocund, holds a glass, reflecting fair, Hoops, crosses, mattadores; beaux, shocks, and belles,

Promiscuously whimsical and gay.

Taffoni, hiding his diminish'd head, [skulks,
Droops o'er the laughing page: while Boileau
With blushes cover'd, low beneath the desk.

‡ More mournful scenes invite. The milky vein
Of amorous grief devolves its placid wave
Soft streaming o'er the soul, in weeping woe
And tenderness of anguish. While we read
Th' infectious page, we sicken into love,
And languish with involuntary fires.

The zephyr, panting on the silken buds
Of breathing violets; the virgin's sigh,
Rosy with youth, are turbulent and rude,
To Sappho's plaint, and Eloisa's moan.

Heav'n's! what a flood of empyreal day
My aching eyes involves! a § temple soars,
Rising like exhalations, on a mount,
And, wide, its adamantine valves expands.
Three monumental columns, bright in air,
Of figur'd gold, the centre of the quire
With lustre fill. Pope on the midmost shines
Betwixt his Homer and his Horace plac'd,
Superior by the hand of justice. Fame,
With all her mouths th' eternal trumpet swells,
Exulting at his name; and, grateful, pours
The lofty notes of never-dying praise,
Triumphant, floating on the wings of wind,
Sweet o'er the world: th' ambrosial spirit flies
Diffusive, in its progress wid'ning still,
“Dear to the earth, and grateful to the sky.”
Fame owes him more than e'er she can repay:
She owes her very temple to his hands;
Like Ilium built; by hands no less divine!

Attention, rouse thyself! the master's hand,
(The master of our souls!) has chang'd the key,
And bids the thunder of the battle roar

Tumultuous*. Homer, Homer is our own!
And Grecian heroes flame in British lines.
What pomp of words! what nameless energy
Kindles the verse; invigours every line;
Astonishes, and overwhelms the soul
In transport tost! When fierce Achilles raves,
And flashes, like a comet, o'er the field,
To wither armies with his martial frown;
I see the battle rage; I hear the wheels
Careering with their brazen orbs! the shout
Of nations rolls (the labour of the winds)—
Full on my ear, and shakes my inmost soul.
Description never could so well deceive:
'Tis real! Troy is here, or I at Troy
Enjoy the war. My spirits, all on fire,
With unextinguish'd violence are borne
Above the world, and mingle with the gods.
Olympus rings with arms! the firmament,
Beneath the light'ning of Minerva's shield,
Burns to the centre: rock the tow'rs of heav'n.
All nature trembles! save the throne of Jove!—
Have mercy, Pope, and kill me not with joy:
'Tis tenfold rage, an agony of bliss!
Be less a god, nor force me to adore.

† To root excesses from the human breast,
Behold a beauteous pile of Ethic's rise;
Sense the foundation; harmony the walls
(The Doric grave, and gay Corinthian join'd)
Where Socrates and Horace jointly reign.

Best of philosophers! of poets too
The best! He teaches thee thyself to know:
That Virtue is the noblest gift of heav'n:
“And vindicates the ways of God to man.”

O hearken to the moralist polite!
Enter his school of truth, where Plato's self
Might preach, and Tully deign to lend an ear.

‡ Last see him waging with the fools of rhyme
A wanton, harmless war. Duncie after duncie,
Beaux, doctors, templars, courtiers, sophs, and cits,
Condemn'd to suffer life. The motley crew,
Emerging from oblivion's muddy pool,
Give the round face to view, and shameless front
Proudly expose, till laughter have her fill.

Born to improve the age, and cheat mankind
Into the road of honour!—Vice again
The gilded chariot drives:—for he is dead!

I saw the fable barge, along his Thames,
In slow solemnity beating the tide,
Convey his sacred dust!—Its swans expir'd,
Wither'd in Twit'nam bow'rs the laurel bough;
Silent the muses broke their idle lyres:
Th' attendant graces check'd the sprightly dance,
Their arms unlock'd, and catch'd the starting tear,
And virtue for her lost defender mourn'd!

§ Francis Thompson, B. D. sen. Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, and Vicar of Brough 32 years. He departed this life, Aug. 31. 1735. aged 70.

His life inspir'd with every better art,
A learned head, clear soul, and honest heart.
Each science chose his breast her favourite seat,
Each language, but the language of deceit.
Severe his virtues, yet his manners kind,
A manly form, and a seraphic mind.
So long he walk'd in virtue's even road,
In him at length, 'twas natural to do good.
Like * Eden, his old age (a Sabbath rest):
Flow'd without noise, yet all around him blest!
His patron, Jesus! with no titles grac'd,
But that best title, a good parish priest.
Peace with his ashes dwell. And, mortals, know,
The saints above; the dust alone below.
The wise and good shall pay their tribute here,
The modest tribute of one thought and tear,
Then pensive sigh, and say, "To me be given
By living thus on earth, to reign in heaven."

EPITAPH ON MY † MOTHER.

In the Parish Church of Brough, Westmoreland.

HERE rests a pattern of the female life,
The woman, friend, the mother, and the wife.
A woman form'd by nature, more than art,
With smiling ease to gain upon the heart.
A friend as true as guardian-angels are,
Kindness her law, humanity her care.
A mother sweetly tender, justly dear,
Oh! never to be nam'd without a tear.
A wife of every social charm possess'd,
Blessing her † husbands—in her husbands blest.
Love in her heart, compassion in her eye,
Her thoughts as humble, as her virtues high.
Her knowledge useful, nor too high, nor low,
To serve her maker, and herself to know.
Born to relieve the poor, the rich to please,
To live with honour, and to die in peace.
So full her hope, her wishes so resign'd,
Her life so blameless, so unstain'd her mind,
Heav'n smil'd to see, and gave the gracious nod,
Nor longer wou'd detain her from her God.

WRITTEN IN THE HOLY BIBLE.

YE sacred tomes, be my unerring guide,
Dove-hearted saints, and prophets eagle-ey'd!
I scorn the moral fop, and ethic sage,
But drink in truth from your illumin'd page:
Like Moses-bush each leaf divinely bright,
Where God invests himself in milder light!
Taught by your doctrines we devoutly rise,
Faith points the way, and hope unbars the skies.
You tune our passions, teach them how to roll,
And link the body but to raise the soul;
To raise it, bear it to mysterious day,
Nor want an angel to direct the way!

ON A PRESENT OF THREE ROSES, FROM IANFHE.

THREE roses to her humble slave
The mistress of the Graces gave:
Three roses of an eastern hue,
Sweet-swelling with ambrosial dew.
How each, with glowing pride, displays
The riches of its circling rays!
How all, in sweet abundance, shed
Perfumes, that might revive the dead!
Now tell me, fair one, if you know,
Whence these balmy spirits flow?
Whence springs this modest blush of light
Which charms at once and pains the sight?
The fair one knew, but wou'd not say,
So blush'd and smiling went her way.
Impatient, next the muse I call;
She comes, and thus wou'd answer all.
"Fool (and I sure deserv'd the name),
Mark well the beauties of the dame,
And can you wonder why so fair,
And why so sweet the roses are?
Her cheek with living purple glows
Which blush'd its rays on every rose;
Her breath exhal'd a sweeter smell
Than fragrant fields of asphodel;
The sparkling spirit in her eyes
A kindlier influence supplies
Than genial suns and summer skies.
Now can you wonder why so fair,
And why so sweet the roses are?"
"Hold, tuneful trisler, I reply'd,
The beauteous cause I now descry'd;
Hold, talk no more of summer skies,
Of genial suns and—splendid lies;
Of fragrant fields of asphodel,
And brightest rays and sweetest smell;
Whatever poetry can paint,
Or muse can utter—all is faint:
Two words had better all express;—
"She took the roses from—her breast."

THE WEDDING MORN.

A DREAM.

'Twas morn: But Theron still his pillow prest;
(His Annabella's charms improv'd his rest.)
An angel form, the daughter of the skies,
Descending blest; or seem'd to bless his eyes;
White from her breast a dazzling vestment roll'd,
With stars bespangled and celestial gold.
She mov'd, and odours, wide, the circuit fill'd;
She spake, and honey from her lips distill'd.
"Behold, illustrious comes, to bless thy arms,
Thy Annabella, breathing love and charms!
O melting mildness, undissembled truth!
Fair flow'r of age yet blushing bloom of youth!
Fair without art, without design admir'd,
Prais'd by the good, and by the wise desir'd.
By art and nature taught and form'd to please,
With all the sweet simplicity of ease.
In public courteous—for no private end;
At home—a servant; and abroad—a friend."

Her gentle manners, unaffected grace,
And animated sweetness of her face,
Her faultless form, by decency refin'd,
And bright, un sullied sanctity of mind,
The Christian graces breathing in her breast,
Her—whole shall teach thee to be more than blest.

'Tis virtue's ray that points her sparkling eyes,
Her face isauteous for her soul is wise.
As from the sun refulgent glories roll,
Which feed the starry host and fire the pole,
So stream upon her face the beauties of her soul,
Though the dove's languish melts upon her eye,
And her cheeks mantle with the eastern sky,
When seventy on her temples sheds its snow,
Dim grow her eyes and cheeks forget to glow,
Good nature shall the purple loss supply,
Good sense shine brighter than the sparkling eye:
Inauteous order round and round shall move,
Love cool'd by reason, reason warm'd by love.

Receive Heav'n's kindest blessing! And regard
This blessing as thy virtue's best reward.
When beauty wakes her fairest forms to charm,
When music all her pow'rs of sound to warm,
Her golden floods when wanton freedom rolls,
And plenty pours herself into our bowls;
When with tumultuous throbs our pulses beat,
And dubious reason totters on her seat,
The youth how steady, how resolv'd the guide,
Which stems the full luxuriant, pleasing tide!
For these, and virtues such as these is giv'n
Thy Annabella! O'belov'd of Heav'n!—
Hail marriage! everlasting be thy reign!
The chain of being is thy golden chain.
From hence mankind, a growing race depend,
Began with nature, shall with nature end.
The mists, which stain'd thy lustre, break away,
In glory lessen, and refine to day:

No more the jest of wits, of fools the scorn,
Which God made sacred, and which priests adorn.

Ascend the bed, while genial nature pours
Her balmy blessings round and nectar show'rs.
And lo! the future opens on my eyes,
I see soft buds and smiling flow'rs arise:
The human blossoms every charm display,
Unfold their sweets, and beautify the day.
The father's virtues in the sons combine;
The mother's graces in the daughters shine.
So where an angel spreads his dovelike wing,
Young laurels sprout, and tender myrtles spring;
Sweet dews descending consecrate the ground,
And opens a new Paradise around!

I see!—But here the scenes which blaz'd behind
Her fancy dazzled, and dissolv'd his mind.
He woke: yet still he thinks he sees and hears;
Till real sounds salute his ravish'd ears:

"—Arise! the bride invites thee to be blest?"

He rose.—But silence only speaks the rest.

ODE BRUMALIS:

Heu veris ætas occidit aurea,
Ætatis atque argentea, et ærea
Recessit autumnus, severæ
Ferreæ solæ Hyemis remansit.

Sic vita transit nostra! volantibus
Urgetur horis. Quid sapiens agat,
Quid ergo prudens? Ille, certè,
Dona rapit fugientis horæ,

Gratus deorum cultor. Hyemis virum,
Quem lavit Isis, flumen Apollinis,
Quem Suada puro melle fovit,
Intrepidum feriet procellis.

Nigrescat æther, pectore candido
Pax alba ridet: mugiat Africus,
Eurusque; tu, tranquilla virtus,
Vere tumens, zephyros reduces.

Tranquilla virtus, nescia criminis,
Te, amice, munit, tectum adamantino
Thorace; te non atra bilis
Mente quatit placidâ Novembris.

Nec me November mente hilari quatit,
Tristesque menses: fallitur improba
Vel cura musis, vel choreis,
Dulcè vices subeunte Baccho.

Horatiani pocula nunc Meri
Grato ore libo, digna labris Jovis!
Nunc intimas et suave nectar

Garrickus urget, dramatis arbiter!
Decore, gestu, voce, vultu
Ille oculos capit, ille mentes.

Odi profanos, pace tuâ, jocos,
Vanburge,—odi: me gravis attrahit
Shakspeare, Cothurnati per ævum
Omne pater, columenque regni.

Heus!—deme foccos:—alta tragoedia
Jubet:—Cothurnos induit aureos:—
Orchestra, majestate adaucta,
Sub pedibus Gradientis horret.

Quod fulmen aures non imitabile
Et corda sternit: Terror amabilis
Pervadit intus nos:—Othello!—
En rabido tonat ore Othello!

Proh! quantus iræ gurgēs inæstuat
Spumatque venis! ut tumet in minas!
Quam splendide bacchatur excors!
Ah! gemit—ah! trepidat—ruensque,

Et quis vetabit quò minùs audeam
Lusus amico mittere cum joco!
Ridere mens est; terra ridet;
Ipse Venus negat esse tristes,

Jucunda veris diva. Quid ampliùs
Rugæ juvabunt? Versicoloribus
En maius alis raptus afflat
Lætitiâ genialis auræ.

Amice! (blando hoc nomine te vocem,
O Woode)? cum quo sæpè per Iſidis

Errare sylvas, nuncque cantu
Nuncque mero licuit morantes

Duxisse soles in Thetidis toros,
Amice! quæ te gaudia floreis
Cingunt coronis? Quæquæ molles
Nympha caput lepidum remulcet

Inter lacertos? Nùm charitum chorus,
Chorive Pindi tempora dividit?
Sunt ambo grati; mense Maii
Quin charites meliùs colantur.

Nunc dulce pietis desipere in toro
Herbis tument, vivus ubi tremor
Splendescit undæ; si poëtæ,
Siquæ aderint, tua cura, musæ.

Adsit jocorum grata protervitas,
Thalia pleno quos tibi depluit
Cornu: nec absit Bacchus, uvæ,
Evohe! purpureus magister.

Handalus omnes tendere barbiti
Nervos labore; nec fileat piacens
Iantha cantu, dum jocosus
Tangit ebur geniale plectro.

Audite, cœli! num modulaminis
Tales triumphos aula refert Jovis
Stellata? Spherarumve tales
Lucidus et numerosus ordo?

O lene murmur! cum Venus aurea
Inire somnos, strata rosis, parat,
Melosque poscit; talis Aura
Idalias tremit inter umbras.

Quæ flamma venis pasta! protentibus
Seccumbo victus blanditiis lyræ:
Succumbo victus voce, vultu,
Crine nigro, niveoque collo,

Sic prata sævis florea solibus
Oppressa languent. Ferte, citò, precor,
Lenimen ægro: fertè rores
Metcassi medicos, sodales!

Frustrâ: nec unquam metcassi Manus
Extinguet ignes, docta licet, meos;
Nec flumen, ah! vestri benignis
Ingenii recreabit undis.

THE LIFE OF CAWTHORN.

JAMES CAWTHORN was born at or near Sheffield, in Yorkshire, in 1721. Of the circumstances and profession of his father, there is no account. He received his education partly at Rotherham in Yorkshire, and partly at Kirkby-Lonsdale in Westmoreland. Whether he was indebted to either of the universities for any part of the literature he possessed, is uncertain. His epitaph gives him the degree of Master of Arts; but his name does not appear in either of the lists of graduates.

His first employment was that of Usher, at the school of one Mr. Clare, in the city of London, whose sister he married. His wife died before him.

In 1743, he was chosen Master of Tunbridge School, by the Skinner's Company of London; of which the founder, Sir Andrew Judd, a native of Tunbridge, and Lord Mayor of London, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, was a freeman.

It must always afford satisfaction to see those public establishments, which the piety of former times has provided for the education of youth, conducted in such a manner as to answer the intention of the donors.

In this respect, the Company of Skinners deserve particular commendation; as a retrospection for many years will show, that their choice has generally fallen on men of very distinguished and eminent abilities.

Cawthorn is very advantageously known to the world by his poetical compositions; and Dr. Knox, the present respectable Master of Tunbridge School, ranks as a writer of popular essays, moral and critical, serious and humorous, with Addison, Steele, Johnson, Moore, Hawkesworth, and Goldsmith.

It is equally honourable to Cawthorn, and to the Company of Skinners, that, in conjunction with his patrons, he founded a library, which is annexed to that seminary.

Before his appointment to the mastership of Tunbridge School, he appears to have taken orders; but neither the time of his ordination, nor the place where he was beneficed, have been ascertained.

He had an early turn for poetry; and as it was his custom to affix to his juvenile pieces the place where, and the year, day, and age of his life when they were written, some of them are dated Kirkby-Lonsdale, in 1735.

In 1746, he wrote The Equality of Human Conditions, a poetical dialogue, spoken at the visitation of Tunbridge School.

The same year, he published his poem of Abelard to Eloisa, with some introductory verses, addressed to a young lady; which, with two sermons, was all that he printed in his life time.

In 1749, he addressed an ethic epistle, on the Vanity of Human Enjoyments, to Lyttleton, whose patronage he courted, with the other poets of that time.

Of the following twelve years of his life, little is known that can be related with certainty.

He was killed by a fall from his horse, as he was going to bespeak the music on some occasion, from Tunbridge Wells, April 15. 1761, in the 40th year of his age; and was buried in Tunbridge Church.

Over his remains is the following inscription:

Hic situs est
JACOBUS CAWTHORN, A. M.
Scholæ Tunbrigienfis magister
Qui juventuti tum moribus, tum literis instituenda;
Operam magno, non sine honore dedit
Opibus, quas larga manu distribuit
Fruitur, & in æternum fruetur
Obiit, heu citius! Aprilis 15. 1761,
Ætatis 40.
Sorum mœsta ex grato animo hoc posuit.

His Poems were collected and published in one volume 4to, 1771; but, by an unpardonable neglect in the editor, without any information concerning his life, family connections, or even the times and places of his birth and death.

This indifference towards a person so respectable as an author, and so deserving as a man, is much to be lamented; and, for the sake of posterity as well as the present times, it is to be wished, that those who are acquainted with any particulars concerning him, would communicate them to some repository where they might be reserved for the use of future biographers.

An anonymous writer in the "St. James's Chronicle," of April 25. 1771, informed the public, that the first piece in this collection was not originally composed by Cawthorn, but by Pitt, the translator of Virgil; and is to be found at page 120, of the poems published by him in 1727.

To this charge of unfair dealing, the editor asserted, in his own vindication, that the poem was really selected from a number of Cawthorn's juvenile pieces in his possession, in his own handwriting. "So, I had not," say he, "the least reason to suppose that it was copied, especially as there are several others, in the same collection, which (if we may believe Mr. Cawthorn) can belong to no other author: For, at the close of one poem, which is called A Meditation, dated Kirkby-Lonsdale, January 30. 1735, he says, "this essay, as well as the other pieces of divine poetry, was composed in the hurry of imagination, without any regard to connection, which is excusable in a person whose judgment, by reason of his years, is deficient. I chose rather this kind of poetry, since the pens of the most celebrated writers have been employed in other matters. They were designed for my private amusement, and to unbend the mind when engaged in works of not so agreeable a nature."

According to this account, the editor does not positively deny the piece in question to be Pitt's; he only declares his having known nothing of the matter previously to the publication of Cawthorn's poems; and consequently, if the poem proved to be Pitt's, the insertion of it among Cawthorn's pieces, is a circumstance very different from intentional plagiarism.

The poems contained in that collection, have been reprinted, together with some pieces which had been omitted, in the edition of "The English Poets," 1790.

Cawthorn is said to have been in the general intercourse of life, generous and friendly; but, in the conduct of his school, singularly harsh and severe. He had some extraordinary foibles. With little skill in horsemanship, he was fond of hunting; and with no acquaintance with music, he was an admirer of concerts and operas. He has been known to ride to London from Tunbridge, in order to be present at a musical performance, though he was under the necessity of being back by seven o'clock the next morning.

As a poet, his compositions are characterised by energy, enthusiasm, and melody, more than ease, elegance, and correctness. He had a lively imagination; but his judgment was not equal to his fancy; and his most finished productions discover an incorrectness of taste. He formed himself upon Pope, as a model of heroic verse; and, it is saying much for him, that he frequently wrote like his master. He has copied his pauses, cadence, cast of diction, and the mechanism and construction of his verse, with a felicity of imitation that has few examples.

But he could not long maintain Pope's easy elegance, nor keep up to the free and unwearied spirit that he breathed. He has the faults of his master; but not all his sublime beauties, and more animated graces. His versification, though flowing and harmonious, is too artificial and uniform, and sometimes elaborated into obscurity. His pauses are anticipated by the ear; and the regular recurrence of the words every and all, especially the latter, in almost every line, produces a tiresome monotony.

His Epistle from Abelard to Eloisa, is the most popular of his productions. It is reckoned little inferior to Partisan's celebrated letter, or Pope's admirable "Eloisa." It certainly contains many strong lines, much passion, and animated expression; but the hand of the perfect master was wanting to dispose the colours and chastise the piece. A third "epistle from Abelard to Eloisa," was published by Mr. Warwick in 1782, which is not a mere copy; and could the exquisite "Epistle from Eloisa to Abelard," be for a while forgotten, it might be thought not a second-rate performance. His Lady Jane Grey to Lord Guilford Dudley, is another beautiful example of that species of writing epistles under feigned characters, which it is no small merit in Ovid to have invented. The subject is one of the most striking in the English annals; and the circumstances of distress, the various turns of passion, and the different sentiments with which Lady Jane is agitated, are finely worked up, without any remarkable deviation from history.

The Elegy on Captain Hughes, is one of the most highly finished, and certainly the most interesting of his shorter pieces. It is exquisitely animated and tender, but not without some pretty, rather than pathetic sentiments, and some obscure and some careless lines. The present writer thinks he has seen a more correct copy of this elegy, than that which is printed in the collection of "The English Poets," in some of the Miscellanies; and has ventured, from memory, to mark the variations, which appear to him to be essential improvements. The sixth line from the beginning, in particular, seems to him to be quite unintelligible.

Forgets the port before he grasps the lyre,
He thinks it should be

Forgets the poet ere he grasps the lyre.

The apostrophe to Nature, in the line immediately following, he thinks should be to Friendship. The subsequent alterations are too numerous to be specified.

His Regulation of the Passions, a moral essay, has great merit in many places. The end of Suffolk strongly reminds us of Pope's Buckingham. The idea of a moral economy from painting, exemplified in Rembrandt, is happily imagined. The concluding images are beautiful and just.

Let all thy passions like his colours play,
Strong without harshness, without glaring, gay,
Contrast them, curb them, spread them, or confine,
Ennoble these, and those forbid to shine.
With cooler shades, ambition's fire allay,
And mildly melt the pomp of pride away :
Her rainbow robe from vanity remove,
And soften malice with the smile of love :
Bid o'er revenge, the charities prevail,
Nor let a grace be seen without a veil ;
So shalt thou live as Heaven itself design'd,
Each pulse congenial with th' informing mind ;
Each action station'd in its proper place,
Each virtue blooming with its native grace,
Each passion vigorous to its just degree ;
And the fair whole a perfect symmetry.

In his Essay on Taste, many of our modern follies, particularly the Chinese taste in building and laying out grounds, are ridiculed with no less propriety than poetry. To avoid these follies, he advises us to follow nature in our improvements.

Examine nature with the eye of taste,
Mark where she spreads the lawn, or pours the rill,
Falls in the vale, or breaks upon the hill ;
Plan as she plans ; and where her genius calls,
There sink your grottos, and there raise your walls.

In his Life Unhappy, because we use it improperly, a moral essay, he draws the idea of a moral economy, from music, as he had done before from painting, which is finely exemplified in Handel.

The Essay on Nobility, spoken at the visitation of Tunbridge School, in 1752, is replete with manly sentiments, and indignant satire. It is a pleasure to find

"———amidst the titled crew, Unknown to all but Collins and the stew ;"

the name of a late illustrious and lamented statesman, who was more ennobled by his private virtues and constitutional principles, than by his hereditary titles. Twelve years of unfortunate political dissension, since his death, have already written his eulogium.

" Admire how innocence can lend to truth,
Each grace of virtue, and each charm of youth ;
And then enraptur'd bend the suppliant knee
To heav'n's high throne, O Rockingham ! for thee."

His Epistle on the Vanity of Human Enjoyments, is written with his usual flow of melodious versification, and pleasing illustration. The distinguished names of Cudworth, Halley, and Desaguliers, are produced as examples of the inutility of genius and science to their possessors. The lines which record their glory, and their country's shame, are selected; because the facts, particularly those relating to Dr. Desaguliers, are little known, and are equally interesting to curiosity, learning, and benevolence.

" Ask at yon tomb, where Cudworth's mighty name
Weeps o'er the ruins of his wit and fame;
Cudworth, whose spirit flew, with sails unfurl'd,
Through each vast empire of th' ideal world,
Pierc'd through the mystic shades o'er nature thrown,
And made the soul's immensity his own.
Yet though his system wit and science fir'd,
Though Wilmot trembled, and though Hobbes expir'd,
Mistaken zeal, mad bigotry conspire,
All Turner's dullness, and all Oxford's fire,
All envy's poisons, all a nation's rage,
And all hell's imps to blast th' unfinish'd page.

Much injur'd shade, to truth, to virtue dear,—
Be calm, ye wirlings! and, ye zealots! hear:
And, while this bright intelligence pervades
Th' ideal world, and rises o'er the shades,
His mines of wisdom, if you can explore,
Then shut the volume, and be vain no more.—

Immortal Halley! thy unwearied soul
On wisdom's pinion flew from pole to pole,
Th' uncertain compass to its task restor'd,
Each ocean fathom'd, and each wind explor'd,
Commanded trade with ev'ry breeze to fly,
And gave to Britain half the Zemblian sky.

And see, he comes, distinguish'd, lov'd, carest,
Mark'd by each eye, and hugg'd to ev'ry breast;
His godlike labours wit and science fire,
All factions court him, and all sects admire:
While Britain, with a gratitude unknown
To ev'ry age but Nero's and our own,
A gratitude that will for ever shame
The Spartan glory, and th' Athenian name—
Tell it, ye winds! that all the world may hear—
Blest his old age with—ninety pounds a year.

Are these our triumphs? these the sums we give
To ripen genius, and to bid it live?
Can Britain in her fits of madness pour
One half her Indies on a Roman whore,
And still permit the weeping muse to tell
How poor neglected Desaguliers fell?
How he, who taught two gracious kings to view
All Boyle ennobled, and all Bacon knew,
Died in a cell, without a friend to save,
Without a guinea, and without a grave?"

If the merit of this Epistle, and his Moral Essays, is to be estimated by the just information they contain, and the important truths they establish, it is unquestionably very considerable. They abound also in beautiful imagery, and splendid poetical embellishments of many kinds; but they are fuller of delicate sentiment, philosophical reflection, and moral satire, than of imagery, figures, and poetry.

His Prussia is a spirited panegyric poem, on the victories of the late King of Prussia, whose literary, legislative, and warlike accomplishments, are the boast and admiration of the present age. His Tales have a considerable portion of the ease, humour, and familiarity which distinguish the productions of Prior; but do not add much to his reputation.

Cawthorn, it must be acknowledged, has bestowed too much attention on inferior poetical ornaments; but, when every deduction is made which criticism requires, his compositions will be found to display that pregnancy of invention, that exquisite sensibility, and that genuine enthusiasm, which are the invaluable sanctions bestowed by nature on every real poet.

THE WORKS OF CAWTHORN.

TO MISS _____, OF HORSEMANDEN, IN KENT.

WHEN wit and science trimm'd their wither'd bays, [rays,
At Petrarch's voice, and beam'd with half their
Some heaven-born genius, panting to explore
The scenes oblivion wish'd to live no more,
Found Abelard in grief's sad pomp array'd,
And call'd the melting mourner from the shade.
Touch'd by his woes, and kindling at his rage,
Admiring nations glow'd from age to age;
From age to age the soft infection ran,
Taught to lament the hermit in the man;
Pride dropt her crest, ambition learn'd to sigh,
And dove-like pity stream'd in ev'ry eye.

Sick of the world's applause, yet fond to warm
Each maid that knows with Eloise to charm,
He asks of verse to aid his native fire,
Refines, and wildly lives along the lyre;
Bids all his various passions throb anew,
And hopes, my fair, to steal a tear from you.

O blest with temper, blest with skill to pour
Life's ev'ry comfort on each social hour!
Chaste as thy blushes, gentle as thy mien,
Too grave for folly, and too gay for spleen;
Indulg'd to win, to soften, to inspire,
To melt with music, and with wit to fire;
To blend, as judgment tells thee how to please,
Wisdom with smiles, and majesty with ease;
Alike to virtue as the graces known,
And proud to love all merit but thy own!

These are thy honours, these will charms supply,
When those dear suns shall set in either eye;
While she, who, fond of dress, of paint, and place,
Aims but to be a goddess in the face;
Born all thy sex illumines to despise,
Too mad for thought, too pretty to be wise,
Haunts for a year fantastically vain,
With half our fribbles dying in her train;
Then sinks, as beauty fades and passion cools,
The scorn of coxcombs, and the jest of fools.

ABELARD TO ELOISA.

FIRST PUBLISHED 1747.

ARGUMENT.

ABELARD and Eloisa flourished in the twelfth century: they were two of the most distinguished persons of their age, in learning and beauty; but for nothing more famous than for their unfortunate passion. After a long course of calamities, they retired each to a several convent, and consecrated the remainder of their days to religion. It was many years after this separation, that a letter of Abelard's to a friend, which contained the history of his misfortunes, fell into the hands of Eloisa: this occasioned those celebrated letters (out of which the following is partly extracted), which give so lively a picture of the struggles of grace and nature, virtue and passion.

POPE.

AH! why this boding start? this sudden pain,
That wings my pulse, and shoots from vein to vein!

What mean, regardless of yon midnight bell,
These earth-born visions saddening o'er my cell!
What strange disorder prompts these thoughts to glow,

These sighs to murmur, and these tears to flow?
'Tis she, 'tis Eloisa's form restor'd,
Once a pure saint, and more than saints ador'd:
She comes in all her killing charms confess'd,
Glares through the gloom, and pours upon my breast, [move,

Bids heaven's bright guard from Paraclete re-
And drags me back to misery and love.

Enjoy thy triumphs, dear illusion! see
This sad apostate from his God to thee;
See, at thy call, my guilty warmth return,
Flame through my blood, and steal me from my urn.

Yet, yet, frail Abelard! one effort try,
Ere the last lingering spark of virtue die;
The deadly charming sorceress controul,
And, spite of nature, tear her from thy soul.

Long has that soul, in these unsocial woods,
Where anguish muses, and where sorrow broods,
From love's wild visionary wishes stray'd,
And sought to lose thy beauties in the shade.
Faith dropp'd a smile, devotion lent her fire,
Woke the keen pang, and sanctified desire;
Led me enraptur'd to the blest abode,
And taught my heart to glow with all its God.
But O, how weak fair faith and virtue prove,
When Eloisa melts away in love!
When her fond soul, impassion'd, rapt, unveil'd,
No joy forgotten, and no wish conceal'd,
Flows through her pen as infant-softness free,
And fiercely springs in ecstasies to me!
Ye heavens! as walking in yon sacred fane,
With every seraph warm in every vein,

Just as remorse had rous'd an aching sigh,
And my torn soul hung trembling in my eye,
In that kind hour thy fatal letter came,
I saw, I gaz'd, I shiver'd at the name;
The conscious lamps at once forgot to shine,
Prophetic tremors shook the hallow'd shrine;
Priests, censers, altars, from thy genius fled,
And heav'n itself shut on me while I read.

Dear smiling mischief! art thou still the same,
The still pale victim of too soft a flame?
Warm as when first, with more than mortal shine,
Each melting eye-ball mix'd thy soul with mine?
Have not thy tears, for ever taught to flow,
The glooms of absence, and the pangs of woe,
The pomp of sacrifice, the whisper'd tale,
The dreadful vow yet hov'ring o'er thy veil,
Drove this bewitching fondness from thy breast,
Curb'd the loose wish, and form'd each pulse to rest?

And canst thou still, still bend the suppliant knee
To love's dread shrine, and weep and sigh for me?
Then take me, take me, lock me in thy arms,
Spring to my lips, and give me all thy charms.
No—fly me, fly me, spread th' impatient sail,
Steal the lark's wing, and mount the swiftest gale;
Skim the vast ocean, freeze beneath the pole,
Renounce me, curse me, root me from thy soul;
Fly, fly, for justice bares the arm of God,
And the grasp'd vengeance only waits his nod.

Are these thy wishes? can they thus inspire?
Does frenzy form them, or does grace aspire?
Can Abelard, in hurricanes of zeal,
Betray his heart, and teach thee not to feel?
Teach thy enamour'd spirit to disown
Each human warmth, and chill thee into stone?
Ah! rather let my tenderest accents move
The last wild accents of unholy love;
On that dear bosom trembling let me lie,
Pour out my soul, and in fierce raptures die,
Rouse all my passions, act my joys new.
Farewell, ye cells! ye martyr'd saints, adieu!
Sleep, conscience! sleep, each awful thought be drown'd,

And sevenfold darkness veil the scene around.

What means this pause, this agonizing start,
This glimpse of heav'n quick rushing through my heart?

Methinks I see a radiant cross display'd—
A wounded Saviour bleeds along the shade:
Around th' expiring God bright angels fly,
Swell the loud hymn, and open all the sky.
O save me, save me, ere the thunders roll,
And hell's black caverns swallow up my soul!

Return, ye hours! when, guiltless of a stain,
My strong-plum'd genius throbb'd in every vein;
When, warm'd with all th' Egyptian fanes inspir'd,
All Athens boasted, and all Rome admir'd;
My merit in its full meridian shone,
Each rival blushing, and each heart my own.
Return, ye scenes!—Ah no! from fancy fly,
On time's stretch'd wing, till each idea die,
Eternal fly; since all that learning gave,
Too weak to conquer, and too fond to save,
To love's soft empire every wish betray'd,
And left my laurels with'ring in the shade.

Let me forget that, while deceitful fame
Grasp'd her shrill trump, and fill'd it with my name,
Thy stronger charms, empower'd by heaven to move

Each saint, each blest insensible to love,
At once my soul from bright ambition won,
I hugg'd the dart, I wish'd to be undone:
No more pale science durst my thoughts engage,
Inspid dulness hung on every page;
The midnight-lamp no more enjoy'd its blaze,
No more my spirit flew from maze to maze:
Thy glances bade philosophy resign
Her throne to thee, and every sense was thine.

But what could all the frosts of wisdom do,
Oppos'd to beauty, when it melts in you?
Since these dark, cheerless, solitary caves,
Death-breathing woods, and daily opening graves,
Mishapen rocks, wild images of woe,
For ever howling to the deeps below;
Ungential deserts, where no vernal show'r [flow'r;
Wakes the green herb, or paints th' unfolding
Th' embrowning glooms these holy mansions shed,
The night-born horrors brooding o'er my bed,
The dismal scenes black melancholy pours
O'er the sad visions of enanguish'd hours;
Lean abstinence, wan grief, low-thoughted care,
Distracting guilt, and, hell's worst fiend, despair,
Conspire in vain, with all the aids of art,
To blot thy dear idea from my heart.

Delusive, sightless God of warm desire!
Why wouldst thou wish to set a wretch on fire?
Why lives thy soft divinity where woe
Heaves the pale sigh, and anguish loves to glow?
Fly to the mead, the daisy-painted vale,
Breathe in its sweets, and melt along the gale;
Fly where gay scenes luxurious youths employ,
Where ev'ry moment steals the wing of joy:
There may'st thou see, low prostrate at thy throne,
Devoted slaves, and victims all thy own;
Each village-swain the turf-built shrine shall raise,
And kings command whole hecatombs to blaze.

O memory! ingenious to revive
Each fleeting hour, and teach the past to live,
Witness what conflicts this frail bosom tore!
What griefs I suffer'd! and what pangs I bore!
How long I struggled, labour'd, strove to save
An heart that panted to be still a slave! [flame,
When youth, warmth, rapture, spirit, love, and Seiz'd every sense, and burnt through all my frame;

From youth, warmth, rapture, to these wilds I fled,
My food the herbage, and the rock my bed.
There, while these venerable cloisters rise
O'er the bleak surge, and gain upon the skies,
My wounded soul indulg'd the tear to flow
O'er all her sad vicissitudes of woe;
Profuse of life, and yet afraid to die,
Guilt in my heart, and horror in my eye,
With ceaseless pray'rs, the whole artill'ry giv'n
To win the mercies of offended Heav'n,
Each hill, made vocal, echoed all around,
While my torn breast knock'd bleeding on the ground.

Yet, yet, alas! though all my moments fly,
Stain'd by a tear, and darken'd in a sigh,

Though meagre fasts have on my cheeks display'd
The dusk of death, and sunk me to a shade,
Spite of myself the still-impoisoning dart
Shoots through my blood, and drinks up all my heart:

My vows and wishes wildly disagree,
And grace itself mistakes my God for thee. [sky,

Athwart the glooms that wrap the midnight-
My Eloisa steals upon my eye;
For ever rises in the solar ray,
A phantom brighter than the blaze of day.

Where'er I go, the visionary guest
Pants on my lip, or sinks upon my breast;
Unfolds her sweets, and, throbbing to destroy,
Winds round my heart in luxury of joy;
While loud hosannas shake the shrines around,
I hear her softer accents in the sound;
Her idol-beauties on each altar glare,
And heav'n much injur'd has but half my pray'r:
No tears can drive her hence, no pangs controul,
For ev'ry object brings her to my soul.

Last night, reclining on yon airy sleep,
My busy eyes hung brooding o'er the deep;
The breathless whirlwinds slept in ev'ry cave,
And the soft moon-beam danc'd from wave to wave;

Each former bliss in this bright mirror seen,
With all my glories, dawn'd upon the scene,
Recall'd the dear auspicious hour anew,
When my fond soul to Eloisa flew;
When, with keen speechless agonies oppress'd,
Thy frantic lover snatch'd thee to his breast,
Gaz'd on thy blushes, arm'd with ev'ry grace,
And saw the goddess beaming in thy face;
Saw thy wild, trembling, ardent wishes move
Each pulse to rapture, and each glance to love.
But lo! the winds descend, the billows roar,
Foam to the clouds, and burst upon the shore,
Vast peals of thunder o'er the ocean roll,
The flame-wing'd lightning gleams from pole to pole.

At once the pleasing images withdrew,
And more than horrors crowded on my view:
Thy uncle's form, in all his ire array'd,
Serenely dreadful, stalk'd along the shade:
Pierc'd by his sword I sunk upon the ground,
The spectre ghastly smil'd upon the wound;
A group of black infernals round me hung,
And toss'd my infamy from tongue to tongue.

Detested wretch! how impotent thy age!
How weak thy malice! and how kind thy rage!
Spite of thyself, inhuman as thou art,
Thy murdering hand has left me all my heart;
Left me each tender, fond affection warm,
A nerve to tremble, and an eye to charm.
No, cruel, cruel, exquisite in ill!
Thou thought'st it dull barbarity to kill;
My death hath robb'd lost vengeance of her toil,
And scarcely warm'd a Scythian to a smile:
Sublimar furies taught thy soul to glow
With all their savage mysteries of woe;
Taught thy unfeeling poniard to destroy
The powers of nature, and the source of joy;
To stretch me on the racks of vain desire,
Each passion throbbing, and each wish on fire;

Mad to enjoy, unable to be blest,
Fiends in my veins, and hell within my breast.

Aid me, fair faith! assist me, grace divine!
Ye martyrs! bless me, and, ye saints! refine:
Ye sacred groves! ye heav'n-devoted walls!
Where folly sickens, and where virtue calls;
Ye vows! ye altars! from this bosom tear
Voluptuous love, and leave no anguish there:
Oblivion! be thy blackest plume display'd
O'er all my griefs, and hide me in the shade;
And thou, too fondly idoliz'd! attend
While awful reason whispers in the friend.
Friend, did I say! Immortals! what a name!
Can dull, cold friendship own so wild a flame?
No; let thy lover, whose enkindling eye
Shot all his soul between thee and the sky,
Whose warmth bewitch'd thee, whose unhallow'd
song

Call'd thy rapt ear to die upon his tongue,
Now strongly rouse, while heav'n his zeal inspires,
Diviner transports, and more holy fires;
Calm all thy passions, all thy peace restore,
And teach that snowy breast to heave no more.

Torn from the world, within dark cells immur'd,
By angels guarded, and by vows secur'd,
To all that once awoke thy fondness dead,
And hope, pale sorrow's last sad refuge, fled;
Why wilt thou weep, and sigh, and melt in vain,
Brood o'er false joys, and hug th' ideal chain?
Say, canst thou wish that madly wild to fly
From yon bright portal opening in the sky,
Thy Abelard should bid his God adieu,
Pant at thy feet, and taste thy charms anew?
Ye heav'ns! if, to this tender bosom woo'd,
Thy mere idea harrows up my blood;
If one faint glimpse of Eloise can move
The fiercest, mildest agonies of love;
What shall I be, when, dazzling as the light,
Thy whole effulgence flows upon my sight?
Look on thyself, consider who thou art,
And learn to be an abbess in thy heart.
See, while devotion's ever melting strain
Pours the loud organ through the trembling fane,
Yon pious maids each earthly wish disown,
Kiss the dread cross, and crowd upon the throne:
O let thy soul the sacred charge attend,
Their warmths inspirit, and their virtues mend:
Teach every breast from every hymn to steal
The cherub's meekness, and the seraph's zeal;
To rise to rapture, to dissolve away
In dreams of heav'n, and lead thyself the way;
Till all the glories of the blest abode
Blaze on the scene, and every thought is God.
While thus thy exemplary cares prevail,
And make each vestal spotless as her veil,
Th' eternal spirit o'er thy cell shall move
In the soft image of the mystic dove;
The longest gleams of heavenly comfort bring,
Peace in his smile, and healing on his wing;
At once remove affliction from thy breast,
Melt o'er thy soul, and hush her pangs to rest.

O that my soul, from love's curst bondage free,
Could catch the transports that I urge to thee!
O that some angel's more than magic art
Would kindly tear the hermit from his heart!

Extinguish every guilty sense, and leave
No pulse to riot, and no sigh to heave.
Vain, fruitless wish! still, still the vig'rous flame
Bursts, like an earthquake, through my shatter'd
frame;

Spite of the joys that truth and virtue prove,
I feel but thee, and breathe not but to love;
Repent in vain, scarce wish to be forgiv'n,
Thy form my idol, and thy charms my heav'n.

Yet, yet, my fair! thy nobler efforts try,
Lift me from earth and give me to the sky;
Let my lost soul thy brighter virtues feel,
Warm'd with thy hopes, and wing'd with all thy zeal.

And when, low-bending at the hallow'd shrine,
Thy contrite heart shall Abelard resign;
When pitying Heav'n, impatient to forgive,
Unbars the gates of light and bids thee live;
Seize on th' auspicious moment ere it flee,
And ask the same immortal boon for me.

Then when these black terrific scenes are o'er,
And rebel nature chills the soul no more;
When on thy cheek th' expiring roses fade,
And thy last lustres darken in the shade;
When arm'd with quick varieties of pain,
Or creeping dully flow from vein to vein,
Pale death shall set my kindred-spirit free,
And these dead orbs forget to doat on thee;
Some pious friend, whose wild affections glow
Like ours in sad similitude of woe,
Shall drop one tender, sympathizing tear
Prepare the garland, and adorn the bier;
Our lifeless relics in one tomb enshrine,
And teach thy genial dust to mix with mine.

Meanwhile, divinely purg'd from every stain,
Our active souls shall climb th' ethereal plain,
To each bright cherub's purity aspire,
Catch all his zeal, and pant with all his fire;
There, where no face the glooms of anguish wears,
No uncle murders, and no passion tears,
Enjoy with heav'n eternity of rest,
For ever blessing, and for ever blest.

AN ELEGY

TO THE MEMORY OF CAPTAIN HUGHES,

A particular friend of the Author's.

VAIN were the task to give the soul to glow,
The nerve to kindle, and the verse to flow;
When the fond mourner, hid from ev'ry eye,
Bleeds in the anguish of too keen a sigh;
And, lost to glory, lost to all his fire,
Forgets the port before he grasps the lyre.

Nature! 'tis thine with manly warmth to mourn:
Expiring virtue, and the closing urn;
To teach, dear seraph! o'er the good and wise
The dirge to murmur, and the bust to rise. 10

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 6, 7.

Forgets the poet ere he grasps the lyre.

Friendship! 'tis thine with manly warmth to mourn;

Come then, O guiltless of the tear of art!
Sprung from the sky, and thron'd within the heart!
O come, in all the pomp of grief array'd,
And weep the warrior, whilst I grace the shade.

'Tis o'er—the bright delusive scene is o'er,
And war's proud visions mock the soul no more;
The laurel fades, th' imperial car retires,
All youth ennobles, and all worth admires.

Alas! my Hughes! and must this mourning verse
Resign thy triumph to attend thy hearse! 20

Was it for this that friendship's genial flame
Woke all my wishes from the trance of fame?
Was it for this I left the hallow'd page,
Where ev'ry science beams of ev'ry age; [scene,
On thought's strong pinion rang'd the martial
From Rome's first Cæsar to the great Eugene;
Explor'd th' embattled van, the deep'ning line,
Th' enambush'd phalanx, and the springing mine;
Then, pale with horror, bent the suppliant knee,
And heav'd the sigh, and dropp'd the tear for
thee! 30

What boots it now, that when, with hideous roar,
The gath'ring tempest howl'd from ev'ry shore,
Some pitying angel, vigilant to save, [wave?
Spread all his plumes, and snatch'd thee from the Preserv'd thee sacred from the fell disease, [breeze?
When the blue plague had fir'd th' autumnal
Ah! when my hero panted to engage
Where all the battle burst in all its rage;
Where dreadful flew the missive deaths around,
And the mad faulchion blush'd from wound to wound; 40

Was he deny'd the privilege to bleed,
Sav'd on the main to fall upon the Tweed?

Ye Graces! tell with what address he stole
The list'ning ear, and open'd all the soul. [rise,
What though rough winter bade his whirlwinds
Hid his pale suns, and frown'd along his skies,
Pour'd the big deluge on the face of day,
My Hughes was here to smile the glooms away,
With all the luxuries of sound to move
The pulse of glory, or the sigh of love, 50
And, spite of winter, lassitude, or pain,
Taught life and joy to throb in ev'ry vein.

Fancy! dear artist of the mental pow'r!

Fly,—fetch my genius to the social hour;
Give me again his glowing sense to warm,
His song to warble, and his wit to charm.

Alas! alas! how impotently true

Th' ærial pencil forms the scene anew!

E'en now, when all the vision beams around,

And my ear kindles with th' ideal sound— 60

Just as the Smiles, the Graces live impress,

And all his image takes up all my breast—

Ver. 61.

Just as the Smiles, the Graces are impress,

Some gloomy phantom brings the awful bier,
And the short rapture melts into a tear.

Thus in the lake's clear crystal we descry
The bright diffusion of a radiant sky—
Reflected nature sheds a milder green;
While half her forests float into the scene.
Ah! as we gaze the luckless zephyr flies,
The surface trembles, and the picture dies. 70

O blest with all that youth can give to please,
The form majestic, and the mien of ease,
Alike empower'd by nature, and by art,
To storm the rampart, and to win the heart;
Correct of manners, delicate of mind,
With spirit humble, and with truth refin'd;
For public life's meridian sunshine made,
Yet known to ev'ry virtue of the shade;
In war, while all the trumps of fame inspire,
Each passion roving, and each wish on fire; 80
At home, without or vanity, or rage;
As soft as pity, and as cool as age.

These were thy virtues—these will still be just,
Light all their beams, and blaze upon thy dust;
While pride in vain solemnity bequeaths
To pow'r her statues, and to guilt her wreathes:
O, warm'd by faction, impudently flings
The price of nations on the urns of kings.

THE EQUALITY OF HUMAN CONDITIONS:

A POETICAL DIALOGUE:

Spoken at the Annual Visitation of Tunbridge School, 1746,

BY MESSRS. M— AND A—.

M—.

WHILE airy Belville, guiltless of a school,
Shines out a French edition of a fool,
Studies his learned tailor once a week,
But curses ev'ry syllable of Greek;
I sit, and think o'er all that Sparta fir'd,
That Athens boasted, and that Rome admir'd.
Enraptur'd fancy, busied with the theme,
Forms ev'ry bright idea to a dream,
Paints all the charming pageantry anew,
And brings at once each classic to my view.

Now, fondly wild, I thunder in the war,
Shake the keen spear, and mount th' imperial car;
With daring Regulus to Carthage run,
Or nobly bleed with Brutus in a son;
Seize, Casca-like, on Caesar's gorgeous vest,
And boldly plant a dagger in his breast.
Now, softly breathing all the Muse's fire,
I drop the faulchion, and I grasp the lyre;
With Pindar's pinion skim the blest abode,
Or strive to charm Augustus with an ode.

Come then, my Lelius! come, my joy and pride! [guide;
Whose friendship soothes me, while thy precepts
Thou, whose quick eye has glanc'd through every age,

View'd ev'ry scene, and studied ev'ry page;
Teach me, like thee, with ev'ry virtue blest,
To catch each eye, and steal to ev'ry breast;
To rise to all that in each patriot shone,
And make each hero's happiness my own.

Say, shall I, with a triumph in my view, [sue;
Fame's air-dress'd goddess through each scene pur-
Ambitious court her in the pomp of war,
And number every trophy by a scar?
Shall I, with Solon, form the moral plan,
And aim to mould a savage to a man?
Or, pleas'd to rival every Grecian sage,
Glean Plato's sense, and copy Homer's rage.

A—.

You ask me, Sir! what few would care to give,
Some grave instructions how you ought to live.
You wish that envied blissful scene to find,
That charms the taste, and dignifies the mind;
That nobly mingles every art to please,
And joins the majesty of life to ease.

Hear then, my friend! the doctrine I disclose,
As true as if display'd in pompous prose;
As if Locke's sacred hand the page had wrote,
And every doctor stamp'd it with a vote.

All lots are equal, and all states the same,
Alike in merit, though unlike in name.
In reason's eye no difference lies between Life's noon-day lustres or her milder scene.
'Tis not the plate that dignifies the board,
Nor all the titles blazing round a lord;
'Tis not the splendid plume, th' embroider'd vest,
The gorgeous sword-knot, or the martial crest,
That lends to life the smile, the jest, the glee,
Or makes his honour happier than me.

When Florio's acres stretch'd o'er half the land,
A gilded chariot roll'd him through the strand:
Reduc'd at last with humbler scenes to mix,
He smok'd a speculative pipe at Dick's.
The same great genius, in or out of pow'r—
Ease smooth'd his brow, and soften'd ev'ry hour;
Taught him to live as happy in a shed,
As when a duchess grac'd his nuptial bed.

Content's the port all mortals wish to hail:
She points the compass, and she guides the sail.
To her alone our leaky vessels roll
Through all the seas that rage from pole to pole.
What boots it then, when gath'ring storms behind
Rise black in air, and howl in ev'ry wind,
That thy rich ship a pomp of pride display'd,
Her masts all cedar, and her sails brocade!

Say, canst thou think the tempest will discern
A silken cable, or a painted stern;
Hush the wild tumult that tornados bring,
And kindly spare the yacht that holds a king?
No, no, my friend! if skilful pilots guide,
And Heav'n auspicious calms the whirling tide,
No winds distress you, and no storm destroys,
Whether you sail in gondolas or hoys.

M—.

What, has just Heav'n no slight distinction made
Betwixt a life of sunshine and of shade?
Must I, in silence, this wild system own,
And think a cottage equal to a throne?
Sure if I did, my friends would soon bestow
A few stout cords, and send me to Monro.

Your tailor, skill'd in fashion's ev'ry grace,
Decks you in all the pageantry of lace,
Lives in a cell, and eats from week to week,
An homely meal of cabbage and ox-check.
You walk majestic in a nobler scene,
Guiltless of ev'ry anguish, but the spleen;
With all the luxury of statesmen dine
On daily feasts of ortolans and wine.
Then tell me, sir! if this description's true,
Is not your tailor less at ease than you?

Hardwicke, great patriot! envy'd, lov'd, carest,
Mark'd by each eye, and hugg'd to ev'ry breast;
Whose bright example learns us to admire
All Cowper's graces, and all Talbot's fire—
Firm to his trust, whatever bribes assail,
Truth guides his sword, and justice holds his scale.
Say, is not he more happy than the throng
Of beardless templars melting o'er a song?
Than him, who, buried in a country town,
Engrosses half a folio for a crown.

Heroic glory in the martial scene
Spread ev'ry plume to dignify Eugene—
On Marlbro's helmet sat, in all her pride,
And proudly frown'd at all the world beside.
And sure you'd think it a most sad disgrace
If ensigns liv'd as easy as his grace.

A—.

Dear Sir! restrain the prejudice of youth,
And calmly listen to the voice of truth.
When first th' Almighty fire his work began,
And spoke the mingling atoms into man,
To all the race with gracious hand was giv'n
One common forest, and one equal heav'n;
They shar'd alike this universal ball,
The sons of freedom, and the lords of all.
The poets too this sacred truth display'd,
From cloud-tipt Pindus to the Latian shade.
They sung that ere Pandora, fond of strife,
Let loose each embryo-misery of life,
All nature brighten'd in one golden age,
Each fire a monarch, and each son a sage;
Eternal blessings flow'd to all the race,
Alike in riches, as alike in place.

Suppose then, Sir, that new distinctions since
Have plac'd a slave some leagues below a prince;
Yet ease and joy, dispassion'd reason owns,
As often visit cottages as thrones.

See! in yon valley, while the mellowing grain
Embrowns the slope, and nods along the plain,
A crowd of rustics, doom'd to daily toil,
Disarm the forest, or enrich the soil;

Not in that elegance of dress array'd
That charm'd Arcadia's hills, and Tempe's shade;
Where Thyrsis, shelter'd in some happier grove,
The lonely scene of solitude and love,
His breast all rapture, and his soul on fire,
Now wove the garland, and now swept the lyre;
No,—'tis plain Colin, Hobbinol, and Ned,
Unskill'd in numbers as in books unread,
Who scorn the winter's deadly blast to shun,
But face the storm, and drudge through ev'ry sun;
Then seek the cottage, where the homely bowl
Smooths ev'ry brow, and opens ev'ry soul;
Speeds the same social warmth from breast to
breast,

And bids them laugh at Verres and his crest.

When honest Colin sees the shining all
That gilds the 'Change, and dignifies Whitehall,
Lost in the scenes of turbulence and strife,
The farce of grandeur, and the pomp of life,
He steals impatient to his native shade,
And longs to grasp his waggon and his spade;
Heedless of ev'ry charm, of ev'ry grace,
That forms the goddess in Fitzwalter's face,
That lends to Finch her majesty of mien—
He would not change his Susan for a queen.

Believe me, Sir! distinction, pomp, and noise,
Corrupt our tempers, as they cloud our joys:
And surely, when the social spirit's broke,
A star's a gewgaw, and a lord's a joke.
Without those robes, those gorgeous bagatelles,
That deck our nobles, and that charm our belles;
Without a crane-neck'd chariot's smooth career;
Without the wealth of Indus in your ear;
Without a group of pictures dearly bought,
Where Titian's colours vie with Guido's thought;
Without the fruits of Spain, the wines of France;
Without an opera, and without a dance;
You may live happy, as grave doctors tell,
At Rome, at Tunbridge, in a grot or cell.

From sky to sky th' imperial bird of Jove
Spreads his broad wing, and thund'ring grasps his
The mighty bull, by genial zephyr sway'd, [love;
Enraptur'd courts his heifer to the shade;
The feather'd warblers pair on ev'ry spray,
The grove re-echoing with the sprightly lay;
While the gay tribe of insects blissful share
The joys of love, and people all the air.
All, all that in the depths of ocean lie,
Graze on the plain, or skim along the sky,
Fondly pursue the end by nature giv'n,
Life all their aim, and quiet all their heav'n.

If then no songsters grudge the bear his thigh,
The hound his nostril, or the lynx his eye;
Nor feel a pang though Afric's shaggy brood
Majestic stalk the monarchs of the wood;
Why should you think your solitude a tomb,
If Pulteney has a title and a plumb?

M—.

But soft—restrain this turbulence of war,
This mimic image of the wordy bar;
Lest you should seem to copy Henry's lore,
Who gravely kills objections by the score.

Behold that wretch, by every woe distress'd,
Want in his eye, and horror in his breast;
A thousand nameless agonies of pain
Rack ev'ry nerve, and burn through ev'ry vein;

He lives to suffer, and but speaks to moan,
And numbers every minute by a groan.
Is he then happy? blest with every joy
That glows on Cecil's cheek, or Dorset's eye?
Shall we proclaim him blest, without rebuke,
And rank a martyr'd beggar with a duke?

A—

Believe me, Sir, each mortal has his fear,
Each soul an anguish, and each eye a tear;
Aches, pains, and fevers, every breast assail,
And haunt alike the city and the vale.

What though in pomp your painted vessels roll,
Fraught with the gems that glare from pole to pole,—

Though health auspicious gilds your every grace,
Nerves the strong limb, and blushes o'er the face;
Though grac'd with all that dignity of wit
That charm'd in Villars, and now charms in Pitt;
Possess'd of all the eloquence that hung
On Tully's lip, and drops from Murray's tongue;
Though all the titles, coronets, and stars,
That statesmen aim at, and that Malton bears,
Enrich your 'scutcheon, dignify your crest,
Beam on your coach, and blaze upon your breast;
Can they forbid the secret ill to glow,
The pang to torture, or the tear to flow?

Confess we then that all the ills of life,
Diseases, grief, vexations, follies, strife,
Without distinction every soul perplex,
Haunt ev'ry scene, and prey on all the sex.
Yet let us own that every pleasure too
That glads the active, and that wings the flow,
Alike indulgent to the rich and poor,
Glides through the land, and knocks at ev'ry door.

Hear then, without the specious pride of art,
A truth that strikes the moral to the heart;
A truth that liv'd in Cato's patriot breast,
And bade a dying Socrates be blest:
All, all but virtue is a school boy's theme,
The air-dress'd phantom of a virgin's dream;
A gilded toy, that homebred fools desire,
That coxcombs boast of, and that mobs admire:
Her radiant graces every bliss unfold,
And turn whate'er she touches into gold.

THE

BIRTH AND EDUCATION OF GENIUS.

A TALE.

Yes, Harriet! say whate'er you can,
'Tis education makes the man:
Whate'er of genius we inherit,
Exalted sense, and lively spirit,
Must all be disciplin'd by rules,
And take their colour from the schools.

'Twas nature gave that cheek to glow,
That breast to rise in hills of snow,
Those sweetly temper'd eyes to shine
Above the sapphires of the mine.
But all your more majestic charms,
Where grace presides, where spirit warms;
That shape which falls by just degrees,
And flows into the pomp of ease;
That step, whose motion seems to swim,
That melting harmony of limb,

VOL. X.

Were form'd by Glover's skilful glance,
At Chelsea, when you learnt to dance.

'Tis so with man.—His talents rest
Mishapen embryos in his breast;
Till education's eye explore
The sleeping intellectual pow'rs,
Awakes the dawn of wit and sense,
And lights them into excellence.
On this depends the patriot flame,
The fine ingenuous feel of fame,
The manly spirit, brave and bold,
Superior to the taint of gold,
The dread of infamy, the zeal
Of honour, and the public weal,
And all those virtues which presage
The glories of a rising age.

But, leaving all these graver things
To statesmen, moralists, and kings,
Whose business 'tis such points to settle—
Ring—and bid Robin bring the kettle.
Meanwhile the muse, whose sportive strain
Flows like her voluntary vein,
And impudently dares aspire
To share the wreath with Swift and Prior,
Shall tell an allegoric tale,
Where truth lies hid beneath the veil.

One April morn, as Phœbus play'd
His carols in the Delphic shade,
A nymph, call'd Fancy, blithe and free,
The fav'rite child of Liberty,
Heard, as she rov'd about the plain,
The bold enthusiastic strain;
She heard, and led by warm desire,
To know the artist of the lyre,
Crept softly to a sweet alcove,
Hid in the umbrage of the grove,
And, peeping through the myrtle, saw
A handsome, young, celestial beau,
On nature's sofa stretch'd along,
Awaking harmony and song.

Struck with his fine majestic mien,
As certain to be lov'd as seen,
Long ere the melting air was o'er
She cry'd, in ecstasy, Encore:
And, what a prude will think but odd,
Popp'd out, and curtsied to the god.
Phœbus, gallant, polite, and keen as
Each earth-born votary of Venus,
Rose up, and with a graceful air
Address'd the visionary fair;
Excus'd his morning dishabille,
Complain'd of late he had been ill.
In short, he gaz'd, he bow'd, he sigh'd,
He sung, he flatter'd, pref'd, and ly'd,
With such a witchery of art,
That Fancy gave him all her heart,
Her catechism quite forgot,
And waited on him to his grot.

In length of time she bore a son,
As brilliant as his sire the Sun.
Pure ether was the vital ray
That lighted up his finer clay;
The nymphs, the rosy-finger'd hours,
The dryads of the woods and bow'rs,
The graces with their loosen'd zones,
The muses with their harps and crowns,

D d

Young zephyrs of the softest wing,
The loves that wait upon the spring,
Wit with his gay associate mirth,
Attended at the infant's birth,
And said, let Genius be his name,
And his the fairest wreath of fame.

The gossips gone, the christ'ning o'er,
And Genius now 'twixt three and four,
Phœbus, according to the rule,
Resolv'd to send his son to school:
And, knowing well the tricks of youth,
Resign'd him to the matron Truth,
Whose hut, unknown to pride and pelf, was Near his own oracle at Delphos.

The rev'rend dame, who found the child
A little mischievous, and wild,
Taught him at first to spell and read,
To say his prayers, and get his creed—
Would often tell him of the sky,
And what a crime it is to lie.
She chid him when he did amiss,
When well, she bless'd him with a kiss.
Her sister temp'rance, sage, and quiet,
Presided at his meals and diet:
She watch'd him with religious care,
And fed him with the simplest fare;
Would never let the urchin eat
Of pickled pork, or butcher's meat.
But what of aliment earth yields
In gardens, orchards, woods, and fields;
Whate'er of vegetable wealth
Was cultur'd by the hand of health,
She cropp'd and dress'd it, as she knew well,
In many a mess of soup and gruel;
And now and then, to cheer his heart,
Indulg'd him with a Sunday's tart.

A lusty peasant chanc'd to dwell
Hard by the solitary cell:
His name was Labour.—Ere the dawn
Had broke upon the upland lawn,
He hied him to his daily toil,
To turn the glebe, or mend the soil.
With him young Genius oft would go
O'er dreary wastes of ice and snow,
With rapture climb the cloud-topt hill,
Or wade across the shallow rill;
Or through th' entangled wood pursue
The footsteps of a straggling ewe.
By these fatigues he got at length
Robustness, and athletic strength,
Spirits as light as flies the gale
Along the lily-silver'd vale.
The cherub health, of dimple fleck,
Sat radiant on his rosy cheek,
And gave each nerve's elastic spring
The vigour of an eaglet's wing.

'Time now had roll'd, with smooth career,
Our hero through his seventh year.
Though in a rustic cottage bred,
The busy imp had thought and read:
He knew th' adventures, one by one,
Of Robin Hood and Little John;
Could sing with spirit, warmth, and grace,
The woeful hunt of Chevy Chase;
And how St. George, his fiery nag on,
Destroy'd the vast Egyptian dragon.

Chief he admir'd that learned piece
Wrote by the fabulist of Greece,
Where wisdom speaks in crows and cocks,
And cunning sneaks into a fox.
In short, as now his op'ning parts,
Ripe for the culture of the arts,
Became in ev'ry hour acuter,
Apollo look'd out for a tutor;
But had a world of pains to find
This artist of the human mind.
For, in good truth, full many an ass was Among the doctors of Parnassus,
Who scarce had skill enough to teach
Old Lilly's elements of speech;
And knew as much of men and morals
As doctor Rock of ores and corals.
At length, with much of thought and care,
He found a master for his heir;
A learned man, adroit to speak
Pure Latin, and your attic Greek;
Well known in all the courts of fame,
And Criticism was his name.

Beneath a tutor keen and fine as
Or Aristotle, or Longinus,
Beneath a lynx's eye that saw
The slightest literary flaw,
Young Genius trod the path of knowledge,
And grew the wonder of the college.
Old authors were his bosom friends—
He had them at his finger's-ends—
Became an acc'rate imitator
Of truth, propriety, and nature;
Display'd in every just remark
The strong sagacity of Clark;
And pointed out the false and true
With all the sun beams of Bosu.

But though this critic sage refin'd
His pupil's intellectual mind,
And gave him all that keen discerning
Which marks the character of learning;
Yet, as he read with much of glee
The trifles of antiquity,
And, Bentley like, would write epistles
About the origin of whistles;
The scholar took his master's trim,
And grew identically him;
Employ'd a world of pains to teach us
What nation first invented breeches;
Asserted that the Roman socks
Were broider'd with a pair of clocks;
That Capua serv'd up with her victuals
An olio of Venafran pickles;
That Sisygambis dress'd in blue,
And wore her tresses in a queue.
In short, he knew what Paulus Jovius,
Salmasius, Grævius, and Gronovius,
Have said in fifty folio volumes,
Printed by Elzevir in columns.

Apollo saw, with pride and joy,
The vast improvement of his boy;
But yet had more than slight suspicion,
That all this load of erudition
Might overlay his parts at once,
And turn him out a letter'd dunce.
He saw the lad had fill'd his sense
With things of little consequence;

That though he read, with application,
The wits of every age and nation,
And could, with nice precision, reach
The boldest metaphors of speech;
Yet warp'd too much, in truth's defiance,
From real to fictitious science,
He was, with all his pride and parts,
A mere mechanic in the arts,
That measures with a rule and line
What nature meant for great and fine.

Phœbus, who saw it right and wise was,
To counteract this fatal bias,
Took home his son with mighty haste,
And sent him to the school of taste.
This school was built by wealth and peace,
Some ages since, in elder Greece,
Just when the Stagyrite had writ
His lectures on the pow'rs of wit.
Here, flush'd in all the bloom of youth,
Sat beauty in the shrine of truth.
Here, all the finer arts were seen
Assembled round their virgin queen.
Here, sculpture on a bolder plan
Ennobled marble into man.
Here, music, with a soul on fire,
Impassion'd, breath'd along the lyre;
And here, the painter muse display'd
Diviner forms of light and shade.

But, such the fate, as Hesiod sings,
Of all our sublunary things,
When now the Turk, with sword and halter,
Had drove religion from her altars,
And delug'd with a sea of blood
The academic dome and wood;
Affrighted taste, with wings unfurl'd,
Took refuge in the western world;
And settled on the Tuscan main,
With all the muses in his train.

In this calm scene, where taste withdrew,
And science trimm'd her lamp anew;
Young Genius rang'd in every part
The visionary worlds of art,
And from their finish'd forms refin'd
His own congenial warmth of mind,
And learn'd with happy skill to trace
The magic powers of ease and grace:
His style grew delicately fine,
His numbers flow'd along his line,
His periods manly, full, and strong,
Had all the harmony of song.
Whene'er his images betray'd
Too strong a light, too weak a shade,
Or in the graceful and the grand
Confess'd inelegance of hand,
His noble master, who could spy
The slightest fault with half an eye,
Set right by one ethereal touch,
What seem'd too little or too much;
Till every attitude and air
Arose supremely full and fair.

Genius was now among his betters
Distinguish'd as a man of letters.
There wanted still, to make him please,
The splendour of address and ease,
The soul-enchanting mien and air,
Such as we see in Grosvenor-Square

When Lady Charlotte speaks and moves,
Attended by a swarm of loves.

Genius had got, to say the truth,
A manner awkward and uncouth;
Sure fate of all who love to dwell
In wisdom's solitary cell:
So much a clown in gait, and laugh,
He wanted but a scrip and staff;
And such a beard as hung in candles
Down to Diogenes's sandals,
And planted all his chin thick,
To be like him a dirty cynic.

Apollo, who, to do him right,
Was always perfectly polite,
Chagrin'd to see his son and heir
Dishonour'd by his gape and stare,
Resolv'd to send him to Versailles,
To learn a minuet of Marseilles:
But Venus, who had deeper reading
In all the mysteries of breeding,
Observ'd to Phœbus, that the name
Of fop and Frenchman was the same.
French manners were, she said, a thing which
Those grave misguided fools, the English,
Had, in despite of common sense,
Mistook for manly excellence;
By which their nation strangely sunk is,
And half their nobles turn'd to monkeys.
She thought it better, as the case was,
To send young Genius to the graces:
Those sweet divinities, she said,
Would form him in the myrtle shade;
And teach him more, in half an hour,
Than Lewis or his pompadour.

Phœbus agreed—the graces took
Their noble pupil from his book,
Allow'd him at their side to rove
Along their own domestic grove,
Amidst the sound of melting lyres,
Soft-wreathing smiles, and young desires:
And when confin'd by winds or show'rs,
Within their amaranthine bow'rs,
They taught him with address and skill
To shine at ombre and quadrille;
Or let him read an ode or play,
To wing the gloomy hour away.

Genius was charm'd—divinely plac'd
'Midst beauty, wit, politeness, taste;
And, having every hour before him
The finest models of decorum,
His manners took a fairer ply,
Expression kindled in his eye;
His gesture disengag'd, and clean,
Set off a fine majestic mien;
And gave his happy pow'r to please
The noblest elegance of ease.

Thus, by the discipline of art,
Genius shone out in head and heart.
Form'd from his first fair bloom in youth,
By Temp'rance and her sister Truth,
He knew the scientific page
Of every clime and every age;
Had learnt with critic skill to rein
The wildness of his native vein;
That critic-skill, though cool and chaste,
Refin'd beneath the eye of Taste;

His unforbidding mien and air,
His awkward gait, his haughty stare,
And every stain that wit debases,
Were melted off among the Graces;
And Genius rose, in form and mind,
The first, the greatest of mankind.

A LETTER TO A CLERGYMAN,

Occasioned by a report of his Patron's being made one of the Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal, 1756.

IF fame, dear Mun! the truth reveals,
Your friend, the baron, has the seals,
With two compeers, his reverend brothers,—
Willes and Sir Eardly, are the others.

Justice, who long had seen impress'd
Her fairest image on his breast,
Plac'd him her substitute, to awe
The nation on her bench of law!
And now, to make her work complete,
Has thron'd him on her mercy-seat.

I'll hold you, Mun! an honest guinea,
That pest ambition's busy in you;
You mind no more your little crops,
Nor ever ask the price of hops;
Nor grieve about such idle things
As half the trumps, and all the kings:
But, blest each night with objects brighter,
Behold a visionary mitre;

And see the verger near you stand
Majestic with his silver wand.

Well---if, as matters now foretel it,
It is your fate to be a prelate;
Though loth to lose the comic strain,
The song, and ev'ry mirthful vein,
Which oft have made me full of glee,
And kept my spirits up till three;
Yet, fond to see, when pray'rs begin,
E-----d, thy heteroclite chin,
With all that venerable bush on,
Reposing on a velvet cushion;
I would the man of humour quit,
And think the bishop worth the wit.

But, hark you, L-----r! as you mean
To be a bishop, or a dean,
And must, of course, look grave, and big,
I'd have you get a better wig:
You know full well, when cheek by jole,
We waited on his Grace at Knowl;
Though that trim artist, barber Jackson,
Spent a whole hour about your caxon,
With irons hot, and fingers plastic,
To make it look ecclesiastic;
With all his pains, and combs, and care,
He scarce could curl a single hair.

It would be right too, let me tell you,
To buy a gown of new prunella;
And bid your maid, the art who knows,
Repair your cassock at the elbows.

Lord! what a sudden alteration
Will wait on your exalted station!
Cawthorn, too proud a prince to flatter,
Who calls thee nought but Mun and L-----r,
Will now put on a softer mien,
And learn to lisp out Mr. Dean;

Or, if you're made a mitred peer,
Humbly entreat your grace's ear.

Poor Adams too, will funk and stare,
And trembling steal behind your chair;
Or else, with holy zeal addressing,
Drop on his knees, and ask your blessing.

And now, my worthy friend! ere yet
We read it in the next Gazette,
That Tuesday last a royal writ
Was sent by Secretary Pitt
To all and singular the stalls
Prebendal in the church of Paul's,
Commanding them to choose and name
A bishop of unspotted fame:
And warmly recommending thee
As prelate of the vacant see;
It will not be amiss to know
Beforehand what you have to do.

First, as you'll want a grave divine
To wait upon you when you dine,
To guard your kitchen from disorders,
And school the youths who come for orders;
Take not an academic saplin,
But, for your life, make S-----n chaplain.
He's tall, and solemn, soft, and sleek,
Well read in Latin, and in Greek;
A proper man to tell the clerum
About Eusebius, and St. Jerom;
And would as soon a fiend embrace as
Give up a jot of Athanasius.

Then, as to what a bishop fleeces,
In procurations, fines, and leases,
And hoarding up a world of pelf,
You'll want no steward but yourself:
For, faith! your lordship has great skill in
The virtues of a splendid shilling;
And know, as well as Child and Hoare*,
That two and two will make up four.

THE REGULATION OF THE PASSIONS

THE SOURCE OF HUMAN HAPPINESS.

A Moral Essay.

Dunque ne l' Ufo per cui fur concessa
L' impieghi il foggio Duce, e le governi:
Et a suo Senno or tepide, or ardenti,
Le faccia: et or le affretti, et or le allenti.

TASSO.

Yes, yes, dear Stoic! hide it as you can,
The sphere of pleasure is the sphere of man:
This warms our wishes, animates our toil,
And forms alike a Newton, or an Hoyle;
Gives all the soul to all the soul regards,
Whether she deal in planets, or in cards.

In every human breast there lives enshrined
Some atom pregnant with th' ethereal mind;
Some plastic pow'r, some intellectual ray,
Some genial sun-beam from the source of day;
Something that, warm and restless to aspire,
Works the young heart, and sets the soul on fire,
And bids us all our inborn pow'rs employ
To catch the phantom of ideal joy.

* Two bankers.

Were it not so, the soul, all dead and lost,
Like the tall cliff beneath th' impassive frost,
Form'd for no end, and impotent to please,
Would lie inactive on the couch of ease:
And, heedless of proud fame's immortal lay,
Sleep all her dull divinity away.

And yet, let but a zephyr's breath begin
To stir the latent excellence within---
Wak'd in that moment's elemental strife,
Impassion'd genius feels the breath of life;
Th' expanding heart delights to leap and glow,
The pulse to kindle, and the tear to flow:
Strong and more strong the light celestial shines,
Each thought ennobles, and each sense refines,
Till all the soul, full op'ning to the flame,
Exalts to virtue what she felt for fame.
Hence, just as nature points the kindred fire,
One plies the pencil, one awakes the lyre;
This, with an Halley's luxury of soul,
Calls the wild needle back upon the pole,
Maps half the winds, and gives the sail to fly
In ev'ry ocean of the arctic sky;
While he whose vast capacious mind explores
All nature's scenes, and nature's God adores, Skill'd in each drug the varying world provides,
All earth embosoms, and all ocean hides;
Expels, like Heberden, the young disease,
And softens anguish to the smile of ease.

The passions then all human virtue give,
Fill up the soul, and lend her strength to live.
To them we owe fair truth's unspotted page,
The gen'rous patriot, and the moral sage;
The hand that forms the geometric line,
The eye that pierces through th' unbow'll'd mine,
The tongue that thunders eloquence along,
And the fine ear that melts it into song.

And yet these passions which, on nature's plan,
Call out the hero while they form the man,
Warp'd from the sacred line that nature gave,
As meanly ruin as they nobly save.
Th' ethereal soul that heav'n itself inspires
With all its virtues, and with all its fires,
Led by these syrens to some wild extreme,
Sets in a vapour when it ought to beam;
Like a Dutch sun that in the autumnal sky
Looks through a fog, and rises but to die.
But he whose active, unencumber'd mind
Leaves this low earth, and all its mists behind,
Fond in a pure unclouded sky to glow,
Like the bright orb that rises on the Po,
O'er half the globe with steady splendour shines,
And ripens virtues as it ripens mines.

Whoever thinks, must see that man was made
To face the storm, not languish in the shade:
Action's his sphere, and, for that sphere design'd,
Eternal pleasures open on his mind.
For this, fair hope leads on th' impassion'd soul
Through life's wild labyrinths to her distant goal;
Paints in each dream, to fan the genial flame,
The pomp of riches, and the pride of fame;
Or fondly gives reflection's cooler eye
A glance, an image of a future sky.

Yet, though kind Heav'n points out th' unerring road,
That leads through nature up to bliss and God;

Spite of that God, and all his voice divine,
Speaks in the heart, or teaches from the shrine,
Man, feebly vain, and impotently wise,
Disdains the manna sent him from the skies;
Tasteless of all that virtue gives to please,
For thought too active, and too mad for ease,
From wish to wish in life's mad vortex tost,
For ever struggling, and for ever lost;
He scorns religion, though her seraphs call,
And lives in rapture, or not lives at all.

And now, let loose to all our hopes and fears,
As pride inspires, or ambition tears,
From ev'ry tie, from ev'ry duty freed,
Without a balance, and without a creed,
Dead ev'ry sense, each particle divine,
And all the man embruted in the swine;
These drench in luxury's ambrosial bowl
Reason's last spark, and drain off all the soul.
Those for vain wealth fly on from pole to pole,
Where winds can waft them, and where seas can roll.

While others, wearied with the farce of pow'r,
Or mad with riot in the midnight hour,
With Spain's proud monarch to a cell retire,
Or, Nero like, set half the globe on fire.

Stretch'd on high-tow'ring Dover's sandy bed,
Without a coffin, and without a head;
A dirty sail cloth o'er his body thrown,
By marks of misery almost unknown,
Without a friend to pity, or to save,
Without a dirge to consecrate the grave,
Great Suffolk lies—he who for years had shone,
England's sixth Henry! nearest to thy throne.
What boots it now, that list'ning senates hung
All ear, all rapture on his angel tongue?
Ah! what avails th' enormous blaze between
His dawn of glory, and his closing scene!
When haughty France his heav'n-born pow'rs ador'd,

And Anjou's princess sheath'd Britannia's sword!
Ask ye what bold conspiracy oppress'd
A chief so honour'd, and a chief so blest?
Why, lust of power, that wreck'd his rising fame
On courts' vain shallows, and the gulf of shame:
A Glo'ster's murder, and a nation's wrongs,
Call'd loud for vengeance with ten thousand tongues;

And hasten'd death, on Albion's chalky strand,
To end the exile by a pirate's hand.

Pleasure, my friend! on this side folly lies;
It may be vig'rous, but it must be wise:
And when our organs once that end attain,
Each step beyond it is a step to pain.
For ask the man whose appetites pursue
Each loose Roxana of the stew;
Who cannot eat till luxury refine
His taste, and teach him how to dine;
Who cannot drink till Spain's rich vintage flow,
Mix'd with the coolness of December's snow:
Ask him, if all those ecstasies that move
The pulse of rapture, and the rage of love,
When wine, wit, woman, all their pow'rs employ,
And ev'ry sense is lost in ev'ry joy,
E'er fill'd his heart, and beam'd upon his breast
Content's full sunshine, with the calm of rest?

No—virtue only gives fair peace to shine
 And health, O sacred temperance! is thine.
 Hence the poor peasant, whose laborious spade
 Rids the rough crag of half its heath and shade,
 Feels in the quiet of his genial nights
 A bliss more genuine than the club at White's :
 And has in full exchange for fame and wealth,
 Herculean vigour, and eternal health.

Of blooming genius, judgment, wit, possess'd,
 By poets envied, and by peers carefs'd;
 By royal mercy sav'd from legal doom,
 With royal favour crown'd for years to come,
 O hadst thou, Savage! known thy lot to prize,
 And sacred held fair friendship's gen'rous ties;
 Hadst thou, sincere to wisdom, virtue, truth,
 Curb'd the wild sallies of impetuous youth;
 Had but thy life been equal to thy lays,
 In vain had envy strove to blast thy bays;
 In vain thy mother's unrelenting pride
 Had strove to push thee helpless from her side;
 Fair competence had lent her genial dow'r,
 And smiling peace adorn'd thy evening-hour;
 True pleasure would have led thee to her shrine,
 And every friend to merit had been thine.
 Bless'd with the choicest boon that heav'n can give,
 Thou then hadst learnt with dignity to live:
 The scorn of wealth, the threats of want to brave,
 Nor fought from prison a refuge in the grave.

Th' immortal Rembrandt all his pictures made
 Soft as their union into light and shade:
 Whene'er his colours wore too bright an air,
 A kindred shadow took off all the glare;
 Whene'er that shadow, carelessly embrown'd,
 Stole on the tints, and breath'd a gloom around,
 Th' attentive artist threw a warmer dye,
 Or call'd a glory from a pictur'd sky;
 Till both th' opposing powers mix'd in one,
 Cool as the night, and brilliant as the sun.

Passions, like colours, have their strength and ease,

Those too insipid, and too gaudy these:
 Some on the heart, like Spagnoletti's, throw
 Fictitious horrors, and a weight of woe;
 Some, like Albano's, catch from ev'ry ray
 Too strong a sunshine, and too rich a day;
 Others, with Carlo's Magdalens, require
 A quicker spirit, and a touch of fire;
 Or want, perhaps, though of celestial race,
 Corregio's softness, and a Guido's grace.

Wou'dst thou then reach what Rembrandt's genius knew,

And live the model that his pencil drew,
 Form all thy life with all his warmth divine,
 Great as his plan, and faultless as his line;
 Let all thy passions, like his colours, play,
 Strong without harshness, without glaring gay:
 Contrast them, curb them, spread them, or confine,

Ennoble these, and those forbid to shine;
 With cooler shades ambition's fire allay,
 And mildly melt the pomp of pride away;
 Her rainbow-robe from vanity remove,
 And soften malice with the smile of love;
 Bid o'er revenge the charities prevail,
 Nor let a grace be seen without a veil:

So shalt thou live as heav'n itself design'd,
 Each pulse congenial with th' informing mind,
 Each action station'd in its proper place,
 Each virtue blooming with its native grace,
 Each passion vig'rous to its just degree,
 And the fair whole a perfect symmetry.

THE LOTTERY.

INSCRIBED TO MISS H——.

CAWTHORN had once a mind to fix
 His carease in a coach and six,
 And live, if his estate would bear it,
 On turtle, ortolans, and claret:
 For this he went, at fortune's call,
 To wait upon her at Guildhall;
 That is, like many other thick wits,
 He bought a score of lottery tickets,
 And saw them rise in dreadful ranks
 Converted to a score of blanks.

Amaz'd, and vex'd to find his scheme
 Delusive as a midnight dream,
 He curs'd the goddess o'er and o'er,
 Call'd her a mercenary whore;
 Swore that her dull capricious sense
 Was always dup'd by impudence,
 That men of wit were but her tools,
 And all her favours were for fools.

He said, and with an angry gripe
 Snatch'd up his speculative pipe;
 And, that he might his grief allay,
 Read half a page in Seneca.

When, lo! a phantom, tall, and thin,
 Knock'd at the door, and enter'd in:
 She wore a party-colour'd robe,
 And seem'd to tread upon a globe—
 Whisk'd round the room with haughty air,
 And toss'd into an elbow chair.
 Then with a bold terrific look,
 Which made the doctor drop his book,
 Address'd him thus: Thou wicked varlet!
 Art not ashamed to call me harlot?
 Why, what's thy consequence and parts,
 Thy skill in letters, or in arts,
 That I, poor fortune! must be lectur'd,
 Kick'd, bully'd, curs'd, abus'd, and hector'd,
 Because, forsooth—a fever roast thee,—
 Thou'rt not so wealthy as Da Costa?

However, as thou hast some virtues,
 And know'st my fav'rite Tom Curteis,
 I'll point thee out a way to be Almost as rich a man as he.

Send to the bank this day and buy
 Ten tickets in the lottery;
 And bid your honest friend, the broker,
 Endorse the name of M— H——;
 The sacred numbers then consign
 Devoutly to the fair-one's shrine:
 That is, in humbler rhetoric,
 Present them by your footman Dick,
 And tell her, in a billet-doux,
 " My dear, these tickets are for you,
 " An offering from an heart that's split
 " Asunder by your sense and wit,

" Yet has the grace, to tell you true,
 " To keep its own dear ends in view,
 " And therefore hopes you'll not forget
 " To give me half of what you get."

My life on't, Jemmy, thou'lt be great—
 Five thousand pounds! a good estate:
 For be assur'd, that though the poets,
 The small philosophers, and no-wits,
 Pretend that I'm to worth unkind,
 And impudently paint me blind,
 I yet can see thy charmer's merit,
 Her taste, her dignity, and spirit;
 Have often listen'd to her song,
 And stole persuasion from her tongue;
 And am resolv'd, though all the shrews,
 Stock-jobbers, brokers, pimps, and Jews,
 Frown, curse, expostulate, and rally,
 With all the tongues of all the alley,
 To give her, out of love and zeal,
 The richest number in the wheel.

LADY JANE GREY TO LORD GUILFORD DUDLEY.

AN EPISTLE.

In the Manner of Ovid.

FROM these dark cells, in fable pomp array'd,
 Where night's black horrors breathe a deeper shade,
 Where ev'ry hour some awful vision brings
 Of pale assassins and the shrouds of kings,
 What comforts can a wretched wife afford
 The last sad moments of her dying lord?
 With what fond tear, what love-impassion'd sigh,
 Sooth the dear mourner ere he reach the sky?

Ye pow'rs of song that ev'ry chord inspire
 When Rome's soft Ovid weeps along his lyre;
 Ye angel-sounds that Troy's great Hector mourn,
 When his lost consort bleeds upon his urn!
 Teach me, ye warblers! teach this strain of woe
 Like you to kindle, and like you to flow.

Alas! in vain ye bid your warmth divine
 Wake all the string, and live through all the line.
 Spite of those warmths, th' immortal numbers roll
 Cool from my hand, and faithless to my soul;
 Too faint a wish, too calm a sigh impart,
 Hide half my grief, and tell but half my heart;
 Lose the fond anguish of this flowing tear,
 And the keen pang that tears and tortures there.

'Tis said that souls, to love's soft union wrought,
 Converse by silent sympathy of thought:
 O! then with that mysterious art divine
 The fierce impatience of my breast be thine:
 And when some tender, recollecting sigh
 Pours the big passion from each weeping eye,
 When wrapt, and wild, thy fond ideas roll,
 And all my image takes up all thy soul;
 Think that my breast the same dear tumults move,
 As keen an anguish, and as soft a love;
 Think that I hear thy pray'rs, explore thy fears,
 Sigh to thy sighs, and weep with all thy tears;
 From all thy wishes, all thy phrenzies see,
 And feel for Guilford all he feels for me,

Ah! where are now the joys my fancy drew
 For ever blooming, and for ever new!

Where the dear scenes that meditation aid,
 The rill's soft murmur, and th' embow'ring shade;
 Where all the heartfelt charities that move
 The warmths of rapture in the pulse of love!
 Lost, lost for ever, like th' ethereal fire
 Shot through the sky to glitter and expire.

Hide it, ye pow'rs! the sad, the solemn day
 That gave a Dudley to the house of Grey:
 For, O! when to the altar's foot we came,
 And each fond eye confess'd the kindling flame;
 Just as the priest had join'd my hand to thine
 An awful tremor shook the hallow'd shrine,
 A sudden gloom the sacred walls array'd,
 And round the tapers threw an azure shade;
 The winds blew hollow with the voice of pain,
 Aërial echoes sigh'd through all the fane:
 'Twas God himself, that from th' empyreal sky,
 Look'd unpropitious on the nuptial tie,
 And pitying taught, as prophecies of woe,
 The shrines to tremble, and the wind to blow.

O! had thy blood drunk in some fell disease,
 From each chill pinion of th' autumnal breeze,
 Had yon keen sun, with all the rage of pain,
 Wing'd every pulse, and scorch'd up every vein,
 Extinguish'd Guilford ere he liv'd his span,
 It had been nature and the fate of man.
 Heav'ns! had my cares but ceas'd thy parting breath,

In life's last moment, and the gasp of death,
 Explor'd the dear imperfect sounds that hung
 Loose on each fibre of the fault'ring tongue,
 Cool'd the fond phrenzies of thy parting sigh,
 Wip'd the warm drop from each expiring eye;
 I had but known what many a virtuous pair
 Are doom'd to suffer, and are doom'd to bear:
 But, O! in thought's wild images to see
 My glories fall, proud infamy! like thee;
 See, 'midst the murmur of a million sighs,
 The sabre glitter, and the scaffold rise;
 To see my Guilford moving sadly slow
 Through ranks of warriors, and the pomps of
 woe;

See him, while bending o'er his awful bier,
 Shed the keen anguish of too warm a tear,
 A tear that from the warmths of love proceeds,
 And melts the husband, while the hero bleeds—

Bleed, did I say!—Tear, tear, ye pow'rs of art!
 Sense, nature, memory, from my tortur'd heart:
 And thou,—beneath the pole's black umbrage laid,

Oblivion! daughter of the midnight shade!
 With all thy glooms, and all thy mists, remove
 Each sweet idea of connubial love:
 Hide the dear man whose virtues first impress'd
 Too fond an image on my virgin breast;
 From all the softness of my soul efface
 His every beauty, and his every grace;
 And force that soul with patience to resign
 All the dear ties that bound her fast to thine.

Alas! vain effort of misguided zeal!
 What pow'r can force affliction not to feel?
 What saint forbid this throbbing breast to glow,
 This sigh to murmur, and this tear to flow?
 Still honest nature lives her anguish o'er,
 Still the fond woman bleeds at every pore.

D d iiij

Ah! when my soul, all panting to aspire,
Each sense enraptur'd, and each wish on fire,
On all the wings of heav'n-born virtue flies
To yon bright sunshine, yon unclouded skies;
Spite of the joys that heav'n and bliss impart,
A softer image heaves within my heart;
Impassions nature in the springs of life,
And calls the seraph back into the wife.

Yet say, my Guilford? say, why wilt thou
move

These idle visions of despairing love?
Why wilt thou still, with every grace and art,
Spread through my veins, and kindle in my heart?

O let my soul far other transports feel,
Wing'd with thy hopes, and warm'd with all thy zeal,

And thou in yon imperial heav'n enshrin'd,
Eternal effluence of th' eternal mind!
O grace divine! on this frail bosom ray
One gleam of comfort from the source of day—
She comes, and all my opening breast inspires
With holy ardours, and seraphic fires:
Rapt, and sublime, my kindling wishes roll,
A brighter sunshine breaks upon my soul;
Strong, and more strong the light celestial shines,
Each thought ennobles, and each sense refines:
Each human pang, each human bliss retires,
All earth-born wishes, and all low desires,
The pangs of empire, grandeur, wealth decay,
And all the world's vain phantoms fade away.

Rise, ye sad scenes: ye black ideas rise,
Rise, and dispute the empire of the skies:
Ye horrors come, and o'er my senses throw
Terrific visions and a pomp of woe;
Call up the scaffold in its dread parade,
Bid the knell echo through the midnight shade;
Full in my sight the robe funereal wave,
Swell the loud dirge, and open all my grave;
Yet shall my soul, all-conscious of her God,
Resign'd and fainted for the blest abode,
The last sad horrors of her exit eye,
Without a tremor, and without a sigh.

Ah!—while heav'n shall leave one pulse of life

I still am woman, and am still a wife;
My hov'ring soul, though ras'd to heav'n by prayer,

Still bends to earth, and finds one sorrow there:
There, there, alas! the voice of nature calls,
A nation trembles, and a husband falls

O! would to heav'n I could like Zeno boast
A breast of marble, and a soul of frost,
Calm as old Chaos, ere his waves begun
To know a zephyr, or to feel a sun.
Romantic wish! for O, ye powers divine!
Was ever misery, ever grief like mine?
For ever round me glares a tragic scene,
And now the woman bleeds, and now the queen:
Now back to Edward's recent grave convey'd,
Talk with fond phrenzy to his potless shade;
Now wildly image all his sister's rage,
The baleful fury of the rising age;
Behold her sanguinary banners fly
Loose to the breezes of a British sky;

See England's genius quit th' imperial dome
To Spain's proud tyrant, and the slaves of Rome;
